hero's shadow

by feelingstabby

Summary

Izuku doesn't cry. He is a weapon, and weapons don't weep.

He won't cry until the battle, when he's falling through the air, when it settles in just how real it is that he's going to die, because yeah, the doctor warned him this would happen, but there's always been a part of Izuku that thought he'd live forever.

Just like his father told him.

Or, how a few heroes help Midoriya Izuku become something more than a lost vigilante.

Notes

i've had this one in my drafts for a long time, so here we go. this fic was created when i decided to take izuku and put him through the most horrific things to see what would happen. i wanted to see where it would lead him, and this is the result

Time is a funny, funny thing. But it doesn't make Izuku laugh.

He drops from the air, hitting the ground with all the grace of a cat, and runs.

He should be commended, really, since he's choosing to run rather than fight. The two heroes chasing after him won't stand a chance if they catch him.

Well, mostly. He likes to think so, anyway.

Izuku adjusts his mask, securing it to his face as he weaves in and out of oncoming traffic and onto the sidewalk. Pedestrians shout at him and complain about the less than two second inconvenience he causes them while fleeing for his freedom, but Izuku is used to this. People are always ready to complain or call him an inconvenience.

Those words are old news to him.

He stops, finding an alleyway to turn into, and instantly realizes his mistake. Dead end. Shit.

The hero with the wooden body hops from the roof, landing in front of him.

Kamui Woods, Izuku's brain supplies. Is this a bad time to ask for an autograph?

Behind Izuku, Death Arms must've caught up. He can hear his heavy breathing as he moves to close him in.

"Give it up," Woods says, every word calm and carefully controlled. "You're cornered."

Izuku crouches down and grips the strap of his supplies backpack. Just as he's about to fling himself into the air with his powers burning through his legs to aid him, his breath is knocked out of him. He's thrown against a dumpster, and Death Arms is eyeing his bag and about to rip it away from him.

Pro Heroes, Izuku would like to say, are thieves too. Somehow whenever they do it, though, it's legal.

"Oh, hey guys," Izuku says nonchalantly. "Nice weather today, wouldn't you say?"

He leans back against the wall behind him, using it as support as he hikes his knees up and aims a powerful kick into Death Arm's stomach when he gets too close. Izuku darts past him while he stumbles in pain, momentarily distracted.

"I would love to stay and talk," he calls, "but I've got places to be and all! You know how it is!"

"Son of a—" Woods suddenly enlarges his arms to stop the boy's second attempt at escape. Izuku dodges out of the way and spins on his heel, only just having time to catch the meaty fist flying towards his head. He looks up and stares at the wide-eyed look on Death Arms' face, still holding the fist tightly.

"That was close," Izuku admits, slightly put off. He throws the arm back at him, shaking out his hand as the sting from the catch sets in. "You're good at scaring me, sir!"

Death Arms steps back and glares down at him, something like trepidation flashing across his expression. "Wait, he's just a kid."

I'm literally right here.

The wooden hero approaches, hesitant now, eyeing him a bit differently. He can't do a lot with his quirk in such a limited space,

Izuku knows. The hero specializes in support, not so much close combat. “How old are you?”

Izuku doesn’t see why that matters, doesn’t see how that will change anything. He takes a couple of steps backward, surrounded again, and raises his hand in warning. He knows to avoid hesitation, but he’s sort of curious now.

“Is being an asshole delinquent enough reason?” Death Arms retorts, and Izuku giggles. I'd love this guy a lot more if he didn't just try to punch a hole in my face.

Woods throws his friend an exasperated look. “You know why, Rabbit. Public quirk usage without a license, armed assault, vigilantism, attempted murder, and more things I can’t bother to name.” He wags a finger at him. “You’re putting a lot of people in danger, including yourself, and it’s illegal, kid.”

Izuku hums, feigning innocence. “Don’t forget grand theft and arson. I worked hard for those.”

Honestly, he doesn’t know why his client needs this bag so badly. He doesn’t usually ask questions if it doesn’t involve him, not unless he’s under some prior suspicions that they’ll hurt innocent people with what they request from Izuku. He learned a long time ago that when it comes to some people, it’s best not to know.

So he just does his little jobs and collects his rewards with his head down and his brain turned off.

That’s how he’s survived so far, so he’s going to keep it that way. It’s not like he’s helping villains. At the very least, the people he works with are other morally gray vigilantes with a desire to keep the world free of scumbags. They’re not going to tear down society as it stands like most villains work to do.

And besides, Izuku gets paid for what he does. He needs money to survive, after all.

The boy can’t decide if it’s better or worse than just stealing money and making victims of the super rich.

He still does that occasionally. Only when he needs to, though. But this way, he earns his keep. It's work, even if it is technically dirty and illegal, and that's better than foster care or an orphanage or starving every night.

He's already experienced the last one before, but he's not ready to try his luck out with the other two. He's heard stories and even done his own personal missions surrounding the rectification of the fostering system.

"If you're as young as you sound," Woods starts, a bit softer this time —a compromise. "We can help you. Just turn yourself in."

Izuku knows it isn't that easy, though. He knows what the government does with people like him, and even if he doesn't get locked away in some high security prison like Tartarus once they find out who he is, he'll be tossed aside to fend for himself anyway, just with added leashes around his neck to keep him contained.

No thanks to either.

If Izuku is anything, he's fast. He snags the weapon on his thigh and fires, a thin black cable shooting out of the barrel and sticking to Death Arms' chest. Izuku reels the man toward him and steps to the side as the hero aims a punch in retaliation. Woods has to put up a shield with his quirk as his friend collides into him, sending them both crashing into the side of the building.

"It's been nice," Izuku says to them. He crouches down, preparing to jump again. This time there's no one to stop him, no interruptions. "But I have to get going. See ya next time, gentlemen!"

He flings himself up, his enhancement quirk—Boost, he calls it— sending energy in waves through his calves. His feet are about to touch the roof when wood bindings encase his ankle and yank him down. Izuku grabs the edge of the building and hisses as pain shoots up his leg. He twists around, pulling a knife from his shoe and throwing it in Woods' direction.

The hero deflects it, just as Izuku predicted he would, and the wood slips off his foot just slightly. Not wasting a second, noticing Death Arms moving for the fire escape to head after him, he digs a hand in his back pockets and pulls out a grenade.

To be fair, it's not an actual grenade. It just looks like one, with the same well-recognizable pin and grooves making up its features. It's funny. Izuku loves to see the look on every hero's face when they think they're about to be blown to bits. It's exhilarating.

Maybe just a bit cruel, but hey, Izuku needs some form of excitement! He throws his homemade grenade, fighting back a shit-eating grin.

The second the bomb makes contact with the ground, there's an explosion of hot pink sludge and glitter. It rocks the earth for a moment, splattering both of the heroes and walls around them and sticking them to the floor, effectively immobilizing them.

"What the fuck!" Death Arms shouts. "Get back here you little—"

"Be quiet and help me find a way out of this," Woods interrupts, obviously the more level headed of the two.

Izuku is crouched on the building now, looking down at the scene. Both heroes are fighting, arguing with each other, and for a few seconds, Izuku wonders what it might be like to give up and let them take him in.

Maybe he'd go back with them to the police station. Maybe the heroes wouldn't recognize him for who he is. Maybe they'd give him a chance.

But probably not. The chances of that are low. Too low to risk. Izuku doesn't mind the way things are now, anyway.

Izuku straightens back out, turns, and doesn't look back as he leaps onto the next building and heads deeper into the city.

He's thankful that most pro heroes go easier on him once they see that he's a little younger than most. It's a bit insulting, sure, but he isn't going to look a gift horse in the mouth.

If they're going to willingly hold back and limit themselves in a fight against him, increasing Izuku's own chances at escaping, who is he to stop them?

After he drops off some of the stolen goods to his customers and collects their payments, Izuku makes his way into a warehouse on the outskirts of the city, where his newest clients are spread out around workstations, kicking back with sandwiches and quirk enhanced beers.

Yep, you heard that right. Quirk enhanced. Izuku almost didn't believe it at first when he was doing some background checks on his clients and found that one of them has the power to turn any liquid into an alcoholic beverage.

Literally a Jesus quirk, which is ironic saying as the man with the power is anything but selfless. No matter, though. It's not Izuku's business.

His stomach gives a low growl as he walks across the mostly empty space, largely ignored by the crew. The sandwiches are looking pretty good to him right now. He hasn't eaten since… actually he can't remember right now.

He drops the bag on the desk in front of a man with a goatee, waiting with his arms crossed to receive his cut.

"You're late, brat," Mr. Goatee says as way of greeting. He picks up a stack of cash to his right, counts it, then hands a few bills to Izuku, who doesn't accept it. Not yet.

"That's half of what you promised," Izuku points out, voice slightly muffled by his mask. "That's not good business, you know."

The man snorts and leans back in his chair, leveling Izuku with a glare. "What are you, five? About time you learned life isn't fair." He tilts his head a fraction, eyes roaming over his disheveled look. "Probably should've realized that by now, though. And it's like I said, you were late. Real businessman know to always be on time."

Izuku feels his eye twitch. This isn't the first time someone has tried to short him. Adults can't be trusted to keep their word, or to do anything at all, really. Heroes or criminals, whatever, they're the same.

He lets the money sit there in Mr. Goatee's outstretched hand without breaking eye contact and lifts his chin.

"I was a little distracted," Izuku explains lowly. "Some pros were chasing me."

That seems to garner Mr. Goatee's full attention. "Heroes? Why?"

“Dunno. It wasn’t anyone too important, but they still weren’t easy to outrun.” Izuku shrugs, smiling under his mask. “It was just a C-lister and an A-lister.”

“An A-lister? Who?”

“Oh, y’know, the number ten pro hero.”

Mr. Goatee sucks in a breath at the mention of Kamui Woods, and Izuku sees a built of guilt along with fear in his shining eyes.

Izuku continues with a cocked head. “They were waiting at the spot where your supplies were, so either it was a trap and you knew that and sent me anyway, or someone else had the same idea you did and just spilled the information. But, judging by the look on your face, it sounds like they’re onto you.”

“Better hope not,” the man threatens, looking a little pale. “Because I know who to blame if they are.”

Empty threats. He doesn’t have enough men to waste on Izuku. Not like he’d bother harming the boy, either. The man may be harsh, but he’d never stoop that low. At least, that’s what his files tell Izuku.

Besides, Izuku will survive if Mr. Goatee puts him out. He has plenty of other clients, and not to mention plenty of rich people to steal from on the subways. He doesn’t like that last part so much, but he’ll do it if he has to, even if it does come with a small amount of guilt.

He turns and is about to make his way out of the warehouse without any of the rewards promised when Mr. Goatee calls after him.

“Just take the money, kid.” He sounds gruff, but Izuku knows it’s a front. “You look like you need it. But the next time you’re late you won’t get nothin', you hear? And for fuck’s sake, buy yourself some new clothes, you look homeless.”

Izuku smirks and grabs the entire stack of cash before the man can change his mind. He doesn’t stop walking as he stuffs it in his front pocket and heads out.

Sometimes it’s nice to steal for a living.

“So, let me get this straight,” the head of the police department says, rubbing the bridge of his nose. His eyes move back and forth between the two pro heroes in front of him.

They’re empty handed, and they’re not supposed to be. Both of them sit on the same bed in the medical wing while a nurse puts ointment on their injuries—apparently they ran into some bank robbers on the way back to the station.

They’re minor injuries, not even close to the worst they’ve had before, but still required by law to be treated.

“You two got bested by a teenage boy who jumps around the city in a cheap hoodie and sweatpants?”

Death Arms shifts. He sits next to Woods, obviously uncomfortable—with the situation or with the man’s tone, Naomasa can’t tell. Either way, the hero doesn’t speak up.

“He’s incredibly fast,” Woods says, sounding impressed. “And we stumbled upon him, really. It’s not like it was planned. We were expecting other villains.”

The officer sighs. “I figured you went easy on him. I guess I can’t fault you both too hard, as we’ve had pros on him for months. Every time they chase him around he manages to slip away.”

That’s my cue.

Naomasa steps forward from where he was hanging back and watching quietly. “I’m the detective who was assigned to Rabbit’s case," he greets, "and I’ve been keeping tabs on him for a while. I have to say, you two got closer than a lot of others have, even while going easy on him, so don’t beat yourselves up.”

Three pairs of eyes stare at him, so Naomasa decides to demonstrate. He takes out his phone and shows them the security footage he compiled together a few hours before.

He shows them videos of the vigilante jumping around the city with an occasional bōstaff that support teams have been anxious to discover the properties of. He also plays a shaky video of the boy stopping a more recent mugging from the night before, only for him to turn the tables and rob the mugger.

“Let me introduce you to Rabbit,” Naomasa says as more footage flashes by. “He’s a runner of government property to sources in the underground. He constructs his own weapons with stolen tech from hero agencies all around Japan, and is currently credited with around thirteen agency break ins all around this district and the next. He’s a grand thief, arsonist, and sometimes, vigilante.”

“Whatever he is,” Death Arms grumbles, “he’s insanely strong. He blocked one of my punches like it was nothing.”

The detective shakes his head. “Most of his crimes as a vigilante are in favor of heroes. He’s never done any harm towards pros, and he tends to save civilians and aid us in villain fights whenever he can.”

The police officer turns toward Naomasa. “If we know so much about him, why hasn’t he been brought in yet? I heard Endeavor has a nice streak of catching vigilantes.”

Oh, Naomasa thinks sourly. He sure does.

Endeavor certainly does have a streak. The number two hero will take any means necessary to bring a target in, kid or not. There’s a reason most criminals are deathly afraid of fire after being captured by him.

“He’s harmless to heroes. He doesn’t do much. Bothering Endeavor with something so small will prove to be counterproductive.” Naomasa puts his phone back in his pocket, and when he looks up, the officer’s gaze is still set on him.

“Or maybe he isn’t,” the man argues, shrugging. “The Hero Commission clearly doesn’t think so. They want him off the streets. Gave the order this morning for him to be brought in, or else they'll send someone to do it for us in a few months.”

It makes sense, at least at face value, that the board wants him off the streets. That the Hero Commission wouldn’t want someone like Rabbit to fall into the hands of a villain or someone who might try to turn him against the pros. While he is a vigilante, Rabbit has never outwardly hunted down heroes. But with enough persuasion, there’s no telling if he’ll change those ideals of his.

Naomasa doesn't want that for the teen, but he also isn't sure he's ready to turn him over to the Hero Commission. He seems too young to become a weapon, way too young, and someone like Rabbit has no business at any kind of government facility.

"We should grab him soon," Woods speaks again, his face set in determination. "Faster he's here, sooner he's contained and safe from the villains out there."

"No," Naomasa interrupts. Their gazes are back on him. "We don't need to go get him. I already have someone who's helping me with the case." He shrugs, then answers the questions in their eyes. "He's an underground hero who's dealt with these types of situations before. If anyone can gain Rabbit's trust and make him stop, it's him."

"Not a terrible idea, I guess," the officer concedes after a pause. "What do you guys think? How long do you think it'll take for this kid to get captured?"

Death Arms huffs and rolls his eyes. "To capture one super-powered boy whilst trying not to hurt him too badly? Who knows. It's always the teens without a license that are the most slippery. So stubborn, too."

Naomasa holds back a snort. This is a child wearing pajamas. They're talking about a teen as if catching him will be the hardest mission ever. Sure, the kid may have outsmarted and outtalked all of the heroes sent his way, but Naomasa is sure this time will be different.

It's just convincing Rabbit to turn himself in peacefully that's the issue.

"Leave it to me," he orders, interrupting the betting pool going on about when the mysterious underground hero will drop the case after his inevitable failure. He turns to the officer. "You can tell the Hero Commission I'm working on it. No need to get Endeavor on his tail."

The man frowns and shakes his head, and no doubt he has a ready-made speech about the importance of listening to the Association, but luckily for Naomasa, he has a ready excuse.

"I apologize, but I'm going to be late for a meeting." He looks at the three men and starts to back away into the hallway. "You guys know how it is. I'll launch the operation as soon as possible, so there's no need to stress."

“Of course, Detective. Go on your way,” the officer says, but Naomasa is already out the door. He certainly doesn’t need permission.

Once he’s out of sight, he speeds to his office. His eye catches on the latest poster on the bulletin board on the way; Rabbit’s face is plastered on there, his mask and everything colored in, his face set in a knowing stare.

Erasing the mask and bunny ears on the hood, Naomasa can just see the makings of a troubled teenage boy.

He sighs. “Aizawa is going to kill me after all this.”

Friday nights are free breadstick nights at Tony’s.

It’s a small, family-run pizzeria that Izuku walks an hour and a half to get to from his apartment, but every second is worth it. Izuku loves the time alone when he gets there, and he loves walking into the restaurant where he’s treated like extended family instead of a homeless runaway.

No one at Tony’s tries to accuse him of stealing, and no one hounds him with questions about his home life or if he has anywhere to stay. They don’t assault him or treat him any differently, and for that he’s thankful.

At Tony’s it’s quiet, and it’s just Izuku and a few other people there at all times. That’s all he really needs.

Sometimes he still feels like he has a couple of missing pieces, however, like he’s somehow incomplete. He supposes that’s normal, though. Izuku can’t remember a time when his life felt complete.

Even when he was with his mother as a baby and everything was alright for a while, even when he met Kacchan and became best friends with him, and even when all of that was taken away and he became a vigilante.

Becoming Rabbit made his life fuller, brighter, more worthwhile, but it's still kind of lonely.

The five-year-old girl sitting across from him seems to feel the same way. The family is sitting a few tables away from Izuku, so he gets a clear view of the couple and their child.

The girl colors on the back of her menu with a pink crayon while the parents wait for their pizza, and she picks it up, flips it over so her parents can see, and smiles with all of her teeth.

“Look, it’s us,” she says, bubbly and bright. She points to each stick figure on the paper and names them, finally getting to the blob cradled in what Izuku guesses is the dad’s arms. “And that’s baby sis.”

“Mhm,” she hums. She pushes her menu aside and snatches the one in front of her father, flips it over, and begins drawing another masterpiece. That one includes the nameless baby, too.

Her mother sighs, shaking her head fondly. “They were doing an assignment about siblings in class today, and now she’s convinced that everyone has to have at least one brother or sister. She’s adamant that a sister is on the way.”

Izuku hides his snort behind his own menu. After figuring out what he wants—he always gets the same thing, to be fair—he glances back over at the family, not able to help it. The girl’s mouth slants upward as she concentrates on her drawing, something Izuku knows people only do when they’re completely engrossed in their work.

Ms. Hanako, an older lady with soft blue hair and eyes that Izuku’s familiar with, brings the family’s pizza, along with what looks to be the girl’s second glass of chocolate milk.

Izuku lets his eyes fall over to the empty spaces at his own table. For a few seconds, he wonders what it might be like if he had a sibling sitting next to him, or maybe even parents of his own. Maybe he’d enjoy it, maybe he’d laugh at their conversations, maybe he’d tell some jokes.

But Izuku doesn’t dwell on it for too long, opting to enjoy what he has now instead of what he could have had. Or, more appropriately, what he lost.

He tunes in to the television on the wall, trying to get his mind off of the morning. It's always set on the news—partially because Ms. Hanako lost the remote a long time ago and won't pay for a replacement, and partially because the news is the least problematic thing to show these days.

"Best Jeanist has stopped yet another fiasco here in the third district this afternoon, and civilians are showing their thanks with—"

Same news, different day. Izuku is surprised there's no coverage on his chase with Death Arms and Kamui Woods, though he's not complaining. It wasn't exactly the most interesting or harrowing thing that's happened to him.

They probably don't want the public to know they let a vigilante go, also.

"Hey, sugar," Ms. Hanako greets, setting a water on the table. "Haven't seen you in a while. What have you been up to?"

Izuku notes the way her laugh lines crinkle when she smiles. She looks tired. "Nothing much, ma'am. Walked into a wall this morning, but I'm okay."

She clicks her tongue and shakes her head at his poor attempt at a joke. "You know, I thought that was a bruise on your face but couldn't quite tell. You've gotta stop being so clumsy, boy."

Izuku stiffens, hand coming up to palm at his cheek. "I have a bruise? Already?"

"Yeah, honey, right below your eye." She leans closer. "Tell you what, I'll bring you some ice after I take your order. How does that sound?"

Oh. She's too nice.

The boy grins sheepishly. "You don't have to do that—"

"The usual, I presume?" She doesn't wait for him to reply. "Extra order of breadsticks with a chocolate shake and two slices of pepperoni, coming right up."

And then she's gone, leaving Izuku to stare blankly at the space she occupied. The lady really is a blessing.

With nothing else to do but wait, he pulls out his phone and turns on the camera, staring at the purple and black bruise on his cheekbone that stops right under his eye. Now that he thinks about it, the skin there hurts when he speaks. It stretches painfully across the bone, itchy and sore.

It really is ugly. No wonder he seemed to get more dirty looks than usual on his way here.

He pokes at it with a finger, only to immediately hiss in pain. Fucking Kamui Woods. If he hadn't grabbed the boy's ankle and caused Izuku to slam his face into the edge of the building, he wouldn't look like this.

Whatever. Can't do anything now. It'll go away in the next week or so. For now, though, he'll cover it with his hair.

Izuku really does need a haircut.

He plays Subway Surfer for the next few minutes, tuning in to his surroundings from time to time. The game is fun, sue him. Although it's slightly annoying to play because of how laggy his phone is nowadays. He needs a new one—preferably one he can make himself.

The bell rings, signaling someone walking into the restaurant.

Okay, but the dog in this game is pretty cute. I wish I could adopt it.

"Take a seat wherever, hon," Ms. Hanako calls from behind the counter. "I'll be with you in a moment."

Damn. I need more keys.

He gets a text from Kacchan, and Izuku can almost hear his explosive friend's voice through the screen as he reads the message. Still coming over tomorrow? The hag bought you something.

Izuku lets a small smile fall onto his lips as he replies. Yeah. Might be late, though. Got another job.

Kacchan texts back almost immediately. Whatever, nerd. Just don't fucking get hurt again or I'll kill you.

Bakugou Katsuki is one of the few people who know about his vigilante counterpart. In fact, he's the one that suggested Izuku become Rabbit in the first place.

An ice pack is set in front of him, breaking him out of his thoughts.

Ms. Hanako places the milkshake down as well. “The pizza and breadsticks are almost done,” she tells him, already walking to the newcomer’s booth to get his order.

When the food finally arrives sometime later, the ice pack is warm and the milkshake almost gone. He thanks the woman and digs in, groaning at how good it tastes.

Tony’s pizzeria never disappoints.

He finishes in record time and places a stack of bills on the table before Ms. Hanako can protest. She always insists he keeps his money, claiming that he’s way too underfed to have to pay for a little bit of food.

Izuku’s on his way out when suddenly the back of his neck itches, his hair standing on end. He turns his head to see the man who walked in staring at him. Fucking creepy much?

He has tired, sunken eyes, and his black hair is pulled back in a loose ponytail. He looks homeless, in all honesty. Dressed in dark clothes, the man gives off the vibe of a murderer. And given the fact that he’s still staring at Izuku even when the boy starts to glare right back, that little thought seems all the more probable.

But that’s not the most noticeable thing about him. Pushed to the side of the table is a large scarf, coiled in messy loops. It looks thick, like it’s made to keep the person warm—but it’s summertime, so why would anyone have that?

Shooting one last look at the probably-a-murderer, Izuku calls out a goodbye to Ms. Hanako and rushes out into the open air.

The library should be open still. He’s got about an hour before it closes, so he should be able to get some research done on his new targets.

Izuku’s heard rumors about a drug ring in the city over, and they’ve apparently got some good stuff. He managed to wean a bit of information from some of his past clients the other day, and that information had included a few names.

If he can access police records, he’ll have an idea of who exactly he’s working with. Or, more appropriately, against.

It’s not the first drug bust he’s done, and it surely won’t be the last. If he can head straight to the library with no interruptions, he'll have just enough time before closing to get a location.

He's just about to turn onto the next street when a noise stops him in his tracks—it's a scream, sounding a little bit off into the distance.

It sounds shrill, and Izuku gets a sick feeling in his stomach. Of course this happens when I'm not in costume.

He slips into the shadows after debating for a moment whether or not he should just ignore it, ultimately deciding that no, he won't be a bitch. He uses his enhancements to jump onto the roof of the nearest building, leaping across multiple rooftops to get closer to the commotion.

The screams are getting louder now, and Izuku peeks down into a lot behind a convenience store to see a young woman struggling against a masked figure.

"What is wrong with you! Get away from me, I promise I won't tell anyone, just please—"

She gets cut off with a slap to the face, and Izuku grimaces.

His first guess had been a robbery, but now, looking at how Unknown Individual #2 is pressing the woman against the wall, Izuku can tell it's much more than that. And besides, it kind of sounds like the lady knows him.

No weapon in sight. It's now or never, I guess.

Izuku drops down from the roof and lands right behind the man, not making a sound. The woman lets out another scream once she sees him, only for Unknown Individual #2 to raise his fist again, an obvious warning.

"I thought I told you to shut up—"

Izuku taps him on the shoulder before he can strike, jumping back when the man instinctively swings at him. "I'm sorry, am I interrupting something?"

The criminal stares at him, lips curling up in disgust. Even in the faint light, Izuku can see the way the guy's eyes light up with something dark. "Listen, kid, you better back off while I'm feeling generous. This don't concern you."

“You know,” Izuku drawls, folding his arms and motioning for the woman to run, “you criminals have got to come up with something better to say when I start ruining your sick plans. I’m getting tired of hearing the same thing over and over again—”

The man’s generosity must be running dry tonight, as Izuku barely finishes his sentence before the dude is whipping out a switchblade.

I mean, he could’ve whipped out a gun or something. I should be thankful.

The woman gasps again on the sidelines, and Izuku gets the sudden urge to tell her off for not running when the man was distracted, but he doesn’t. He doesn’t know their situation exactly, so he can’t judge.

Now that he’s actually looking at them, Izuku can see that they’re both wearing formal clothes. They could’ve been out to a dance or club together, and one thing led to another. Are they married, or at least engaged?

The light’s too faint for Izuku to be able to look for a ring.

“One last chance,” the dude growls, bringing Izuku out of his thoughts. “Get outta here, or I’ll rough you up the same I did her.”

Izuku doesn’t give him a chance to respond before he’s on him, fingers grasping his wrist and tugging him sideways. The blade flies from his hand and clatters a few feet away, right in front of the woman.

Is that a phone in her hand—?

A punch to the gut has Izuku cursing, springing back into action. The guy doesn’t know how to fight, that much is obvious. He makes quick work of kicking him in the crotch and smashing him against the concrete wall, muscles burning.

The man slumps to the floor, unconscious, and Izuku stares at him for a moment, analyzing. There’s no recognizable features or marks on him, so he’s not part of a gang or league of some kind—at least, not one that Izuku knows. And he knows just about every single one in central Japan, if not all of them.

Digging in his pockets, he pulls out his emergency capture tape and ties the guy’s hands and legs up, putting a piece over his mouth just for fun.

“Um, kid?”

Izuku kicks the man one more time just for funsies and faces the woman who called out to him, frowning. “I’m almost fourteen. Not a kid.”

“Oh, sorry!” She says, walking closer on shaky legs once she makes sure the attacker won't wake up. There’s a bruise right below her eye, matching Izuku’s own sore spot. “Er, thank you for stepping in. You didn’t have to. He’s been harassing me at my job ever since he started working there last week, and he made me go with him to this restaurant today. I only went because I was being polite, but I guess that backfired on me.”

I was almost right. Dammit.

Izuku joins her under the street lamp at the mouth of the alleyway, wiping his hands on his pants. “Is he the one who gave you that mark on your face?”

She looks away, hiding her face with her black hair. She seems tired, and Izuku feels bad. “Yeah, but it doesn’t hurt too much. If he went any further I would’ve stopped him with my quirk, y’know? I don’t know why I didn’t use it before, but sometimes it’s just…”

“I understand,” Izuku says, and he does, really. Sometimes, even when you have the opportunity and power to do something, you still can’t. In those circumstances, it’s still not your fault. “But, hey, if you want to do something now, like kick him or something, I won’t tell.”

The woman laughs softly, relaxing. “Thank you again. I’m grateful, even though I don’t think you should really be out at this time of night. Anyways, I called the cops, so they should be here soon to—”

Izuku stiffens. She called the fucking what?

As if being summoned, a new voice cuts through the air, and Izuku can feel a familiar man’s presence behind him. “Midoriya?”

Oh fuck.

Two police officers suddenly appear a few yards away, irritation and confusion clear in their expressions. The guy who spoke rushes forward, eyes fixated on the boy. He has the face of a cat, which is the only reason Izuku recognizes him. And it may also be because he’s had to escape from said cat officer multiple times, both as Rabbit and as

Izuku.

“I swear, kid, this is the fifth time you’ve done shit like this!” The guy complains. “I’m taking you in this time, Midoriya. And don’t bother running.”

Izuku laughs nervously, escape plans already running through his mind. He’s not Rabbit right now, so he can’t use his quirks to escape. He’s just going to have to run for it.

“Hey, buddy ol’ pal!” He starts innocently, putting his hands up in mock surrender. “Long time no see! How about we talk about this first, huh? I mean, I did just catch that criminal right over there. That’s like, what, already sixty percent of your job?”

He points into the depths of the alley, and at Cathead’s nod, the other officer heads in to check it out. “Yeah, that’s not going to happen. Just come with us, peacefully this time, and then—”

Izuku spins on his heel, almost tripping over his own feet, and runs. He cackles maniacally as he hears the police officer sprinting after him.

And that’s how he ends up being chased through the streets for the second time that day. He only needs one more incident before the day ends to beat his personal record.

Izuku is fast, even without his enhancements. There’s not a lot of cover for him like there was this morning, though. There’s barely anyone out at this time of night, and—

Oh. He’s not gonna be able to make it to the library today.

Groaning, Izuku jumps onto the hood of a car and does a backflip, continuing smoothly down the middle of the road.

“Are you kidding!” He hears behind him. “Now you’re just showing off! Give it up, kid!”

Izuku just laughs and pumps his legs faster. The officer is still part cat, which is weird to think about, and therefore faster than average humans. If the boy doesn’t go any quicker, he’ll probably be caught.

I already have a few cases of public quirk usage on my file. What’s another one?

Izuku crouches down, feeling the familiar burn in his toes as he jumps up, using a wall as a springboard to catch the handle of a nearby fire escape. From there, he makes the final leap to the top of the random building.

He's so close. The officer won't be able to follow him up here—

He hears it before he feels it.

There's the rustle of fabric, so faint that it would've been nearly undetectable to someone else, but Izuku's been trained to pick out these sorts of things, so to him it may as well be as loud as a car horn.

Wind hits his neck, and Izuku twists mid-air at an awkward angle, his back arching almost painfully. He only just manages to miss the flash of grey fabric shooting his way, but the damage has been done, and Izuku overshoots the side of the roof and goes flying toward the ground.

He rolls clumsily, fighting back a hiss at the pain that shoots through his shoulder from landing on the hard sidewalk. His back hits a fire hydrant, and Izuku feels the breath leave him all at once.

Who the hell—?

A figure lands lightly in front of him, dressed in all black. Yellow goggles stare him right in the face, neon even in the night. The figure shuffles closer, not making a sound, and Izuku tries to conjure up some strength to get away, to run again, only to find that he can't. There's—there's no quirk to use? His enhancements are gone?

"Oh, fuck me," is the first thing to leave his lips.

Because he feels so stupid now. If the absence of his quirk doesn't give it away, then the large grey scarf certainly does. That, and the blazing red eyes.

That's why the guy at the pizzeria looked so familiar. Izuku's been studying underground heroes for the better part of his life. He knows exactly who this is.

The boy gulps nervously. "I didn't know Eraserhead patrolled in this part of town."

That's the wrong thing to say.

“What?”

Izuku immediately flushes, waving his hands out in front of him. “Ah, forget I said that!”

He’s an underground hero for a reason, dumbass! No one’s supposed to know he even exists, much less know about his patrol routes!

Izuku has probably just come off as a stalker, or worse, a villain.

Okay, don’t overreact. Chances are he just thinks you’re messing around.

Eraserhead blinks once, then twice, and Izuku’s breath catches in his throat when the underground hero bends down to lift him up by the back of his hoodie, setting him on his feet.

The man looks scruffy and tired. Not so much like the murderer Izuku had assumed he was just a little bit ago at the pizzeria. Pushing his goggles up, the hero scrutinizes the boy.

“You’re faster than you look,” Eraserhead grumbles, completely ignoring what Izuku said before. “That’s your quirk, right?”

“Uh, yeah, I think so.”

Izuku turns an even darker shade of red. He hopes the man can’t see it. “Um, I mean it’s part of it, but not really? It’s kind of like, um, well __”

Eraserhead cuts him off with a shake of his head. “Actually, forget about it. Come on. I’m taking you in.”

And that shakes Izuku out of his stupor. “W-Wait! Can you hear me out, first? I’m sure there are more important things for you to be doing right now, Eraserhead, sir. Like, er, fighting villains! Or, you know, taking in criminals!” Izuku is grasping at straws now.

“That’s what I’m doing,” is Eraserhead’s only reply. The man stuffs his hands in his pockets and strolls down the deserted street, obviously expecting the boy to follow.

Izuku digs his heels into the ground and tries to slow his rapid heart rate. He’s too excited to even be offended by his comment.

Holy shit. This is actually happening. I just met Eraserhead, like for real. I just met one of the greatest underground heroes to ever live and he’s currently arresting me—

“You’re not being arrested. You're a witness. Now follow me.”

Izuku obeys with shaky limbs, currently starstruck. So what if his file’s going to get even longer after this? It’s not like he has to apply for a college or job or whatever. He’s meeting one of his idols, so at the moment a fucking meteor could strike him down and he’d probably be okay with it as long as he gets to talk to the man before him.

I wonder what his favorite food is, Izuku thinks to himself. I mean, I just saw him at the pizzeria, but I don’t think he ordered anything. He was drinking something, though. Might’ve been a black coffee. He seems like that kind of guy.

“Are you hurt?”

It takes Izuku a second to realize the hero is speaking to him with his face turned just slightly to stare at him with one eye.

The boy flinches on impulse. “Ah, no, sorry! I’m fine!”

Eraserhead gives him an indiscernible look before turning away.

Alright. That’s not suspicious in the slightest. Way to go, Izuku. Acting real pathetic.

They come upon the cat officer, who Izuku guesses stopped his chase after seeing him get captured. He’s currently standing under a streetlight with crossed arms, and he steps forward once they get close enough. “Thanks for catching him, Eraser. He’s very slippery.”

The underground hero grunts, pulling a bottle out of his pocket and squeezing liquid into his eyes.

Izuku briefly wonders if he smokes. There’s no way a guy who looks like that doesn’t.

What's his plug?

"Midoriya!"

Oh, he's spacing out again. "Yes?"

The officer huffs, taking him by the arm. Izuku has to stop himself from kicking him in retaliation. "We're going to the station. Eraserhead here is coming with us."

"Ooh," he says, inwardly dumbfounded. He covers it up with a flourish of his free hand. "You know, I think this is the most fun I've had in my seven times of being arrested by you."

Cathead drags him along, hissing. Yes, he's actually hissing. Izuku shouldn't be surprised.

"The day I get to actually arrest you is the day I finally retire, and you can quote me on that."

"Don't you worry, I will." The boy swears he hears a small snort from behind him. Must've been the wind, because it just couldn't have been the emo hero trailing after them.

The walk to the station isn't long, as the library is only a few blocks away from it. He was heading there in the first place. Izuku can't help but smirk as he's led inside, and he greets the night shift employees with finger guns. They respond back with groans and muffled complaints.

Izuku counts that as a win.

"Stay here," Cathead orders, pointing at a spot on the ground. "I'll get the detective. Don't move."

As soon as the man disappears down the hallway and out of sight, Izuku spins on his heel to walk right out the door. He's done this plenty of times before. In all honesty, Cathead should have expected him to do this every time he leaves him unsupervised—

He smacks into Eraserhead's chest immediately upon turning around. The hero is standing in front of the doorway, looking down at him with tired eyes.

It's only been like a minute and I already forgot he's here. He's too quiet.

Deciding that he won't in fact square up to one of his idols—as he'd surely lose spectacularly—Izuku takes a few steps back and decides to go annoy one of the other cops after quickly apologizing to Eraserhead. If he can't escape, then he has to wait. So, naturally, they're going to suffer the consequences of keeping him here.

He needs to water his fake plants. His imaginary fish need to be fed. He has to get at least a few hours of sleep tonight before his next task tomorrow. He has no time.

He's about to start bouncing off the walls—quite literally since quirk usage is permitted inside the building—when approaching footsteps cut off his train of thought.

"Why am I surprised?" Detective Tsukauchi sighs, strolling into the room with a cup in his hand. It smells suspiciously like coffee.

Izuku wants it.

"You really shouldn't be anymore," Izuku agrees, eyeing his beverage with malicious intent.

Tsukauchi sighs, pinching the bridge of his nose. "Alright, you know the drill. Come with me, Midoriya."

But Izuku's already walking his way over to one of the interrogation rooms down the hall, and not even a minute later Izuku is sitting in that uncomfortable chair, waiting for the detective to come in.

All of this shit is making me hungry again. I wonder what Kacchan is doing right now.

Tsukauchi enters the room with a few papers in hand—Izuku's file, from the looks of it. He sets a new coffee on the table and peers at the boy. "Tell me what happened, Midoriya."

With an exaggerated huff, Izuku folds his arms and pouts. "Okay, in my defense, I was just going to the library this time, I swear. I was walking over and heard someone scream, so I went over and stopped what looked like a potential aggravated assault case." He jerks his head at the wall opposite of him, knowing that another interrogation is happening beyond it. "I'm sure she's telling your men what happened, so why are you keeping me here?"

Tsukauchi fixes him with a glare. "Because according to Eraserhead, you used your quirk to stop the fight, not to mention try and escape my officers. You were the only other witness to the crime."

Izuku keeps his face carefully blank as his mind suddenly floods with thoughts. Eraserhead saw me step in? I didn't sense him there, though. Is he just making that part up to get me to admit it?

"That's not fair," he objects. "You know my quirk is active most of the time, detective. It's hard to just turn it off."

The detective quirks a brow incredulously. "Eraserhead responded to the victim's screams just after you did. He decided to watch what you would do, and he specifically told me that you spent a moment to power yourself up. I don't consider that being accidental, son."

Izuku wants to smash his head against the table. It seems like his idol is a stalker as well as a snitch.

"I've got a question," Izuku starts abruptly, wanting to get the man off track. "Does your quirk work over the phone, too?"

"Wha—?"

The door slides open, and an unfamiliar head pokes its way in. "Sorry for interrupting, sir, but the criminal we just brought in woke up. He's fighting back, and the boss would like your assistance."

Tsukauchi has never looked this tired, Izuku decides.

"I'll be right there." He stands up and gestures for Izuku to do the same. "You can move around, but stay in this building. We'll finish this in a few minutes."

And with that, he's gone, leaving Izuku to his own devices. Which is mistake number one.

They keep the criminals in the eastern part of the station, and I'm in the western part. The offices are past the interrogation rooms, so I have a wide-open shot.

Izuku did want to go the library to get some much needed info, but since that's not happening, he'll have to settle for something better.

Tsukauchi's office is the third one down, and it's by the far the biggest. After checking to make sure no one's looking, Izuku darts down the hallway and slips inside, quietly closing the door behind him.

It's fairly clean, if not a little bare. The detective seems to be a simple man.

Practically skipping over to the rolling chair and plopping down, Izuku shakes the man's mouse. It's already on, so there's no need to scout for the computer's password. It also appears to be on a random file—which makes things easier.

Izuku digs around in his boot and pulls out a flash drive, praying he has enough room on it after his latest library visit. He hasn't cleaned it out in a long time.

He blows off the dirt on it from his recent escapades, plugging it in correctly after only the fourteenth try.

The boy copies as many files as he can get his hands on, dragging the mouse back and forth to cover the hundred folders he can see. Hopefully he'll get something useful.

He doesn't know how long he has until Tsukauchi finishes up with whatever the Chief wanted with him, so he has to be quick.

There's a lot of data on this computer. Just by glancing at the folder names, Izuku can tell some of the files date back to as far as a few centuries ago. There's information on organized crime groups and their hideouts, on their victims and members.

Ah. This is some good shit right here. Much better than what Izuku would've managed to find at the library.

There are voices down the hallway, and Izuku hears the door to one of the interrogation rooms opening, probably to check if he's in there.

Panic slithers up his spine like a snake, and Izuku frantically yanks the flash drive out of the computer and shoves it up his sleeve. The boy has just enough time to click onto the original tab before the office door swings open, revealing an annoyed Detective Tsukauchi.

"What are you doing in here?" The man asks, shooing him to his feet.

Watching porn, is what Izuku wants to say, but then he sees Eraserhead standing against the wall behind the detective, watching the scene with that same unreadable expression. Okay. I really don't wanna say that in front of one of my heroes.

"I was looking at your pictures." Izuku grabs for the nearest photo on the desk, and it just so happens to be what looks like Tsukauchi's dog.

“I didn’t take you for a dog person. What breed is it?”

Tsukauchi stares at him in disbelief for all of five seconds, eyes going hazy as he seems to rethink his life choices. “You know what,” he sighs, taking the photo out of the boy’s hand. “Just get out.”

Trying to hide his nerves, Izuku slips past the two men and walks to the main area to wait.

“To wrap this up,” Tsukauchi concludes, emerging from the corner. “I only kept you here to hear your side of the attack. This is a minor issue, and because you’re underage, I can’t really charge you for this, same as your other crimes. But this will be going on your record.”

The boy can’t help it; he grins. “Something tells me you really wanted to put me in jail this time.”

Tsukauchi stands and heads for the door. “Don’t get too happy. It’s past curfew for kids your age, so you’ll be going home with an escort.”

“What?”

It’s the detective’s turn to smile at him, looking entirely pleased with himself. “You heard me. Since no one else wants to do it, Eraserhead here will take you home.”

You gotta be shitting me.

“And please try to refrain from putting yourself in danger again. At least for the rest of the week. I already have enough paperwork to do without you adding on to it.”

Izuku gives the man a short nod, even though both of them know that no amount of scolding is going to change anything. He looks at Eraserhead, who’s been standing to the side silently up until this point.

“Come on,” the man grumbles. “My shift's already over.”

I mean, you didn’t have to agree to this. This is your fault for snitching on me.

The walk is awkward, and Izuku comes to find that Eraserhead walks incredibly fast. The hero is walking a few yards ahead of him, despite the fact he doesn’t know where Izuku lives. It’s like he’s waiting for the boy to take the lead, or he’s just waiting to see how long Izuku will let it happen.

Or maybe Izuku's thinking too much into this and the man has actually forgotten what he's supposed to be doing. But just as Izuku plans to slip into one of the alleyways and out of view, Eraserhead glances back at him, as if reading his mind.

He doesn't say a word, but the boy can feel his impatience hanging heavy in the air, as if silently telling him to hurry the hell up.

Rushing forward to continue walking beside the man, Izuku tries to slow his erratic heart rate. The power the hero's quirk exudes is overwhelming, thrumming underneath Eraserhead's skin even when he's not using it. Izuku has to block out his own senses to focus on trying not to ramble.

He's so cool. There's a high chance his quirk doesn't work on mutant types, so he basically fights quirkless half of the time. He's very skilled; he has a 98% success rate concerning missions, which is one of the highest Izuku's ever seen, rivaling All Might's himself.

I may admire him, but I can't get too close. What if he links me to Rabbit? Does he even know about Rabbit, or is that below his pay grade? Actually, how much does he get paid? Doesn't he have another job on top of this one?

"You're mumbling, kid."

Izuku wishes for a bus to come speeding by at a hundred miles per hour so he could conveniently step out into the middle of the road.

Fuck. Did he hear the Rabbit part? He couldn't have. He wouldn't be acting so nonchalant if he did.

Izuku thought he stopped this little tic of his a long time ago. He hasn't rambled aloud this much in years, not since—

Fabric wraps around his wrist and yanks him out of the way of a pole, stopping Izuku from crashing face-first into it. He stumbles and almost collides with Eraserhead yet again, only just managing to right himself in time.

"Sorry!" He squeaks, covering his face with his hands. "I'm not usually like this."

The hero grunts. He sounds annoyed, though to be fair that seems to be his default emotion. “Just try to pay attention.”

Izuku nods quickly. “I will, sorry about that!”

Eraserhead gives him a weird look before turning away again, continuing the walk to who-knows-where.

Wait, now that he’s thinking about it, where is Izuku going to take him? He can’t just lead him to his actual apartment, which is the entire top floor of an abandoned building in the worst part of the city.

That’s what the police call illegal.

He’ll be sent to an orphanage if anyone finds out he’s homeless. He can just take Eraserhead to Kacchan’s house, but then he’d run the risk of the Auntie accidentally exposing him. It's past midnight, after all. He has no reason to be knocking on his best friend’s door when he’s not even expected to be there until tomorrow evening.

The only logical explanation would be to go to a random apartment complex and hope that Eraserhead won’t try to talk with his 'parents.'

There are a few of those buildings a few blocks away from where my place is. I can try there. I know the lady who owns it; she won’t let Eraserhead in if he comes in after me.

That sounds like a solid plan. Now to just put it in action.

Izuku tries to gather up his courage but finds it difficult. God, he’s Rabbit. He shouldn’t be having such an issue talking to a pro hero.

He clears his throat. “I live down by City Hall. It’s like a fifteen-minute walk from here.”

Eraserhead grunts. He fucking grunts. Again. Without saying anything.

Izuku isn’t nearly as irritated as he thought he’d be.

The boy nervously shoves his hands into his pockets, fingering the flash drive he drops in one of them. There’s probably so much stuff on it. He already knows he’s not going to get any sleep tonight.

Maybe I can get more leads on that drug ring.

They’re still walking, and Eraserhead stays just a step or two ahead of him the entire time. It’s not exactly a bad quiet, as Izuku is used to silence. He lives in it, so he's not exactly a stranger to it. He can deal.

But there's something about the way the underground hero holds himself that tells Izuku that he's waiting for something. He's thinking.

About what? It's not like the boy can outright ask him.

Izuku takes a chance and speeds up so he's the one slightly in the lead. "So, uh, why are you in this part of town?" He immediately cringes, hearing how aggressive he probably just sounded. "I—I mean, not that you can't be here. It's just that you never usually come this far down on your patrols unless you're going to see the Detective, and even then you don't stay for long. It's usually only when you're already done with your shift and—"

Eraserhead stops in his tracks and stares at him, nose crinkling. "Do you make a habit of yelling out the secrets of all the heroes you first meet, or am I the first case?"

Izuku's mouth snaps shut immediately. Okay, that was a bit rude, but I deserved that.

"Sorry," he says sheepishly, looking at the floor.

The hero sighs and glances up at the sky before turning back to him. Izuku suddenly realizes just how tall the man is. "Don't be. Now listen, here's the deal. I can feel your brain working from where I'm standing, kid. You can ask me one question, but then I get to ask you one in return. We can go back and forth."

Izuku blanches. What does he want to know about me? I'm not important.

Unless he has linked the boy to Rabbit. And then Izuku better be ready to run for his life.

"Like ping-pong?" Izuku asks.

The man pauses as if to gauge if he's joking or not. He must not find anything, as it's only a moment later when he huffs out something like a laugh. "Sure."

"Ooh! Can I go first?" Izuku doesn't wait for a reply. "Can you use Erasure on multiple people at once or just one person? I've never seen you do it to more than one, at least on camera, and I really wanna know if—"

Eraserhead keeps his voice clipped. “Multiple. How do you know so much about me?”

Izuku barely has time to process the first part before the fidgeting starts up again, his previous embarrassment coming back full force. “I just like to study people and their quirks, sir. I think they’re fascinating, and I’ve always liked to analyze things.” He runs a hand through his hair. “I guess it’s just a hobby.”

“Ask your next question.”

“Oh, yeah! About your goggles, I’ve been wondering why you have those slits in them. There has to be a reason you’d go for that look instead of wearing actual protective gear.”

They continue like that for the majority of the walk, and Izuku learns that most of the theories he’s made about Eraserhead are correct. His quirk works through sight, and it wears off when he blinks his eyes, which is why his goggles look the way they are. It prevents villains from knowing where he’s looking.

The man fights essentially quirkless against mutants, and he uses his capture weapon to aid in both long range and close-range combat. He’s trained his entire life to be able to do the things he can. I wonder if I can reach that point someday.

Izuku pushes that thought away. Being a hero is just a dream for him. He may have completed all of his education online, making him eligible for a hero school if he wanted to go that route, but he doesn’t really have a choice.

I can’t let myself be known. I get to do the same things a hero can when I’m Rabbit. I just wish I could be more for the people.

“I live with my Dad,” Izuku lies easily, making sure to mask the discomfort on his face. “He knows I go out here all the time. He just doesn’t care.”

A lie that bad can only be the truth.

“He doesn’t care?” The hero echoes. There’s a slight upturn at the end of his voice, and Izuku freezes.

“Ah, it’s not that he doesn’t care! He just knows I can take care of myself!”

Eraserhead gives him a sidelong glance but leaves the topic alone. Izuku tries to distract him by asking him more questions about his hero life, but the calculating look on the black-haired man’s face never leaves.

Great. Way to keep him off your tail, you piece of shit.

A few minutes later, Izuku spots the building he talked about. The owner works the night shift at the desk area, which Izuku is eternally grateful for at the moment. He spots her face through the lit-up glass doors, and he waves at her from the street.

She doesn’t seem to notice, but Izuku turns around anyway to say goodbye to Eraserhead, hoping he won’t follow him in.

“Thank you for taking me home, sir. I’m sorry for wasting your time.”

Izuku bows low and straightens up just in time to catch the momentary confusion on the man’s face. Eraserhead, unsurprisingly, grunts, and so Izuku starts to head up the steps to his apparent home.

“One more thing, kid.”

Izuku turns to ask him what’s wrong when he suddenly sees it. The lights behind the boy allow him to see what Eraserhead holds up between his fingers.

A flash drive. A very familiar flash drive.

The hero doesn’t even flinch when Izuku practically leaps down the stairs, eyes wide with panic. “What! How did you—?”

“Nope. It’s my turn to ask a question.” Eraserhead looks almost smug as he continues. “What were you planning on doing with Tsukauchi’s files.”

It’s not a question. More of a demand for an answer. Izuku digs his nails into his palms, panic rising like putty in his throat. “N-Nothing bad, I promise! I just wanted some new people to study, that’s it!”

“So you thought stealing police records was a good way to continue your hobby?”

Fuck. How did he get it out of my pocket without me noticing? No one has ever been able to do that to me before. Why him? And why now, of all times?

Izuku fumbles with the sleeves of his hoodie. “Um, kinda?”

There’s another beat of silence, spent with Eraserhead looking him up and down, the flash drive still in hand. “You do know,” he starts slowly, “that there are other ways to get information like this? Almost all of the libraries in this area offer free, legal archives of past criminals.”

It sounds like a rhetorical question, but Izuku can’t stop himself from answering. “I mean, I—I was heading to one before that mugging happened and, uh, threw off my plans?”

“You didn’t have to intervene.”

And that has Izuku shutting up, because he’s right. It’s not Izuku’s job to stop crime, or to put himself in danger to help someone else. He just likes to be a decent fucking human being sometimes.

But still. Izuku shouldn’t have stolen those files—not that he regrets it, though. He’d do it again if given the chance.

He hangs his head, hoping for the best. He doesn’t know what he’ll do if he doesn’t manage to get Eraserhead off his back. “I’ll use the resources given to me next time,” he promises. “Can I please have the flash drive back now, sir? I—I didn’t copy any of the important files!”

For a moment, Izuku thinks that the man will scoff and tell him he’s crazy, that there’s no way he’ll give it back after what he’s done. The hero can definitely bring him in for this, because isn’t stealing government property a federal crime?

But then, in a move that’s almost anticlimactic, Eraserhead steps forward and places the drive in his hand, already turning to take his leave after fixing Izuku with an intimidating glare. “It’s not like you can use most of that information negatively anyway. Just don’t do it again. You’d only be giving the detective more of a reason to put you in jail, understood?”

In slight shock, Izuku’s head shoots up. “T-Thank you, I didn’t think you’d actually give it back—”

The underground hero jumps away, capture weapon flying out to wrap around a pole and pull him up. It reminds Izuku of that really old comic book hero from America. Was it Spider-Man or something?

Whatever the name may be, Eraserhead disappears into the night with the same amount of grace that the web-slinger himself had, just like that, leaving Izuku alone in front of an apartment complex he doesn't even live in.

Did that really just happen? Everything kind of feels like a fever dream right now.

The glass doors behind him slide open, and Izuku turns to face the owner's concerned face. "Izuku, is that you? Why are you out at this time of night? It's way too cold out."

After assuring the woman that he's not, in fact, going to freeze to death, Izuku shoves the flash drive back into his pocket—where it will hopefully stay this time—and trudges away with a quick goodbye.

It takes Izuku another five minutes to walk to his actual place, and by the time he's climbed the many flights of stairs to the top floor where he lives, he's shaking with nerves.

I need to pay more attention. He could've arrested me. He should've. And I don't think I could've run from Eraserhead of all people.

He kicks open the mahogany door and slams the flash drive down onto his makeshift desk. "You better be worth it, you sad piece of plastic! Now I've got a pro hero watching me. This is all your fault."

Izuku slumps into his chair and glances at the clock. It's late—or early, depending on what type of person you are. Izuku knows sleep won't come easy to him after the day's events, so he just logs onto his beat-to-hell, generator-run computer, and goes to pick through the files.

He's only got a few hours until daylight. He can pass the time for that long, at least with some instant coffee.

That's about the only food he has in the apartment. Besides some packs of instant ramen noodles. And even then he doesn't even have a way to heat up water for it.

Man, I really do need some help.

To be honest, no matter how cool it looks in the movies, using a parachute is never fun.

However, when you are over two thousand feet up in the sky in a burning helicopter with an untrained villain-for-a-pilot and a very, very large bomb, you take what you can get.

Has Izuku ever mentioned how much he hates explosives? At least the ones that are about to blow him to little bits and pieces on live television.

Izuku has managed to get in over his head once again by following a group of moron thieves—the very same group his client warned him about a few days prior. They said it would be easy. He'd go in there, set the place on fire because that's the most efficient way to flush a large group out, collect the drugs, and end up saving the day for the third time in as many days.

But the world hates Izuku. He can't ever do things the easy way.

The so-called moron thieves ended up being major gang leaders that Izuku put in prison a year or so back, so you can imagine his surprise when he caught sight of their faces inside a base with a lot of weapons, a lot of drugs, and a fucking helicopter.

Izuku would've been more excited had one of the henchmen not clocked him in the knees with a crowbar right after his entry. Now he has a limp.

Fucking superb you stupid little goon. I didn't even see you coming.

And truly, Izuku never planned on getting in said helicopter, but when Mr. Tiny got in it with an armful of guns and unmarked medications, what was he supposed to do?

Okay, yeah, he could have called Tsukauchi, saying as he got his phone number from the files he stole a week before now—but it's a Thursday evening, and Izuku knows the detective only works night shifts on certain days of the week! He probably wouldn't be able to do much of anything since he's off duty right now.

Plus, Izuku couldn't just let them get away! What kind of wanted vigilante would he be if he didn't aggravate the heroes further by doing their jobs better than them?

And so Izuku clung to the landing skids under the helicopter just as it lifted into the sky. In hindsight, Izuku should have considered what he planned to do after dealing with all the bad guys, given the fact that he can't actually fly a helicopter.

But it turns out that luck is actually on his side a little bit today! He doesn't have to worry about that since Mr. Tiny set off the bomb before Izuku actually took him out.

Who puts explosives in a helicopter, anyway? Isn't that, like, illegal?

So here Izuku is, dangling from the bottom of a spiraling aircraft. Izuku curses to himself. He's going to be late for dinner at Kacchan's house. Just like he was last week the day after being captured by Eraserhead.

If he doesn't get killed jumping out of this aircraft, Kacchan will certainly do the job himself.

As the timer ticks to fifteen seconds, Izuku decides he'd much rather die by his friend than face the impending explosion.

Giving a wave to the news helicopter a few hundred yards out, Izuku lets go of the landing skids with a screech. He spreads out his arms and legs to keep himself from tumbling through the air like a rabid banshee—he's done that before and won't do it again; he's learned from his mistakes, thank you very much. The boy would smile if not for the wind whipping at his face and hood.

Izuku has always enjoyed jumping from high places. The feeling is exhilarating. It fills his lungs with fresh air and makes his stomach do backflips. It always leaves him giddy in the end.

This type of jump, however, is a little higher than he usually prefers. But it's fine, he has a parachute, so everything is fine.

He balances himself out well as he plummets, and after deciding that he's a safe distance away from the bomb, he flips onto his back and presses the button under his left armpit.

Nothing happens.

Izuku's heart leaps into his throat, his thoughts coming to a screeching halt.

I didn't reinstall the parachute from last month.

If there's an opening for a modern version of that old movie Dumb and Dumber, Izuku needs to audition.

The helicopter explodes above him in a blinding display of heat and fire, but Izuku can't bring himself to pay attention to it because fuck, those buildings are getting awfully close.

He's going to die. But he can't, not before dinner. Kacchan will kill him.

Izuku doesn't realize he's screaming until he feels his voice give out from the strain. He drops like a rock past a skyscraper's roof and sees his reflection in the glass, his Rabbit costume a dark contrast to the blue sky around him.

He watches in horror as he sails closer to the top of another building. Okay, I can do this.

There's no telling who's recording. The media is probably capturing these fateful moments right now, so he can't afford to use one of his more flashy quirks. Not that they'd help much in this situation.

He can use Deflect to break his fall, but at the rate he's plummeting, the transparent shield would probably shatter upon impact, killing him instantly. It's not strong enough to withstand that much force.

That's what I get for refusing to train with it.

The only other quirk he can use is Pull, and even then the only thing he can do is make himself fly into the side of one of the buildings. Concrete is too heavy for him to move, so instead of the building coming towards him, he'll be going towards it.

It's basic physics, and it should work. Izuku just needs to wait a little longer for one of the lower floors. If he does it too early, a hero might come after him and trap him inside one of the higher levels. The closer he is to the ground, to an exit, the better.

Izuku sails past the roof of a smaller hotel and juts out his arm desperately, letting Pull manifest in his palm. The momentum is far too much, the distance far too wide, and Izuku's arm very nearly rips out of its socket as he goes flying towards the side of the building.

This is going to hurt.

In a matter of seconds, he crashes through the window, yelping in pain as his injured leg and arm are jostled again.

He's on a lower level, the polished tile of the hotel room covered in broken glass. The boy goes sprawling against it, barely registering the screaming to his right.

He looks up and is greeted to the sight of a young girl on one of the couches, staring at him and still screeching. She's clutching a small dog, who's currently barking and wriggling to get out of her grasp and probably bite Izuku.

Oops. Time to go.

Izuku struggles to get to his feet, holding his hands up in surrender before stumbling to the door past the girl. He really is trying to think, but his body is still considerably numb.

"Shit, I'm sorry!" He tries, though she most likely doesn't hear him over her own strangled noises. "I'm leaving, it's alright!"

He opens the door with a little too much force, nearly ripping it off its hinges, and proceeds to face plant into the hallway wall. He finds his way to the stairs and runs.

That went better than I thought it would.

Izuku is, regrettably, a little over an hour late. He had to stabilize his knee and make sure to cover up any bruises and cuts on his face and body from the fight. His Rabbit costume is a little torn, but it'll be alright. A little wash is all it needs.

All in all, the mission was a success. The heroes have probably searched through the base and tied up any loose ends, and it seems the whole of Japan knows what Rabbit did today. Izuku has earned a bit more cash, too, so that's always a plus. He has to buy more fabric for his costume to patch up the tears.

But for now, the boy steps up to the door in front of him before he ends up losing his courage. Kacchan is very serious about schedules.

If Izuku is being honest, though, he doesn't think he deserves the punch to the gut he receives in greeting when Kacchan swings open the door before the boy can even get the chance to knock.

"You nerd!" The blond roars, barreling into him before Izuku can defend himself. "You're fucking late again!"

Izuku yelps, falling to the ground with Kacchan standing over him. "That's not my fault! I told you I might be a little late—"

Kacchan yanks him up by the front of his shirt, dragging him inside and slamming the door shut. "That was for last week, you dick!"

"You know that goes for every time, Kacchan! I've told you this."

The explosive teen chuffs in irritation. "Whatever, you shithead. You're not the one who had to listen to the old hag bitch about you being in trouble again. You're lucky she didn't call the police to report your fucking ass missing."

Izuku frowns to himself as his friend shoves him onto the couch. "I thought you can't report someone missing unless it's been twenty-four hours."

"That's a myth, dumbass!" The blond plops down next to him, flicking through channels on the TV faster than Izuku can keep up. "Now shut the hell up, dinner's almost ready."

Izuku just rolls his eyes, biting back his own retort. He won't admit it to anyone, but the fight—as quick as it was—wore him out. His knee is getting on his nerves. He now has a newfound reason to hate crowbars.

Another voice cuts in then, sounding from the top of the stairs behind them. "Hey, what's with all the yelling, brat? I thought I told you to shut up!" Bakugou Mitsuki pokes her head around the corner, and her face immediately lights up upon seeing Izuku on the couch. She starts down the stairs with a smile. "Oh, hon, you're finally here! I was starting to get worried about you. Where've you been?"

Izuku jumps to his feet and bows quickly, ignoring the complaints he gets from his friend about standing in front of the TV. “Sorry, Auntie. I didn’t mean to worry you. I got a little distracted by a villain fight, that’s all! But I promise I’m fine.”

Izuku chooses to ignore Kacchan’s quiet that’s a shitty lie, because he’s technically not lying. It was a villain fight, and he did get distracted.

The woman, thankfully, doesn’t hear her son, and she wraps Izuku up in a tight hug, picking him up and swinging him from side to side in typical Bakugou fashion. “Oh, that’s alright, kiddo. You came just in time. The food’ll be ready in a few.” She drops him and turns to her son with a glare. “Your father has a migraine, Katsuki, so be quiet!”

“How is that my problem?” Kacchan snaps, palms cackling. “He’s always feeling shitty!”

Izuku just sighs as the mother and son duo go at it again, loud enough to wake up the entire neighborhood. He’s used to this, in a sense. That’s just how the dynamic is in this house.

He’d be lying if he says he doesn’t like it.

Izuku instead goes into the kitchen to try and help with dinner. He may not cook a lot nowadays, partially because he doesn’t have a lot of money for food and partially because he’s too lazy, but he does know his way around the kitchen.

He loves to cook. Being alone for the better part of his life, Izuku had to find some way to pass the time without school or family. And cooking, he found quickly, is a sure way to keep himself occupied. Living on your own for years kind of forces you to learn how to take care of yourself.

And besides, he likes to cook because it allows him to feel the warmth of something other than fire.

It looks like Mitsuki is making katsudon tonight, if the pork and eggs on the counter are anything to go by. Izuku feels his stomach rumble. That’s his favorite meal, and the entire Bakugou family knows it.

I don’t deserve you, Auntie.

It looks like the only thing that needs to be done is to finish the rice. That’s easy.

Izuku hums a tune to himself as he takes out plates and sets the table. He's done this often enough for it to feel like second nature. The Bakugous invite him over once a week, usually every Thursday night, for dinner or breakfast. They are the only people he'd ever consider to be his family.

Though that's yet another thing he won't admit to anyone else. If somebody finds out about his relationship with them, if they see how he looks at them whenever they let him come over, everything will be screwed.

If Father finds out I'm still visiting this often, they'll all end up dead.

Izuku spreads the rice over the plates and prepares to divvy up the food. The smell makes his mouth water, and the boy forces himself not to scarf everything down.

All that ass-kicking has left him starved, so sue him for literally salivating.

A heavy hand lands on his shoulder, and Izuku nearly jumps out of his skin when Kacchan teases right beside his ear.

"You hungry?"

Izuku flushes, not realizing he was staring so intently at the food on the table. "Shut up, it's been a long day!"

The smirk drops off his friend's face, being replaced with something more suspicious. Izuku tries to push down his sudden nervousness.

Kacchan crosses his arms. "So where were you, really? And don't fucking lie to me. You've gotten caught up in fights loads of times, but you've never been this late before."

"I told you, Kacchan, I—"

"Then tell me again!" His palms cackle dangerously, but Izuku doesn't flinch. He knows the other boy would never hurt him like that. "I don't have time for your shitty excuses! And don't be stupid enough to think I didn't notice how fucked up your leg is."

Izuku bites his lip, eyes flicking toward the doorway. "I'll tell you later. Auntie might come down any second."

"She's trying to get Dad out of bed, so she won't be back for a while.

Now spill it before I blow your ass up!”

Too late, Izuku thinks to himself. Already had my ass almost blown up today. It must be quite famous for everyone to want a piece of it.

“You know,” Izuku says instead. “It almost sounds like you care, Kacchan.”

“Okay, okay! I’ll tell you, just give me a second.”

Kacchan leans back with a scowl. “Better be a good reason for worrying me.”

Finishing up with setting the table, Izuku leads him back to the living room so he can see when Mistuki comes down the stairs. He doesn’t sit down, too full of nerves to be in one place. “You know that client I told you about? The one who told me about this new drug ring in the city over?”

Kacchan huffs. “Get to the point.”

“Well, I couldn’t find any information on the names I came up with, though they did sound familiar to me. I went into their base a few hours ago and tried to flush them out, but it was harder than I thought.”

Izuku trails off near the end, causing Kacchan to gesture for him to spit it out. “And?”

“Well, I set the place on fire, like usual, but then I had to—” Izuku has a reason for cutting off this time, his mouth going slack as his eyes catch the picture on the television. Oh, wow.

Kacchan follows his gaze, blinking at the video footage conveniently being shown on the news channel. It’s a rerun from the fight, and it's currently showing the spiraling helicopter as it heads toward the ground at a rapid pace.

Rabbit is seen clutching the rails of it, only to let go a few moments later, a huge explosion following not long after.

Of fucking course they’d choose to replay the footage right now.

There’s silence. Izuku risks a glance at his friend, only to see a vein popping out of his skull. “Uh, Kacchan?”

The teen turns to him, and Izuku is pretty sure he would have become a victim of homicide had Mitsuki’s voice not rung out from the top of the stairs. “Boys, it’s dinner time! Get to the table!”

Izuku meets Kacchan’s eyes with a deadpan look. “It’s not what it looks like, I swear.”

Kacchan just grins, but it’s all teeth.

Maybe I am going to die.

It turns out that the food is, in fact, as good as it looks. Izuku takes one bite and nearly moans at just how delicious it is. The pork practically melts in his mouth, and the eggs and rice balance out the salty taste of the tonkatsu sauce perfectly.

“This is delicious as always!” He groans. “Thank you for the food.”

Mitsuki looks up at him and smiles, eyes crinkling. “You’re welcome, kiddo! I was rushin' a bit, but I think it turned out alright.”

The blonde woman waves away the praise, turning to talk to her husband some more about something from work.

Izuku glances at Kacchan just as the boy starts to speak, his voice low: “Everything tastes good when you haven’t eaten in days, huh, Deku?”

He flashes Izuku a fiery look, telling the boy all he needs to know about what he’s referring to.

“What was that?” Masaru asks, frowning, but Izuku kicks Kacchan from under the table before he can reply.

For a few, tense moments, everything is silent, but then Mitsuki shrugs and turns back to the conversation with her husband—not before narrowing her eyes suspiciously at them, though.

Izuku breathes out a sigh in relief. Fuck, that was close.

Kacchan is still glaring at him, and Izuku kicks him again under the table. His friend hisses but otherwise says nothing.

Jesus. Does he want to expose me? We've already talked about this. He knows I try to eat when I can.

Izuku tries to focus back on his food, continuing to eat as if his life depends on it. Katsudon tastes best hot, so he doesn't want it to get cold.

He cleans off the plate in record time and leans back slightly in his chair. He's still hungry. He could go for another portion, but he also doesn't want to eat more than he should.

Mitsuki and Masaru are still eating, albeit slowly. They don't look like they're going for seconds anytime soon. And Kacchan—

The teen takes a large spoonful from the pan in the middle of the table and drops the food onto Izuku's plate, not saying a word.

Huh. I swear he can read my mind.

He throws him a quick, grateful look, having not completely forgiven him for the comment a few minutes earlier, and digs in again.

"So," Mitsuki says suddenly, once everyone is almost finished. "It's getting late, Izuku, so why don't you stay the night here?"

Izuku pauses as three pairs of eyes land on him. He gulps down a piece of egg and takes a nervous sip of his soda. "Uh, I'm not sure Father would like it if I—"

"Nonsense," Mitsuki interrupts, voice bright. "It's dark out, and the crime rate around here has been high nowadays. I'd feel better if you stayed with us tonight."

Masaru clears his throat then. "You don't have to, of course. It's just a thought." He gives his wife a pointed look. "Don't pressure him, Mitsuki; it's his choice."

"It's fine," Izuku cuts in, not wanting the couple to argue. "If it's alright with you guys, I guess I can stay the night."

Kacchan grunts from his place at the table while Masaru nods his reassurance.

Mitsuki clasps her hands together. "Great! I'm sure Hisashi won't mind since he's never there at the house anyways."

The entire room seems to drop a few thousand degrees, and Izuku winces. Kacchan's head snaps up to face him, as if to gauge his reaction, and Izuku hears Masaru choke on his food. "Mitsuki, that's not—"

She cuts him off before he can finish telling her off. "Oh come on, you know I'm right! That bastard doesn't give a shit about him or any of us for that matter! He won't care if Izuku stays the night here."

"You can't just say that," Masaru says, trying and failing to come up with a good defense.

Mitsuki fires back, and Izuku half expects Kacchan to join the fight, too, but he just watches his friend with narrowed eyes.

The green-haired boy winces. He doesn't like being the cause of one of Mitsuki and Masaru's arguments, even though it happens often enough. He knows it's not really his fault, but still.

Izuku waves his hands in front of him as if to fan away the metaphorical flames, garnering both of the adults' attention. "It's okay," he amends. "Er, Father is kind of a jerk sometimes, but I don't think he'll mind this time."

Mitsuki brightens up instantly. "Oh, that's good." She stands up and starts to collect the plates. "Well, dessert is in the oven, so stay here while I get it."

She leaves the dining room quickly, and Masaru doesn't waste any time before leaning over the table. "Sorry about that," he mutters. "You know how she gets."

"I can still hear you!"

Masaru sighs at his wife's yell, and Izuku hides his grin behind a hand. "It's alright," the boy repeats. "Auntie's right, after all."

The dessert, it turns out, is a weird sort of pie filled with chocolate and cream. It doesn't taste bad at all, and so Izuku has to stop himself after his second slice.

He helps Masaru with washing the dishes and putting away the leftovers, making small talk along the way. Speaking with the older Bakugou is always calming for him.

He's the polar opposite of Mitsuki and Kacchan, so it was quite a shock to Izuku when he was first introduced to him all those years ago. He still finds it hard to believe that such a quiet man married such a headstrong woman. Masaru is like a river, steady and unbreakable, whilst Mitsuki is like a raging inferno, scalding and disastrous.

But after spending so much time with the man, Izuku has come to realize that they both complement each other in their own way.

Izuku doesn't mind talking with him. Masaru is nice to be around. The power his gentle quirk exudes is comforting, almost, so the boy tries to soak it up all he can.

Once everything's cleaned up, Masaru ruffles Izuku's hair softly before joining Mitsuki in the living room.

Oh. That was nice.

Izuku climbs the stairs to Kacchan's bedroom after wishing the couple a good night, a skip in his step now.

His happiness, however, depletes as soon as he opens the door.

Kacchan tackles him, and Izuku instinctively spins around to throw the boy over his hip. Kacchan grabs his arm and brings him down with him, shoving his face into the carpeted ground. "I'm gonna kill you, nerd."

"Fuck!" Izuku gasps, a little bit of pain running through him from the movements. "Get off me, Kacchan! I'm injured!"

"Not a chance. You deserve to get your ass beat for the shit you pulled."

Izuku whines. "That's not my fault! Why can't you—" A harder press to the ground has him shutting up, and he huffs in frustration.

He can hear Kacchan's grin as he speaks. "Just admit it, Deku. I win! I always win! Now say it!”

Any other time and Izuku probably would have pushed his friend some more. He’d make him angry enough to start another fight out of pure pettiness. But right now, all Izuku wants to do is sleep. “Fine. You win.”

Kacchan shakes his head. “I don’t think I heard you.”

“You always win!” Izuku throws the other teen off of him and sits up against the bed. “Happy now?”

“Always.”

Izuku starts to fix the wrappings on his knee, and the boy can feel his friend’s piercing gaze on him. He tries to ignore it, putting his hair up into a small bun to try and distract himself, but it doesn’t work.

When his skin starts to itch in discomfort, he looks up to meets Kacchan’s sour expression. “What?”

Kacchan, surprisingly, answers him. “Are you alright?”

It’s clear that he’s not talking about his injuries.

Izuku feels himself relax. “Yeah. I don’t mind it when she talks about him. I’m not going to piss and shit and cry at the mention of his name or something, Kacchan.”

“I don’t know why you won’t just tell them.”

He frowns. “About what? My father being the most feared villain alive? Yeah, that’d go over real well.”

Kacchan rolls his eyes. “I meant about your homelessness, shithead. It would be easier for you if you just told everyone.”

“And then I’d be sent to an orphanage, or worse.” Izuku stands up and goes to get the emergency nightclothes Kacchan keeps under the bed in case he stays over. “Is that what you want to happen?”

“They’d take you in! The hag already said she’d adopt you in a heartbeat if given the chance! Why won’t you—”

“You know why.” Izuku’s voice is tight, cutting right over his friend. “I’m already too close to you guys. I can’t risk putting you all in danger like that. I’m sorry.”

Kacchan snorts. “That’s hypocritical, Deku. You could just—”

“Please just drop it.”

Maybe it’s the look on Izuku’s face that does it, or maybe the tone of his voice, but either way Kacchan does drop it after only a few moments of hesitance. He always does. He cares about Izuku too much to make him upset. Especially when it comes to the topic of his father. The last time he’d argued with him over this, Izuku nearly had a breakdown.

That's probably what would've happened now if he kept pushing.

“Fine,” Kacchan says begrudgingly. “But you’re telling me about what happened today. In detail, shitface.”

So Izuku does. He talks to him about the information his client gave him, telling him how the targets were supposed to be just petty thugs. He tells him how that was a fucking lie and how he nearly had his kneecaps taken out by a gremlin. He explains how he executed the flawless takedown of the entire base and burnt everything to ash, and how he hitched a ride with the helicopter seen on the news.

Kacchan cackles and sneers at the right moments, slowly putting Izuku at ease again.

Izuku frowns when he gets to one part, though. “The helicopter exploded with the bad guy still inside. He was unconscious, and I think I saw him get caught by one of the flying heroes, but still.”

“Kacchan,” Izuku chides.

The teen scoffs again. “What? He was a villain. I say good riddance to all those fuckers.”

“But he was still a person, Kacchan!” Izuku shakes his head. “I wouldn’t care if I didn’t already know he had a family waiting for him. He was one of the original group I put away the first time. He was in the wrong place at the wrong time, so I guess I just feel bad.”

His friend doesn’t back down. “You did his family a favor. I’m not going to feel bad for a lowlife. He deserved what they got. ‘Sides, you even said he got caught. It’s not like he’s dead.”

Izuku watches Kacchan's face for a moment, trying to decide whether or not he's joking. Finally, the boy sighs. "You're insufferable."

"Shut your face, nerd. It's already after nine, so go to sleep."

Kacchan flops onto the bed and flicks on his fan, kicking off his slippers in the process.

Izuku smirks to himself, settling on his side of the mattress. "You act like you're so tough, and yet you still go to bed at nine every night like a little kid."

A foot lands in his stomach, kicking him off the bed entirely. He just giggles as he lands, facedown, on the carpeted flooring.

I deserved that.

He doesn't bother getting back up. He doesn't like to sleep on beds anyway. They're too soft for him.

Izuku rolls onto his back and looks up at the ceiling, Kacchan's light breathing a white noise beside him. A blanket and pillow are tossed his way, and he mumbles his thanks.

As expected, he gets no reply.

Today is, overall, a good day. A nice, hot dinner was just the icing on the cake—it always is, in all fairness. Cooking is fascinating to him, and today made him appreciate it even more. He may have to start it up again.

He used to cook a lot, but now he prioritizes certain things over food. He makes his own weapons. He saves up the money he earns for necessities like his phone bill. He needs tech to make his support items.

Speaking of which, he has to make more of his pink sludge bombs.

He also never really feels hungry a lot. So why waste food if he doesn't need it, right? It's best to save his belongings for better things. But that's not the point.

He's full, he's content, and he's just completed another one of his missions. It may have been harder than he thought, but it was a success. He pocketed a lot of the money the gang had stashed in their boxes.

So, today has been eventful, and all Izuku wants to do is rest.

His mind, however, has other ideas. He doesn’t actually fall asleep until the moon starts to dip low into the sky and the early lights of the morning start to filter in through the window.

Izuku pretends he wasn’t awake for the whole night when Kacchan gets up to go to school.

He didn't mean to stay up. Insomnia just has a way of creeping up on you like that.

Shouta is done with life right about now.

His day started out pretty well. He woke up at a fairly good time, had his favorite coffee, ate breakfast with his obnoxiously loud husband, and then proceeded off to work.

He may have expelled his entire homeroom class a few months earlier, but he still has other lessons to teach the rest of the students at UA. Besides, Nezu doesn't allow his teachers to just slack off, even when they technically don't have a class to teach.

But back to the point—everything started out okay. He felt relaxed. Content. So content that it made him suspicious, because something has to go wrong.

Good days like this one don't come by very often, especially on a weekday when he has to work. It just doesn't happen.

It's around lunchtime when he gets the call, and Shouta can tell just by looking at the caller ID that his instincts were correct, as always.

The underground hero sighs and puts down his chopsticks, wondering balefully if he'll ever get the chance to finish his teriyaki. "What is it, Tsukauchi?"

The detective laughs a little over the line. "Don't sound too upset, I think you'll enjoy your visit this time."

Here we go.

Shouta picks at his food, aware of Hizashi and Nemuri staring at him as he speaks. "You want me to come to the station again?"

"If you can. I only need a few minutes, at the very least."

"I'll see if Nezu will let me leave early after my last lesson. What do you need?"

“I’m sure you saw the news last night.”

The hero snorts. “Of course I did. It’s all everyone’s talking about right now.”

Shutting up about Rabbit is something the media doesn’t know how to do. The vigilante has done it yet again, embarrassing all of the pro heroes in the city yesterday by taking down a drug ring that local authorities hadn’t even been able to locate, much less initiate a full takedown on. Shouta didn't actually watch the coverage of it live, as he was getting ready for his patrol, but Hizashi recorded it for him.

Not that he needed to, though. Every news station within a fifty-mile radius of the attack has been replaying the scene of Rabbit jumping out of the helicopter like some sort of maniac every five minutes. It’s like they truly have nothing else to report on.

It’s getting to be kind of annoying.

“Well, I feel like it’s time to start the process, Aizawa.”

Shouta doesn’t have to ask what that means. They’ve been planning it for a while. Shouta has been keeping an eye on Rabbit for a few weeks now—nothing too special. Just some tracking to figure out where the vigilante tends to patrol, and also of the area and perimeter he covers.

So far, he hasn’t been able to gather much. The kid is slippery. He seems to know that he’s being followed, and after only a few minutes of Shouta trailing him, Rabbit just disappears into thin air. As if he’d never been there in the first place.

Shouta hates to admit that he’s a little impressed. Now, that’s not to say the kid has completely bested him—of course not. He’s fast, irritatingly so, but he’s still young and jumpy. Twice, Shouta has been presented with the chance to jump him, but both times he refrained. Not only because he’s not a fan of attacking a person who just got done saving a victim of assault or robbery but also because he knew, deep down, that it wouldn’t have solved the core of the issue.

Right. This is his case after all.

Shouta makes an affirmative noise. “I’ll see to it. Give me a little bit.”

He hangs up, and with a long-suffering sigh, Shouta gets up to talk with the principal. He already knows he's going to regret this.

"Going to the station?" Hizashi asks, peering up at him from his place at the table.

Shouta nods, grabbing his scarf off the hook and wrapping it around his neck. "Is it alright if I take the car? You might have to walk home."

"Sure! Hey, I'm going to get some more ground sausage before lunch is over. We ran out this morning, so I'll be leaving in a few."

Yawning, Shouta nods in confirmation and picks up his sleeping bag from the corner by the door, feeling the beginnings of another headache coming on. He starts for his office to gather the work for his next class. Nezu will no doubt say yes when he asks. The mammal has never had an issue with him leaving early before if it's for police business.

He passes back by the teacher's lounge and chooses to ignore Hizashi's amplified laughter as the voice hero berates Nemuri for taking the rest of his teriyaki.

I'll get her back tomorrow.

Izuku hates bullies.

To be fair, most everyone does. You'd have to be a special kind of asshole to actively support bullying, especially when it's against people who don't deserve it.

Which is why it's easy for Izuku to stand up to jerks. It's the right thing to do. He knows what it's like to be put down, to be hated by everyone around you and be spit on and treated like nothing more than an animal.

He knows what it feels like, so Izuku will be damned if he lets someone else go through that.

He tries to help as best he can. Most times, he does it well. He'll see a group of kids picking on someone that they deem weaker, and he'll step in. Most of the time, the bullies back down.

That's the thing. Most bullies aren't used to their victims fighting back. They'll get surprised. They'll insult you a bit, and then make their exit after deciding it's not worth it.

But it's not really an exit, it's not really a show of kindness. It's a show of cowardice. It's more of an escape.

Some bullies, however, don't back down. These are the ones you really have to watch out for. These ones will break you down. They'll pick out the things you hate most about yourself and bring it out into the light for everyone and their grandma to see.

It's harsh, and it's wrong. But it happens. And Izuku had thought that after everything he's gone through, after all the shit he's overcome, he'd become immune to it. And in many ways, he has.

But the insults hurt worse coming from certain people; people who you used to trust.

After Kacchan leaves for school, Izuku takes a quick shower and borrows some of his clothes, thinking that his friend probably won't mind.

Probably.

When he comes downstairs, Mitsuki is sitting at the counter with a cup of coffee in hand, getting ready for work. Masaru must have already left. It's a Friday, after all. Those are the busiest days of the month.

Izuku makes sure to thank her again for letting him stay, and after promising to be safe and not be late next time he comes over, the boy skips out of the house with his notebook in his hoodie pocket.

He has a few things to do today, seeing as his Rabbit costume has a few holes in it now, plus the fact that some of his weapons got destroyed when he set the hideout on fire. The prices you pay for salvation.

So today he has to buy some fabric to patch up his costume, look through some dumpsters for abandoned technology and metal parts, and then wash his clothes at the laundromat. Which makes it a full day for him.

He's on the way to the embroidery story down the street from his apartment when his plans first seem to go down the drain. Because as he continues to slip through the crowds of people, he accidentally bumps into someone.

Except it's not an accident. Not on their part, at least.

The next thing he knows, Izuku is being grabbed by meaty hands and slammed into the concrete wall just inside the entrance of an alley.

His wide eyes trail up to meet the scornful expression of a boy around his height, and Izuku can already tell that things aren't about to go his way.

He knows this kid. No, he knows these kids, because there's more than one. Three, to be exact. All encasing him in, arms coming out to trap him against the dirty wall.

And honestly, Izuku could have avoided this. He felt the movement in the air a split second before the hand even came into contact with his shoulder, just before he was pushed by two other pairs of hands into the alleyway. He could've avoided it because he'd felt the attack coming.

In four seconds flat, Izuku could have had all three of these kids on the ground crying. Probably sporting a broken bone or split lip, or something even worse.

But he's not Rabbit, here. He can't fight them. And besides, if he dodged the hand, the idiot would've hit the guy behind Izuku.

You see, it's different when you're defending someone else from a bully or criminal. At that point, it becomes self-defense. The laws become more lenient at that point, especially when you have an alibi or witness to back you up.

But here, right now, the only witness is Izuku himself. And to make matters worse, he's the one getting bullied.

Which means he can't fight back. Not unless he wants to find himself in jail. For real this time. He can get arrested if he harms them because no one ever believes the victim. Not when they're someone like Midoriya Izuku.

Someone who already has a history of violence and volatility from the age of six and beyond.

His eyes glance between the trio, and Izuku's throat suddenly tightens.

It hurts worse coming from certain people. People who you used to trust.

These are Kacchan's friends. Or, should he say, were. He recognizes them all. The one with spindly fingers and an angular face—he's the one Kacchan hates the most. He's in the middle of the group now, still holding Izuku against the wall. He must be the acting leader since Kacchan is gone.

The next one is a boy Izuku can only faintly remember. He has a square chin with hair that stops right above his eyes, and Izuku can't quite recall what his quirk is, but he can feel its faint power humming beneath the other boy's skin.

But Izuku remembers Bully Number Three clearly. He's round, just a little bit chubby. The most defining features, however, are the crimson wings he sports on his back, folded neatly in on themselves. They look almost leathery in texture, set with talons at the end of each joint. They've definitely gotten bigger since the last time Izuku's seen them.

"Tsubasa?" Izuku breathes out, staring at his old friend.

The boy doesn't answer, only letting out a sneer as he looks back at the ringleader—waiting for an order, Izuku faintly realizes. The power dynamic here is obvious.

Kacchan's replacement presses him harder against the wall, his breath hot against Izuku's cheek.

"Midoriya," he scoffs, and his voice is almost laughable. It's almost as if the boy is forcing himself to sound like an edgy teenager who's just finished his second bowl of weed. "Didn't think we'd find you here of all places."

It sounds like a normal conversation to anyone else, when in reality it's anything but. It's more of the calm before a storm. That's how they get you, Izuku thinks. They build you up and make you think you're their friend, and then they hit you where it's hardest.

They're nothing but a bunch of slimy assholes, thinking they're tough shit.

Izuku can identify this. He can identify the problem and even come up with the solution for it, but the problem is just that he can't seem to execute it.

A slap to the face jolts him right out of his thoughts. He stumbles slightly, realizing all of a sudden that his knee still hurts like a bitch. Escaping won't be an easy feat.

"I asked you a question, Deku," the leader starts up again, getting right in his face. "You don't wanna be rude, do ya? Answer me."

Deku. He called him Deku. As in, useless. As in, the nickname Kacchan gave to him a long time ago. The nickname that started out as an insult and is now nothing more than a term of aggressive endearment —but only when it comes from Kacchan.

And now this idiot is bringing back the old meaning behind his name? Anger rises up within him, setting his insides on fire. He shouldn't stand for it. He really shouldn't. He can almost hear his father's soft words in his mind, egging him on, promising him he won't get in trouble if drags these boys through the mud until they beg for him to stop.

"Shouldn't you guys be at school?" Izuku asks instead, clearing his throat and praying he doesn't sound as snappy as he thinks. "It's not time for it to be out yet—"

He sees the next smack coming and braces for it, relaxing his face like he's been taught multiple times. His head snaps sideways with the force of the blow, and Izuku is now facing the street, only just able to see what's going on through the gaps left between the two boys closest to him.

He takes a few deep breaths in through his nose, ignoring their barked laughter all around him. It sounds like nails on a chalkboard.

"Now, I don't think that's any of your business, is it?" That's the forgotten boy, the one Izuku can only faintly remember. His voice is squeaky, almost artificially so.

Izuku wishes he'd been patrolling as Rabbit at this moment. He would've roasted the hell out of them all.

So they got kicked out, or are they skipping? Probably the first.

He receives a kick to the shin, and he nearly buckles as his bad knee is jostled even more. He has to stay up. He's taken a whole lot worse before. He just has to keep up the facade for enough time for them to get bored with him. Or maybe for someone to step in.

They tease him, but he's used to these words. They're more of a backdrop to his thoughts than real insults.

"Worthless."

"Creep."

"Bakugou's little witch bitch."

"Finally decided to drop out of school, huh, Deku?"

"Guess he figured out he wouldn't make it after all."

Izuku sees a few people glance inside the alleyway when they walk past. But instead of lending a hand, they just turn away. They keep walking.

In a way, Izuku isn't surprised, but it doesn't stop the new spark of rage from igniting inside of him. He forces it down with a swallow. This is not the best area to lose his cool in.

They're just kids. That's probably what everyone's thinking. The onlookers. Just boys being boys, roughhousing and all that. Must be good friends.

But there's no way. No way those people can't see what's going on. And what's even worse, Izuku spots a cop on the other side of the street, watching the crowds for any suspicious movements or interesting events.

He catches his eye, and for a few long moments, Izuku waits. He waits for the cop to come over and stop them. To break up the literal assault going on. But he doesn't. He gives Izuku one last look before glancing away as if he never noticed him there in the first place.

Somewhere in the midst of the spite-fueled rants being thrown his way, Izuku ends up falling to the asphalt. That's when Tsubasa lands his first hit on him—a weak kick to his stomach.

They keep going, but it doesn't hurt much. Having a high pain tolerance really helps in these circumstances. Besides, they're not hurting him too badly. And if they're doing it to him, chances are they'd do it to someone else if given the moment. Better Izuku than someone else.

He wants to fight back, but another part of himself knows he can't. Because for one, they don't know any better. They've never been taught how to deal with their emotions correctly, which is still not an excuse, but it is a reason.

Kacchan would've ended up like them. He probably would've ended up worse had Auntie not forced him into therapy.

Secondly, Izuku can't bring any attention to himself in this alleyway. If he becomes the punching bag for once, or maybe even a few times, they might decide not to hurt anyone else. He can be that sacrifice.

Izuku would love to beat their asses and hand them over to the police —oh, to Tsukauchi! The detective loves straightening out bullies!—but chances are he'd be put in jail even with the detective's quirk to help him out. There's no proof that any of this happened, and lie detectors (even human ones) are still subjective in most courts. Even if they do believe him, his past record is enough to lock him up anyway.

If he attempts to beat them badly and run, they might snitch, and then he'll be hunted by Tsukauchi and the others.

The only thing Izuku can do is fight back just a little bit. Just enough to keep them interested and off of someone else's case. He can humor them a little. Besides, this is good practice for him.

He sees a steel-toed boot heading for his nose and instinctively grabs it, twisting the leg and ankle simultaneously so the person trips over their own body.

The ringleader lands next to him and starts yelling more obscenities at him, becoming progressively louder—which is what Izuku wants.

Even after these years, the trio is still utterly predictable. They'll no doubt take any bait he lays out for them.

It's not until elongated fingers reach into his hoodie pocket does he actually startle. His notebook—his analysis notebook, filled with all of his notes and theories on all the recent villains and heroes—is snatched out of his grasp and thrown. Right into a large puddle next to a dumpster.

Are you fucking serious?

“Hey, what are you—!” Izuku is cut off by Tsubasa’s meaty fist flying towards him, and quicker than lightning, Izuku grabs his wrist between his fingers and yanks him forward. Tsubasa smashes face-first into the wall with a loud crack and cries out in pain, slumping to the side.

Well. So much for not doing too much damage.

The boy Izuku had forgotten about gasps, taking a few steps back from his previous place beside Tsubasa. He’s obviously the weakest link. Izuku had a feeling he would crumble as soon as one of his friends went down.

Izuku jumps to his feet and heads for his notebook, only for Ringleader to grab the back of his hoodie and swing him around.

Don’t hit him. You might hurt him.

He merely ducks under Ringleader’s fist, kneeing the other boy in the stomach so he stumbles away. Tsubasa must’ve recovered already, as when Izuku turns back, the mutant is now holding the notebook in his hand with a furious look on his face.

“Tsubasa,” Izuku tries, holding his hands out placatingly. “Please. Give me my—”

There’s a rush of wind to his side, and Izuku forces himself not to move as the third boy fucking slaps him with the back of his palm.

And what? What kind of hit is that? What a bitch move!

Izuku tastes iron in his mouth and grits his teeth, dazed for only a moment. Ringleader is on his other side now, blocking him in. Tsubasa stands triumphantly in front of him with his wings outstretched.

I need my notebook, and they’re going to make me fight to get it.

They want him to fight. They want him to get arrested, most likely.

At this point, fuck it. Whatever. He needs his notebook back, no matter the cost. He’s spent a lot of time on it, and his own analysis of his quirks are in there. Izuku crouches down a little lower, fists clenching.

Memories of his father are in it. He can’t afford to lose it.

He prepares for a fight, and he sees the trio tense in anticipation. They'll go for the first hit, at least Ringleader will. Tsubasa will likely follow, and the third one will have no choice but to—

Ringleader is rushing forward, fingers outstretched to do who knows what, when a loud voice comes from the entrance to the alleyway and freezes them in their tracks.

"What's going on here, boys?"

Izuku stares at the intruder—because that's what he is at the moment. He could be a cop looking to arrest him, or maybe even a random civilian looking to get in on the action.

It sounds sick, but Izuku has seen it happen before.

The man is tall and lanky, and his hair (a nice, light shade of yellow that almost looks white) is pulled back to presumably keep it from getting in his eyes. It looks like he has it in a half-bun.

But that's not the most interesting thing about the mystery man. He has red, rectangular glasses sitting on the bridge of his nose, framing a set of piercing green eyes.

Eyes that Izuku swears he knows, but just can't put his finger on. The voice, too, he realizes. It has a certain ring to it.

And also—is he carrying a bag of cat food and ground sausage?

Izuku opens his mouth to speak, but Ringleader beats him to it. "Oh, uh, were just having some fun, sir!"

His voice is high-pitched, and it's such an obvious lie that Izuku wants to laughs. He should've let me talk, I would've been a hell of a lot more convincing.

And from the looks of it, Mystery Man doesn't believe the act either. "Oh, yeah?" He frowns a little, walking casually towards them while still carrying his bag. "What'cha doing with that notebook there, kiddo?"

He's looking at Tsubasa, and the boy in question folds under the adult's knowing glare. He sheepishly shoves the journal back into Izuku's chest, wings flapping slightly out of nerves. "We're all just, er, playing a game of catch, ya know?"

Real convincing. Maybe phrase it like a statement next time, dragon boy, and it might be a little more believable.

Izuku holds his notebook tightly, not wanting to risk it getting tossed into another puddle.

Mystery Man stops a few feet away from him, frown deepening. “Is that right? Well, I think maybe you three should pick another game. This one doesn’t look like too much fun, yeah?”

It sounds more like an order, and Izuku is hit again with the same feeling that he knows this man.

The intruder—savior, more like—points back to the mouth of the alley with a thumb, giving the boys all the incentive they need to start scrambling.

They keep a safe distance away from Mystery Man as they flee towards the exit, and the one closest to Izuku, the Forgotten Boy, shoots him a scathing look and says, voice low, “You should’ve done everyone a favor and jumped off a building once you quit school, Deku.”

Izuku had been waiting for a comment like that, had been waiting for a taunt, a finishing blow, but now that he’s actually hearing those familiar words, he feels himself get sick.

"Do ya like making a fool out of me? You think I’ll believe you weren’t just lying to me all that time? Go take a fucking dive off a roof if you think for one damn second I’ll forgive you!”

The memory tastes foul on his tongue, and Izuku shakes it away quickly.

Forgotten Boy is gone with shrill laughter, leaving Izuku and the Mystery Man alone together in the alley. Great.

Izuku flips through the pages of his notebook, quietly seething.

All of his notes are ruined. The pages are soaked; he can barely read the words written in them. His drawings, theories, all of his hard work —destroyed. He can probably salvage some of it, sure, but it’s the fact that he has to do it at all that makes him angry.

A hand lands on his shoulder. “You alright, son?”

Izuku snaps the notebook shut and shoves it back into his hoodie pocket, glancing up at the taller man. “Oh, yeah! I’m, uh, I’m fine, sir, thanks. You didn’t have to do that.”

“Nonsense,” the blond says happily, retracting his hand. “I’m glad to help. Do they do that often?”

He sounds used to this. Is he a cop?

“Um, not really! They just like to play rough sometimes!” That sounds believable, Izuku thinks. The man probably would have believed it had he not just witnessed Izuku almost get the shit beat out of him.

“Uh-huh,” he says, brows scrunching suddenly. “Hey, you’re bleeding above your eye there, listener. Here.” The man digs in his back pocket for a moment before handing Izuku a bandaid, and looking closer, the boy can see a small print of a cat on the top.

Who the hell just carries a bandaid on them? Maybe he's more of a doctor?

Izuku wipes the trickle of blood off his forehead with his sleeve, thanking the man once more as he applies the bandage. He stands there for a moment after, the silence awkward as he realizes the stranger is studying him, before blurting out, “I have to get going, sir! I’m going to be late!”

He doesn’t wait for a reply as he runs out of the alleyway and disappears into the throng of people.

The man’s quirk had given off a strange, calming aura. It felt nice, in a way. Almost, dare Izuku say, comforting.

Again, he can’t shake the pressing feeling that he knows him from somewhere. There’s a strong possibility that he could be a cop, or maybe even a hero. In all fairness, his brain is too muddled from the bullies’ insults to think too much on anything else.

He ignores everyone’s stares and judgmental gazes, opting to instead continue on his way to the embroidery store. It closes pretty early, so he has to hurry. After that, he’ll finish his other plans.

It’ll take a few hours, but if he does it right he should have enough time to go to Tony’s for free breadsticks again!

At least the day had started out shitty, he thinks. Now it can’t get worse, it can only get better from here.

Right?

“You have his phone number.”

It’s not a question. Shouta hopes the disappointment is evident on his face as he stares at the text Tsukauchi apparently received from Rabbit himself.

Nezu let him off work a little early, as expected, so now he’s here, at the station, having to deal with this bullshit.

The detective has the decency to look a little sheepish as he replies, “Well, yeah. I don’t know how he got it, but he started texting me a week or so ago.”

“Did you find a location?” Shouta takes the phone and scrolls up, reading the rest of the messages. Maybe the kid left a clue or something. A hidden message.

“Nope.” Tsukauchi spins in his rolling chair, blowing out an annoyed breath. “The number is private. It’s a burner phone, by the looks of it. But the fact that he uses emojis throws out that idea. It has to be a smartphone.”

No doubt on purpose to give them this inner dilemma on what kind of phone he’s using.

“Or he just likes to piss people off,” Tsukauchi offers. “You told me before that he’s likely trying to come off as innocent so the heroes won’t try to arrest him.” He tilts his head in thought. “And also so we’ll underestimate him.”

Shouta hands the phone back, huffing when he reads the latest text again: I lived, bitch.

Honestly, it’s so corny that it’s not even funny.

The message was sent at around eight in the morning, which is interesting in itself. It followed a string of messages from Tsukauchi, who'd asked the vigilante if he survived his latest stunt. The detective was obviously worried.

“You think he’s injured?” Shouta asks, turning back to the holographic whiteboard. “The time frame between the incident and when he answered you is short, considering he jumped out of a helicopter.”

Tsukauchi stands up and drags a video file with his pointer finger onto the whiteboard. He expands it so it starts to play, showing the last minute of the warehouse fight. “He didn’t get injured too badly here. The most he got was a strike to the knee, but it doesn’t look like the bone shattered.”

Shouta narrows his eyes at the display. The vigilante is efficient in this type of scenario. He seems to have a lot of experience in dealing with multiple targets at once while also minimizing property damage.

Well. At least before he set the place on fire.

Shouta pauses the video just as the first spark of flame leaches into the air beside Rabbit’s figure and starts to spread over the dry wood of the warehouse. “That could be a fire quirk. I don’t see use of any implement.”

The detective shakes his head. “Previous encounters have shown that Rabbit does have a flamethrower. Homemade, by the looks of it, so we couldn’t search the records to find out who’s bought one in the past couple of years.”

“His file says he has basic enhancements,” Shouta continues. “If we narrowed down everyone in Japan based on his build and features, we’d still get nowhere. Ten percent of this country has a basic enhancement quirk, if we’re to be broad. There’s no way we could limit that range any further.”

“Despite the chances, we still tried to do so. By the end, we still had around nine thousand potential suspects. We don’t have enough information to narrow it down more. It’s a dead-end, as of the moment.”

Shouta rubs a hand down his face. He brings up another video file, this time of the most well-known part of the incident; the one with Rabbit taking a spectacular dive off a spiraling helicopter. “The only thing we don’t know is how he managed to survive this.”

Tsukauchi speaks up again. “We spoke to the young girl yesterday. She was present at the time he allegedly smashed into her hotel room window.” His voice takes on an amused tone. “The only thing she could give us was a clue to his voice. She said he sounded a little weird when he apologized to her, and his words were a little choppy.”

There’s one explanation for that, one that Shouta has been pondering for a while.

“He might have a voice changer. I doubt he bought it with how smooth it sounds most of the time. Same with the flamethrower, he must’ve made it himself.”

“That’s what I thought. All of the weapons he’s used, they’re all one of a kind.” Tsukauchi drags up a few grainy photos of Rabbit’s support items, exiting out of both videos. A bōstaff is more prominent among the pictures, along with a few dozen knives and capture wires. “My team can’t find any of these on the market, even illegally.”

“So he’s incredibly smart,” Shouta concedes. “Or has a few amazing clients.”

The other man nods. “There’s also a chance he wears contacts. We have no proof, but we have to keep that theory on the table. What I’m hoping is that you can get some information from him.”

And that has Shouta turning to look at the detective, hands shoved deep inside his pockets. He’s too tired for this shit today. “You want me to initiate contact?”

“I don’t think you should capture him just yet,” Tsukauchi says after a moment of pause. “Just talk to him about what we’re offering. Maybe he’ll come to his senses.”

Shouta can’t help but snort. “I have a feeling he knows I’ve been keeping tabs on him. He won’t take too kindly to me talking to him. He’ll instantly be on the defensive.”

Tsukauchi grins. “Well, there’s only one way to find out how he’ll react, isn’t there?”

For what seems like the millionth time today, Shouta sighs. He longs for his sleeping bag. “I’ll try to see if I can talk to him in the next few days.”

The man thanks the underground hero sincerely, but Shouta just rolls his eyes and makes for the door.

“Just don’t expect anything big to come out of it. I know people who used to act like him before, and I know you know who I’m talking about. Chances are he’s going to laugh in my face and disappear on me again, perhaps permanently this time.”

If he messes this up, everything might crumble. The progress they’ve made will have to be restarted.

For the kid’s sake, Shouta hopes that won’t have to happen.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Now that he’s thinking about it, Izuku has never been to Tony’s Pizzeria this early. It’s around three o’clock in the afternoon, an hour or so before Kacchan gets out of school.

He doesn’t know why he’s keeping tabs on his friend all of a sudden, but the words of his bullies are still ringing in his ears, and he wants to make sure Kacchan is alright, even though he knows he most definitely is.

The explosive teen won’t let anything get him down, a trait that Izuku both envies and hates at the same time.

Anyway, Izuku usually only goes to Tony’s in the evening time, when it’s already dark outside and he’s about to go on patrol or head home. But since he's passing by, he figures it's time to break that cycle.

While he waits for his order of one Dr. Pepper and a side of breadsticks, Izuku pulls out his damaged notebook, along with a brand new one he bought at the department store after getting some supplies to fix his costume.

It comes with two pens and some sticky notes, making it perfect for his analyses. And what makes it even better is that it was only a few dollars! The manager gave him a discount since he has a surplus of them in storage.

Izuku thinks it might also be because he looks a little homeless, but that's beside the point.

He opens both notebooks and sets them beside each other, comparing the pages. It's safe to say that his original journal is destroyed beyond repair—the paper has dried pretty much completely, leaving streaks of black and red ink from where he'd written notes and theories. He can read a little bit of it, as the puddle was only so deep, but his sketches are all mostly ruined, along with his analyses of the more recent pro heroes and villains.

It's a good thing he doesn’t care much about those. He's already memorized everything in those sections, after all. Every time he studies a new person or group, the information gets lodged inside his brain. It's more like common knowledge to him now.

The only thing he's worrying about is the notes he had on himself. Or, more specifically, on his quirks. He's still adding on to those sections little by little, sometimes every day and sometimes every other day. It just depends on his findings.

The thing about his quirks is that he doesn't know everything about them yet, so he still has to have a baseline down for them in his notebook. He can add on to them easily that way. That's why he's prioritizing copying those sections over from his old journal to his new one rather than his other, less important stuff.

He titles the notebook #15-2, in honor of its original, and doesn't waste any time in transferring the information. The only good thing about this is that he now has the chance to sort through his scribbled notes and make a more detailed, neater version. He uncaps his blue ballpoint pen and gets to work, humming under his breath.

Property of Midoriya Izuku. If found, please return to the nearest police station :)

That's all he's going to write on the first page. It's not like he's going to put down his phone number or address—what address, he thinks sourly, the abandoned building I've taken claim to?

Izuku has a criminal record, albeit not a terribly violent one, so if he loses it and it gets turned into a police station, it'll most likely come back around to Tsukauchi. The detective will hold it for him. At least, Izuku thinks he will.

He makes sure to write in code in case someone gets their hands on it and plans to use this information against him. Other than that, it takes a relatively small amount of time for him to get through the different sections. It's a little bit tedious, but he prefers handwritten notes since he has a very rational fear of someone being able to uncover all of his digital documents on his computer.

Ms. Hanako brings him his Dr. Pepper sometime in the middle of his furious jotting, and she doesn't look the least bit surprised at the cat bandaid on his forehead. She has the good sense not to mention it, and Izuku makes a mental note to give her a good tip (he'll just have to run fast so she doesn't try to give it back). Speaking of, how much money does he have left? He might just have to cash in his checks later on at the club.

But that's a matter for later. At the moment, Izuku is enjoying his soda and finishing his writing. The pen is smooth when he drags it on the paper, so he's having a little more fun than he probably should be.

Extract (M): activation requires both hands; exclusively skin-to-skin contact, gloves or fabric blocks usage; effects are permanent, cannot give back or away; steals original, does not take a copy; mutation of quirk from the paternal side, offspring quirk cannot steal parent quirk or vice versa

Izuku grimaces as he continues writing.

Cons: painful, leaves burn marks, immoral; Pros: could save a person dying due to quirk, more quirks = more versatile in combat; Use: villains, last resort only

It's admittedly a little bare for his liking, but it’s only a rough outline for now. He makes sure to leave a lot of room between sections.

Force: f orced quirk activation; skin-to-skin, brief touches work; c an be used on two at once since one touch of a hand is required for each person; no cooldown, no limit to how many can be affected by it at a time; cannot control input or output; pushes victim to limit, often to the point of exhaustion or fainting

The last note makes Izuku shudder when he remembers heavy liquid filling up his nose and bubbles racing one another to break the surface far above him. Cold enters his veins, and he shakes himself to get rid of the feeling.

Cons: extremely painful depending on the quirk of the user, expels a lot of energy, may be counterproductive; Pros: a quick way to get someone out of the way permanently

Technically, Extract has the same benefit, but Izuku isn't going to write that down for fear of spiraling again. He always likes to get the worst ones out of the way.

Deflect: similar to transparent shield; could be better described as invisible glass; shatters at around 350 pounds of force or pressure; activated when arms are crossed in an x shape—must be held there for the entire duration; can successfully block bullets, knives, other variations of sharp weapons, blunt force trauma, gases, and more to add; unsuccessfully blocks attacks that are above 350 pounds of sheer force and repeated hits that bypass the regenerative aspects

Yeah, Izuku isn't about to forget about that one dreadful night a villain with a bodybuilder quirk kept hitting the shield over and over and over, adding up to about three hundred hits in ten seconds, and broke the shield to send Izuku flying through the concrete wall behind him.

He won't ever make that mistake again.

Cons: limited time to hold, current max time is seven and a quarter seconds; causes bloody nose and chronic migraines; Pros: solid defensive tool; blocks both long-range and close-range attacks; allows for mobility while shield is up

Izuku hasn't trained with this quirk a lot, honestly. He's used it before as Rabbit, but only a few times when it was necessary and also dark out, so no one could see it. It's more of an instinctive thing than anything.

If he trains more with it, the boy is sure he'll be able to increase the time limit.

Boost: basic enhancements; provides an incredible supply of energy; increased strength, stamina, speed, hearing, and sight (will need to conduct more tests); used daily, almost always active

In fact, that's the excuse Izuku always gives: I can't help it, it's just always on! You can't arrest me for public quirk usage, that's not fair!

Cons: higher metabolism means normal med doses will need to be tripled, along with food consumption; Pros: useful in nearly all situations, offensive and defensive means, great opportunities for escaping situations

He's starting on the last section when Ms. Hanako comes back over and places two orders of breadsticks on the table. "Sorry for the wait, dearie. Ouki burnt the first batch, which should frankly be impossible with the setup we have back there. He managed to do it, though, so here's an extra bag."

Izuku dips his head at her in thanks, suddenly struck with that same uncomfortably warm feeling he gets in his chest when people are being kind to him. "I appreciate it! Today's been rough."

The older lady nods, putting her hands on her hips. "Got a new journal, huh?"

"Yep! I kinda ruined the first one, but I don't mind."

“Hm.” She looks like she doesn’t believe him, but instead of calling him out on it, she pats him twice on the head and walks away. “If you need me, just holler.”

He munches on the breadsticks, sprinkling them with an ungodly amount of parmesan cheese and dipping them in marinara as he continues his work. He's glad for the food's timing, as he needs a slight distraction when it comes to this upcoming quirk.

Pull: weak form of telekinesis that allows objects to be pulled towards the body as long as nothing is blocking the way; to activate, hold out one palm, have the object in sight, and imagine an invisible string attaching to it; can control how much force and speed to pull at, however, requires more concentration

It's also not always reliable.

Cons: can only pull a max of 300 pounds currently; Pros: beneficial in both long-range and close-range attacks, good for retrieving weapons or providing distractions

Now that he’s finished with those sections, he can throw away his old notebook since he has no use for the old information. He can start anew with different theories and such in this one.

He makes sure to throw a few extra bills on the table before leaving, calling out a goodbye to Ms. Hanako and the only other person working. He’s not full by any means, but at least the breadsticks will make sure he’s not starving.

Izuku has a few choices. He can go home and get his dirty clothes to go to the nearest laundromat, or he can go home and get his Rabbit costume to get an early start on his patrol. He’s a little calmer than before, thanks to the food and the easy note-taking, so either of those options will suffice.

Well, he might as well do the cleaning today.

The air is cool outside. It may be the afternoon, close to evening, but it’s not nearly as hot as it could be. The streets are bustling with people, some of them in suits and some of them in casual clothing. Izuku spots a few heroes in the crowds, too. They look like they’re off duty.

He’ll go by the house, drop off his stuff from the stores, and get his laundry to go out again and clean it.

People give him strange looks as he weaves through the crowds, but it doesn't really make him upset. Again, he's used to it.

It is kind of annoying, but what can you do about it?

Izuku pulls out his notebook and writes little stuff down along the way. He passes by a few undercover cops and heroes, which serves as perfect practice for him to try and get out a quick analysis on people before they disappear.

It's more of a hobby now more than anything. Come to think of it, his note-taking is kind of stalker-ish.

He decides to go down the tunnel he takes sometimes on the way to his building. It offers him more privacy than the usual streets do, and it also helps Izuku get more ideas for weapons and support gear.

The bridge is quiet around this time—no cars or people passing by. It's nice. It causes a certain kind of comfort to settle of his freckled skin.

And this is where Izuku makes mistake number one: he lets his guard down.

He's so focused on sketching a prototype of a bōstaff that doubles as a katana that he doesn't hear what's going on behind him until it's too late. Usually he's more alert than this, but it's like the universe wants to stack every odd against him.

There's a shift in the air, and a squelching noise is heard a few yards back. Izuku whips around, only to freeze in his tracks at the sight before him.

A large, slimy creature is crawling out of the sewer hole, and as Izuku watches, it creates more of its sludge out of thin air. That must be a quirk, Izuku thinks quickly. Which means this is a villain.

His thinking is proven correct once a face appears in the middle of the sludge, along with sharp, jagged teeth that send shivers down Izuku's spine. Yellow eyes meet Izuku's green ones, and the boy suppresses a groan of pure frustration.

"You'll make a perfect skinsuit for me to hide in, kid," the creature grounds out, the words watery and dark.

And the next moment happens too fast for Izuku to process. He just barely manages to dodge out of the way when the sludge makes a swipe at him, crossing the yards between them in less than a second. He doesn't get a chance to breathe, though, as brown and green tendrils shoot from the side of the creature's body and wrap around Izuku quicker than lightning. He's being pulled in before he can do anything about it, quickly being enveloped whole by the disgusting slime. As a last-minute decision, he throws his notebook and bag full of supplies somewhere out of view so his hard work won't get ruined once more and prepares himself.

What in the ass is happening right now? Oh, fuck, it's—

Izuku feels like he's floating. His body is being held up by the smelly sludge, and it slides down his throat like cold lava once the tendrils pry his jaws open. He gags, his lungs trying to draw in air, but it's no use. It clogs his ears and nose, cutting off his senses.

He's drowning, but it's a weird sensation, as he feels closer to flying right now.

Izuku can barely hear what the villain is gloating about now. Something about how he has to leave soon, how he didn't expect him to be in town, whoever he is.

He's choking, and it's slow and weightless, but his lungs burn so badly that he feels like he's being torn apart from the inside out. And for a moment, a very brief moment, he wants to close his eyes and sleep. He suddenly remembers what that bully said to him before fleeing out of the alley, and everything hurts ten times worse than before.

Surely there's a reason the boy said what he did. A reason for why he brought something up from their elementary school days. But Izuku can't really think of one with the way his brain is reacting in this situation. Perhaps this isn't the best time to be thinking of Tsubasa and the others.

Izuku is trying his best to move around to dislodge the villain, but the sludge is sticking to his skin and attempting to peel it right off his bones, and he's completely surrounded. It all happened so fast that Izuku is just annoyed now! Can his luck get any worse, for real?

Losing his patience, Izuku calls upon Boost and uses up some of the energy from his store to send his fist cracking forward through the slime. The sheer speed and force of the movement cause it to split apart with one easy line, freeing Izuku. The gunk splatters against the ground and walls of the nearby tunnel, but some of it lands on his feet and sticks him to the floor. He performs another superpowered kick to dislodge himself, but soon more tendrils shoot out from the base of the body to capture him again.

"Woah, woah, now! Stop being difficult, you brat!" The face in the ball before him warns. "I just wanna use you for a little while! That's all!"

His main body is somewhere inside all of that, Izuku thinks, face shadowed as sludge races up his legs to regain control. The stench clouds his senses. He's certain there must be some chemical reagents in the fluids since they are making him feel so queasy. I just have to send another blow directly through the middle without him dodging, and it'll split him in half. Then I—

His thinking cost him too much time. In a split second, a tendril erupts from the creature's abdomen and wraps around Izuku's throat, dragging him in once more and tightening around him like a noose. This time, Izuku is suffocating for real. His vision blurs and no sound comes out of his mouth when he tries to speak.

This stuff is not warm and comforting and safe like one might think slime to be—it's cold and scary, and it fucking burns. He's even more certain there are some kinds of acidic substances making the man up.

He feels like the words the bullies spewed at him, funnily enough.

He musters up the last bit of his strength as black dots begin to corner his vision, because dammit this villain wants to end things quickly, doesn't he? And Izuku does not want to fucking die at the hands of this sewer rat, of all things! He uses Boost one last time to reach for the knife in his boot, hoping he can send the sharp side sailing through the sludge like it's butter for it to slice the physical body of the man and get the quirk to deactivate. He calls on all of his quirks to do something, anything against the goo suffocating him. He ignores the man's jeering words, and right now it feels like his lungs are about to shred themselves.

Izuku feels the first patch of skin begin to rip from his flesh to be replaced by thick sludge, and he swallows down a scream in favor of yanking his knife out of his shoe and taking blind aim. He can't see the main body, but he can vaguely sense it using Extract, so he can do it. The moment Boost invades his body and sends the knife flying forward, headed towards its mark, the cold suddenly vanishes, and Izuku is dropped unceremoniously to the ground.

The sky swims, and he swears he sees stars behind his eyelids as he lies on the grass, as still as death.

He doesn't bother getting up; his body is already trying to restore its reserves of energy, so he can't delay that. He should probably take a nap. Or would it be weird, seeing as he's literally in the middle of a pathway?

To be fair, he's in front of a tunnel nobody really uses. He's slept in worse places before. He may as well—

A hand starts lightly slapping his cheek sometime after he comes to this conclusion, rapidly and in quick succession. A hushed voice reaches his ears, and it sounds a little rough around the edges—or maybe Izuku is losing it.

"Hey, wake up! Hey!"

Izuku blinks against the sun in his eyes, staring at the shadowed figure above him. He frowns. Who the hell has awakened me from—?

"Oh, good! Thought I'd lost you there!"

Izuku's vision clears, and for a moment he wonders if he did die, for why else would there be a steaming giant that looks suspiciously like the number one pro hero hovering above him, crouching awkwardly? Perhaps he is imagining things; there is no way that All Might is standing three feet above him. All Might patrols this part of town four times a day: early in the morning, again at noon, then at around three in the afternoon, and finally at seven at night. It is not any of those times, so why would All Might be here? Granted, certain villain fights may have led him astray, a little outside of his normal routes, but what are the odds he was searching for the very villain Izuku was fighting?

The more Izuku stares, the more Extract responds. He feels something nasty bubbling up in his stomach, and he has just enough time to duck his head and twist his neck to throw up somewhere that is not on All Might's face. Bile drips from Izuku's lips as he heaves, and he shudders anxiously, chills wracking his frame.

His first thought afterward is oh, so it is All Might, and his second is oh, fuck, it's All Might.

Izuku has been in All Might's presence before, but never has he talked to him or gotten closer than ten feet from him. Mostly because Izuku is well aware of who he is to his father. He also knows everything that the hero in front of him stands for—and that is everything Izuku is not. To say they're mortal opposites would be an understatement; simply put, Izuku can't be here right now.

He should leave. If Father finds out he got within even a mile of All Might, he'll—

There's a hand on Izuku's back, which makes sense, as the boy is still hunched over, contorted in a weird position on the harsh concrete. He stares at the vomit in front of his face, now extremely embarrassed.

“Oh, looks like you're moving around all right!” All Might says, and Izuku realizes with a start that he's spending too much time thinking. "You've thrown up the slime, so that's a good thing!"

Beneath his terror and trepidation lies excitement. Two idols. He's met two of his idols in just the past couple of weeks alone. Izuku is about to have a stroke.

Despite this realization, the boy shrugs the very large hand off and scrambles away, eyes wide as saucers. “I'm sorry, I need to—!" Izuku's mind goes blank, because what exactly is he looking at? There, lodged into a very wide shoulder, is a sleek black and red knife that has Izuku's initials engraved on the side. This means one thing: when Izuku threw his knife in an attempt to slice the main body of the villain, he hit All Might instead, who likely jumped in the way.

Somewhere, he thinks Father is laughing maniacally.

"Um," Izuku starts, throat dry. "I think that's my knife."

The hero jerks at the reminder. "Oh, yes! I forgot about that." All Might glances at the weapon and pushes a little on the handle, testing its give, before smiling widely at Izuku. More steam radiates off his body at the motion. "It's quite deep! Forgive me, young man, but I may have to keep it so I can get it removed in a more sterile environment. Though I don't think you'll end up getting it back, unfortunately; it seems a little big for state standards."

Izuku grabs his discarded journal and holds it to his chest, not worried about that in the slightest. At least the knife isn't one of his Rabbit ones. "Oh my God, I'm so sorry," he says numbly. "I just stabbed you."

"Not to worry!" All Might assures, standing to his full height and glory. His shadow casts over Izuku. "I don't even feel it! Besides, I should have seen it coming, honestly! You throw very fast and hard for your size—you should be proud!"

The boy averts his gaze, his cheeks reddening from the unexpected praise. He expected a lecture about not paying attention to his surroundings or being able to find a way out quickly, but he gets neither of those things. Why did he ever think All Might would be like that?

“Now, are you feeling alright? Any dizziness or lingering nausea?” The hero coughs a little into his hand.

"No, I'm fine, sir." Izuku jerks his head up when the man begins to walk swiftly away after tightening the lid of a bottle stuffed in his cargo pants. He must be keeping the villain in there. This proves Izuku's theory that it is like slime; one just has to contain it in an object that will prevent it from expanding. If only Izuku had one of his bombs on him when he got attacked—things would've been easy!

“Good! If you can, I advise you to be checked at an urgent care facility just in case of concussion, but for now, I must get going, my boy!” The hero crouches down as if preparing for a leap, the smoke coming off of him in waves now. Extract is rippling inside Izuku, warning him of something, but he doesn't pay any attention to it.

Izuku, who was momentarily stunned by my boy, jerks forward. "No, wait, please!"

His hand shoots up without really thinking about the consequences of doing so, palm facing outwards, and this is mistake number two.

Pull activates on its own accord, tingling at his fingertips, and Izuku is yanked forward a few feet, as the sheer force of All Might's jump was much greater than the maximum he can counter. To Pull's credit, the man glitches mid-air, freezing in place for a fraction of a section, before losing the momentum he needed. And then the behemoth of a hero is falling back down to the Earth several yards away from Izuku, landing sloppily in front of the tunnel's entrance. He darts inside the shadows the moment he finds his footing, and Izuku is prepared to turn around and run (did he actually just use his quirk on fucking All Might, right after stabbing him?) when a cloud of smoke explodes within the tunnel and fans out to greet him. It feels slightly moist, kind of like rainclouds, and Izuku shivers, pausing in his plans to escape. The mist clears then, revealing a tall, lanky man with blond hair and piercing blue eyes.

Well, it is. It’s just the man in his deflated form. Kind of like a balloon, if you think about it. That's how Father explained it to him, anyhow. Izuku always called him Small Might, as it was easier to remember.

All Might never really had a time limit for how long he could stay in his muscle form until he fought Izuku's father, and this reminder lodges a lump in Izuku's throat. It seems the hero's time limit is getting shorter with each passing day. Izuku doesn't think the hero would let everyone know this secret of his willingly, so this must've been an unhappy accident.

Oh, that explains all the smoke. That's my fault.

"You're... not freaking out?" Small Might's astonished voice brings him out of his thoughts. "Are you sure you don't have a concussion? Why are you not surprised?"

That's right. Izuku shouldn't know about this; no one should. He needs to at least act like he's shocked. Should he scream? No, that'll look fake.

Honestly, fuck it. Izuku can just lie through his teeth like all the other times. He's incredibly done with this entire day, so this may as well just happen. He walks closer, checking his surroundings just in case there are any cameras or people walking around.

"Honestly, I already sort of guessed this, sir." Izuku rubs the back of his head. "I'm a fan, so I studied your moves, the time of your appearances, and the average duration of your fights back to back. At that point, I made the connection that you must have some kind of time limit."

Small Might's mouth drops open, blood spewing from between his teeth, and Izuku hurries to correct himself.

"Not in a creepy way! I didn't know about your other form, exactly! It just seemed plausible!" He wrings his hands together, hoping he looks nervous enough to be believable.

Once the hero stops coughing up a scarlet waterfall, he gives Izuku a grim look. "Young man, you must know that this is a very important, very dangerous secret. Have you told anyone else about this?"

Izuku doesn't know why he feels a little insulted at the accusation; he has no right to be. "Of course not. Even I know that it would ruin the whole of hero society if word got out. Plus, you'd be in even more danger, as you wouldn't be able to walk around without being recognized anymore."

After a minute of contemplation, he gets a small, slightly confused thank you from the number one hero, and after another few moments of awkward silence—well, probably awkward to Small Might, not so much to Izuku—the man speaks up. “When I was attempting my jump, what did you do to me?"

The question, though edged, has no anger in it. Izuku is careful anyway.

He stares directly into Small Might's shadowed blue eyes and forces his body to quit trembling. "I did nothing, sir."

"Really?" Small Might searches his gaze in disbelief, but he must not find anything, as he shakes his head and retreats further into the shadows when the smoke clears completely. "I admit, I'm off my game today. First the knife, and now this.”

Izuku swallows dryly and forces what little courage he has to aid him. “Well, now that you're here, I have a question I've been wanting to ask you if that's okay."

"A question?"

"It’s not for me. It’s for a friend of mine.”

“Go on.”

He takes a deep breath. Just go for it. What’s the worst that can happen? On second thought, don’t answer that.

“He, uh, well... He wanted to ask if—if someone with a bad quirk can become a hero."

There’s a pause. The universe's eyes are on the pair of them.

“A bad quirk?” Small Might repeats. "As in, one that may not be very useful in heroics?"

Izuku shuffles, gaze on his feet. He kicks some of the gravel below him. “No, sir. Like... a quirk that’s thought to be more useful for villains than heroes.”

that, I must ask: Why does your friend want to be a hero?"

Just tell him the truth, the wind whispers. Tell him it all.

“To help people, I think?" Izuku says softly. "To be someone that the people can look up to. So, when he's around, everyone knows they’re not in danger anymore." His eyes narrow some. "And... maybe to prove that he's not all bad like everyone says."

Small Might studies him silently, his eyes glazing over briefly, thinking about something Izuku is not privy to. “I believe anyone can be a hero if they try hard enough. A quirk does not make you who you are.”

Izuku’s stomach does this weird, swooping thing that makes his heart jump out of his chest, because that’s way better than he—

“Though, it's worth mentioning that it is very hard to deal with the discrimination that comes with having 'villain' quirks. Sometimes it may be better to look into another profession entirely because of it.” He tips his head in thought. “Police work or even a doctor would do. Those are very important jobs, and you'd still be connected to heroics. There are hundreds of other ways to be a hero, young man.”

What you're telling me is to go for something easier? But how can I do that with who I am?

“To answer your question, yes, I do think it’s possible. However, I don't think it should be your friend's goal, as oftentimes these aspiring heroes face terrible struggles from those around them—even from other pros, unfortunately. With that in mind, it may be better if they went for something else, for everyone involved.”

It’s the way the man says they that has Izuku’s mouth running dry. “Oh,” he says quietly. “that, uh, makes sense. Thanks.”

Why is Izuku surprised?

He doesn’t know how long he stands there for, eyes focused on nothing, really, but when he comes to, All Might is gone, just like that, leaving Izuku alone at the mouth of a dark tunnel.

Izuku doesn’t know what to think. He didn’t expect any sort of real answer when he first asked the number one hero the question. But he also never thought he’d get this sort of reaction.

He's right, though, isn't he? You've known it yourself, all this time. You just never wanted to admit it. There's a reason suicide rates for those with villain quirks are higher than any other.

Something heavy settles in his stomach, making the boy regret eating those breadsticks. He wants to throw up again.

Hearing those words from his favorite hero? It's just strengthened the walls around his mind and heart. He shouldn't care so much. Why is he so upset? And why is he so sad? So angry?

Izuku asked. All Might answered. So who's really at fault?

Great. He started out having a shitty day and had breadsticks to try and make it better, only to have those efforts ruined just a few minutes later. That's just his luck, right?

The walk home is short. It takes him only a few minutes to get there from where All Might left him. He retrieves the bag of supplies he left by the bridge and trudges up the various flights of stairs—it's broad daylight; he can't climb up it this time.

When he opens his notebook, he is surprised to find All Might's signature scrawled across two whole pages in black ink. It's something that Izuku never thought he would ever get the chance to have, and if it were any other time, he'd be delighted, but now he only feels subdued.

He feels too upset to do laundry now, so he puts on his Rabbit costume and turns right back out the door.

Going on patrol makes everything better. He can forget everything for a few hours, at least.

That last part was a lie.

Izuku's fantastic luck strikes again only twenty minutes into his patrol.

By this point, he's already stopped two muggings and helped an older man cross the street, so that's cool. Now, however, he's gliding across rooftops and relishing in the feeling of cool air hitting his face, unaware of what's to come There's commotion a little ways away. He extends his senses and finds various quirks grouped together near an open alleyway, making him frown. A villain fight, huh?

It takes him less than a minute to have a bird's eye view of the scene. The first thing he notices is, well, the star of the show: the villain.

The villain that All Might should have brought to the fucking police station. The one that Izuku nearly suffocated in not even an hour before.

That green and brown sludge is unmistakable. It's definitely the same guy.

Oh, shit, Izuku thinks with horror making an home out of his skin. Did he drop it when I yanked him out of the air? Did he not see it? How didn't I see it!

The more Izuku thinks about it, the faster he comes to the conclusion. The jar probably dropped and rolled right back into the storm drain that the villain first came out of—which would've broken the bottle if it hadn't been already, freeing the monster.

Arrogant and stupid. That's what Izuku is. He should've seen it. He should've known that the villain wouldn't give up so easily! He's been trained for this kind of stuff, and yet he still somehow missed it!

If he had only checked for the villain's quirk signature and not let himself be distracted by All Might, it wouldn't have escaped.

The second thing Izuku notices is that quite a few heroes are already on the scene. Except they're not exactly doing much of anything. The heroes are standing there. Does the villain have a hostage or something? Why are the heroes trying to keep back the press and civilians instead of trying to take down the fool and minimize property damage? He is, as a matter of fact, standing between two apartment buildings where families reside. This is a high risk situation!

Aren't they going to help?

The idea of a hostage becomes a little more realistic once he catches sight of a figure near the front of the goo. Izuku hops onto the corner of the roof to get a better look.

And that's when he sees it: a tuft of spiky blond hair peeking out from the sludge, along with a familiar school-issued uniform.

Kacchan?

School's been out for half an hour. They're a few blocks away from the Bakugou household, which is around thirty minutes from Aldera Middle School.

The time stamps match up. It could very well be him. And the heroes still aren't doing anything.

Izuku is moving before he can stop himself, his muscles burning from the sudden use of his enhancements. Suspended in midair for a fraction of a second after his jump, Izuku hikes up his knee and digs a knife out of his boot—this one with his Rabbit initials on the side.

His precision is deadly, and light reflects off polished metal as the blade soars through the air and hits the villain's exposed eye.

The sludge recedes briefly, just enough for Izuku to see more of Kacchan's body and skin.

He's suffocating!

When he flies close enough, the vigilante brings his leg down on an outer piece of the sludge, tearing a large chunk off of it and sending it far away from the villain's grasp.

He hits the ground running, hand already reaching for his friend's exposed forearm. Wide, panicked crimson eyes meet his, and Izuku yanks. Kacchan is almost fully out of the sludge now; his leg and torso are the only things still stuck.

Izuku rears back with a grunt and aims another kick at the floating face, shoving the knife further into its eye. Juice sprays out, splattering both Izuku and Kacchan.

The screech he gets in reply grates on his ears, but he feels a tiny bit of satisfaction at the noise.

He uses Pull on his friend again in tandem with his yanking, knowing that his back will obscure what his hands are doing from the cameras. Kacchan is jerked forward slightly, and he frantically lets off a few large explosions to try and break the rest of the way free.

What can I do, what can I do—?

Izuku fumbles for the small grenade in his belt, nearly dropping it as he pulls the pin and chucks it at the far side of the villain, as far away from Kacchan as possible.

This grenade isn't like his pink bomb, which is made for detaining smaller criminals and heroes who are chasing him. No, this is the grenade Izuku uses for the Big Boys.

This is his last one, too. It cost him a hell of a lot to make.

The sludge absorbs it immediately, just as Izuku hoped, and the boy can see the moment the villain realizes his mistake, as he lets out an ear-splitting screech.

It's too late, though, as the sludge explodes from the inside, effectively destroying the base and causing some of the slime to dissipate. Thank fuck for physics!

Kacchan slips free, stumbling to the ground and coughing up black liquid. Izuku tries to drag him away, only for a furious roar to make him look up.

The sludge has expanded to twice its original size in just under a second, and it's now looming over the two boys, bearing down on them monstrously.

Oh, fuck you! You're gonna make me use one of my other quirks, you sack of—

His desperation and fear wins over all his other emotions; Izuku crouches over Kacchan and throws his arms up in an x, eyes squeezed shut.

Deflect comes to him naturally, and Izuku waits for the blow, waits for the sludge to envelope them both. He's aware of the heroes and crowd screaming something behind him. They must've been screaming the entire time, he just never realized it.

But the blow never comes.

The ground shakes. Izuku doesn't risk letting go of Deflect even as a large shadow washes over them—not even when, a moment later, a familiar, booming voice shouts out, "Wyoming Smash!"

All Might.

Izuku is left with a striking feeling of déjà vu when the sludge villain is reduced to a million pieces, and it's only by instinct that he grabs Kacchan before they both go flying. The shockwave is large, and chunks of sludge smack Izuku in the face like the ultimate bitch slap. The two of them land with a hard thud on the concrete, rolling forward a few feet.

Izuku covers Kacchan with his body again until the wind dies down, and he can't help but sigh in relief at the realization that Kacchan is safe, he's not dead, thank God! He flops onto his back once the commotion dies down, still a little dazed.

Fuck, All Might. I knew I needed you, but holy shit. I love you, sir. All homo.

His euphoria is interrupted by Kacchan socking him in the shoulder. "Why the hell did you do that?" The blond barks, eyes flaming. "We would've both been dead, dumbass!"

Izuku sits up and chuckles, making sure his mask and hood are still in place. The last thing I need is an impromptu face reveal.

"Glad you're still alive," he says quietly, making sure no one else can hear them.

"Shitty nerd, I'll kill you!" Kacchan reaches for him again, but Izuku dodges out of the way, already on his feet.

The explosive teen would've chased after him had a hero not run forward and grabbed the boy's arm, directing him to the nearest medic. Everyone starts to crowd around him, some asking if he's alright and others just telling him how brave he was, staying calm under the circumstances he was in.

Good. At least they're doing something now. After the fact.

Izuku glances around and notices that All Might has already given the villain to the police, and he's answering questions from the press with an awkward hand rubbing at the nape of his neck. There is a slight sheen of steam coming off of his back, but it's much less than it was before.

Now it's time for me to leave.

He picks up his discarded knife from the ground and wipes the remaining sludge on his costume, figuring that he might as well seeing as he's going to wash it later.

He's about to leave when a hero calls to him from beside a police officer, stepping forward pointedly. He's obviously hesitant to capture the boy after what he just did but also isn't willing to let him go.

Izuku holds his knife threateningly and turns on him, his voice icy as that righteous anger comes back to him in full force. "Are you fucking blind or something?"

Everything comes to a standstill. The chatter from the heroes and press stops at once when everyone snaps around to stare at the vigilante.

"He was suffocating!" Izuku gestures in the air with his blade, pointing at the man now restrained in the police car. "That bastard over there was going to kill him, and you all just sat there and did jack shit!"

He's breathing heavily now, and he vaguely notices all of the cameras being turned on him and the reporters holding out their microphones. All Might has disappeared from view, though Izuku can still feel his quirk nearby.

A woman to the far right of him shifts on her feet, jutting her chin out defiantly. "None of our quirks were suited for the job. We would've made the situation much worse—"

"Worse? What situation is worse than letting someone die because your quirks weren't suited for saving him?" Izuku walks forward, flipping the knife repeatedly in the air out of nervousness. "Is that what heroes do? Let people die?"

Another one with hoses for hands shakes his head. "Of course not! We had a plan."

Izuku ignores him, not wanting to waste his breath on a walking fire hydrant. "Unless your plan was waiting around for someone stronger to show up, I doubt that. How useless are you guys, really? I'm not suited for dealing with a villain like that either, but that didn't stop me! You guys were okay with doing nothing as he tried to use a civilian as a skin suit, huh?"

No one interrupts him this time. Most of the heroes and policemen look ashamed, uncomfortably moving around and looking at the ground. It's kind of funny, Izuku thinks, how they all look like they've just gotten scolded by their parents.

He's only a little surprised that no one is trying to capture him. He just helped save a boy—not just anyone, Kacchan—from a villain, and the cameras most likely captured it all. If they were to arrest him now, there'd probably be some sort of protest.

Izuku crosses his arms, the knife held tightly in his grip. "Did hero school teach you guys nothing? Or the police academy? You're supposed to help people. Not wait around for someone like All Might to save the day, though I guess that's the easier thing to do, right?" He has to wrap this up. He can see Kacchan glaring at him from the corner of his eye. "I can't believe how shitty the system is these days. It doesn't matter what kind of quirk you have, or lack thereof. You could be quirkless or a mutant for fuck's sake—it doesn't matter! What matters is your brain and how you use it. You guys obviously never realized that."

Izuku doesn't know why he's ranting like this. Maybe it's because All Might's words are still fresh in his mind, along with his bullies'. He's getting too passionate about this. It's time to go, for real this time!

He lets the silence after hang in the air for a few moments, as if to let what he said sink in, before blowing out an annoyed breath. "Pussies," he spits, ignoring the surprised murmur from the crowd.

Shakily, Izuku lets some extra energy flow to his legs and jumps onto the nearby café, running along the rooftops until he's out of sight, not answer the calls of his vigilante name behind him.

Fuck. He said too much. Stupid, stupid!

His phone is buzzing nonstop as he runs, but Izuku is too angry to answer the texts.

It's probably Kacchan. He heard the blond's voice among the others calling after him. He probably wants to yell at him again. Or maybe it's Tsukauchi, as Izuku might've just been on the news again.

This time was purely accidental, though. Well, sort of.

Doesn't matter. He can't do anything about it now. All he knows is that it's time to hurt some bad guys.

Whenever Izuku is upset, he sleeps on the floor.

It's completely ridiculous and totally irrational to an outside person, but it's a habit he picked up after his mother left him. The first night with his supposed father, Izuku laid on that hard mattress and stared up at the clean ceiling with tired eyes.

And it was at that moment that everything changed. Nothing felt certain after that.

Even these days, nothing ever feels right.

Izuku just needs something concrete to hang onto every now and then, so he curls up on the floor and sleeps.

He used to do it all the time under the care of his father, used to require the comfort of a hard floor beneath himself, something sure to cling onto in the midst of his spiraling thoughts and splintering words, as he'd surely never be given that comfort by anyone else.

It doesn't make sense, but these things never really do. They just are.

And so Izuku paces the run-down kitchen on the top floor of his building, his head pounding. This building hasn't had anyone live in it (legally, at least) in two decades, so the boy doesn't know why he's stressing so much. It's not like anyone is going to waltz in here and demand he leaves.

Maybe because he's just put himself under All Might's radar, both as Midoriya Izuku and as Rabbit.

Why can't I just keep my mouth shut? Everything would be so much easier.

But no, Izuku just had to start ranting about a flawed system of heroes and police. How having a certain quirk defines your worth and your duty.

He was only able to patrol until midnight before his thoughts took over. He could barely concentrate the entire night, earning him a few more bruises than he honestly should've earned, skillfully speaking.

Kacchan could have died. Died.

Every time Izuku thinks about it, he starts to shake a little more. His only friend, the person who has stayed by his side for far longer than his own mother and father had.

He could have died. Would have, if not for Izuku's small distraction and All Might's quick save.

Izuku should have been faster. Should have realized the sludge villain still posed a threat to civilians even when he thought the Symbol of Peace was holding it. If he'd been even a minute late, Kacchan would have suffocated.

And those heroes just stood by and did nothing. They watched. They kept back the reporters and tried to calm everyone down, which would've made Izuku a little less angry had Kacchan not been in immediate danger with no one willing to help.

It'd be foolish to blame those heroes personally, though. Rather, Izuku points the blame at the system that allowed this to happen.

And he said as much, in front of everyone and the cameras. He spewed out his distaste, aware that if he didn't leave soon, the heroes would try to capture him.

He was stupid. He should've left when All Might took care of the situation. He should've disappeared as soon as he made sure Kacchan was okay.

But he didn't, and there's nothing he can do about it now. His alter ego is trending on four different social media platforms. He's in the public eye.

Izuku can't tell if that's good or bad. The only reason he's kept his identity a secret so far is because he's avoided cameras. The more he talks and acts out in front of people, the more chance there is of someone connecting Rabbit to Midoriya Izuku.

The chance is slim, but it's still there. And it's enough to make Izuku panic even more.

So many things have happened today; he ran into some of his old bullies, met All Might, then the same man in his deflated form, and then helped save Kacchan from the same sludge villain that tried to wear his skin as a suit.

It makes Izuku's head spin, and that's how he finds himself lying on the cold ground next to his couch. He doesn't have a bed right now since he sold his previous one for extra cash, and he'd rather not pick one out of the garbage just yet. The couch is where he usually sleeps, but sometimes it gets too soft for him. Like now.

It's one of those days where he needs to have something hard beneath him. Something concrete.

He probably won't be able to fall asleep, though, but that's the least of his worries.

There's a slight, gnawing pain in his stomach all of a sudden. Now that he's thinking about it, he's felt it ever since the sludge villain attacked him, just not this bad.

That's right. I haven't eaten since those breadsticks. And they barely filled me up.

He should probably make himself some of that instant ramen. It'd just be cold.

Well. He could put iced coffee into the ramen to give it more flavor. Maybe to distract him from the fact that it's cold and not cooked.

Huh. Maybe when I'm more awake.

He stares at the dusty ceiling and thinks about how this day could've been better. The only highlight was the food.

"This sucks," he says aloud, to no one in particular.

The silence he gets in return drapes over him like a blanket, and Izuku closes his eyes to continue pretending to sleep until the next morning, hoping tomorrow will prove to be a little better.

Izuku feels like an oxymoron.

He steals. He stops people from stealing.

He breaks into places. He stops muggings and robberies.

He hurts people. He stops people from hurting others.

Granted, the criminals he hurts aren't good people in the slightest, but Izuku knows it doesn't make it okay.

He can't find it in himself to care, though, because he has this need to just do what's right. He also needs food and money, which his clients provide him with when he gets his jobs done.

Sometimes the only way to survive is to break the law and get on Detective Tsukauchi's last nerve. Which is an added bonus, in Izuku's humble opinion.

Forgive him, but he will do anything—commit any nonviolent crime no matter the size—if it means he can survive for another day. Because if he lives, he can help others.

That's just how being homeless works.

Sometimes, Izuku gets lucky. Sometimes, people are so grateful to him as Rabbit that they offer him money or food if they can spare it.

It used to make him uncomfortable. He started being a vigilante because he wanted to help people. He never meant to get anything in return, except maybe a slightly clearer conscience to help him pretend to sleep at night.

But then the heroes started taking interest in him, and the game changed a little.

No, a lot.

He then couldn't stay in the same spot for more than a couple days for fear of one of the pros catching him. He could no longer take his time patrolling the city; he's almost been caught by police more than once. He has the scars from his trip-ups to prove it. Now he has to speed run through his routes and go over them multiple times to make up for his haste.

At least Izuku can be a vigilante. If he can't be a hero, he can at least be that. There are less restrictions that way anyway.

So now Izuku gets to feel like a hypocrite. Because he takes and he takes and he takes, and being a vigilante is the only way he knows how to give back.

The rage he feels towards villains and people in general sometimes threatens to consume him, so he slides his mask on and does what he does best.

He runs towards the danger and prepares for a fight.

Tonight is no different. He got a tip from one of his clients that there's going to be a large human trafficking auction happening downtown. There's supposedly going to be around thirty kids there, all ranging from ages eleven to nineteen.

It sounds normal. Easy. Familiar.

So of course, he should've known that life hates his guts. As if he couldn't catch a break between having to jump out of a helicopter so he wouldn't be blown up and then having to save Kacchan from a freaky sludge villain, now he's stuck having to take down a trafficking ring with an undesirable amount of guards around it.

Fan-fucking-tastic.

If Izuku is anything, he's quiet. He presses himself to the wall and blends in with the shadows, happy that the dark green of his suit allows him that advantage. He barely breathes, instead becoming one with his surroundings.

People are talking right below him. Harsh, barked voices, overlapping each other as they communicate.

They're speaking in English, that much is obvious. Izuku thanks the skies above that his shitty father had at least taught him that. Between six different languages, English was the hardest to grasp.

"Where the hell is he?"

"He said he's running late, don't get your panties in a twist."

Izuku inches alongside the edge of the wall to hear them better.

There's four of them directly below him in a tight circle, dressed in suits. Looks cheap, Izuku notes. So they must not be too important. Or they're gun-for-hires.

Which makes this a little bit harder. But also a bit more fun.

So far, no sign of the hostages. There are apparently a lot, so they won't be too hard to miss. They're likely in a room off to the side, waiting for the rest of the participants to arrive. Likely guarded, too.

He can see the guns slung over the men's backs, so he knows they mean business.

Now, Izuku isn't sure if this is the dealing part of the trade. This could be, as bad as it sounds, the viewing part. Where the buyers come and look and then later decide on the price.

But if this is just a pick-up, where these mercenaries are probably just here to make sure everything runs smoothly, then things just got a whole lot more difficult. Because this means his time frame will be cut short.

He'll have to be quick with this. There's also a chance a third party might come in, as the buyers surely have their own bodyguards.

Izuku glances back down and notices more people coming from a side hallway. The abandoned warehouse—why is it always in an abandoned building, Izuku thinks, be more creative, guys—is dark, lit only by a few well-placed lamps and candles.

It's just enough light for Izuku to make out their faces.

"It starts in ten minutes. He should be here by now, seeing as he's the one who's operating it!"

Oh, spill it.

Izuku thinks about how funny it would be if he were to drop down right beside them like I know right? He's such a drag—but he ultimately decides not to. He'll make sure to do one for the memes later on.

"Watch your mouth. If he hears you say that—"

The one who first spoke turns on his friend, gesturing with his gun. "He'll what? Sell me? That's all he's good for."

Okay, Izuku would love to hear more of the roast fest going on, but he has kids to locate.

Dumb and Dumber #1 told him that it apparently starts in ten minutes. Meaning he has just short of that to secure the victims and start to get them out.

Ten minutes. He's done it in less time before, but not nearly with this many people to evacuate.

Can't wait to tell Kacchan about this shit. He's gonna flip.

Izuku balances on the beam he's crouching on and shuffles forwardly quietly, making his way into the ventilators. It's just big enough for him to squeeze through, and it's not too hot.

He's not very good with enclosed spaces in areas he isn't familiar with, but as long as he's got a way out, he'll be okay. Besides, he's doing this to help the kids stuck in this shithole. He can deal.

His watch tells him it's five minutes before ten, so he's gotta hurry if he wants to finish this before eleven. He promised Kacchan he'd go with him to the mall tomorrow, so he has to leave enough time to finish up his other work before then as well.

Izuku stops by a hatch and peers down the slits into an empty hallway. There's no noise, so he keeps going, ingraining the location in his mind.

It's been a few days since the sludge villain attacked him, and thus a few days since he saved his friend and ranted to the press about how dumb heroes are. Not his best moment, for sure, but definitely one of his ballsiest.

His patrols have been relatively quiet, granting Izuku a little bit of a reprieve from the chaos and exposure he's received lately. He can still feel those eyes on him, though. They get closer with each passing day. It's only a matter of time before whoever is following him decides to pay him a visit.

Izuku has a good idea on who it is.

Static crackles below him, and he pauses once more, peeking through the nearest vent hatch in interest.

"Everything okay over there?"

Ooh. They're speaking in Japanese this time.

A tall, bulky man is pacing back and forth in the middle of the walkway, dressed in the same attire as the previous guys. He, however, has a thick bulletproof vest on, obviously being more of a fighter.

He looks like he could crush Izuku's skull in between his biceps. The boy shudders at the thought.

It's the radio sitting on Crusher's hip that made the noise. Someone is checking in on his position.

"All clear. How much longer?"

Crusher has a Russian accent, is speaking Japanese, and carries himself like he's German. All while being involved in a trafficking ring with a bunch of American English-speakers.

The flavor here is immaculate.

Izuku carefully lifts up the vent, grateful that he's small enough to fit through, and waits for an opening. He'll have to be extra careful, as he has no clue what this guy's quirk is.

He isn't very keen on finding out, either. That can come later, once the people responsible for this have been interrogated by the police and their names have been filed.

Makes for good analysis practice.

"Boss is late. Standby."

Crusher turns his back towards Izuku, walking another few feet before stopping. “Clear.”

That looks like an opening, don’t you think? The voices in Izuku’s head, for once, don’t answer, and the boy drops down silently, slinking forward until he’s right behind the man.

“Boo.”

It’s almost comical how quickly Crusher whips around with wide eyes, hand reaching for his gun on instinct. “You—”

Izuku doesn’t give him a chance to finish, his fist pulling back and smashing into his face with what’s probably excessive force. The punch is so strong that the man drops like a rock, knocked unconscious.

Blood leaks like a steady faucet from his nose, and Izuku frowns. Excessive? Yes. Necessary? Absolutely.

He bends down and takes the gun from the man’s grip, eyes already running over it to figure out what kind it is.

It’s heavy, but not as heavy as Izuku expected. He’s only a little surprised when he recognizes the tranq darts sitting inside.

So he must be one of the keepers. He’s in charge of making sure the kids are behaving. Meaning they’ve gotta be close by.

Izuku slings the gun over his shoulder and kicks Crusher off to the side, hoping no one will stumble across him and sound an alarm.

He speed walks down the dark hallway, peeking around corners and opening all of the doors he passes. Five minutes left.

He just about crashes into a woman running by, and it’s only by instinct that he drops to the ground and slides forward, knocking her feet out from under her.

She shoots a tranq dart, and it barely misses him when it bounces off the floor and shatters.

Izuku is behind the kneeling agent now, and he simply cocks his own gun and aims two darts at her, not willing to have a full-on fight with her.

He’s already running to continue his search when her radio cackles.

“Nova, what was that sound?”

Nova. That’s an interesting nickname. She must have a force quirk or something, or maybe a fire quirk.

Which reminds him that he’s going into this whole thing blind. It’s not usually like this. Any other time, Izuku would have already known the participants and their powers, and he’d have developed a plan that best suited his mission. But now, Izuku thinks faintly that he might need some backup.

Time to go.

The boy digs into his pockets for his phone, shooting off a quick text to a certain detective with the address of the warehouse. After a moment’s hesitation, he adds the number thirty after the words. Hopefully the man will get what he means. He only adds one emoji this time: a clown face.

Izuku clenches his teeth and takes off, extending his senses as far as they will allow. Come on, search, search. Feel for their energies, Rabbit.

Extract doesn’t just allow him to take quirks and their properties, it gives him an acute sense of the quirks themselves and of where they are. On some occasions, Izuku can pick out who the person is just on the energy or power their quirk, or lack thereof, exudes.

But the splitting headache that nearly has him crumpling in pain usually stops him from using it to this extent.

While he can feel the energies of the people closest to him on the daily, since that part of Extract seems to always be active, he can never really feel them when they’re a long ways away.

Not unless he’s really searching. Like now.

On the left. There’s a bunch of people in that storage room up ahead.

Izuku rounds the corner, shooting the two guards closest to him with ease while dodging the fucking bullet that grazes his ear. The boy eyes the culprit, who’s standing protectively in front of the double doors housing the kids. He’s smaller than his fellow counterparts, but he seems to stand much taller.

“Get outta here, brat, if you know what’s good for you.”

Cocky fucker. He’s also speaking English—the drawl tells Izuku he’s from the southern United States.

Izuku jumps onto the wall and bounces off of it, leaping at the guard like a feral cat. No, like a rabbit with rabies.

He tries to draw in a breath before his attack, only to feel nothing coming into his throat. In fact, air is suddenly being pulled out of his lungs, scratching against his insides painfully.

Oh. This man either has a breathtaking quirk—pun fully intended—or an air manipulation quirk. Either way, it’s gotta end fast, or Izuku’s not gonna be able to finish this quickly, if at all.

The boy falters midair, twisting away from the bullet aimed at his head, and kicks the guard with so much force that they’re both sent crashing through the doors.

Huh. That works.

There’s screaming, and it’s only when he sees the large group of teens and young adults around him that he realizes how bad this must look.

He scrambles to his feet and makes himself small, hands lifting placatingly.

“Hey, hey! I’m here to help, it’s okay! I’m going to—”

A hand grabs his leg, and Izuku casually kicks the guard beneath him sharply, hoping no one saw it in the faint light.

There’s thundering footsteps down the hallway, and Izuku’s eye twitches in frustration. “You guys stay here for a little longer, I have to deal with those assholes out there, okay? Just a sec!”

He doesn’t wait for a reply before backing out of the darkness and throwing himself into the fray.

This is not good. His time is up. It’s probably been ten minutes by now, and they most likely know he’s here. The alarm will sound any second—ah, there it is. Right on time.

The dusty walls are painted in red lighting as the alarms sound off, and Izuku feels his hope start to diminish. Come on, Tsukauchi. I’d prefer it if the backup came today.

A hit to the face has him crashing into another guard, who immediately covers the boy's face in what looks like plastic.

And okay. That's a pretty funny quirk—having plastic wrap come out of your wrist like some sort of discount Spider-Man. Funny, but also deadly.

Izuku struggles against the tight hold on him, gasping when the man holding him from behind presses himself against the wall with a harsh thud. Slowly, he begins to suffocate.

"Give it up." The English sounds rough in Izuku's ear. "Just let us do this to you. It'll be painless if you stop struggling—"

Wow. Izuku knows these people are pedophiles, but damn.

With a renewed vigor, he kicks the chin of the guy advancing before him and throws his head back against the one smothering him. The crack of bone fills the air, only partially drowned out by the alarms and the approaching sirens, and Izuku quickly rips the plastic off of him. He turns on them, grin sharp behind his mask.

He wishes they could see it.

He picks up his discarded tranq gun and gets back to shooting. He drops half of them before he runs out of darts, and he backs up into a corner to get a bird's eye view of the few guards left.

A pink sludge bomb does the trick. It's his last one, so Izuku will have to be careful now.

After finding another gun and making sure the criminals who are now stuck in the goo are unconscious, he calls out to the scared teens, panting now.

They come out slowly and in one large group, which would've been more heartwarming to see if they weren't currently in the given situation.

He holds out his hands again so as not to scare them and tells them the plan. They have to be quiet, and they have to listen to him. He mentally mapped out all of the hallways and rooms he passed on the way here, so going back to the exit will prove easy.

He just has to get them there.

Izuku leads them like a pack of wolves, darting ahead around ten yards at a time to deal with the incoming flock of fighters. Not too many guards stand in their way, though, not after seeing how bloodthirsty the group looks.

And if the boy sees some of the other kids kicking and spitting on the unconscious guards as they pass, he doesn't mention it.

They have a right to be angry. He can give them this.

It takes mere minutes to get to the fateful door leading to the outside, and Izuku ushers them out two at a time, directing them to the approaching sirens and police cars skidding to a halt out front.

Izuku is constantly keeping a close eye on his surroundings, so he's ready for it when four more hitmen appear out of a side hallway, guns blazing.

They don't shoot him, obviously not willing to risk shooting their prized possessions, but they do aim a few shots at the ceiling.

Which causes three of the kids near the back to start running away from the exit.

Izuku, who is just finishing up taking down the guards, watches them go with a muted huff. "Oh, come on."

He goes after them once he's ordered the rest of the children to keep going towards the heroes. He's certain they'll be well cared for there.

And Izuku doesn't know what is it with stairs and people thinking that that's where they should run during a raid, but the kids are heading up the floors, and the gremlins are fast.

Izuku is tired. He can barely keep up. It's only the sinking feeling in his gut that tells him something bad is going to happen that spurs him forward.

They're already on the top floor heading for the rooms on the far side of the building when he reaches them.

"Hey, wait a second! We've got to get you three out!" They face him, terrified, and Izuku makes sure he sounds as soft as possible as he continues, putting a hand on one of the little boys' head. "Trust me, it's much safer back down there. You don't want to go this way!"

A girl, looking the oldest of the three, takes charge. She can't be any older than Izuku himself. "Are the—are the heroes here?"

Izuku nods, and he would've responded verbally had he not just heard the heavy footsteps coming from the side. The boy instantly shoves the group behind him, facing the very large figure in front of him.

He looks just short of four hundred pounds, and he wears a crisp suit with a fully shaved head. The suit is much nicer than the ones some of the guards were wearing. He must be the boss. Or one of them.

"It's you," he says, as if equal parts amused and irritated. The Japanese is smooth, meaning he's obviously been here in Japan for a while. "I knew you'd have something to do with this, Bunny."

Bunny. Normally, Izuku would just be offended that his vigilante name was messed up, but the way the man said it just sent shivers down his spine. His heart beats fast.

"If anyone calls me that one more time, I'm gonna go back to juvie on another cannibalism charge," he breathes out.

The Big Bad Guy chortles. "You're funny, kid. You know, I've been waiting to meet you."

Izuku feels the kids behind him trembling. He has to get them out safely before he finishes this up. "Sure, well, give me a second here, and I'll gladly get acquainted with you, aight?"

Another low chuckle, and Izuku ignores the slight fear that coils up in his stomach. He points to the stairs, giving the older girl a meaningful look.

"Just get down those stairs, and you'll be fine." He hands her his tranq gun, pushing her and the two boys back. "Use that if you need to. It's not lethal! Go on now."

She thankfully doesn't argue, and she quickly leads the kids away, fumbling a bit with the gun.

Izuku lets out a breath, his eyes lighting up. He faces the Big Bad Guy and is suddenly met with a bunch of knives hovering around the man like wings.

That's his quirk, really? Blades?

The man winks at him. "I'm going to enjoy this, kiddo."

Great. I have a feeling that I won't.

Shouta doesn't really mind vigilantes, in all honesty.

He sees why they do what they do, even when they push boundaries and break laws. As long as they're working for the right side and have a pretty good head on their shoulders, Shouta doesn't see the harm in letting them do their thing.

Most of the vigilantes Shouta have met in the past use similar unorthodox methods to capture and restrain villains. Those vigilantes are brutal, efficient, and quick-witted.

Rabbit is no different. Except for the fact that he's most definitely on the younger side. And also that he's a little more, well, explosive.

Both in personality and actuality. He actually reminds him of another vigilante he knew a few years back.

The man has to admit he's never been a fan of how the Hero Commission tries to keep everything tightly controlled. They send out heroes like Endeavor for the slightest reasons, at least when they realize they can't get what they want when they want it.

It's probably worse for a hero who isn't underground. Someone like All Might.

While the number one hero can obviously get away with a lot more stuff than regular pros can, he's also a lot more limited. Being in the public eye has its advantages, but the popularity also brings with it a ton of restraints.

All Might can't, for example, bash a group of newer heroes for not saving a young boy from a villain made of sludge. It would be considered rather distasteful, and kind of unprofessional.

While for Shouta himself, being the underground hero he is, can say pretty much whatever he damn well pleases, as long as it's not directly denouncing the Commission. It's not like he'd give a rat's ass about the backlash he'd receive anyway.

But back to the point. Hero laws can drastically limit heroes, so of course vigilantes have no such constraints.

It's similar to how laws and systems in general only apply to those willing to abide by them. Those who aren't willing are simply going to turn into criminals and villains. Thus making vigilantes, by definition, criminals. Which is why Shouta only complained a little bit when he was put on Rabbit's case.

He's a hero, and it's his job to take down criminals and protect the peace. But Shouta can also see where the detective is coming from. To be spotted this many times in only a week or so and be connected to so many fucking cases—

It's only natural the Commission wants him out of the picture. Or maybe in the picture. They want him alive, or else they'd have sent Endeavor already despite Tsukauchi's promises. They probably want him for themselves.

The vigilante has a higher success rate than most of the top heroes today and has the skills to match even the dirtiest of villains. So the Commission getting their hands on him would be the equivalent to finding a piece of chocolate in a shop full of nothing but licorice, with the licorice being the agents that do the Commission's dirty work.

Why go for the shitty stuff when you can have something better? Something near perfect. Someone who is fresh and almost always successful in their work. Shouta—and any other sane person—would take the chocolate.

Okay, maybe not the best analogy, but it works.

Rabbit would become the perfect weapon for them, much like the number three hero is—which is a dangerous topic in itself, but that's a discussion for another time.

The brat is definitely not sloppy with his stuff. Shouta assumed that the vigilante would mess up a little bit more, considering how new he is to all of this. Sure, his files claim that he's been doing this for a few years now, only having gained popularity more recently, but Shouta still considers him pretty fresh.

If you don't count the past two incidents, Rabbit is like a ghost. The criminals he takes down always say that they didn't even seen him coming. They couldn't get a good look at his face, or even at his quirk.

All they say is he's apparently short, snarky, and fast. Incredibly fast.

Which backs up the theory that he has an enhancement quirk. That would explain how he's seemed to evade heroes well enough up to this point. Even Shouta himself has a little trouble keeping up with him.

Strong, fast, and obviously intelligent, Shouta sort of respects Rabbit's drive. At least until he opens his mouth.

The expletives that come out of him sometimes are enough to make even Shouta wince. It's even more obvious that he's young.

Shouta doesn't know how to feel about that. He's never really had any strong opinions on teenagers or kids in general. He teaches them, sure, but he's also expelled so, so many of them in just the past couple years alone.

And while it looks like he doesn't care, he can't bear to see his students not take their lives seriously by doing dumb, crazy stunts. It's costly—a word Rabbit probably doesn't even have in his mental dictionary.

He doesn't want the kid to end up dead in a ditch somewhere due to his own recklessness, a feeling that the detective shares with him.

"I'm gonna kill him. I'm actually gonna kill him. The little shit is making me go insane."

Shouta takes a long sip of his coffee before replying to the detective. "I don't see what's so bad about this. He called those pros out, as he should've."

"You don't see what's so bad?" Tsukauchi throws him a glare, though there's no real heat behind it. "That video is trending over four different social media platforms, Aizawa! Not just in Japan! Do you know how bad this makes everyone look? The board is pissed."

"Why, because he's right?"

The detective huffs. "You're insufferable sometimes. And don't act like you're all innocent. This is kind of your fault, you know. You were supposed to go talk to him."

It's annoying to be called out.

That was a few hours earlier, when Shouta dropped by the station yet again after seeing the news. His friend was in the middle of an exasperated breakdown—faded coffee stains on his button-up shirt and slacks, papers and documents discarded all around him.

Shouta knows he was debating whether or not to track the vigilante down himself and smack some sense into him.

Hell, Shouta is still debating whether or not to go lecture the kid. While being proud of Rabbit for spewing the truth to those heroes, the man can also realize how bad of a decision that will prove to be later. He just pissed off the Hero Commission even more, along with all the less sensical pros.

And he's also probably won the favor of some villains.

Rabbit has undeniably done himself a disservice. While he's got the support of a lot of the general public now, especially after saving that blond boy, he's also made a lot of enemies.

His phone suddenly rings, breaking him from his thoughts, and Shouta skids to a stop on the rooftop he's running on. Well, speak of the devil and he shall appear.

"I was at the station not even three hours ago, Tsukauchi, what is it? You know I'm on patrol."

The man answers with a hurried tone, and Shouta instantly goes rigid. "Rabbit just texted me an address. He's busting a trafficking ring, are you available as backup?"

"Where? What's the situation looking like?"

"I sent my closest officers. They have most of the kids, I think, but they're still hearing shots in the building. I'll forward you the text."

He hangs up abruptly, and not a moment later the man hears a ding on his phone. And then Shouta is sprinting.

He's only five miles away, so he can get there quickly if he pushes it. He glances at the text again, frowning at the number written after the address. Thirty.

Thirty what? Guards? Minutes? Victims?

Victims. It sounds like the best guess. Which means he needs to make sure the police and other heroes know the count so they can tell if they're missing anyone.

The sounds of gunshots get closer. A couple heroes are already spread out throughout the neighborhood, evacuating them because of their proximity to the raid. Shouta uses his capture weapon to spring himself forward even faster, and he approaches the police officers camped out front. Quite a few ambulances are parked on the side, tending to what looks like the victims.

The children, Shouta thinks, upset. Some even younger than my past students.

"There's supposed to be around thirty of them," he announces, garnering their attention. "How many have you counted?"

The hero closest to him straightens up. "Twenty-seven, Eraserhead. We haven't checked the upper floor yet, so there might be a few more there."

"I'll check, but in the meantime, get some water heroes on the scene! We'll need strong firefighters in a minute."

Shouta ignores the confused look the hero gives him. He has a feeling fire is going to get involved simply because of Rabbit's presence.

The first thing he notices when he goes in is the bodies on the ground. A few paramedics rush past Shouta to check the unconscious criminals. None of them look dead, so that's a plus.

There are gunshots high above, however, faint due to the distance, and Shouta narrows his eyes to try to adjust to the darkness. The alarms are still going, and it's making his dry eye worse.

Giving a nod to the paramedics, he heads for the stairs on the far side of the room. The building is big for a warehouse, and Shouta has to take large steps so as not to trip on the criminals lying on the ground.

Now that he's looking, Shouta can see the darts stuck to their skin. Tranqs.

That explains a lot.

He takes the steps two at a time, only to run into a small group of kids halfway up, having just rounded a sharp corner. They immediately stumble back with fearful eyes, and a girl steps forward, ushering the two boys behind her.

They must've been trying to go down, and Shouta got in the way.

The group seems unhurt, though a little shaken up, and the older girl holds up a gun with trembling hands.

Shouta instantly puts up his arms, still on the steps. "I'm a pro hero," he explains, looking her in the eye to make sure she listens. "I'm not here to hurt you. I just need to know, is there anyone else up there?"

The girl hesitantly nods. "Only the, uh, the hero, and the—the boss is up there."

Hero?

Shouta nods in acknowledgement. "You three follow me, and be careful." He reaches for the gun with wide movements, carefully taking it away from the girl before casting it to the side. "Are any of you—?"

An explosion suddenly rocks the building, and Shouta instinctively pulls the three kids to him and jumps over the side of the stairs just as fire engulfs the entire top level. He uses his capture weapon to make sure the kids are secure against him before booking it to the exit, the sudden heat acting as encouragement.

Yep. Rabbit is definitely here.

They had twenty-seven out there. These must be the last three.

He has full intention of helping Rabbit after depositing the kids to the police and paramedics. The girl gives him a shaky thank you, and he just gives her a curt nod before turning back to the fiery building.

There doesn't seem to be any criminals left on the bottom floor, so it's uphill from here. The heroes are almost finished with dragging the guards out so they won't get burned. He stops to ask if they need help, and after being waved off, he heads back to the top.

Gunshots ring out again, this time closer to him. Heat washes over him, and shouted voices reach his ear. He races up the long, metal stairs, and sees a few bodies being dropped from the railings on the uppermost floor.

There are no heroes or police this high up, so it must be Rabbit. It seems like the vigilante is doing good without him. But he still has to help. He has to see it for himself.

This event might help solve Shouta's current troubles of having to actually catch the vigilante in question.

The files Tsukauchi handed him didn't really shed any light on what kind of person he's dealing with, which is why he took it upon himself to look up everything he could about the teenager. Even going as far to try and note his frequent patrol routes and the time he takes to go through them.

He seems like a good person, generally speaking. But for all Shouta knows, Rabbit could be completely different behind his mask.

He's never even heard the vigilante speak except for in recordings, and even then it's highly possible the kid's using a homemade voice changer. They know nothing beyond how he usually acts due to how well his actual identity is hidden.

He's barely even seen the guy apart from a few interactions here and there when Shouta had been trying to tail him but ended up being far too slow to capture him.

According to the evidence, Rabbit is a happy, rebellious vigilante who's not afraid to speak his mind and do what he thinks is right. He's also incredibly intelligent and skillful.

So yeah, there's a chance Shouta might be in over his head.

But all of those thoughts come to a halt when he catches sight of a dark green figure, illuminated by the flames behind him, heading for the window after seemingly catching his breath. Bingo.

You wanted me to talk to the kid, Tsukauchi, so that's what I'm going to do.

Izuku didn't mean to get shot. Honestly.

But the Big Bad Guy set off an explosion right before their scuffle started and, being the greedy bastard he is, took all of his attention during their fight. Izuku made himself vulnerable, then, as he assumed the boss was the only one left.

He didn't notice the guard to the side until it was too late.

Izuku saw it, though. He saw the flash of light reflecting off the gun's barrel, but it was still a little dark. He assumed it to be a tranq gun.

With his enhanced metabolism, he was confident that a tranq dart wouldn't work on him. And besides, he didn't want to risk anyone else getting shot by it.

So, Izuku didn't dodge. He instead parried another hit from the Big Bad Guy and took the 'dart' in his abdomen. He had not, of all things, expected the wave of pain that rocked through him upon the bullet's impact, or for the bullet itself to be a hollow point.

Yeah. Definitely not a tranq gun.

It was a hollow point bullet, meaning he now has several small pieces of metal inside him, and not in the fun way.

"What the shit."

Izuku yanks the gun away from his side opponent, darting forward to kick the man's legs out from under him before throwing him over the ledge of the top floor. Let the heroes have him.

They're like sharks anyways. Bloodthirsty motherfuckers.

Another knife flies towards him, and Izuku blocks it with one of his own, grabbing the discarded blade before throwing both of them at the Big Bad Guy.

He ducks down at the nick of time, but it gives Izuku the distraction he hoped for. He sails forward, foot outstretched, only for his ankle to be caught and his body thrown to the ground.

His breath leaves him all at once, and then the Big Bad Guy is towering over him, another knife being drawn out of thin air with his quirk.

Izuku jerks to the side, dodging the blade as it drives itself into the wood beneath him like it's nothing but wet paper. That could've been my head.

He pushes off on his palms and hikes his legs up to wrap around the man's throat, trying to rapidly draw in all the air he can before making his move.

"This is where you're supposed to moan," Izuku chokes out, lurching forward and driving his fist into the man's temple.

The Big Bad Guy sways, and Izuku doesn't wait to see if he's still conscious before unclenching his legs and rolling away, watching as the man faceplants into the floor.

Is he out? Izuku hopes so.

Oh, fuck yeah. I'm amazing. I'm a fucking god.

He turns away, already eyeing the broken window. He's gotta go. There are a bunch of heroes here. They'll take care of everything else. He barely has any energy left to use—he's gotta save it for escaping. And the bullet in his abdomen would very much like to be treated, thank you, and soon.

But then there's an angry roar behind him, which foils his plans.

Izuku moves, but evidently not fast enough as he's body-slammed to the ground, being thrown straight into the flames. It appears the Big Bad Guy wasn't as unconscious as he thought.

"I'll kill you, Rabbit!"

He tries to jump out of the fire, not wanting to get fried like a chicken wing, but the man seems dead set on wrestling him in the flames, and he tries to tackle him again.

Izuku is ready this time around, and he meets him head on with a shattering kick to the stomach, sending the criminal stumbling to the side. He grabs his shoulder with one hand and his head with the other, using the very last bit of his strength to twist the man around and slam him into the wall.

The crackling of flames drowns out the guy's yells, and Izuku sees a knife appear shakily beside him. The boy just slams the guy into the wall even harder, again and again, not stopping until the mental hold on the blade is released and it clatters to the ground.

Now he must be unconscious for real now.

Izuku steps back, letting the Big Bad Guy slump to the floor in a bloodied heap with a loud thump. A little messier than I intended, but it's his fault. His quirk is hella strong.

Heat suddenly licks up Izuku's pant legs, and the boy only then remembers that fire is fucking hot.

Grabbing the criminal by the back of his vest, the boy drags him away from the flames using Boost before heaving him over the railings, dropping him to the base level like he's an anchor to a ship.

There's shouts from below, and it sounds like the pro heroes are giving instructions and body counts. No one's been recovered dead, apparently.

Which is a win in Izuku's book.

Something moves out of the corner of his vision, and the boy turns to get a glimpse of red eyes staring straight at him, almost gleaming in the firelight. It sends shivers down Izuku's spine, because he suddenly knows.

It's him. The guy who's been following him for the past few weeks. He can feel the prickling sensation start up at the back of his neck, and Izuku is certain that he's right.

Which reminds him. He should probably be escaping right about now.

Izuku turns tail and runs. He stifles his cry of pain when he corkscrews out of the window, opening his arms up wide as he comes out into open air.

Oh right. They're a few miles away from the city, so there's nothing but houses here. He has nothing to land on but trees.

He crashes through the leaves, covering his face with his arms as branches scrape and claw at him like thorns. He hits the ground none-too-gently and scrambles to his feet, pressing a hand against his abdomen as more blood leaks from his gunshot wound.

A glance behind him shows that yes, he is being followed. A figure is jumping through the trees after him with all the grace of a cat, and it's clear even from this far away that he's definitely gaining on him.

“Oh fuck, oh shit, oh—”

He stumbles over a root but keeps going, not wanting to give up yet. His strength is waning, that’s for sure. He stupidly used up all of his energy because of his enhancements and not left any over for his getaway, which was his original plan.

The trees start to thin out, and Izuku feels a bit of hope bloom inside his chest when he sees a clearing up ahead. Houses line the streets, so Izuku must’ve finally reached a neighborhood.

Izuku is under a street lamp, exiting the dense line of trees and making for his freedom, when a shadow falls over him. He puts on the brakes so hard that he ends up tripping over his own feet, and the next thing he knows he’s plummeting toward the ground, face first.

Oh, he loves the taste of dirt in his mouth.

There’s a thud from somewhere in front of him, and he opens his eyes to see black boots standing just a few inches away from his face. Izuku is glad that his intuition was right, as he does in fact know who this is.

“Eraserhead.”

A pause, and then a hum in consideration: “You’re smaller than you look.”

Izuku snorts, lifting his chin off the ground to meet his gaze. “And you’re even more annoying than you sound. Look, if you’re gonna capture me, just do it already. Make it a quickie.”

Eraserhead doesn’t blink an eye at the interesting word choice. “I’m not going to capture you.”

“Huh. Interesting.” Izuku narrows his eyes once he gets a good look at him. “On an unrelated note, are you perhaps into bondage? The scarf gives it away, you can’t really deny it.”

Eraserhead makes a low noise, something between a huff and a grunt. “You use sarcasm to distance people.”

“And yet you’re still here, so could you kindly fuck off? I’m kind of in the middle of something."

"What, staring at the dirt beneath you?"

The reply comes quick, and it has Izuku pushing himself up by the elbows and leaning back against a nearby tree, casually covering his bullet wound with a hand. His hoodie should be dark enough to hide the growing blood stain. Except this conversation is going to be hard, because thick, warm liquid is currently trailing down Izuku's side and dripping onto the floor beneath him.

He prays the man won't notice. It's pretty dark out, so the chances are low.

He can't show any weakness lest Eraserhead decides to attack him for being an easy target.

Izuku glares half-heartedly at him. "What do you want from me, if you're not planning on arresting me?"

"To give you a choice." The man's gaze is piercing, letting Izuku know of the sudden seriousness behind his words. "I know you're young, and I know you've got heart, kid. So I'm letting you have a chance here."

Letting. As if he has control over him. Maybe he does, and Izuku just doesn't know it.

Izuku grits his teeth. "Go on."

"You did good back there, at the warehouse. You took those mercenaries down as efficiently and effectively as possible, while also prioritizing the victims' safety. Not very many pros do that, as you pointed out a few nights ago. You have a lot of skill and potential. Unfortunately, not all people agree. And, luckily for you, you managed to piss off nearly every single one."

I'm stuck between feeling giddy over your praise and being offended over that last part.

Izuku rolls his eyes. "I know they're jealous of me. What are you getting at?"

"You can turn yourself in. And before you argue, hear me out. This'll give you a few advantages in court, and you'll get off easier and with less charges than you would have any other way." He tilts his head, but not in a curious way, more of in an I'm going to figure you out sort of way. "You'll be given some time to tie up any loose ends as Rabbit, and then you'll hang up the costume for good. You're still a kid, so giving up now while you've still got that as an excuse is in your best interest, trust me."

"I'm finding it hard to trust anyone right now, so that's a hard no."

"You trust Tsukauchi, and he trusts me." He looks slightly annoyed when he says this, and Izuku files that detail away for later. "If you don't believe what I'm saying now, believe him. You have his phone number, right? Ask him yourself."

Izuku swipes a hand over his sweaty face, fatigue beginning to take over. "I only read half of what he sends me. I don't speak his language."

The boy relishes in the brief look of utter confusion on Eraserhead's face, only for it to be replaced by irritation. "My advice to you is to turn yourself in. You do a lot of good, but you can't deny that you get in the way of others. But. We can work things out for you in the long run, legally speaking. It'll be easier for you and for everyone else."

"I don't think it's that easy."

"You don't seem to have any better plans."

Izuku balks at being called out. "Harassing me when I haven't even done anything is a misdemeanor crime, punishable with a fine and up to two days in jail. You should be ashamed, sir. I have literally done nothing wrong, ever, in my entire life."

The underground hero ignores him, getting right back to business. "One week. You have one week to make a decision."

"Or what?" Damn him, Izuku is curious. "What are you going to do if I decide not to turn myself over?"

"I won't be the one doing anything. The Public Safety Commission will. Believe me, you'll wish you listened to me the first time. Consider this a warning."

Okay. That's fucking ominous. And kind of infuriating, since it's not really an answer to his question.

Eraserhead is walking away, hands in his pockets, heading back towards the warehouse. “Don’t screw yourself over, kid. I know you’re smart, so don’t disappoint me. We can help you get out of this.”

The boy frowns at the tired tone, at the kind of sad way the man says it. He doesn’t know what it means. He doesn’t know what any of this means.

His mouth opens before he can stop it. “Hey, you think I can get an autograph!”

But the hero is already gone, disappearing into the forest, and Izuku sighs to himself. The bastard probably wouldn’t have given him one anyway, being underground and all that.

Tilting his head up, he glances at the stars above one last time and forces himself up. He can’t wait around when it comes to dealing with a gunshot wound. He does not want to bleed out the night before he has to go to the mall with Kacchan, thank you very much. Infections aren’t very festive to have, either.

His head is reeling. He’s happy that the mission was successful so he can collect his money when he gets the chance at the club, but he’s also very much wounded, and now he has to worry about what Eraserhead said to him.

His ultimatum.

Izuku doesn’t know what to think at the moment. He doesn’t know if he even can think with the bullet lodged in his abdomen.

The worst part, though, is that Izuku can’t tell if the underground hero was lying when he said he’d help him.

“Bullshit. How come I haven’t seen it then?”

“Because you’re too busy getting shot every damn day of the week to pay attention to the newest hero merch coming out.”

Izuku gives his friend an irritated look, mildly annoyed. “So you are mad at me.”

“I’m not,” Kacchan snaps in a rather mad way, shoving his hands into his pockets and heading towards the shirt Izuku pointed to.

This makes Izuku sigh.

“Kacchan, I’m fine. And it’s not like I wanted to get shot. It just kinda happened, you know?”

“Can’t leave you alone for a goddamn second without you almost dying.” He drags Izuku into the store by the front of his hoodie. “I don’t even know how you’re still alive after all the dumb shit you pull.”

“Death is tired of me. She threatened to file a restraining order if I showed up on her doorstep one more time—”

Kacchan raises a hand to hit him, and Izuku dodges it easily with a bright smile.

They’re on the top level of the largest mall in Musutafu, browsing through the stores and buying little things here and there. The mall is pretty active during this time of day. The crowds are huge, and Izuku is sure that business must be booming since summer is almost near. The breeze is just chilly enough to give people an excuse to wear long pants and sleeves.

Izuku himself is wearing one of Kacchan’s hoodies. He showed up to his friend's house wearing jeans and a ripped black shirt with the words i'm dead (but actually) printed on it in flowery font. A shittily drawn human skeleton with neon sparkly crossbones coming out of its eyes was the centerpiece to it all, and Izuku is still pretty proud of it. It only cost him a couple dollars at the thrift shop down the street to his building.

Kacchan, however, did not share his friend's sentiment on the masterpiece, as the second he opened the door, ready to leave for the mall, the light seemed to leave his eyes. He made Izuku cover it up, claiming that he wouldn't be caught dead with someone wearing such a disgusting shirt. Which is also unfair, in Izuku's opinion, as Kacchan owns skull shirts himself. It's likely Kacchan just wants to be the only weird kid out of the two of them.

So here they are. Izuku is still pouting, even though Kacchan's red hoodie compliments his jeans and is actually really soft.

Yeah, he is definitely not getting it back.

Kacchan grunts, gesturing with a hand at the shirt Izuku pointed at. "See, I fucking told you. Came out a few months ago."

He's right. The tag has the original date on it.

"Whatever. It still looks nice." Izuku peers closer at it, deciding that he likes the Ingenium logo on the front. A little outdated since the hero came out with a new one recently, but at least it's on major sale. Izuku thinks he might get it.

He's only got a few bills left, so he can't get a lot, but he's going to cash in his checks from his recent gigs later on in the day, so it won't be a problem. After all, he isn't sporting a bullet wound on his abdomen for nothing.

He helped those kids get outta that hellhole, so the money doesn't really matter; it's just an added bonus at this point.

"You already have two Ingenium shirts," Kacchan complains. "Pick something else, or I swear I'll leave your stupid ass here."

Izuku rolls his eyes. "I'm surprised you remember those shirts. I got those years ago."

"My memory's better than yours, shitty nerd. Name one thing I've ever forgotten."

“You forgot me in the parking lot last month when we snuck into that amusement park.”

Kacchan’s face contorts into a smug grin. “I did that on purpose.”

It’s Izuku’s turn to hit him.

The rest of their time at the mall passes by in a blur. They banter back and forth a little more than usual, as Kacchan is still upset at him for some reason. At one point, the blond tries to fight a lady for running into them and not apologizing.

Izuku is forced to hold him back, having to ignore the voices in his head that were cheering the boy on.

Both teens have a couple bags in their hands now, full of clothing and smaller accessories, and they decide to rest on a bench near the middle of the mall on the first floor. The open air is a blessing, and they both start to relax for at least a few seconds.

Kacchan is on his phone, scrolling through the news and some hero blog post, while Izuku is looking around, notebook in hand.

This is a perfect opportunity for some people watching.

He’s always been observant. Hell, there were quite a few times back then where Kacchan would call him a stalker just to get under his skin. He kind of is, honestly. The only difference being that he doesn’t actually follow people around unless he has a reason to. Probable cause and all that.

He just sits back and observes most days.

There’s a fountain.

Izuku blinks at the sudden thought, not knowing where it came from. Okay, and?

Jump in it.

What the fuck? Izuku frowns, unsure what the new deep voice at the back of his mind is doing. Why would he do that? He’s still healing. His bandaged torso hurts like hell, so why would he make it worse?

Why not?

Oh, shit. The voice is right.

In a moment of incredibly poor judgement, Izuku slips the hoodie off of his back, revealing the monstrosity of a shirt underneath. He takes off his shoes as well, not wanting to ruin them.

Kacchan glares at him over his phone. “What the fuck are you doing? I already said I’m not sitting next to you when you look like that.”

“I’m jumping in the fountain.”

The boy stares, mouth slightly agape in disgust. He looks disappointed, but not surprised. “You dug a bullet out of your stomach not twelve fucking hours ago. What makes you think that’s a good idea?”

Izuku shrugs and continues stretching.

“You did a shitty job at stitching yourself up, too. How did you even get all the pieces out?”

Izuku blanches and rubs at his neck nervously, laughing lightly. “Well.”

Kacchan turns on him, eyes intense. “You did, didn’t you?”

“Of course I did! And it doesn’t matter now. I’m jumping in the fountain, and that’s that. I’m already in motion, so I can’t stop now. Like an electron in an atom.”

So what if he’s deflecting? He does not want to remember last night. It turns out that if you poor enough liquor onto an open wound, you’ll eventually become numb all over. So yeah, he had a lot of fun.

“Deku, I swear—”

Izuku sets his own phone into one of his discarded bags on the bench before jumping up. He has a clear path to the fountain, so this is gonna be amazing.

He takes a few big steps and leaps, foot touching the edge of the wall holding the water, and promptly does a belly flop.

The reaction is instantaneous. There are gasps and laughter coming from all around him, and the water splashes up like a wave. Izuku sloshes around in the surprisingly clean water for a few more seconds, giddy, right up until he hears shouted voices. Fuck. Mall cops.

The green-haired boy stumbles to his feet and goes back the way he came. A crowd has gathered now, drawn to the noise, and they part for him immediately once he lands on the tiled floor and slips.

And, okay. That hurts like a fucking bitch.

More laughs reach his ears, and Izuku finds himself giggling along with them. He speeds past the bench, grabbing his shoes and bags as he goes.

“Run, Kacchan, go!” He slips again, only to regain his balance before he can truly fall. “Sled gang, sled gang! Come on, say it!”

Kacchan catches up to him fairly quickly. “I’m not repeating that shit!” He yells, smacking the back of his friend’s head.

“Hey, boys, come back here!”

The two of them only run faster. Izuku throws his head back to glare at the cops giving chase, water falling from his hair. “No! Fuck you, old man!”

And that’s when Izuku realizes he’s probably been spending too much time around Kacchan lately. Now he’s starting to sound like him.

They run into a small restaurant at the other end of the mall, confident that they’ve shaken the cops from their tail. Kacchan still makes him put back on the hoodie, though, and not just to look different to the cops.

“I’m gonna kill you,” Kacchan promises, sitting across from him at the table. “I take it back. You deserved that bullet.”

“And they say friendship is dead.”

Kacchan’s eye twitches. “That’s not how that phrase goes.”

“Yeah, but it still managed to piss you off, so—”

Kacchan reaches across the table, death in his eyes, but then the waitress approaches their table. She has a bright smile on her face, and without her presence, Izuku would’ve most definitely been strangled. Izuku owes her his life.

“Welcome in,” she says. “What can I get for you boys today?”

Kacchan sits back as if nothing happened, going back to his usual gruff self. “I’ll have the number four meal with a coke, please.”

Interestingly enough, Kacchan can be nice when he wants to be.

“Alright, and for you, dear?” She asks, addressing Izuku.

Izuku, having only been to a couple restaurants in his life and nowhere else, short-circuits. What do they even serve here?

“I’ll take the number four, too, please!”

Kacchan gives him an annoyed look but otherwise says nothing. The waitress walks away, and it’s only then that Izuku realizes something. His face turns red, and he squeezes his knees nervously through his jeans.

“Uh, Kacchan, I don’t think I have enough money for—”

“Did I ask you if you had enough money? No.”

Izuku frowns. “That’s not fair. You always pay for my food.”

“You embarrassed the fuck out of me by jumping into that fountain, so you’re letting me do this as repayment.”

Izuku snaps his mouth shut, still glowering once the waitress brings them their drinks. A lot of people won’t know this, but Kacchan is actually a huge sweetheart. A bitchy and controlling sweetheart, but a sweetheart nonetheless.

It doesn’t stop Izuku from feeling guilty, though. While the Bakugou family isn’t exactly uber rich, they’re definitely not poor either.

Though to be fair, pretty much everyone and anyone is richer than Izuku these days.

The water from the fountain is slowly drying, and Izuku shifts uncomfortably at the feeling. His wound hurts like a motherfucker now, and even though his bandages are waterproof, it still feels a little damp.

Maybe it’s blood. Oh, shit. Izuku hopes he hasn’t torn his stitches.

One quick peek shows that he does not in fact have a leaking bullet hole, as his bandages are still pristine white. He breathes out, leaning back in his chair.

Kacchan must’ve been watching him, as his eyes narrow onto his. “Does it hurt?”

“Only a little bit. Liquor works wonders.” That last part is a joke, but his friend stares at him with an indecipherable expression, causing Izuku to shake his head. “I didn’t drink any, Kacchan. Well, not too much—”

He dodges the rolled up wrapper coming his way from Kacchan’s straw, giggling. Truth be told, he only had a little bit. Not a lot, really —only a couple of glasses since he doesn’t like the taste so much. He just wanted to see what it would do.

Nothing, it turns out. It did absolutely jack shit. He knows that one glass can’t get someone with his enhanced metabolism drunk, so he assumed that a few would be enough to do it. It turns out he was wrong.

It would take, according to Izuku’s calculations, eight glasses of straight liquor.

Regardless, the liquor didn’t help with any of the pain permanently. He’s still sore, and jumping into the fountain has done nothing but reignite the dull burn in his lower torso.

“You’re not going out at night until it’s healed, right?” Kacchan says once the waitress brings out their meals, barely sparing Izuku a glance as he digs in.

“‘Course not. I may be dumb, but I’m not stupid.”

Kacchan doesn’t grace him with a reply to that, so Izuku starts on his food.

It’s a pretty large portion. Cheap food tastes the best at places such as this one: cheap restaurants hidden away in the corners of malls. They usually have the best customer service, too.

With his metabolism, having larger servings is a blessing. Especially now since he used up most of his energy yesterday. Maybe a week to recuperate isn’t such a bad idea.

Kacchan eats slower than Izuku, as always. The teen likes to take some time and look at the food, mentally critiquing it and giving praise. Which is kind of ironic. Izuku analyzes people, and Kacchan analyzes food. It’s an interesting dynamic.

“That hobo ninja sounds like an ass.”

Izuku frowns, pulling away from his drink. “Who?”

“Hobo ninja,” Kacchan says impatiently, gesturing aggressively with his chopsticks. “Y’know, the guy named after the thing I bite off at the top of my pencils?”

“You mean Eraserhead?”

“That’s him. What a lame fucking name, anyway.”

“I don’t think he was being an asshole, Kacchan. He was just doing his job. Why do you think that?”

“Why wouldn’t I? From the texts you sent me about that talk with him, he seems like a pretentious ass.”

And doesn’t that sound familiar? Izuku finds a sudden burst of courage. “Like you?”

“Yeah.” Kacchan looks smug as he takes another bite of his food. “But at least you still follow me around. You probably don’t want nothing to do with him now.”

And isn’t that a dilemma. Izuku doesn’t know anymore. While the man was sort of a prick, he was just doing his job. He was probably forced onto the case against Rabbit anyway. He could’ve just taken Izuku in right then and there and not given him a chance to, as he put it, tie up any loose ends.

He was pretty generous, if Izuku is being honest.

A part of him wants to defend the hero, to put those thoughts into words, because despite his mixed feelings right now, he still likes Eraserhead. He’s still really cool and one of his favorite heroes. He wants to defend him, to chastise Kacchan about being so judgmental, but another part of him, the part that withers at not being in control and craves any excuse to commit a crime to save himself, is saying fuck yeah, stick it to all of them!

And he’s bound to listen to that part of himself.

Kacchan is scowling at him now. “Well? What are you gonna do to tell him your decision? Seek him out and tell him yourself? Because that would be a dumb idea.”

“Who said I made a choice already?” Kacchan just blinks at him, and Izuku looks away sheepishly. “Alright, fine. What do you have in mind?”

The blond grins, and it’s all teeth. “I have spray paint.”

Izuku has never loved him more than he does in that moment.

Two hours later, they’re both running away from a poor officer in training who looks far too tired to be in the current situation.

He’s barely even trying, just weakly calling out to them as they sprint through the crowds, cans of spray paint still in hand. They’re covered in different colors, so they’re obviously suspicious, though no one tries to stop them as they escape.

“Sled gang, sled gang!”

Kacchan repeats it, too, only once, but it’s enough to make Izuku descend into a fit of laughter. He made sure to find a spot where there’d be no cameras to catch their faces as they sprayed the paint, and the gas masks on their faces should hopefully help more with their identities. They decided to wear them to protect against the fumes.

The cop must’ve stopped by now, as neither boy can hear yelling anymore. They slow to a stop, and Izuku tells himself he’s only panting because of his wound.

“I’m going back home,” Kacchan says, throwing a multicolored hand up in a rough dismissal. “Try not to get shot again, nerd. I expect you at the house on Thursday.”

That’s a given, but Izuku nods anyway, giving the boy the gas mask he borrowed. He pants out a goodbye and starts the walk to the edge of the city. He dropped his bags off at his building before they even started defacing the billboard, so he doesn’t have to carry anything there.

Pulling out his phone, he searches for his newest contact. He was a little hesitant about doing this at first, but after working through all of his nerves by spray painting with Kacchan, he’s not so uncertain anymore.

He sends a quick address to the man in question, just as he did to the detective the night before. He's trying to be as ominous as possible. He wants this guy to be freaked out.

Do you like the gift I made you? :)

Izuku likes to think that the non-suspicious emoticon makes it even better. He won't text anything else. He'll just have to wait for a response.

He's not very good at waiting, so he finds something else to do to pass the time.

The beach is quiet around this time of day, just before evening time. Everyone is busy either leaving work and heading home or doing last minute shopping to make dinner. To be fair, Dagobah Beach hasn't had many visitors lately, given the fact that it's covered in heaps of trash.

The beach was spotless once upon a time, like all things, until it started accumulating junk from the ocean over the course of a few years. Now nobody comes here.

Ms. Hanako told him all about it a year or so ago. She recalled the days when she'd go on dates with her partner there, back when the beach was still a popular tourist attraction.

And so, in honor of Ms. Hanako and her partner, Izuku has been slowly picking up stuff, just a few bits of trash here and there, whenever he passes by. It's not much, as he only stays for like ten minutes, but it's added up. He can put in the work if it means he can see it spotless one day, especially now that he's not going out as Rabbit for a little while.

He has more time today, which helps maintain his emotional state. Izuku doesn't just clean up Dagobah Beach—he does the same for other dirty areas of the district. Whenever he's not patrolling or working on his projects, he's doing that.

The sun is dipping low in the sky by the time he decides that he's done enough for today. He ended up working for a half hour longer than usual, so now a small portion of the beach has been cleared out—a few square yards by the edge, to be exact.

It's not much, but it makes Izuku just a little bit happier.

He turns around, longing for the comfort of his hard couch, and stops in his tracks.

The air feels weird. There's someone close by. He extends his senses and finds that someone is sitting on top of the hill near the pavilion, either near or on top of the steps. Their quirk is strong, he can feel it.

And it's familiar, too. Blaringly so.

Izuku peeks around the corner and up into the pavilion, eyes widening.

Is that All Might?

The hero is in his smaller form, but it's still undeniably him. He's sitting on one of the steps, looking down at his phone. It doesn't look like he's noticed Izuku just yet.

What is he doing? Izuku wonders. Has he been there for—

The man must sense his gaze, as he glances up abruptly, lips parting in surprise once he sees who's staring at him.

Izuku steps down, back out of sight, wincing. He begins to stride away fast, heart beating loudly.

No, no, no. Please walk away, please walk away.

The man immediately stands up and inflates into his bigger form, striding over with a huge grin on his face.

Izuku doesn't know how someone can stand to smile so much, and for that long, too. It's something he's always respected All Might for.

"Young man!" The hero exclaims, coming down the steps and stopping Izuku in his tracks. Izuku's shoulders hunch up, and he turns to face All Might with a wince. All Might towers over him and blocks out the rays of the sun. "I've been looking for you all over this city! I thought I'd have to lose hope! I never thought I'd find you here."

Yeah, never thought I'd find you here either.

Instead of saying this, though, Izuku rubs the back of his neck, wondering why the number one hero is taking an interest in him. It can't be because of Rabbit, or else he wouldn't be smiling like that.

Would he?

“Oh, yeah!” Izuku smiles awkwardly. “I actually just started coming here a few months ago. It’s crazy that no one visits here anymore.”

“I agree!” All Might’s eyes fall to Izuku’s hands, which are dirty from the grease and debris of the trash he picked up. “Er, were you touching the garbage piles?”

Izuku reddens. He really doesn’t want All Might to think he was acting like some trashy delinquent rooting through the garbage! “No, no! Uh —I mean, yes? Technically! I was trying to clean some of it up!”

“Ah, you’ve got a noble heart, I see!” He comes to stand right in front of him, and Izuku is reminded suddenly that All Might is just as tall as his Small Might form. It’s quite scary to think about, actually. “Well, I’m glad I found you! I’ve been meaning to talk with you.”

Izuku tries to calm himself. There’s no way he’s made the connection between him and Rabbit. That’s impossible. So then what? And why is Izuku freaking out so badly? All Might appears to be nothing but happy. He wouldn’t be acting like this if he was planning on tricking Izuku, right?

When Izuku tunes back in to his surroundings, All Might is suddenly back in his small form, a puff of smoke escaping him as his muscles deflate. Which scares the everliving shit out of Izuku.

It’s cool, but still unnatural.

The next moment feels like an important one, and the breeze coming off of the ocean sounds like a gentle whisper of victory.

All Might dips his head a fraction. “I wanted to tell you that I was wrong. It was foolish of me to say that your friend shouldn’t be a hero due to a quirk.”

And—what the fuck? Izuku can’t quite comprehend what’s just been said, because there’s no way that the Symbol of Peace is standing there and telling him that he made a mistake. And why is he doubling over—?

“I apologize, young man, for possibly discouraging your friend with what I said.” He drops his head even lower. “I ask that you please forgive me, and that you can find it in yourself to give me another chance.”

Izuku panics, truly panics, because honestly, what the fuck is going on.

And what does that last part even mean?

His hands jerk forward, only to stop before he can touch the behemoth of a man in front of him. “No, no, it’s fine, please! Don’t do that, it’s fine, I swear!”

All Might straightens up from his bow a little hesitantly, looking grim. Or maybe that’s just how his face looks when he’s in his small form, Izuku doesn’t know, but he keeps talking rapidly to fill the sudden silence.

“I didn’t even take what you said to heart, so there—there was no harm done! I mean, not that I didn’t care about your advice, but—but you’re still really cool and I still admire you—not in a weird way, though! I’m sure you didn’t mean it when you said it and I knew it when—”

“Woah, hey, hey!” All Might cuts him off with a wave of his hand. He chuckles awkwardly. “You’re a big fanboy, aren’t you?”

Izuku blushes, looking anywhere but at the man. He lied when he said he didn’t take the words All Might said to him to heart. There by that tunnel, they cut deep within Izuku, but now, upon hearing All Might’s apology and revisal, the boy can feel that shame start to leave him.

He coughs, crossing his arms in self-comfort. There’s just something about being in the presence of his idol, of his father’s arch-nemesis, that gets him extraordinarily nervous. “So, uh, what were you doing around this part of town?”

“But it’s been days since the sludge villain attacked me. Shouldn’t you have given up by now?”

All Might has the decency to look sheepish. “If I may be honest, I deeply regretted what I said to you. It was foolish of me, and I shouldn’t have ever said those things. I was set on finding you again if only to make sure you knew the real answer.”

Why did you care that much? I don’t think I’m worth that much effort for someone like you.

Izuku glances away again, staring at the piles of garbage surrounding them. “Oh,” he says quietly. “What changed your mind?”

All Might inflates back into his hero form with a blinding smile. “Well, young man, I had to get the sense knocked back into me! Later the very same day we first met, I was inspired after intercepting a short villain fight back in the city. A particular hero at the scene reminded me of why I chose this profession to begin with, and I realized that I had deviated from my roots, for lack of a better way to say it.”

Izuku’s eyes bug out of his skull. No fucking way. He can’t be talking about what Izuku thinks he’s talking about! What are the chances the fight he’s talking about was the second sludge fight with Kacchan?

With this comes another thought: did he just call Rabbit a hero?

Izuku shakes. “All Might—”

“Please, allow me to answer your question once more—correctly this time.” His hands come forward, settling on Izuku’s shoulders. The touch burns somehow, but Izuku was raised in the fire and now craves the warmth from it.

The earth has stopped spinning, only for them. Only for this. Izuku meets his gaze fully, eyes wide, skin prickling.

All Might is all tanned skin and scarred tissue, and his golden features light up the entire beach with more success than the goddamn sun setting behind them. “Your friend can without a doubt be a hero, and he shouldn’t doubt himself for a second. It doesn’t matter what his quirk is, or what he thinks he is limited by. None of that truly matters! It’s your actions that truly define who you are!” He tips his head, the setting sun framing his large build. “With enough training and determination, anyone can be a hero!”

For a while, the space between them is quiet. The waves are muted in Izuku’s mind. The birds flying overhead, the sand shifting beneath them—it does not exist. And the silence is painful. All Might’s words were painful. Why? They shouldn’t have been.

Izuku should be ecstatic. He should be feeling euphoric. Because this—this is what Izuku has wanted to hear ever since he was four fucking years old. Just those measly five words: anyone can be a hero. Because Izuku is anyone, so that means that he can be a hero, too, despite his background. Despite his nature, his father, his quirk. Despite his very real limitations

It’s what he’s always wanted to hear, but it’s been more of a pipe dream than anything. A selfish little thought that he’s kept at the back of his mind. Sure, Kacchan has always told him that they'd be great heroes together. Hell, he's threatened to force Izuku into becoming a hero with him, but it's different when someone else says it.

Because Kacchan has known him his entire life; he could be biased. For All Might to say that he can be a hero even with a quirk like his own—it's almost enough to make Izuku cry even though he technically didn't say it for Izuku directly.

But why does it still hurt so much to hear? Why is it still so painful?

Izuku keeps walking through life one minute at a time, always forgetting to cauterize the wounds from his previous letdowns. He is a dog that licks the blood off his paws after each scratch, thinking he has cleansed himself when he has not. Perhaps this is why hearing All Might's words feels like salt on open wounds. This is why trusting again feels like deceit and betrayal and constantly being exhausted.

God, it fucking hurts, but the vines wound tight around his heart and lungs can only leave these kinds of puncture wounds from thorns once they have loosened, and Izuku feels that they must have. Air has never tasted so crisp to him. Not since he was laughing and being held by a man with cold clouds for hands.

"My boy?"

"Midoriya," he says suddenly, his tongue heavy.

"I'm sorry?"

"That's my name. Midoriya Izuku." Izuku is focused on the sand. "Thought you'd want to know."

All Might brightens even more. "Well, in that case!" He bends low to look Izuku in the face, still smiling. "How would you like to train with me, Young Midoriya?"

This time, Izuku hears the waves and the birds so clearly that he questions how he missed them in the first place. "What?"

"You have only told me about your friend, so how about you, young man?" He places his hands on his hips. "How would you like to be a hero?"

Izuku cannot help it: he steps back, stumbling in the sand. He nearly trips but at the last moment catches himself. The breeze has only strengthened, seeming to purr with encouragement. If only the boy right here had a way of knowing just how much the words hanging before him will change the course of his life and many others.

Do I? I've always wanted to be. But can I? Do I even dare to dream for that much?

The thing is, this is what destroyed Izuku in the very beginning: the longing for something he could never have.

Izuku is stuck, because if he breaks and says he can't be a hero, All Might most assuredly would not accept that answer. Not after his entire spiel. No, Izuku has to go for a different approach.

And this urge to run away from what Izuku loves more than anything is a sort of sadism he can no longer pretend to understand. "I'm… I'm sorry, sir. I don't think I, uh, want to be one. Not right now."

Maybe not ever.

And for a moment, there's a change to All Might's expression. It's simple, and it's brief, but Izuku sees it. It looks like disappointment, it looks like sadness.

But then it's replaced with his usual shining enthusiasm quicker than it appeared, so he doesn't dwell on it.

"That's quite alright! The training does not have to be exclusively for making you a hero. It can be just to help you be the best you!" His voice lowers a little as he adds, almost hopefully, "And if you eventually change your mind about the hero thing, that's great, too!"

I won't, Izuku thinks, but he finds himself nodding anyway.

All Might punches the air with a fist, not one to look a gift horse in the mouth. "Great! We can meet here every morning to start your training! We can use your little method of cleaning this beach to help with strengthening your body! Very good job with that, by the way. Oh, I hope you're prepared!"

Izuku starts. Woah, woah, why are we going so fucking fast?

The hero begins talking about diets and training regimes, explaining that at first it might be easy for Izuku since he appears to already be in moderately good shape, but that the training will progressively become harder. At some point, they even exchange phone numbers.

But Izuku is barely paying attention. He's too shocked that all of this is happening. Training? With All Might, of all people?

There's no way. Five-year-old Izuku would be having a meltdown right now. Even Kacchan would be in shock!

One thing that Izuku notices, though, is that All Might doesn't once mention One for All in his ramblings. He doesn't talk about the process, about its history—none of it. Izuku kind of guessed that that would be the case, but still.

Izuku's just admitted that he doesn't even know if he wants to be a hero, so All Might doesn't have a reason to tell him about his quirk. But then there's the question of why he is so dead-set on training the boy when they've only had a few minutes of interaction time.

He has done nothing to warrant this attention. He's just a kid who almost—stupidly—got killed by a villain but was saved by All Might himself. The hero probably saves a bunch of people every day, so why him?

Is all of this even worth it? Is Izuku worth it?

I really shouldn't be here. I don't deserve to stand next to you, or even to accept this training. Not with what my father did to you, and certainly not with what I've done.

Regardless, All Might looks excited as he talks, and he shoots back and forth between his larger form and his normal form quite a few times, with the occasional blood spurting from his lips.

All Might looks like an oversized golden retriever. That's what he reminds him of. Izuku can see it now.

He doesn't give the boy any time to interrupt, not that Izuku would have tried to given how guilty he feels at the moment. He wouldn't dare shut the man down when he sounds so hopeful. So good and honest.

This is not a good idea, that's for sure. It's most definitely not, but the boy ultimately decides that he can't do anything about it now. This might very well backfire on him.

But he guesses that only time will tell.

The Underground Club is exactly what it sounds like.

It's a club, and it's underground.

Hidden under a law firm, the club is pretty secretive. Of course, the firm does know about them. They run it, after all.

This club is not like any other clubs, and Izuku isn't just saying that. This club is sort of like a hangout spot for a lot of vigilantes, antiheroes, and even the occasional underground hero.

Izuku thanks the skies that he's never seen Eraserhead in here. He doubts the man even knows about it with how under wraps everything is.

Back to the point—you could call this the common room for all the people and groups that don't exactly abide by the law but also aren't full-on villains.

There's drinks, some food, a pool table, and even some card games set up.

It's more like a bar, honestly, but calling it a club sounds better. The Underground Bar sounds like it could have a number of double meanings. And none of them are good.

Everyone goes quiet when he walks in. There's a lot of people in tonight, some of them smoking and placing bets and throwing darts, while others are sitting around chatting. Could be for business, could just be for fun.

Izuku isn't wearing his Rabbit costume. He's in what he calls his casual clothing. A dark green hoodie with black sweatpants, red and green sneakers—he looks like any other person on the street. His hair is pulled back in a ponytail and hidden by his hood, and he still has a plain black mask on and his contacts in.

He likes to think that everyone is staring at him because of his roguishly good looks, but he knows it's probably because he's the youngest one in there by far.

Everyone in the underground knows his name. Rabbit is sort of a celebrity, much to Izuku's chagrin.

So it's only natural that they'll stare and then look away after a few moments. There's a strict no-unwarranted-fighting policy inside the building, so if they want to start a fight with him, they'd have to actually ask him so they can take it into the ring at the back.

He's gotten into plenty of fights before. Sadly, no one has challenged him in the last few months. Not for real. He's gotten the occasional friendly spar, though.

He heads to the side counter, giving a few waves and nods in greeting to the others around him. No one speaks to him, though.

His friendlier vigilantes and partners aren't in, it seems.

"Rabbit," the lady at the front says. She has horns on her head, kind of like a dragon's. She can produce poison from the tips, which is partially where she gets her name. "Back again early I see."

"Yep. Just here to cash out my recent dues."

She nods and pulls out a tablet to check his profile, looking back up after a few moments. "Alright, just give me a second while I get your stuff."

The lady goes into the back behind the bar, and Izuku whistles as he waits.

The club is also a good place to get clients and unclaimed jobs. Most of them pay really good, which is part of the reason Izuku was introduced to this place a couple years back. He's been banking off of it ever since, as he's never been picky about which jobs he gets. The club sells weapons, tech, and even valuable information.

That last one is new—Izuku still remembers in the beginning when they would only provide weapons and technology, not so much stolen documents.

The boy is proud to say that he helped make that happen.

When she comes back with his cash, he pockets it without saying a word. Something has caught his attention on the back wall by the wine. "Hey, what's that?"

"Oh, this?" Dragon lady picks up the object and brings it over for him to hold. "That's an itchy smoke bomb. Just got it in a few days ago."

She hums in amusement. “Yeah. We’ve only got a few left; they’re a hit with the antis here.”

He ends up buying three of them on impulse without anymore questions. Can you blame him, really? It just sounds so cool!

Sitting at a small table in the corner of the room, he starts to work on them. Dragon lady had said that the smoke is white, so he wants to change that. Maybe he can make one of them multicolored, like a rainbow, and the last two black.

The black smoke is good for stealth, while the rainbow one is good for pissing people off. Sounds perfect.

He’s almost finished with the second black one when his phone buzzes in his hoodie pocket.

Oh, he thinks. It seems his victim has texted back.

Izuku checks the conversation with a wide grin.

How did you get this number? Who is this?

Wouldn’t he like to know, huh? Izuku doesn’t think he’ll grace him with an answer to the last question. The man should be able to figure it out.

He types back quickly: The same way I got Tsukauchi’s.

It’s five minutes later when he gets another notification.

This phone number has blocked you. You cannot receive texts or interact with this number again.

Izuku starts to cackle like a maniac, earning a few nervous looks from the people closest to him. The hero thinks that’ll stop him? How dumb does he think Izuku is?

He can’t wait to terrorize the man. Izuku’s already complained to Tsukauchi about the less-than-stellar experience he had with Eraserhead, and he’s yet to get a reply.

Probably because the detective realizes just how dumb it was to send a hero after him.

He's finished with the smoke bombs, so he's ready to leave. He's planning to wash his clothes at the laundromat, so he might as well get a move on.

That's his plan, at least, until one of his clients walk up to him and offer him another job, persisting even after Izuku tells them that's he on a one-week hiatus.

The boy is ashamed to admit that he stays an extra hour at the club listening to his client's explanation, but he doesn't regret it one bit.

Oh, Izuku can't wait until the week is up. He's going to throw down.

Doing laundry sucks.

Well, not totally. If Izuku actually had a working washing machine and dryer at his place, he probably wouldn't be complaining. But he doesn't, so here he is, sitting in this disgusting laundromat and waiting for his clothes to finish washing.

It smells like burnt rubber in here, but also like the confusing odor of multiple laundry detergents and soaps mixed together.

It's not necessarily bad, but it gets on Izuku's nerves anyway.

He takes a bite of his Slim Jim, bobbing his head to his playlist of this really old artist.

He put his Rabbit costume in the washer as well, having picked it up at his apartment after dropping off his smoke bombs.

Which reminds Izuku that he has to change his bandages when he gets back. His stitches still have to stay in for a while, but his bandages have to be reapplied twice every day to avoid infection.

At least the boy thinks so. It's not like he's gone to medical school.

The washer turns green, so Izuku finishes his Slim Jim and starts to take everything out, pushing a few coins into the dryer to start it.

This new song is interesting. It's about some student punching one of their classmates for stealing their potential boyfriend, but the artist still manages to make it sound good without being weird.

He steps back, only to bump into someone. Izuku's not surprised—his senses don't work very well when he's listening to music, which is exactly why he does it here. It's an escape.

Izuku immediately turns around and pops an earbud out of his ear, apologies spilling from his lips.

But then he stops. Because what the actual fuck.

The man is tall, but not as tall as All Might. He has long blond hair and green eyes that have a dark swirl in place of their pupils. He's wearing red rectangular glasses and light grey sweatpants with a plain white shirt, his muscles clearly defined through the thin fabric.

They're built more for speed than for strength, though it's obvious the man isn't lacking.

"It's alright," the blond insists. "I didn't see you there either!"

Izuku recognizes him immediately. This is the man who scared off those bullies in the alleyway.

It's the voice that gives it away, along with the hair. It's pulled back in the same hairstyle he had when Izuku first saw him. It's definitely him—Izuku doesn't mess up little details like that.

He prays that the man won't stop, that he'll just keep going on his way to wash the basket of clothes he's got in his hands, because this is already so fucking awkward, but of course Izuku doesn't get his way. The universe never listens to what he wants.

The man's eyes light up in recognition, and he slips off his headphones and lets them hang by his neck, setting the basket on one of the washers beside him.

"Oh, it's you, little listener! How are ya?"

Izuku curses at the world. Why does everything hate him? He's just a magnet for trouble, isn't he? Why can't he just—

He said listener.

Listener.

Izuku is, to put it simply, a dumbass. How has he not put the pieces together already? The blond hair, the personality of a radio show host, the swirling eyes, kind of like a cockatoo's—the man even called him listener back in the alley when he helped him that day.

This is Present fucking Mic.

Izuku kind of wants to pass out. First Eraserhead, then All Might, and now Present Mic? Just how involved is his life getting? Is he the main character?

He used to listen to Present Mic's radio show all the time, and he loved this man—still kind of does, actually. The pro has been steadily rising in the recent hero rankings, Izuku knows that much. He hasn't caught up on the man's life, though. He doesn't know where he's at, or how his show is going.

This feels like a fever dream.

"Kiddo?"

Oh, right. He asked him a question.

Izuku flounders, stepping back to lean against his washer and dryer set, trying to give the man more room. "Oh, I'm fine! I've been doing great!"

"Well that's good." The hero smiles sweetly, and it looks too real to be fake. "The cut above your eye healed up nicely, yeah? I'm glad you're alright."

He remembered that? Why does Izuku feel so happy about that?

"Yeah, I—I heal pretty fast, so…" He winces after saying it. Why did he bother mentioning that? Actually, it doesn't matter. He needs to take advantage of this! "Uh, Present Mic! Can—Can you sign my notebook, please? You don't have to, obviously! I was just wondering, since, um, I didn't really ask the last time and we're both already here so—"

"Oh, you do know who I am!" He sounds amused but more flattered than anything else. "I thought you might with those clothes you have on."

Izuku suddenly feels very self-conscious even though he knows the voice hero didn't mean it like that. It's weird how he didn't care about his looks or attitude at all when it came to All Might or Eraserhead—but when it comes to Present Mic, a hero who loves fashion just as much as he loves yelling, everything suddenly matters more.

Izuku probably looks pretty homeless right now in his oversized Hawks t-shirt and his Ryukyu pajama pants. Oh, he's glad that he didn't decide to wear his Edgeshot socks today.

Present Mic dumps his laundry into his own washer, continuing to talk to him even with his back slightly turned. "And of course I'll sign your notebook, kiddo."

This prompts Izuku to go rushing back to his seat, taking the journal out of his bag and frantically flipping to a page. The voice hero gives him a teasing look when Izuku hands him the Ingenium-themed pen.

Oh my God. This is actually happening.

Izuku is vibrating at a frequency that could break glass once the man hands it back to him, and he hugs the journal to his chest as he bends down low. "Thank you!"

The voice hero lets out a no problem before finishing his load of clothes, already starting to whistle a tune to himself.

Izuku is in heaven, and he has to force himself out of his stupor before he makes a fool out of himself. He does not want to be embarrassed, nope.

Music is still blasting on one side of his head, and he pops his earbud back in and repeats the song that had started.

It'll be about thirty minutes before his laundry is done, so he's just going to sit there and do what he does best: analyze.

He opens his notebook back to Present Mic's page and starts to make an entirely new analysis on him. He sketches the man in his hero clothing, as he's pretty much memorized it by now, and jots down a few more notes about him and his style choices.

His on air personality is very much exaggerated, but he's reportedly a nice, sweet teacher for his students at UA while also a badass pro hero who doubles as a radio host. The man is incredible, and his intelligence is off the charts. There's a reason he's an A rank pro hero with high stats.

Someone pokes him in the shoulder, and Izuku jolts, snapping the notebook shut and yanking his earbud out yet again as he turns to stare, wide-eyed, at the culprit.

Present Mic is looking at him with a hand outstretched, sitting two seats over and looking a little concerned. Oh. The man must've been trying to get his attention.

"Sorry!" Izuku says, nails digging into his palms as his cheeks flush an even darker shade of red. "What did—what did you say, sir?"

"'S alright, listener, I was just asking why you're out here so late at night. It is past curfew for kiddos your age."

Curfew. Izuku suddenly remembers that a curfew does, in fact, exist for children who are underage. The boy never follows that law, so he's kind of forgotten it even exists. Besides, most of the cops around here know him. As long as he's not using his quirk in public or being a little shit, they usually turn a blind eye to him being out late.

Doesn't stop them from snitching on him to Tsukauchi, though, which usually earns him another lecture the next time he sees the man.

The hero must see the panic on his face, because he gives him another reassuring smile. "You're not in trouble or anything, I was just curious. I was never a stickler to that rule either."

It sounds genuine, but Izuku still hates how easily he believes him. He also hates how easily the lie slips from his own mouth. "My dad told me to do the laundry, but I kinda forgot. He's getting back from a business trip in the morning, so, uh, yeah."

For a second, Present Mic just peers at him. He doesn't respond, and there's not enough light in the laundromat for Izuku to see what his expression looks like, so the boy waits with bated breath on his reaction.

He hums after what seems like forever, but what could've only been a few seconds. "That's fair. And by the way, listener, I'm off-duty right now, so you can just call me Yamada."

Yamada. That's his last name. Being a pro hero with relatively high rankings, most people know that. It's not a secret.

Izuku opens his notebook back up, still a little shaken. He doesn't like the look Yamada had given him during the brief pause. The man is, again, very intelligent.

Did he notice the lie? Why not call him out on it if so? Izuku is too tired for this.

He can barely focus on even his analyses, so he instead listens to the music playing in one earbud. He doesn't dare put the other one in, not wanting to risk another incident. He's learned from his mistake.

And so he actually hears what happens next the first time.

Present Mic is giggling now. Like a little schoolgirl.

Izuku frowns, wanting to ask what he's laughing at, but he stops himself. That's none of his business. He has no right to ask, so he continues writing.

Present Mic, however, doesn't seem to think so, as he glances at him brightly. "My coworker just had an impromptu painting of him on a billboard today. Apparently some vigilante around here made it to get back at him for being an ass." He blocks his mouth suddenly. "'Scuse the language, listener."

But Izuku didn't listen to the curse word—he's heard and said way worse himself—as he's suddenly frozen solid. It can't be.

Why does this keep happening to him?

Yamada leans over and shows him the picture on his phone, and sure enough, it's the painting that Izuku spray painted with Kacchan not five hours before. It's a little bit painted over, unfortunately, as the excellent drawing of Eraserhead—an underground hero—is not something that should be seen by the public. They must've taken it down real quick.

The painting is still all mostly there, at least in the picture. It's a silhouette of Eraserhead with his most defining features: his unkept black hair, the capture weapon wrapped around his neck, and his neon yellow goggles. In bold, rainbow letters, the words Eat My Ass cover the top.

Izuku made sure to add glitter everywhere, because why not?

Yamada tries to block the swear word with his hand, but it doesn't matter. It's not like Izuku had written it or anything. No, not at all.

"He doesn't appreciate the talent as much as I do. I mean, look at the detail! It was obviously done in a rush, but it looks great!"

Izuku gapes, looking at the voice hero with a newfound sparkle to his eyes, because finally, someone appreciates my artistic abilities.

“I agree,” Izuku says, looking back down at his lap. “I think the dick painted on his forehead makes it a whole lot better, too. Really ties it all in.”

Yamada laughs, and Izuku can’t help but wonder if the voice hero would still smile at him like that if he knew the truth.

Considering the voice hero’s abrasive personality, he probably would.

Izuku laughs with him, and it’s not until later that he realizes it wasn’t forced.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Izuku looks up at Endeavor's Agency from the sidewalk, and logically, he knows it's a bad idea.

He knew it as soon as his client explained the job, as soon as he mentioned it had anything to do with the number two pro hero. He should've walked away when he saw the name on the job report. No amount of money is worth getting busted trying to rob a place that houses Endeavor and all of his sidekicks, where Izuku will, without a doubt, be outnumbered and easily caught if something goes wrong.

And something usually does go wrong. It's just Izuku's luck. It's his curse, and his birthright.

Though, despite his bad feelings, despite knowing better, here Izuku is, slipping into the alleyway beside the very intimidating building, about to make the climb. He's drawn to this place, knowing that the hero who works here is second only to All Might himself.

Sometimes, Izuku wonders if the Symbol of Peace would be disappointed in him if he found out about his vigilante counterpart, and he wonders what the man thinks about Rabbit, if he even thinks about him at all. He hasn't exactly stood out lately except for the incident with the sludge villain a couple weeks back, so there's no reason for someone as powerful as All Might to pay him any attention.

All Might stands for justice and tranquility, and he's a pillar of hope for the people of Japan and even for the rest of the world. He advises everyone to help keep the peace, no matter the hardships that come along with doing that.

Standing at the bottom of Endeavor's agency after disabling all of the thermal recognition sensors around the area, it's clear Izuku's doing the exact opposite of what All Might preaches.

He's looking for trouble, not solving it. He may be doing it as a means for survival, perhaps, but this stunt, this job, is about more than that. He's searching for something.

He just doesn't know what.

Izuku flips his hood over his head, making sure it won't get in the way, then starts his climb. He has to be quick about this, as the next patrol comes by in twenty-five seconds and will assuredly see him if he remains at the base of the building. Endeavor is a paranoid man, and this makes it so his agency is one of the harder ones to get into.

He constantly has security patrols, but the only good thing is that there's only two of them protecting the outside of the building. With over four walls and corners making up the outside, there are places that are out of sight for a small stretch of time.

And twenty-five seconds is enough for Izuku.

The climb goes quick with his adhesive gloves, and just seconds later he's pushing himself up and over the balcony on the top floor, hidden away from the eyes of the public and the security patrols from the ground level. It's the same balcony he's seen Endeavor jump onto countless of times after finishing patrol.

This must be his own private office, which is exactly where Izuku needs to be.

He readjusts his hood and mask one last time and walks across the ledge to the door. Of course it'll be locked—Endeavor may be a bitch, but he's not stupid. If Izuku so much as touches the handle to open it, alarms will start to blare all around him. He'll be caught in less time than it takes for Izuku to make a villain cry, and that's saying something.

So it's a good thing all of the cameras are down for around ten minutes in this section of the top floor.

Completely unrelated, of course. I wouldn't dare mess with Endeavor's security systems unless I had a reason to.

Singing to himself, Izuku uses Pull to carefully peel off the transparent sensor—a thin sleeve that covers the handle of the door and checks for fingerprints—without making it go off. He then powers up his leg and kicks at the door handle, effectively breaking the handle off in one clean sweep. He catches it before it can clatter to the ground, and he lets out a relieved breath when he hears no alarms or sirens.

He then takes one of his electronic probes and jabs it into the now exposed hole in the door—the electronic lock buzzes and then clicks, and Izuku is in.

He nudges open the balcony door and peeks inside.

Sure, it's a little strange that there's no one else here, but he presses on anyways. Maybe it really is going to be this easy. He's outsmarted plenty of heroes before now, so maybe they're all just this stupid and incompetent.

Still, he isn't careless about it. He's just a little hesitant. After he steps inside, he looks around the room and checks out the high-ceiling appreciatively. There are scorch marks in some places on the walls, obviously from the hero's quirk. Did he activate it out of rage back then? Or maybe excitement?

He doesn't like where his train of thought goes after that last one.

Izuku focuses on his senses, finding nothing out of the ordinary. There's no one here, and there's no hidden tripwires or anything. He's in the clear.

And now he has his eyes on the prize, or, rather, his client's prize. A statue sits near the large double doors, made out of what looks like hollow gold. It's a lion, and if Izuku didn't know any better, he would've presumed it to be a regular statue.

But he does know better. He knows, thanks to his extensive research the night before and his helpful client, that this statue also happens to double as a safe. A safe that should, if Izuku's information is correct, contain in-depth records of Endeavor's latest missions and targets. Villains that he's already apprehended, and also ones that he hasn't.

Not yet.

These files are worth way more than the lousy police records Izuku downloaded from Tsukauchi's computer that day. He'll have to scan these files for himself before handing them over for payment. It might prove to be useful to him, which is obviously why his client gave him the job in the first place.

The lion glowers at him, mouth open in a permanent snarl. It looks like it's taunting the vigilante even without being alive. Izuku doesn't know why Endeavor chose a lion of all animals to hide his secrets away, and he doesn't really care to find out.

Each step brings him closer to the double pay he was promised. It'll be enough to keep Izuku from pickpocketing rich jerks on subways—or from taking on another job like this one—for at least a few weeks.

Enough time to repair some of my weapons. I need to make more grenades.

And besides, Izuku will get more time to focus on his training with All Might, something that the boy doesn't mind nearly as much as he thought he would when the hero suggested it a week ago.

He's glad that the training is easy, at least for now. His stomach still hurts a lot every day, and he only took out his stitches this morning—he probably shouldn't have—but he reckons he's alright.

Checking to make sure the alarms are still down, he takes out his staff and swings with all his force at the head of the mammal, right behind its left ear.

Is that it? Izuku thinks, panicked. That should be the trigger.

For a moment, nothing seems to happen, but then there's the sound of metal scraping against metal, and a little compartment pops open in its chest. A keypad sits inside, and words flash on the small screen.

Facial recognition required. Initiating full body scan. Please do not move.

Izuku takes the end of his staff and sends it smashing straight into the glass, shattering it completely and revealing the mess of wires behind it. There are no alarms yet, but Izuku has to hurry. He only set the security systems to be on loop for ten minutes. They'll be coming back on soon—maybe even sooner if one of Endeavor's sidekicks notices the breach.

He sets down his weapon and carefully pops off the door to the safe, eyes widening once he sees what's in it. There's no money, of course. Izuku isn't a fool—Endeavor is too rich to actually carry around bills. But there is a thick folder, along with a few pictures of the hero's family that Izuku doesn't give a damn about.

They may still be useful, however.

He picks up the folder, turning it over in his hands and peeking at its contents.

As promised, there must be a hundred different files in here, each containing the names and details of Endeavor's closest allies and enemies. Flipping through them, Izuku can see pictures of battle scenes, and even some handwritten notes in the margins by the number two hero himself.

He's gonna be so pissed when he realizes someone took this.

He sets it on the ground for a moment and picks his staff back up, sliding it into the harness over his back as he gets ready to leave. He doesn't bother trying to shut the safe. He wants Endeavor to know someone was here. Hell, he wants him to be thinking about it for weeks.

When Izuku stands up, he freezes. Something—something feels wrong.

"Too easy," Izuku whispers. He rubs at the corner of the folder with the pads of his fingers, and not a speck of dust clings to them, which just goes to show how important the files are.

I broke into Endeavor's agency to steal really important documents, so why am I not I being attacked right now by one of his sidekicks? Even with the cameras down, I expected better from the number two hero.

And, really, Izuku just had to think that, huh?

There's a shift in the air, and wind blasts at the back of Izuku's neck. The vigilante turns just in time to see a flash of gray fabric coming towards him. He drops to the ground and rolls to the side, barely dodging the capture weapon as it wraps around the space he occupied moments before.

Izuku's breath hitches as he crouches low to the floor, facing the intruder with his bōstaff clutched in one hand, folder in the other. Well, this is familiar.

"Strange, isn't it?"

Eraserhead stands just under ten yards away from the boy, right in front of the open balcony doors. He's staring at him, but for how long? He couldn't have been there the whole time. Just couldn't have.

Izuku would have—should have—felt his quirk. He feels him now, of course, now that he's made himself known, but the panic rising in his throat doesn't seem to die down at all.

"You look like a moth," is the first thing Izuku says. The boy blinks, surprised at his own stupidity, before straightening back up from his crouched position. "Has anyone ever told you that, Eraser?"

"Once or twice. What's in your hand?"

Crisp, succinct, his tone of voice tells Izuku that despite his question, the man knows exactly what's going on here, and what Izuku is holding. "A copy of Endeavor's search history. Thought it'd make for good blackmail. Did you know he's into temperature play?"

He gets an unimpressed look from the man. "I thought you only steal from bad guys."

Endeavor is a bad guy, Izuku wants to say, but he bites his tongue. Now is not the time to start a debate, even though the boy has a feeling the underground hero would agree with him on his views.

"I don't recall ever saying that," he says instead, trying to distract him. There's not much else to do when Izuku is frantically trying to come up with a plan whilst simultaneously freaking out over the fact that Eraserhead found him so quickly, that he's here, in this room, and Izuku didn't notice.

And that—that shouldn't be possible.

"Didn't have to," Eraserhead says. He starts a slow, methodical walk from his place by the balcony, creeping closer to Izuku. "Your records told me a lot about you."

He's bluffing. He has to be. Izuku has taken a lot of measures to make sure nothing important is found out about him. The man doesn't know anything that Izuku doesn't want him to. Right?

Izuku takes a couple of steps back to make up for the distance Eraserhead is gaining. The hero notices and stops approaching.

"It's been a week," the man continues, suddenly sounding much more serious. The change has Izuku shivering. "Have you come to a decision?"

Decision? For Izuku to make a decision, he'd first have to have a choice in the matter. And there is no choice, not for Izuku. He's already thought about it, already talked it over with Kacchan.

Izuku trusts Tsukauchi, he really does. The detective has admitted that he truly does want the best for him, and Izuku doesn't need a lie detecting quirk to be able to tell that's he's telling the truth.

But once Izuku turns himself in, it's basically a death sentence. Not legally, since he's still a minor, but when has the government ever done things legally? At the very worst, in the public's eyes, he'll get some time in jail or be put on house arrest for the unforeseeable future. He'll be put through some program like any other juvenile delinquent, and he'll just have to live with the words ex-vigilante on his record for the rest of his life.

But that's not what will really happen. He'll be checked over by the doctors, of course. They'll find out about his quirk—no, quirks.

They'll make the connection between him and his father, and then they'll take him away. The government is good at that. No one will blink an eye at the disappearance of a vigilante once the Commission gets involved. He'll then suffer a fate worse than death, worse than whatever Tsukauchi or Eraserhead seems to think will happen to him if he doesn't turn himself in.

Because if Izuku is caught by the Hero's Commission, his father will feel inclined to involve himself.

Izuku lets venom seep into his voice when he speaks. "Decision, huh? Let me think about it for a second, I wouldn't want to disappoint you."

Eraserhead grimaces, which is more of a reaction than Izuku thought he'd get. The man takes another step, only to stop at the way Izuku raises his bōstaff in warning. "Listen, kid, I admit that I could've had more tact regarding our last conversation."

I wouldn't go so far as to call it a conversation. Felt pretty one-sided to me.

The hero clears his throat, though the indifference on his face stays. "It was wrong of me to come onto you like that. You have no reason to trust me, so I had no right to act like you owed me something. Though you're technically still a criminal, Rabbit, you've done a lot of good for a lot of people. Even I can recognize that."

"I get it. You're just doing your job," Izuku says quietly, and he kind of means it, too. He can't fault him too much when the man could've just spared him the ultimatum and captured him straightaway. As much as he hates to admit it, Izuku doesn't think he would've stood a chance against him at that moment, not while he was injured at least. "Though what I do want to know is how you got roped into all of this."

He means why. Why does Eraserhead care, or at least act like he does, when that makes everything so much more difficult.

“You’re young. I can tell just by the way you talk, even with that voice changer. You can’t be any older than my school’s first years.” His expression softens just a fraction, and Izuku wishes it wouldn’t. Wishes the man didn’t decide to be so open with him. “It isn’t everyday a teenager with skills like yours chooses to become a hero instead of a villain.”

Izuku looks down at the folder cradled in his hand. He’s fucked. He’s caught with no way out. At least no way out that doesn’t involve going through Eraserhead, who has, once again, started to move closer and closer to him. He’s slow and careful, as if Izuku is a scared, wounded animal that will bolt or attack if he’s caught off guard.

And honestly, that’s not far from the truth.

Izuku doesn’t answer immediately. He could be stalling until backup arrives. I have to get out of here.

When it’s clear the hero isn’t going to continue without a reply, the vigilante looks away, towards the clock hanging above Endeavor’s desk. “I know enough.”

Eraserhead makes a noncommittal noise. “I’m sure you know how dangerous those files can be when dropped into the wrong hands.” A tilt of his head. “But that isn’t your problem, is it? Ignorance means you don’t have to feel guilty when things get screwed up, right?”

Izuku backs up some more, back hitting the double doors to the office. He doesn’t like the way Eraserhead keeps tightening the room by closing the distance between them. He doesn’t like the way it makes him feel trapped, or the way the man keeps trying to poke holes in his conscience, in the way he rationalizes what he’s doing.

The man was just praising him, soothing his rising anxiety, but now he’s back to being the pro hero Eraserhead. Rabbit is his mission, after all, and he has to finish it.

Izuku lifts a shoulder in a stiff shrug. “I don’t give out information to just anybody. If something goes wrong, or turns bad, I fix it.”

“That’s not how the Hero Commission sees it,” Eraserhead says. “And whoever you’re doing this for, I’m sure you know they can’t be trusted, at least not fully. I don’t mean to be insensitive when I say this, kid, but you can't possibly know for sure what that person will do with the information you're holding right now."

As much as Izuku wants to scream at the jab at his perception and his very untrustworthy client, he keeps his jaw tight, his eyes set on the balcony behind the hero before looking back down at the folder in his hand.

It doesn't feel dangerous. It doesn't have an aura of power or feel like anything at all. It's just a couple hundred pieces of copy paper with some ink on it. It has a few thousand names and dates, and that's it. The more he looks at it, the more he's convinced that it does nothing except look important and tease, that the hero is lying.

Izuku supposes he shouldn't be surprised. Adults can't be trusted to tell the truth, or to do much of anything good.

"Who said I'm doing this for someone else? I like to treat myself sometimes."

It sounds flat, even to Izuku, and so the vigilante isn't surprised when Eraserhead just blinks at him, unfazed. "Most of your jobs involve money. I doubt you'd be doing something as risky as this without some sort of reward at the end."

Does he know about the club? I know there's probably a few informants and bugs in there, but I didn't think Eraserhead would know about it.

Or the hero could be bluffing, trying to push Izuku into submission without the boy realizing it.

Izuku's eyes flash back towards the doors and windows, towards freedom, and he watches how Eraserhead tracks the movement with his own eyes.

"Just hand the folder over. Do the right thing. If not for me or Tsukauchi, than for yourself."

"And I walk out of here?"

"No," Eraserhead says. Another step. "You were never going to just walk out of here, but if you hand over that very expensive piece of government property, I can help you."

And there it is again. The help thing. He wants Izuku to trust him, and at the moment the boy wants nothing more than for the hero to go fuck himself. They've been over the trust thing. So why is Eraserhead still trying?

And why is he being so gentle about it? He still sounds so matter-of-fact, too. Izuku wonders how the hero manages to pull that off.

The thing is, Izuku doesn't know how the pro hero defines help. Maybe to him, help is calling the cops or sending him somewhere for troubled teens, or maybe Eraserhead's idea of help is locking him up in some prison where they'll never let him see the light of day again.

Some people are twisted like that. Some people like to twist words.

Izuku doesn't want Eraserhead to be some people. He hopes to god he isn't.

"I think you're lying." Izuku watches the man closely for any tells. For an eye twitch—something. But all he gets is a raise of his left brow. It could be read as a sign of irritation, or even amusement, but Izuku has a feeling that it's neither of those. The hero is trying to figure him out, has been, ever since their first discussion. "I think you set this up, knowing I'd come here. That's how you caught me so quickly."

Caught him red-handed, like a parent catching their kid with their hand in the cookie jar.

Eraserhead stares, curiosity and indifference fighting for control in his every movement. It looks like an act. Or the boy is looking too much into this, and the hero truly is examining him so openly.

He's good at that, Izuku thinks. Making me question myself. Practiced.

"Is that what you think, kid?" His tone never changes, but he moves closer again. Hands now settled in his pockets.

Izuku feels closed in.

"Those files are real. I did nothing except put word out on the street about where they were located. I figured you'd come looking for them. If not for yourself, than for someone not brave enough to break into the number two hero's agency."

Strange, isn't it?

Of course Eraserhead said that. He knew Izuku would find the whole thing too easy. Knew Izuku would do it anyway. So is he really that predictable? Izuku has walked straight into his trap.

His instincts were right. He should've listened to his gut.

"Kid, if you turn yourself in, I promise that I'll do everything I can to make sure you'll be alright. I'll work towards that trust, understand? Even if you don't believe me right now, I promise that I'll help you. You just have to meet me halfway."

And for a moment, Izuku allows himself to think about what would happen if he'd cave. If he'd just do it and say that dreadful word. Maybe Eraserhead would be able to protect him. Maybe Izuku is just too paranoid, too anxious, too scared to admit that he might actually be okay if he laid down his weapons.

Izuku, for some reason, doubts himself.

But then he remembers his father's face, he remembers the number three hero's predicament, how he's nothing but a tool for the Hero Commission, and then the moment is over and the clock is ticking.

He has less than a minute before the security systems come back on. The doors behind him will burst open, and Izuku will most definitely be screwed.

He has to run. Right now. That's his only choice. Izuku's escaped Eraserhead before, right? Well, not escaped; the man let him go, but that's besides the point. This shouldn't be too much difficulty.

Oh, how wrong he is.

Izuku slides the small bōstaff back into its harness. He stuffs his free hand into the inside of his costume's jacket, and to anyone else, it would look normal. Like something an angsty teen would do to avoid having to do something or to socialize with anyone.

But Izuku has pockets on the outside of his jacket like any normal piece of clothing. The ones on the inside are there to hold his weapons. His creations.

The boy almost feels bad for what he's about to do. Eraserhead doesn't know, so it's not his fault. It's not his fault that people are cruel. Izuku can't just turn himself in, not even with the promise the hero gave him.

It sounded genuine, too. That's the worst part.

Izuku hopes the sorry is written clear in his eyes as he meets Eraserhead's heavy gaze and tries for a laugh.

"You said I wouldn't be able to walk out of here, right? You never said anything about running."

The hero jolts. "Rabbit—"

What happens next seems to be in slow-motion. Izuku takes one of the smoke bombs out of his pocket and throws it at the floor with one jerk of his wrist, and at the same time, a screeching alarm starts to blare from the walls.

The thick black smoke expands more into a cloud, covering the whole room and seeping through the vents.

Izuku has to think fast. There's loud voices and quick footsteps coming from below. Endeavor's office seems to cover the entire top floor.

Well, fuck. It's either Rabbit versus Eraserhead, or Rabbit versus all of Endeavor's sidekicks.

And with the way the underground hero is flying at him with his capture weapon outstretched, the smoke billowing around him, having somehow pinpointed exactly where Izuku would be standing even with the fog obscuring his vision, the decision is made abundantly clear.

Izuku throws open the doors behind him and runs.

He hopes Endeavor's sidekicks aren't as capable as everyone says.

Shouta is unequivocally stupid. So incredibly stupid.

He's surprised the trap worked. He didn't expect Rabbit to actually go for it. He expected another petty criminal or thief to make some attempts, sure, but Shouta was under the impression that Rabbit had no reason to, no need to go this far.

He was obviously very wrong.

Money must be one of those reasons—and maybe it serves as the deciding factor for most of Rabbit's missions. That thought alone is enough to have Shouta frowning.

The vigilante is young. He should still be living with his parents, so he doesn't need that money, right?

Shouta never imagined someone as smart as Rabbit to risk his life like this for some cash.

Yes, his life. Because if Endeavor had somehow been here, having canceled his meeting or simply left early, Rabbit would probably be dead. The number two hero wouldn't think twice about frying a little vigilante over breaking and entering, so Shouta is eternally grateful Endeavor is not here.

That might change soon, though. He must be getting some sort of warning on the situation right now, wherever he is.

If Endeavor had been here in the first place, escaping would have been near impossible. He also wouldn't have taken kindly to Eraserhead being in his agency, especially on his own private floor.

He sees underground heroes as being lesser, and Shouta is no exception.

Speaking of escape—what the fuck is Rabbit thinking? And why does he have smoke bombs all of a sudden?

This is the first time he's used one, at least to Shouta's knowledge. He'll have to remember to ask Tsukauchi about it after this is over.

He flies down the stairs, slipping his goggles over his eyes as he listens for the brat. The windows on Endeavor's floor are bulletproof; Rabbit must've known this, which explains why he didn't go for them immediately.

He must be planning to go for the ones on the next floor down, as the entrance to the agency is most likely locked. If Shouta isn't mistaken, the locks slide in place automatically once any alarms go off. There's no point heading for the base level.

He lands at the bottom of the first flight of stairs and curses as he takes in the scene before him. The room is already in shambles and it's only been five seconds. Rabbit is bouncing on top of the rows of desks and using the walls as leverage as he dodges the three heroes who lunge at him.

The interns are all scrambling back, away from the seemingly rabid vigilante and the ongoing fight. Endeavor's sidekicks are banding together and attempting to stop the chaos. There looks to be ten of them here at the moment, which isn't surprising. Shouta knows Endeavor has over thirty, so they must be out and about at this time of day.

Most of them are hanging back and protecting the interns while also watching the three other sidekicks try and take down the vigilante. They must not be able to all go for him at once—their quirks might make it difficult to fight close range or with partners.

Another smoke bomb suddenly goes off, this one rainbow colored, and Shouta takes this as his cue to rush forward, capture weapon in hand. He leaps onto a side table and crouches down low, straining to see through the smoke.

One of the sidekicks, a woman with long, flaming green hair that Shouta faintly recognizes as Burnin', turns to look at him with dark eyes. "Who are you?"

She's shouting to be heard over the yells of the other sidekicks and the alarms, and Shouta gives her a quick glance before searching the smoke again. "I'm a pro," he informs her curtly. "I was tasked with capturing him, so let me help."

She looks suspicious, but she must recognize him somewhat, as she just nods and disappears into the fog, looking for the others.

Shouta, however, looks up.

The smoke doesn't travel very high; it tends to get thicker down at the bottom, just like moisture in a cloud.

And there he is, just as Shouta predicted. Rabbit is sticking to the wall, head pressed against the ceiling. It has to be the gloves allowing him to do that, Shouta thinks, and now that he has a view of the vigilante's boots, he can see that there's something glossy painted over the bottoms.

Something that allows him to stick to surfaces? Is the gloss permanent, or does he have to reapply it every day?

The smoke is starting to clear just a little bit, and Shouta notices that the kid has purposefully thrown desks around to create obstacles in order to slow the sidekicks down. They don't know that he's above them, not running around them.

Shouta realizes suddenly that he's waiting for an opening—no, for the right angle.

He's trying to go out the window like Shouta thought. He doesn't want to fight or hurt anybody, it seems.

And Shouta sees the moment it happens. Rabbit's head snaps to the side, and Shouta follows the movement; a sidekick is moving out of the way and heading deeper into the fog, leaving a clear view of one of the bigger windows. Big enough for a teenager to fit through.

And then the boy springs, shooting across the room with surprising force and speed.

It's only on instinct that Shouta flings out his capture weapon, eyes itching as his quirk flares. His hair rises from his shoulders, and the gray fabric of his scarf only manages to wrap around the vigilante's ankle. Shouta yanks hard, and in the next moment the figure comes jerking towards him. But Rabbit doesn't make a sound, not even a pained grunt or breath; he only twists midair, free hand suddenly gripping his bōstaff. His finger moves quick across the metal, the weapon extending to reveal—is that a fucking katana at the end of it?

Shouta's eyes widen, and he watches, breath suspended, as the vigilante's arm comes down quick, the blade cutting through the smoke. A piece of his scarf is severed off a few inches away from the boy's ankle, setting him free.

Oh. He sliced right through it like the scarf is nothing but softened butter, like it isn't made from one of the strongest materials to ever be threaded into fabric.

But Rabbit is still sailing towards him from the leftover momentum, and Shouta brings his hands up to protect his face, being forced to blink at the sudden rush of air.

His quirk sizzles out, a mistake Shouta is made aware of a fraction of a second later.

Rabbit meets his gaze, and this close to each other, Shouta gets the chance to see the boy's eyes. They're a dark crimson, seemingly glinting even without light. it looks like contacts—the sharpness is still there, the emotion too profound, too bright of a center; it has to be fake.

And then boots are hitting him squarely in the chest and Shouta is sent sprawling to the ground when Rabbit uses him as a springboard. He's flying back towards the window like a torpedo, and the sidekicks are rushing for him as well, the fog having cleared due to the commotion.

But he's too quick.

The window explodes on impact, and Rabbit disappears through it amidst the shattering glass.

Shouta is already up and running. He has to stop him now, dammit, or someone less forgiving will.

Burnin' looks at him in shock. "What are you doing? We're on the fifth __"

Shouta doesn't hear the rest of her sentence as he's currently flying out of the window himself, arms pulled to his body to keep from hitting the sides. The drop is long, and he puts together the fact that she meant to say floor. They're on the fifth floor.

There's a flash of dark green at the corner of his vision, but he can't do much about it with the ground rising up to meet his face. He braces for it, rolling once his feet hits the ground.

There's gasps, then some screams, and Shouta looks up to see a bunch of people crowding around him and the agency's entrance. They must've been drawn in by the alarm.

The hero shoves past them, eyes searching over the area he swears he just saw the vigilante running through.

Nothing.

"Where'd he go?" He asks sharply, glaring at the horde of onlookers. He despises the press as it is, but civilians are arguably a little more annoying when it comes to getting in the way of hero work.

A man with cat eyes points to a building across the road, and Shouta doesn't bother responding before taking off.

He has a feeling he won't find him. The boy is slippery.

And this is why Shouta feels stupid. He had him in his grasp, his capture weapon had been around him, and he just let him escape.

His one job. He only had to not let the kid get the best of him, and look where he's at now.

Rabbit is gone. After an entire hour of combing the streets, Shouta only stops his chase when Tsukauchi calls him and chews him out about not telling him that he set up a trap at Endeavor's Agency, and that he could've provided his men as backup.

And fuck is Shouta angry. Not at Rabbit, at himself. He should've just captured him. Shouldn't have let his emotions get in the way. He's been trained for that. He knows not to do stuff like that, and yet he's done it.

He gave Rabbit a chance. He should've just done his job and not let a teenager influence his actions.

But that's not entirely right, is it?

Shouta is irritated, sure. Irritated that he failed to bring him in, that the kid is going to be in even more danger now, and yet he doesn't feel an ounce of guilt. Maybe because he saw how scared the boy really was. Even with the mask and the contacts, Shouta could see it. He got a glimpse. Rabbit is scared, no, terrified at the prospect of turning himself in.

He's scared to death over it. So much so that he'd much rather go through Endeavor's sidekicks to avoid his biggest threat at the moment: Eraserhead.

Shouta is definitely stupid. He's so, so frustrated, and he finds himself stopping just before the edge of another roof. He's too distracted—he won't be of any use going on patrol. He has to head home now and gather his thoughts.

And it's not until he's halfway to the apartment he shares with his husband that he feels something digging into his neck. He moves to scratch his neck, and that's when he finds it: a folder, bent in half and pressed into the folds of his capture weapon.

He doesn't even have to look at its contents to know that it's the one.

The brat somehow managed to stick it in his scarf without him noticing, probably when he kicked him.

Shouta feels the ghost of a smile tugging at his lips, a little bit of the tension easing from his chest. Playing mind games, huh, kid?

And after the underground hero has slipped into his apartment and kissed Hizashi in greeting, he decides right then and there that he'll try to help the boy as much as he can. He promised, after all, and Shouta doesn't break his promises.

Izuku feels like he's going to pass out from running too long. He's a good city over, well outside his normal perimeters, which means he should be good.

He doesn't feel any eyes on him, so he slips behind a cat café and doubles over, clutching his stomach. His wound is jostled now, perhaps even torn. The skin is still healing, so it's delicate. He probably shouldn't have accepted the mission at all this soon after his injury.

It's still sore. His ankle hurts like hell after being jerked like that—oh yeah. His ankle.

The piece of fabric is still wrapped around it, a little piece hanging off from where he sliced through it. Which, now that he's safe and can think freely, he finds that he feels bad about it. That capture weapon must be a lot of money to fix.

All of this shit, and the boy still didn't even keep the folder.

Oh well. He got something of far more importance from this little adventure. Izuku can do without that money. Although it would've helped a great deal, Eraserhead is right. While he sort of trusts his client, there's no telling what could have happened if he did end up giving him the folder.

Izuku doesn't want to be responsible for something bad happening.

For now, though, he'll just focus on getting home. Maybe he can actually go to sleep, as he feels like he's going to pass out any second.

Yeah. Kacchan is going to kill me.

> 10k??? hits??? guys i love you all so much!! ty for the support! i don't like this chapter so much but I forced myself to get it out since it's kind of a filler. The next one will be better I promise!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Slower, honey. The slices have to be smooth. If you're sloppy, it won't look right."

"This is me going slow."

"Doesn't look like it."

Izuku grits his teeth and bites back a groan, his expression sour as Ms. Hanako moves him aside to show him how it's down. She takes the knife from his hand and positions it over the thick slab of pork in front of them.

"You have to focus," she explains, "but not too hard, or you'll mess up even more."

"Wow," Izuku says dryly. "That makes perfect sense."

The woman smiles and continues to cut the meat into clean, even strips. "It just takes practice. You're good with a knife, so it shouldn't take long to get the hang of it. You're just being impatient, is all. Now try again."

This is how the process usually goes for days like this. Ms. Hanako tells him how to do something, he fails at it, and then she shows him how to do it herself. It's frustrating sometimes, but she's right—he does eventually get it, most times within the hour. He's quick like that.

Well, as he said: most times.

"You're doing it wrong again." Her voice comes from the opposite side of the kitchen, and the boy glances back to see her busy kneading out dough.

"How? I'm doing exactly what you told me."

“The rhythm of the knife hitting the cutting board is off. You need to be less hesitant.” She sniffs. "'Sides, your slices are getting crooked."

Izuku squawks. “How do you know? You’re not even looking!"

The woman finishes kneading and wipes her hands on a cloth before walking to him. “You did good,” she observes. “But you’re still doing it with the result in mind. Try focusing on each individual slice, instead of on what you think the product should be.”

Izuku feels like his mind might just melt into the drains beneath them but does as instructed anyway, receiving an approving hum in return.

“See, that’s better.”

There is no difference, Izuku thinks, but he doesn't voice this. Ms. Hanako certainly knows best when it comes to cooking this type of food, so he won’t argue.

That’s not the purpose of this, anyway. He's not really caught up in the art of cooking, not like she is, at least. The purpose of this is for Ms. Hanako to teach him how to make cheaper meals to substitute for the diet plans All Might gave him.

The man didn’t spare him a second glance after dropping the book into his hands after training one day. He only told Izuku to read it through and tell him his suggestions on what to change or not. The book contains the exercise regimes and diets he has to follow—which is okay, Izuku isn’t upset; he expected something of the sort to be in their agreement, but still.

He just can’t afford to follow it. Like, at all. Who knew that eating healthier is a lot more expensive than not? Izuku did from his experience of being, well, homeless, but he never imagined the gap would be this large.

And Izuku feels bad, he really does. He doesn’t like lying to the man, per se, but it’s not like he can just walk up to him and say sorry, All Might, I’m extraordinarily broke and can’t afford the very basic meal plan you want me to follow, which will probably ruin what we have going on here and make you stop teaching me, but I’m still willing to work myself to the bone to continue training with you if that’s alright.

No. That wouldn’t be very plus ultra.

Izuku squints at her. “Huh?”

“That man just doesn’t understand that not everyone can eat like he does.” She gestures aggressively with the knife to the dietary book Izuku brought with him, shaking her head. “And besides, you’re already quite fit for your age and stature. Your metabolism burns through most foods, does it not? It’s not like eating more protein every day will change anything unless you're eating a bucketful of it, which is just insane to expect from a young boy.”

That’s true. The only reason he is fairly built—besides his vigilante activities, of course—is because Boost gives him an enhanced metabolism. He barely eats enough as it is, but what he does eat gets turned into whatever nutrients he needs incredibly fast. Besides raw ramen, cold coffee, and breadsticks, Izuku lives off the prepackaged food that sits on the clearance shelves of the nearby supermarkets. Sometimes he's able to have fruits and vegetables when they're on major sale, but more often than not he's getting his major nutrients from a can. His body cries for better sustenance, but Izuku can’t provide it.

I need to save up for a mini stove heater. I don’t want to have to steal one.

Izuku continues practicing the steps for the meal she told him to try, frowning slightly. “It’s not his fault. And I wouldn’t call him privileged, really. He works hard for his money.”

“Of course he does. That was bad phrasing on my part, sugar. I’d say he’s just rather ignorant, then.”

“Well, he’s nice, though.” Izuku thinks about how happy the man gets when he witnesses the boy achieving something new, and how he encourages him even when Izuku is stubborn.

It’s only been a little over a week of training with All Might, and Izuku can already feel the difference, both in his physical features and mental state.

All Might is nice to be around, which is wrong. He shouldn’t be. He very much should not be.

Izuku shouldn’t even be around him. His very presence is dangerous to All Might. His quirk alone is reason enough to be wary. The boy feels he’s betraying the hero by even being near him. He doesn’t know what Izuku is, or what he can do with his powers. He wouldn’t be training him if he did, surely.

“Oh, I guess not," Ms. Hanako concedes. "I’m sure he's a humble person, but he could at least try to be more open with you. I swear, if he wasn't a hero, somebody would've called the cops on him already.”

Izuku only laughs quietly, now feeling torn. It would be nice if All Might was more open about One for All and why he’s choosing to train him. Izuku is still, at the bottom of all this, suspicious about everything. I’m a nobody. Why did he choose me and not someone else? Isn’t he just wasting his time? I have nothing to give back to him, so it’s not like he’s gaining anything from this. I already told him I'm not becoming a hero, so why does he continue to train me?

But he's being hypocritical, isn't he? The man owes him nothing. Izuku shouldn’t be upset when he’s also keeping his real quirk a secret. He's arguably doing much worse things, too, so who's really to blame?

“Which reminds me!" Ms. Hanako’s voice becomes sharp, and she turns to him with narrowed eyes. “You haven’t been to my house in a long time, boy! You know how many baked goods I’ve had to throw away because you weren’t there to eat them with me?”

Oh, shit.

The woman continues dramatically, gesturing wildly with one hand. “I’m just an old lady, Izuku, I can’t finish an entire pie by myself. You know my daughter won’t eat them with me either anymore. Something about trying to maintain her physique or whatever.”

“Ah, I’m sorry!” He dips his head, his skin heating up. It has been a while since he’s last visited her outside of the restaurant. “I keep forgetting!”

“I don’t wanna hear excuses or nothing. Just make sure to come over when you can, hon, I’m getting lonely all by myself.”

Before Izuku can promise that he will, that he’ll eat all the pies she makes with him and even more, the bell near the front door rings, signaling someone coming in.

“Ah, that must be Ayaka.” Ms. Hanako leaves the back kitchen to greet her daughter, briefly telling Izuku to take a break.

The boy does so with a bit of hesitancy, glancing at the open book laid out on the sidebar. There’s a bunch of pages that All Might printed of various meals, drinks, and even shakes that he's supposed to start adding to his daily routine. Most of them are crossed out in red sharpie by Ms. Hanako and replaced with cheaper, easier meals that hold the same amount of nutritional value.

Most of the foods Izuku can get for just a few bills—older vegetables, reduced canned foods, and fruit that nobody buys this time of year. It's still a lot more than he can really afford, but Izuku can try.

Between Tony's Pizzeria and Auntie Mitsuki's house, he's going to try and eat more. Eat healthier, more specifically.

He may not need to lose weight, but he needs to build more muscle. Even with Boost, building muscle is hard.

But he has to keep it up. This isn't something that he can do off and on when he has the extra money, he has to put in the effort. He owes All Might that much.

Again, he really has to save up for some household items. Like a mini stove heater, for one, preferably battery operated or solar-powered since he doesn't have a lot of electricity. The generator he made only goes so far—it allows him light and some outlets to plug his tech in to charge, not so much anything else.

He needs a phone. The one he has now is used for both his vigilante persona and himself. He isn't comfortable with All Might having Rabbit's phone number, even if the man doesn't know that he does. He's gonna have to play it off like I got a new number, you can lose the last one!

He's okay with Kacchan and Auntie having it, Kacchan for obvious reasons and Auntie only because she doesn't have a reason to connect him to Rabbit. But anyone else is a big no-no.

"Oh, hey Izuku," Ayaka greets, shutting the kitchen door behind her as she slips on an apron. "Ya here to help us today?"

When Izuku can't go on patrol or when he has nothing else to do, he helps Ms. Hanako and her family at the Pizzeria. Being a family-owned restaurant is hard, so Izuku is glad to help. So now, saying as it opens in less than thirty minutes, Kayaka is probably assuming he's here for that.

Which, since it's a weekend, he is free. He only trains with All Might during weekdays. A fact that Izuku is very happy about; sometimes he likes to get in an early patrol before the sun comes out to catch the criminals off guard.

“Um, actually, yeah.” Izuku closes the book and starts to clean up his area, tying back his hair. “If you’re okay with it, that is.”

“Of course! I haven’t seen you in a while, kiddo, so it’s always nice to have you here.”

Again. He doesn’t deserve the kindness this family gives him.

Izuku washes his hands and picks up the dough Ms. Hanako had been working on, spreading it out even more to get it to the correct thickness.

Now this is something he knows how to do. Which is kind of weird, seeing as Italian cooking is actually a little harder to do than Japanese cooking—at least according to Ms. Hanako. He doesn’t know how to perfect basic cooking techniques, and yet he can cook and even bake sometimes. Both Auntie and Ms. Hanako have said he does it pretty well, too, he just doesn’t do it the correct way.

What the correct way is, he doesn’t know. All Izuku cares about in cooking is if his food is at least a step above garbage and a little bit edible by the end of it.

“Dad has to run a few errands today, so he can’t come in.” Ayaka doesn’t turn away from stirring the tomato sauce. “And he’s just not feeling it, y’know? He’s been getting depressed since the business has been going down.”

Izuku frowns a little, taking the sauce she slides him and spreading it over the dough. “No one’s coming in anymore?”

“You know how it is, being a pizzeria in Japan. Nobody really wants to eat here after they’ve gone here once.”

And Izuku does get it. Ms. Hanako complains about it a lot. That’s why she works all the time—they can’t afford to close it down for even one day.

“Hm.” Izuku looks at the board on the wall, taking note of the menu. The three meat pizza is the most popular, he knows that much. Better start making that first. “Well, I think the food you guys make is amazing, so they’re missing out.”

A short laugh. Ayaka pats him on the shoulder as she squeezes past him to get to the sinks. “You know, maybe you should start working here. Mom says you help a lot, even when you’re not cooking.”

Izuku has thought about it before. He pushed that idea away very quickly, though, as working means getting paid. And Ms. Hanako and the rest of the family barely get enough money to keep it open. She definitely won’t have enough to pay him a salary. Izuku doesn’t want to do that to her, even if it would really help him.

And besides, he isn’t always free to do stuff like this. His vigilante work calls for his attention at random times, not just at night or in the early mornings.

“Maybe,” Izuku says, finishing up with the first pizza and moving on to the next. “Hey, where did Ms. Hanako go?”

“She’s cleaning up the front. We’ve got about, what, twenty minutes before opening?”

He glances at a clock above the door. “Yep. What’s the special today?”

Ayaka stops what she’s doing and turns to him with a wide grin. “Ever heard of Italian cream cakes?”

Oh, yes.

Izuku likes sitting on roofs.

Call it a hobby, call it a drug, hell, call it a fetish, Izuku just likes being up high.

Not too high, though. He does not want to remember the helicopter incident right now, thank you.

He just finished preparing the food with Ayaka and saying his goodbyes, and now he's sitting on the ledge of the restaurant with his notebook in hand and earbuds in.

He has to update his journal on his quirks. Even after a week, he hasn't done it yet.

Pull.

It's a dumb name for an even dumber quirk, but it's helpful. It's just the memories attached with it that Izuku doesn't like. But again, it practically saved his life when he got shot, so he can't hate it too much.

See, before that incident, he assumed that Pull, well, pulled things to his body when he raised one of his hands. And in a sense, he's still right.

But rather than the actual magnetic part being his chest or stomach, it's his hands themselves that serve as where the objects head.

To put it simply, the objects will head towards his hands and not his chest. So when he had to pull out the fragments of the hollow point bullet that night, things proved to be a little easier than he expected it to be.

He thought that Pull wouldn't be useful, as the pieces were already in him and therefore wouldn't move anywhere, but he was fortunately wrong.

His palms are the magnets, not the center of his body. So when he positioned a hand to face the bullet wound entrance, he was gobsmacked to see all of the pieces flying out, meaning Pull worked.

So gobsmacked, in fact, that the white-hot pain of his flesh being torn almost didn't register.

Almost.

It's safe to say that being shot at the warehouse had its pros and cons. The pros being that he now knows about another aspect of his quirk and has even more uses for it, and the cons being that it hurt like a son of a bitch and left a large scar on his abdomen.

Not fun at all, no. And it's not cool when you can't really show it off. People tend to get a little concerned when teenagers such as himself start to show off bullet wounds.

Izuku is used to scars. No one else seems to be.

And so he writes those findings in his notebook, crossing out his previous theories and expanding on what he knows now. He even makes a small sketch of his hands versus his body, showing that his palms are the magnets.

A cop walks by from below, and Izuku hastily scrambles back so he's not swinging his legs off the side. He's already gotten reprimanded for his rooftop sitting before, even though it's not technically illegal since Ms. Hanako allows him to on the restaurant. And the building is only one story tall, so it's not like anyone can mistake him for a jumper.

Eh. Better safe than sorry.

Tomorrow's Monday, so that means he starts up his training again. Six o'clock in the morning, every weekday. It's a nice schedule, saying as Izuku never sleeps anyway.

He can't wait for what All Might has planned this week.

"Did you know that it takes longer to drown in saltwater than it does in freshwater? It can take anywhere between five to thirty minutes, while drowning in freshwater takes anywhere between five to twenty minutes."

"I did not know that, my boy!"

All Might sounds confused, if a little intrigued. Izuku counts that as a sign to continue.

"And so, theoretically, if I walked straight into the ocean right there and swam out, face down, for as long as I could, I should float pretty far out before finally dying. I think that calls for an experiment, don't you think? I'm curious."

"That doesn't sound so theoretical, Young Midoriya. I must ask that you please step away from the water—"

All Might picks Izuku up easily by his shirt before he can submerge himself into the ocean, and he carries him like a limp rag doll over to the pile of garbage he'd previously been at. The pile of garbage where he's supposed to be dragging a fridge from.

The boy groans as he's carefully dropped onto the pile. "Come on, All Might, anything is more fun than doing this! This is boring."

"Drowning is more fun than training to become stronger?" The man beams at him, hands on his hips in another blinding pose. "I thought you said you wanted to clean this beach up, my boy!"

"Well, yeah, but it's going to take forever without using my quirk!"

All Might doesn't sympathize with him for a second. "I won't allow you to use your quirk for this because that will simply defeat the purpose. First you must get your body strong, and then your mind. Your quirk will be next!"

Why is he making me do this. This is not what I had in mind. Someone run me over.

At least it's something for Izuku to do in the mornings besides stare at the ceiling and contemplate life or create yet another plan to terrorize Tsukauchi. That gets boring pretty quick.

He'd rather be here than be lonely.

"Here, my boy! I'll make this a bit easier for you!" All Might grabs an edge of the fridge and, with one effortless shove, tears it out of the depths of the pile. It falls with a loud thud to the ground, now free from its restraints, and the hero grins at Izuku. "Now you can pull it to the garbage bin!"

Izuku just stands there, briefly wishing that he could've been under the fridge when it fell. All Might made it look so easy, and Izuku had been struggling for at least half an hour trying to dig it out.

In his defense, his wound is still a little bit sore. It's healed over pretty much completely now, leaving behind a deep scar about the size of a golf ball on his abdomen, like he's said before. The scarred tissue won't ever go away.

But hey, that was his first time getting shot with a hollow point. He can add that one to the list of his growing scars.

Izuku stares at the large refrigerator. “Just to reiterate, you want me to move that without my quirk?”

“Yes, my boy! I want to see how you do!”

Car, Izuku thinks, but make it crash. He wants All Might to pick up the fridge again and let it land on him. That sounds a little more tempting with each passing second.

Speaking of All Might, the hero jumps up and lands on top of the fridge, throwing Izuku some ropes to wrap around it. “Well, get to it, my boy! It’s not going to move itself!”

“This isn’t fair,” Izuku gapes, glaring at him. “You’re like half a ton by yourself, and you’re sitting on it!”

“I have to say that I’m enjoying the view, Young Midoriya. You haven’t looked so beaten down since I made you push that car the other day!”

Izuku flushes as the hero takes out his phone and snaps a few pictures. “It didn’t have any tires. It was harder than it looked.” An idea suddenly forms in his head. A dumb, probably shitty idea, but an idea nonetheless. “I bet you can’t move this without using your quirk, All Might.”

It’s a tease just as much as it is a challenge. The hero stands to his full height on top of the fridge and does another pose, causing Izuku to have to physically look away due to the amount of light he emits.

“Just watch, Young Midoriya! I will show you how strong you must become!” And then he slides off, grips the bottom of the fridge with both hands, and throws it up into the air. Izuku can’t help but let out a gasp as the man jumps up a little and kicks it all the way across the sand so it lands right in the dumpster.

Izuku lets himself admire the man for a second—that’s just his physical prowess, he didn’t even use One for All—before turning smug. “Well, now I don’t have to move it, right?”

The boy sees the exact moment All Might realizes what he’s done, as he seems to glitch in place, blinking in surprise. And then he straightens up, grinning sharply. “I’m glad you did that, my boy! I was fearing it was getting to be too easy for you! Why don’t you move on to that other fridge over there?"

He points, and Izuku follows his gaze, only for his jaw to drop to the floor. This freezer looks twice the size of the last one, and it looks like there's a bunch of garbage stuffed inside it. It may not be buried underneath a ton of trash like the last one was, but it looks to be even harder to move simply because of its size and weight.

Izuku pouts and trudges over, trying to mentally hype himself up. They've been out here for a few hours now, and he's tired, so sue him.

"Head up, young man! This training will make you even stronger!"

And for what? I'm too tired from Rabbit as it is, and then I gotta do this every morning. I mean, it's technically my fault, but still.

"You really do need to quit that mumbling."

Izuku jumps, not having heard All Might power down into his smaller form. The boy sighs and starts to wrap the rope around his newest target. He's gonna be here all day, as he knows All Might won't let him leave unless he moves it at least a little bit.

On Mondays and Thursdays they work on heavy lifting, which is what Izuku is doing right now. They take breaks on weekends, and everything in between is something cruel that All Might plans for him on the spot. That's the plan, their schedule.

Izuku likes knowing things. He likes the stability.

The boy would be lying if he said he doesn't get a bit of a thrill by training with the hero. He's gradually getting a little stronger, and besides, he isn't bad company.

He just doesn't know why this is happening. Izuku has a feeling the man doesn't know himself. All Might must have some ulterior motives, some ambitions, but Izuku can't think of any. It's like there's nothing there. He has an idea, but—no. Of course not. The number one hero would never choose him.

Izuku knows that All Might's quirk can be passed down, but there's no way the man is thinking of him as a potential user. He probably has someone in mind already. Someone stronger, more obedient, maybe someone who can move a fridge with ease even without special powers.

Is that a little unfair to say? Maybe. It's not right to get bitter, especially when Izuku knows why something like that can't happen, even if All Might wishes it so.

It's better that way, anyways. For everyone involved.

It's exactly eleven days after the Endeavor incident when he gets the text.

He's taking a short break from All Might's training, just laying on the ground with his shirt over his face to protect him from the light, when his phone buzzes in his pocket.

The glare from the morning sun is bright, and Izuku turns his back towards it so he can read the screen.

Meet me at this address tomorrow at ten.

It's the number that trips him up, not so much the text. He knows who this is, he's just surprised that the man is even texting him at all.

Now, his first thought is wow, he unblocked me. And his second thought is oh fuck, he unblocked me.

Because this sounds like another trap. Does Eraserhead think he's stupid? Izuku is genuinely curious now.

He glances quickly at All Might, who is busy setting up a small area on the sand for them to spar. Sand will make it harder to fight, and Izuku has a feeling that that's the point.

When Izuku will ever have to fight a villain on the beach, or someone with a sand quirk, the boy doesn't know, but it doesn't hurt to be careful, he guesses.

Confident that All Might won't walk up behind him, Izuku texts back with hesitant fingers.

Ooh, a date night? Are you bringing some of your super secret cop buddies?

What he means is do it, I dare you.

He doesn't like how Eraserhead is deciding to text him now, out of the blue. Why not earlier? Why not never?

Tsukauchi has been texting Rabbit a lot this past week. He'd blown up Izuku's phone the night of the whole Endeavor escapade, asking if he was hurt.

Kind of endearing, if Izuku is being honest, but that thought didn't stop him from being annoyed at the detective. Tsukauchi claimed he didn't know about Eraserhead's plan until after it all happened, but Izuku is too pissed to decide whether or not to believe him yet.

Again, he can't be angry. Doesn't have the right to be. He's a criminal, a vigilante. Most people believe that vigilantes are worse than villains simply because they think they can get away with their wrongdoings. They apparently believe they're above the law, same as criminals.

Izuku knows he's not. Knows that he really is a villain—in more ways than one—and deserves to be treated as such. And yet he can't help but feel a bit betrayed.

Detective Tsukauchi was the first one on Rabbit's case when the vigilante first appeared. Izuku had run into him quite a few times in the beginning, if only to ask him questions about his quirk and how it works. He received no such answers then, of course, but Izuku wasn't discouraged. He isn't dumb, he knows the very basic rule of not telling the enemy your secrets—which is why he'd been especially surprised when Eraserhead answered his questions that night after saving that woman.

Though in the hero's defense, Izuku wasn't Rabbit then. He was just a scrawny little kid who helped out a bit with a domestic violence case. And maybe he also stole some files from the police, but hey, they should've considered that his repayment.

But back to the point—it's taken a while for Izuku to trust Tsukauchi. The detective has never sent any heroes after him, not directly, and he's never done anything that Izuku sees as threatening towards him. It's as if, dare he say, that the detective has let him go a few times.

All of that is changing, it seems. Even if Tsukauchi didn't know of his colleague's little trap, he was probably still in contact with him. He was still sharing his notes and probably spilling Rabbit's secrets. So, by default, he must've known that Eraserhead was planning something.

Tsukauchi probably talked with him about it, too, which makes this all worse.

Izuku's grace period is running out. He's going to have to meet up with Eraserhead if he wants any hope of figuring out how to deal with all of this.

So much has happened in the span of less than a month—he met Eraserhead as just Midoriya Izuku, had some trouble with the sludge villain, met All Might, then Small Might, and even met Present Mic.

Oh, and he was also shot by a hollow point bullet. Not a very good experience. Would give it zero stars if he could. Would not recommend.

Tsukauchi, in a sense, cares. At least artificially so. He's shown that he cares. He doesn't just text him now to tell him to turn himself in—though he still does that on occasion, and Izuku never fails in sending him another weird hero meme to get him to fuck off. He texts Rabbit and asks if he's okay, if he's hurt or needs backup or anything, as he promised he'd surely get that help if he requested it, like how Izuku had asked during the warehouse incident.

The detective has the right to text him. Izuku trusts him, maybe not fully, of course, since he still works for the police and wants him to turn himself over, but enough. Eraserhead, on the other hand, does not have the right to text him something like that. For the underground hero to just suddenly up and tell him to meet him on some rooftop at ten at night, with the knowledge of how undesirably their last meeting ended—it doesn't sit right with the boy.

Maybe he'd waited for Izuku to cool off before texting, as dumb as that sounds, or maybe it's something else.

No. I'm not bringing anyone. This is just a talk.

The reply comes instantly, which is a little surprising. And what does he mean by just a talk? Like the first conversation they had after the warehouse incident? Where the talk was more of a do this or else sort of thing?

But that can't be right. Eraserhead promised to help him. Surely he won’t make another threat.

Eraserhead is level-headed. He specializes in manipulation and espionage, so he might be planning something. Izuku has to be careful, as much as he wants to believe him. As much as he wants to build up that trust like the man was saying.

He is still Izuku’s idol. Their relationship as criminal and hero won’t change that. Izuku will make sure it doesn’t.

The boy leaves him on read. He fears no god.

He’ll have to ask Tsukauchi if he can trust the tired hobo man. Only then will he seriously consider the offer.

Kacchan won’t like it, Izuku knows that much. He’ll probably laugh in his face and suggest drop kicking the hero—which Izuku already has, much to his friend’s amusement and the boy’s own mortification.

He did it to escape, sure, but it still makes Izuku feel a little bad.

Hopefully he won’t have to do it again anytime soon.

“My boy, are you ready!” All Might calls to him from inside the makeshift box. “I think we should work on defensive strategies today, what do you say?”

Izuku is already jumping up and running over, leaving his phone sitting on his discarded over-shirt as his energy comes back full force.

Now that, he thinks, sounds like a good distraction.

“I told you before that you can’t just do something like that, Aizawa! He’ll get spooked!”

“Spooked? What is he, a dog?"

Hizashi watches the scene unfold in front of him with wide eyes. His husband has dragged him to the police station for some unspoken reason, and the more of the argument Hizashi is beginning to hear, the more he’s starting to think that he’s only here as a witness so Tsukauchi doesn’t end up flaying Shouta alive.

Because boy does the detective look pissed.

“You can’t just text him some ominous message and expect him to meet you somewhere in the middle of the night! That just screams danger!”

Shouta glares at the detective, not budging an inch from where he’s sitting, arms crossed, at the large oval table in the conference room. The holographic whiteboard is lit up in front of them, not showing anything at this particular moment.

The underground hero rolls his eyes. “I don’t know what else you expected me to do. I told the kid it’s just a talk, and it is. I’m not going to capture him.”

“You wouldn’t be able to even if you tried,” Tsukauchi says, and if Hizashi didn’t know better, he’d say the detective looks almost proud.

Oh, shit, it’s getting real in here.

Shouta throws a hand up in the air. “Really? Whose side are you on?”

Now Hizashi can’t help but snort at that, earning himself a cutting look from his husband and an amused glance from Tsukauchi. Hizashi is enjoying himself now, not at all mad at Shouta anymore for tearing him away from his favorite show. If he gets to sit here and listen to this frankly hilarious convo going on, Hizashi can perhaps forgive him.

“You wanted me to get close to him,” Shouta says, pinching the bridge of his nose, “so that’s what I’m going to do.”

“That’s not how he sees it. He texted me, you know! He still doesn’t know whether or not he can trust you after what you’ve done to him.”

Okay, I’m lost. What the hell are they talking about now.

“How is that my fault? I only did what you wanted me to.”

Tsukauchi looks scandalized. “You set up a trap for him like he’s some kind of rodent! That’s not what I meant when I told you to get him to trust you and then peacefully convince him to turn himself in.”

Rodent. Hizashi hums thoughtfully. “I mean, rabbits are small animals, so that wasn’t a farfetched idea.”

And now both hero and detective whip around to glare at him. “Not helping,” Shouta grumbles, shaking his head.

Hizashi just smirks as his husband continues. He’s cute when he argues.

“And I tried, Tsukauchi. I only set him up so I could get the chance to talk to him. You know how fast he is. I tried to get him to believe me, and it just didn’t work.”

The detective doesn’t look convinced. “Can’t imagine why.”

Oop. Hizashi wants popcorn for this comedy. He has a feeling it’s going to turn into a tragedy soon.

“Tsukauchi,” Shouta sighs.

“Aizawa.”

“Look, I know I fucked up. I know.” The underground hero swipes a hand down his face before sitting up to touch the whiteboard. “I could’ve been nicer when I talked to him after the warehouse fiasco. I scared him off, and now I have to make up for it.”

Images and news articles pop up on the screen, all revolving around a certain green vigilante. Hizashi leans forward and peers at a few of them; he’s only read a few of the ones from when his husband showed him Rabbit’s file that one day, so most of these are new to him.

The kid is apparently young, and he's managed to escape a ton of heroes before, so he must be relatively smart. Hizashi thinks flippantly that he'd make a good hero under different circumstances.

"I'll meet with him tonight. See how it goes. We'll work from there."

"Fine," Tsukauchi finally relents after a long pause. "I trust you won't make this worse again."

And then they leave, just like that, Hizashi giving the detective finger guns as a goodbye before his husband can drag him out completely into the hallway.

The blond doesn't hesitate to pull him in for a kiss once the door closes behind them, never one to pass up a chance to see Shouta flush.

"Hizashi," the man says in warning, pushing him away. His eyes dart around the police station, probably to see if anyone saw.

The voice hero ignores him and starts the walk to the car. "So, want me to come with ya for this talk, just in case?"

He means to keep watch. Maybe to act as backup in case things take a turn for the worse.

Shouta must see where his line of thinking is. "No. Rabbit will know you're there, as he always seems to when I try and tail him. I need him to trust me, and bringing you will do the exact opposite."

Hizashi hums, taking out his set of keys. "What're you gonna do? I don't think talking about the weather is gonna do ya much good."

"I'm gonna let him know that we're on his side. We won't actively try and capture him anymore."

That's unsurprising. It's obvious to Hizashi just in the way his husband talks about the vigilante that he cares for him. The voice hero expected this sooner or later.

"You're such a softie," Hizashi coos as they get in the car. "He's grown on ya, hasn't he? Even in such a short amount of time."

"Shut up."

Hizashi leans over to give him a quick peck on the nose, and this time his husband doesn't pull away.

It's their day off today, and they've decided to go out for a quick breakfast outing, seeing as they didn't have a chance to eat anything this morning. The couple unfortunately never gets to spend quality time together very often. Between Hizashi's three jobs and Shouta's nightly patrols, they have no time to just be together. But that's alright, they both knew that that's how it would be before they even got together.

Doesn't mean they can't complain about it, though.

Hizashi lets his mind wander as he drives, humming a tune in time with the song playing on the radio. Now that he's thinking, he needs to do the laundry again. It's been a couple weeks, and both heroes are starting to run out of clothes—Shouta especially, which is really telling. The man only wears one outfit the entire week, just a plain black shirt and pants that double as his hero costume, much to Hizashi's distaste.

To be fair, it's not really Hizashi's fault that he broke their washer machine. He doesn't even know how it happened, it just did. Now Shouta has been making him go to the laundromat and wash their clothes until they can get a new one.

It'll probably be another couple months before that happens. While money isn't exactly tight, saying as they have five jobs between them, they can't just afford to up and buy a whole new washer machine.

But maybe it's not all bad. He might get to see that green-haired kid again.

The boy's quirky, no pun intended. He shares Hizashi's same dry humor and music, so that's a win in his book. He wouldn't mind talking to him again.

Hell, he needs to actually ask his name so he doesn't keep calling him the kid in his head.

"What are you thinking about?"

Shouta is still looking out the window as he speaks, a foot kicked up on the dash. He does that solely because he knows that it annoys Hizashi. And Hizashi knows that his husband knows that he knows why he does it.

It doesn't exactly make sense, which honestly sums up the entirety of their relationship.

“You know that kid I was telling you about? The one I walked in on getting beat up in that alley?”

Shouta props up another foot on the dash, ignoring Hizashi’s side eye. “The same one you saw at the laundromat?”

“Yep. He’s making me worry a bit. There’s just something about him that I can’t put my finger on.” Hizashi flicks on a blinker to turn into the diner’s plaza. “Hopefully I’ll see him when I do the laundry again.”

“Hopefully not, you mean. He shouldn’t be out that late, ‘Zashi. That usually means something’s wrong.”

Hizashi rolls his eyes at him. “We were both exactly the same around that age, don’t try to act all angelic now. And besides, it’s not like curfew is a big deal.”

“You’re supposed to enforce the law, not encourage people to break it.” Shouta grins suddenly. “It seems we’ve both got delinquents now. It’s time for you to feel my pain.”

The voice hero can’t help but laugh, as he didn’t think of it like that before now. “Well, I don’t think mine is nearly as bad as your two. One of yours is an actual vigilante, Sho.”

“And the other one is going to put Tsukauchi into an early grave.” Shouta thunks his head against the headrest multiple times, groaning. “I have a feeling I’m gonna see more of him, too. Tsukauchi said he’s been too quiet recently.”

“Ah, so he’s the calm before the storm type, huh?” Hizashi ducks away from his husband’s hand with a cackle.

They pull into the parking lot and go in to hopefully enjoy some food. It’ll be a good time to relax, especially when Shouta has to have that meeting with Rabbit tonight. Everyone is high strung nowadays.

But even while eating his soup, he can’t get what Shouta said out of his mind. Hizashi wants to see the kid even more now.

They’re both probably being paranoid, he muses to himself. The kid is most likely fine.

“That usually means something’s wrong.”

And if he’s not, well, Hizashi will get to the bottom of it himself.

Midoriya Izuku is, to put it simply, weird. He's interesting. At least to Toshinori.

The boy has an edge of unknown about him. An edge to his smile and a dark light in his eyes that reminds Toshinori of villains he's faced before.

"I studied your moves and appearances and made the connection."

Toshinori shivers as he remembers what the boy said to him on that roof. There's just no way the kid already knew. He said that he hadn't been sure about his other form, that it had only been a theory, and yet he didn't seem surprised in the slightest when Toshinori unexpectedly deflated.

Though in all fairness he barely reacts to anything as it is, which is mildly disconcerting but not quite to the point of making Toshinori uncomfortable.

It doesn't make sense. Does he have a mind reading quirk? Maybe an analysis quirk? But that can't be right. He has increased strength and speed, and that fact is backed up by his paperwork, so it must be true. That's the power listed under his quirk category—Boost, he calls it. Just another normal enhancement. Nothing about increased intelligence or a mental power.

Toshinori only knows this because he asked Tsukauchi to run Midoriya's name for him. Not out of suspicion, but just because he wanted to know more about his potential successor—ahem, his trainee.

He hadn't been expecting much, so imagine his surprise when he heard that his friend already knows the boy. Very well, in fact. He was even more surprised to hear that his trainee is a bit of a troublemaker.

Midoriya has quite a few charges under his belt, that being multiples cases of public quirk usage, assault, and interference with police and hero work. Nothing too special, as Tsukauchi was adamant about the fact that the boy is not, in fact, a criminal or something of the likes.

According to his friend, Midoriya is very passionate about doing good and maintaining an open personality, and he even went as far as to vouch for the kid.

The green-haired boy is respectful to him, if not a little snarky sometimes, but that's okay. The sass keeps Toshinori on his toes. It kind of reminds him of himself when he was younger.

The point is that he's never done anything that Toshinori would classify as villainous or dangerous.

Which is good, however low that's setting the bar in regards to finding a good successor. Midoriya's character seems honest. He looks like someone Toshinori would want on his side during a battle—and the kid is only fourteen! Had just turned fourteen a couple months ago, in fact. His record says so.

The hero feels a little bad that he missed it, but there's nothing he can do about it now.

Midoriya doesn't seem to have a bad bone in his body, and yet he still manages to set Toshinori on edge sometimes.

Not out of fear, exactly. More out of, well, anticipation. For what, he doesn't know.

The boy is bright and cheerful most days, but in those moments where he's really focusing on a task that Toshinori gave him, he looks different; controlled, determined, a bit perturbed.

He looks almost, as silly as it sounds, like a robot. Like a machine that's been programmed to do everything efficiently and to the upmost standards.

Or maybe the boy is just a perfectionist and Toshinori is looking into things that aren't there.

A part of him can't help but compare Midoriya with his own rival. The boy reminds him of Endeavor's menacing personality, the way the number two hero faces his opponents with an air of malice and animalistic power before completely and utterly destroying everything in his way.

Midoriya has a similar intellect, a similar off-putting aura, but there's an obvious edge to Endeavor's. You know his character just by looking at his face, and that's if the flames hadn't already clued you in.

The boy is more like a mine, hidden from sight until you've already stepped on it. Hidden beneath a sharp smile and slightly feral demeanor that goes against everything Tsukauchi told Toshinori about him—about his comedic personality and the immature-yet-responsible way he carries himself, how he's quiet and reserved when you first meet him, and how quickly the nervousness disappears once he gets used to you.

So Toshinori doesn't mind the sass at all, not if it means that the boy is starting to feel comfortable around him. He doesn't miss the way Midoriya tenses up when he goes in for a pat on the shoulder, or even when he gets a little closer to the boy without warning him first.

That's only natural for a teenager, Toshinori supposes. It should go away soon.

But Midoriya also has bruises on his body, bruises that Toshinori knows damn well he doesn't get from training with him. He isn't blind, nor is he stupid. He may not be the brightest hero there is, but he can recognize warning signs when he sees them.

The teen doesn't answer any of his questions when he asks about them. He also never seems to take off his shirt. Sure, he discards his top whenever he gets a little too sweaty, especially when he's out on the beach, but he always has an undershirt on. Like the day before, when they sparred together. The boy had that black gym shirt on.

Which is fine. If the boy isn't comfortable showing skin, that's okay. It's not like that matters. Toshinori wouldn't have cared about it had the boy not been covered in very worrying bruises everywhere else. But whatever, he won't push him, at least for now. Because something doesn't feel right.

And if Midoriya really is like a mine, that means the danger will start to explode into existence once someone sets him off.

Toshinori doesn't know what danger Midoriya possesses. What he could possibly do if given the chance or permission, and he isn't too keen on finding out at the moment.

He still doesn't know why he's taken an interest in the boy. Maybe it's because of his guilt for saying all of those things to him on their first meeting, or maybe because of his growing sense of urgency due to the fact that Toshinori is getting old and he hasn't picked a successor yet.

But Midoriya says he doesn't want to be a hero. At least, he isn't exactly sure yet.

So why is Toshinori still drawn to him? Why is he willing to waste precious time on a boy who probably wouldn't even accept his quirk if he asked—

Waste. Toshinori frowns to himself as he watches said boy run around the park to increase his stamina. He's sitting on a bench off to the side, just making sure the kid doesn't pass out.

He's not wasting his time. Not at all. He enjoys training with Midoriya. He truly does. More so than he imagined he would when he first suggested it. He finds that watching the boy work and train and grow stronger makes him happy. Happier than he's been in a long time.

It's only been a couple weeks now, but even Tsukauchi is noticing his friend's change. He never stops teasing the hero about it every time he stops by the police station.

Toshinori can only pretend he's annoyed by it.

"The question is for a friend of mine."

Midoriya has never talked about his friends before. It wasn't concerning at first. The boy is busy training, so there really is no reason for him to bring up his personal life.

But now that they're into this, now that Toshinori is getting invested, he wants to know more about him.

He wants to know if the question was really just for a friend.

The feeling is slight, but Toshinori is starting to think that the boy lied to him about that part. It wouldn't make sense, though, as his quirk is just minor enhancements. There would be no reason for anyone to think that he's a villain.

But the more time he spends around the boy, the more he thinks about it. The more he realizes that he can't judge the kid without knowing him, despite his growing suspicions.

He plans to get closer to the boy. Even if he won't end up becoming his successor. He's too smart and powerful for Toshinori to let slip through the cracks. And who knows, maybe he can eventually convince him to be a hero. Maybe.

It's weird, is the thing. The kid is like a magnet. There's something about him, something about his aura, that makes Toshinori drawn to him. But One for All screams at him whenever he gets close, or whenever he so much as thinks about him. Toshinori can't tell if it's a good or bad thing. He's leaning more towards good.

God, he hopes it's good.

Gran Torino would have his ass if he found out about this. His former mentor would most definitely whack him upside the head for being this ignorant and secretive about the new training.

Toshinori doesn't want to tell the retired hero about this. Maybe because he's afraid of what he'll say—that he'll tell Toshinori what a bad idea this is, or how dumb of a choice Midoriya is for his quirk.

He doesn't think he can handle any more negative comments. His mind already does enough of that as it is. He knows that this is probably a bad idea. He knows, damnit.

And yet he just can't bring himself to push the boy away.

He shakes himself away from those thoughts. He has a duty to train Midoriya now, even if he doesn't want to be a hero. Toshinori suggested it, so he's going to keep his word.

"Alright, my boy!" He calls out, inflating into his bigger form. "You can use your quirk now!"

The happy gasp he gets in return gets rid of all his qualms.

"Your costume is dumb."

Izuku turns on his friend, pointing the needle at him threateningly.

“Your face is dumb.”

“You look like a wannabe All Might, nerd.”

“Literally how? It looks nothing like him! And besides, you helped me design this, so doesn’t that make you dumb?”

“Tch, whatever.” Kacchan leans back on his bed with his hands behind his head, eyes narrowed into slits as he watches Izuku work. “It looks dumb on you. It wouldn’t on me.”

Izuku huffs, threading the string expertly through the bullet hole on the costume. “Out of the two people in this room, who is A) being useless, and B) the one that makes little kids cry just by looking at them?”

Kacchan just snorts, lapsing into an annoyed silence.

Huh, that’s weird. He usually would’ve jumped me by now.

Izuku snips off the excess thread and looks at his newly stitched up Rabbit costume. The dark green is still there, along with the red outlines that frame the fabric and make it look sharper, but now the multitude of tears that’s been gathering on the costume has disappeared. The bullet hole has been fixed, along with all the other scrapes.

It looks, in Izuku’s opinion, amazing. He knows Kacchan thinks the same, or else the boy wouldn’t have made such a big deal about it apparently being dumb.

It’s reverse psychology. Izuku is well-versed in his friend’s language after all these years of knowing him.

Izuku is proud of his suit. It looks new, and he can’t wait to put it on tonight to show it off. He has to make a new appearance for himself, especially since he’s decided to go to that meeting with Eraserhead.

This meeting is going to be important, he can feel it. It might be a deciding factor for something, or maybe even the beginning thread for something new. Something great.

If he looks scraggly, it’ll make him look even more stupid than he already is, which will ruin everything. He’s already embarrassed himself in front of the hero before, he won’t do it again.

Izuku clears his throat, putting Auntie's sewing supplies back into her box and sliding it to the side. "My suit is way better than all of your hero costume designs anyway."

He makes sure to say it casually, like it's a fact, as he knows that's a surefire way to get his friend fired up.

He's proved right when Kacchan sits up suddenly, an angry hah? escaping the blond's mouth. "The fuck did you say, Deku?"

Izuku is already throwing open the bedroom door, hoping he can get down the stairs and into the safety zone before it's too late.

He's not quick enough, however, as Kacchan grabs him around the middle and throws him back into the room as if he weighs nothing more than a potato wedge.

Izuku shrieks, scrambling away from his friend. "We can't wrestle, I'm too tired from All Might's training! This isn't fair!"

"All he did was make you run," Kacchan says, grabbing Izuku's ankle and yanking him back with ease. "And you're already good at running, nerd."

Izuku uses the momentum to throw himself on the boy, bringing them both to the ground. He tries to pin the blond to the carpet, but he gets shoved off at the last moment. Now the positions are switched, and Kacchan is busy trying to hold the boy's arm behind his back.

"I feel like that was an insult," Izuku grunts, rolling out from under him.

This is all very practiced to them. They wrestle just about every time they see each other, sometimes with quirks, sometimes without. It's more of a show of strength, at least on the front, but really it's a show of endearment.

Kacchan isn't big on touch, or any kind of affection, really, so Izuku doesn't mind wrestling like this if it means his friend can still be around him without getting uncomfortable.

That doesn't mean Izuku's going to let himself lose, though.

He uses Pull to jerk the other boy off balance, dodging Kacchan's outstretched arms to get behind him. He kicks the back of one of his knees and forces him down to the floor with a hand on his back.

Kacchan sets off a mini explosion to change his direction, twisting to pull Izuku down. In a matter of seconds, Izuku is being put in a chokehold with Kacchan holding him still from behind.

He can’t. If Izuku does, that means Kacchan will gain another point. That’ll put Kacchan in the lead, which means they won’t be even anymore.

“No!”

“Do it, nerd!” The boy increases the force of the hold just slightly; he wouldn’t actually choke Izuku out. They’ve never really hurt each other when doing this before. “Do it, or I’ll—”

There’s a sharp knock on the door, and then Auntie is poking her head in. “Hey, what’s going on in here?”

She pauses, taking in the sight of both boys on the carpeted floor: Izuku wriggling in Kacchan’s grip like a dying fish, Kacchan kneeling behind him with what’s probably a blank expression now that someone has interrupted their wrestling, and then the costume balled up a few feet away from them.

Oh. Double whammy.

She doesn’t seem surprised in the slightest, though, and she doesn’t pay the suit any mind before looking at Izuku with a soft smile. Well, soft for her.

“Izuku, kiddo, are you staying for dinner?”

Oh, right.

The boy forces Kacchan’s arm away from his throat just enough to speak. “Um, I don’t think I—” A knee presses into Izuku’s back, punching a sharp gasp out of him. “Ah, actually, I can. If that’s alright, of course!”

“Nonsense, sweetie. You know you’re always welcome here.” She fixes Kacchan with a fierce look. “Stop that, brat, you obviously won!”

The door closes before Izuku can argue the fact, but Kacchan just lets go with a satisfied smirk. “Now I’m winning.”

“For now.”

“Whatever.” Kacchan says, falling back onto his bed. “And I thought you were planning on spending the night here. Why were you gonna tell the hag no to dinner?”

Izuku looks away, rubbing the back of his neck. “Mm, well, you see—"

“Deku.” His voice is low, and Izuku risks a glance up to see his friend glaring at him. “Don’t tell me you’re actually going to meet up with the shitty hobo ninja.”

And okay, wow, that was quick.

Izuku crosses his arms. “He’s not shitty, Kacchan, and what if I am? I calculated only a forty percent chance that I’ll end up in prison by the time it’s all over.“

The explosive teen scoffs. “You’re a dumbass. Just don’t go crying to me if something bad happens. I don’t want to hear it.”

“Fine, I can respect that.” Izuku throws his Rabbit costume at the boy. “But I’m not playing any stupid video games with you until you admit how great this suit is.”

And so it goes.

By the time Mitsuki calls them down for dinner, they’re back to being even.

The night air is chilly, and the small bursts of wind here and there make Izuku glad his costume has a hood on it. It’s just cold enough to be refreshing, and Izuku relishes in the comforting feeling spreading over his skin as he crouches on the edge of a roof, watching the few adults and teens still out at this time of night.

It’s only a few minutes until ten, so Eraserhead should be here any second. If he even shows up, that is. This could still very well be a trap, although the chances of that are slim since Tsukauchi himself told Izuku that's it not.

He doesn't know why he's still nervous. He shouldn't be. It's apparently just a talk, so he should be fine. He shouldn't be stressing out this much.

Key word, shouldn't. Because he definitely is.

Izuku starts to pace the rooftop. He's on top of a small, family owned cat café, and he really wishes it were open right now so he could go in there and pet all the cats. That sounds much more appealing than having to deal with his current predicament.

Dinner was great. Auntie's cooking is, again, always godly. The boy is happy that even with it not being Thursday the woman still let him over.

He checks his phone after a few minutes and seethes to himself. It's five after. He should be here by now. Doesn't this man care about professionalism?

Izuku knows the man may look homeless and indifferent all the time, but that doesn't mean he's ignorant. He's usually on time when it comes to meetings. His school records say that he's never been late to his classes, both as a student and a teacher.

So why the fuck is he not here—?

"Rabbit?"

His bōstaff is already out and pointed at the speaker before Izuku can truly process what just happened. Because there's no fucking way that Eraserhead managed to sneak up on him from behind for the second time.

That's twice more than anyone else has ever been able to, and it's too much. Izuku had been searching, damn it. He should've felt him long before he even stepped onto this roof.

The realization hits Izuku like a brick: he's the only person who can sneak up on me.

He doesn't know how to feel about that. He doesn't know why it's even possible, and it's not like he can just ask him.

Eraserhead, to his credit, merely blinks at the bōstaff hovering threateningly a few inches away from his throat.

The hero is smart. Izuku would even go so far as to consider him a genius in his own right, so it's entirely possible that he knows that the side pointed at him is also the side where the blade of his katana slides out of.

And yet, instead of moving back or even countering with his own weapon, the man just slowly reaches up with a hand and pushes the metal away from him. "It's nice to see you, too," he deadpans.

Izuku pulls his staff back, still clutching it protectively by his side. He won't put it away. Not yet.

There's too many open variables here. Too many things that could go wrong.

He extends his senses once more to scan for anybody nearby, and he's relieved when he finds that Tsukauchi was telling the truth.

There's no one else here. It's not a trap. He's okay.

"You can relax," Eraserhead says, nodding at the boy's weapon. "I'm not going to try anything."

"Okay." He doesn't put it away, though, just shifts on his feet to appear more comfortable. That's the best the hero is going to get from him.

Eraserhead looks normal, if a little more tired than usual. He probably wants to be here even less than Izuku does, but the boy doesn't let himself feel sympathetic. He's the one who suggested this in the first place, so he can suffer with him.

The hero doesn't make any move to get closer, as he's already only a couple yards away. Too close.

Izuku is yet again struck with sudden anger at himself. Eraserhead is this close to him, a dangerous close, and Izuku didn't notice. Again.

It has to have something to do with his quirk. But nothing about Erasure should allow Izuku not to feel its presence. He can feel it now, of course, and he could feel it the other times before this meeting, too.

So why does it only happen when he's coming up on Izuku? Perhaps it happens subconsciously. Perhaps Eraserhead activates some unknown part of his quirk without realizing it, and the outcome is giving Izuku a fucking heart attack.

“Kid? You alright?”

Oh. He’s been staring into space for too long. Eraserhead is still in the same place, a fact that Izuku is grateful for.

“I’m fine. What did you want to talk about?”

Izuku internally winces at his own sharpness. He doesn’t know why he’s being so straightforward, but Eraserhead doesn’t seem to mind.

His hands plunge into his pockets, the epitome of casualness. “I just wanted to make sure that we’re all on the same page about what’s going to happen next.”

“Oh?” Izuku’s heart jumps in his chest. The chilly air doesn’t feel so comforting anymore. “And what’s that?”

“Nothing.”

And—what? That’s not at all what Izuku expected, but okay.

The boy coughs. “Uh, can you elaborate? I think I lost you there.”

“Nothing is going to happen,” Eraserhead repeats. “Meaning that I, along with Tsukauchi, will not attempt to capture you or bring you in anymore.”

He doesn’t get a reply, not that he expected one. It’s not Eraserhead’s fault that Izuku is a Grade A dumbass.

“Wait, so you’re going to just... let me go?"

“In essence, yes.”

It’s the first part that garners Izuku’s attention. The boy narrows his eyes. “What do you mean by that?”

Fuck. Izuku isn’t good with conditions. With any sort of debt, honestly. Those never usually end well for both parties.

Eraserhead must sense his hesitation, as he continues gruffly. “It’s nothing bad. I’m just asking that you continue to meet me here once every week, same time.”

And that throws Izuku a little off guard. He was expecting to have to promise something, or to do something for the man like help on some of his missions—not this.

It seems this discussion is full of surprises.

Izuku slides his bōstaff back into the holster on his back. “Why?”

It always comes back to that. Why is he doing this. Why does he care. Why is he even bothering with making a deal with Izuku.

Eraserhead doesn’t care about vigilantes. He doesn’t even try to capture them most of the time, so what makes Izuku so different?

“I just want to make sure you won’t end up dead, or worse,” Eraserhead says. “There’s no secret intentions behind it, kid. It’s for me and Tsukauchi to keep track of your wellbeing, that’s all.”

Wellbeing. As if he cares.

A cricket chirps nearby, prompting Izuku to speak. “And if I say no?”

There’s a slight pause. It’s obvious that both are remembering their first conversation. The first time Izuku asked that.

Eraserhead lifts a shoulder in a careless shrug. “Nothing.”

Oh.

Izuku searches the man’s face for any sign of dishonesty, and, after not finding anything, he nods once. “Okay.” At Eraserhead’s blank stare, he adds, “I’ll do it. What day do you want it to be?”

Eraserhead raises his brows in slight surprise, but otherwise his face remains unchanged. “It doesn’t matter to me. Thursdays would be better, however—"

“I can’t do Thursday!” Izuku flushes at the sudden scrutinous look he gets in response. “I—I have stuff to do on that day. I won’t be able to make it.”

He goes to Kacchan’s on Thursdays. Sure, he might not spend the night there every time he comes over, like today, for example, but it’s better safe than sorry. He wouldn't want to have to sneak out of the house.

"Fine. How about Fridays?"

"That's good." Izuku says, frowning suddenly from beneath his mask. "Uh, what if I can't make it one night? Like, what do I do?"

Eraserhead seems prepared for this question, as he straightens up a little to his full height. Izuku is once again reminded of how tall the man is. "I know you won't be able to make it every night. You have a life too, and stuff happens. So if you can't, for whatever reason, just text me."

Okay. That's easier than he thought. So he's not completely trapped. He still has his freedom.

"Alright. Is there, uh, anything else you wanted to discuss?"

Eraserhead squints at him. "Only the obvious. I'm sure you know that just because I'm not going to capture you doesn't mean that everyone else will start doing the same."

"'Course," Izuku nods. He's not that dumb, after all. "So, is that it?"

"Seems that way. I have to finish my patrol, kid, so I'll see you this Friday, same place and time, alright?"

"Yeah. I can do that." After a pregnant pause, Izuku bows quickly. "Thank you, Eraserhead. Really."

"Sure, Rabbit." The man just dips his head in goodbye and turns around to leave.

The wind starts to pick up again, and Izuku really does wince this time as he catches sight of the end of the hero's capture weapon flapping slightly. It looks like somebody hacked some of it off, and speaking of —

"Hey! Wait!" Izuku rushes forward, hands digging in his pockets until he finds what he's looking for. He pushes the small piece of fabric into the man's chest before stepping away quickly. "Uh, sorry for cutting it. I know it must be expensive to get it fixed."

Eraserhead gives him another one of those indiscernible looks before replying, voice edged with amusement, "It's alright. I have to do it sometimes myself to get out of certain situations."

He continues on, as if he didn't just drop a major bombshell on the analysis part of Izuku's brain. Because what. Why hasn't he thought of that?

Of course! The man's capture weapon aids him in a lot of his fights, but it can also serve as a huge disadvantage if a villain uses it for themself or if the hero gets stuck on something.

Brilliant, Izuku thinks. He has to add that into his notebook when he gets a chance.

"Oh, and by the way." Eraserhead throws him a glance over the shoulder, a smirk tugging at his lips. "That mural you painted of me was really something, kid. You've got some talent, I'll give you that."

Izuku laughs at the unexpectedness of the comment, and he watches Eraserhead leave with a funny feeling blooming in his chest.

Because alright, maybe, just maybe, things won't be so bad.

Before Izuku knows it, a little over a month goes by.

The pile on Dagobah Beach has been growing smaller and smaller over the days, even in the short amount of time he's been working on it. All Might told Izuku that he's being a little too quick with it, that he needs to slow down if he wants to keep building muscle and stamina over time.

Izuku takes the too quick part as a compliment, even though the only reason he's been able to move everything so quickly is because All Might has been letting him use Boost for certain things now.

Together they came up with a change of plan. So now, instead of spending an hour on it every morning, Izuku will only spend thirty minutes cleaning it up. The extra time gives them more opportunities to try new training regimes and exercises.

New training is code for more hell.

But the good kind of hell. Is it bad to say that Izuku enjoys it? Training his body like this feels good. He's always been a bit fit, of course, but not like this. It hasn't been long, but he can feel the difference.

Especially during his patrols. His stamina is even better than it was, and he can lift fifty pounds more even without his enhancements.

The only downside is that now that he's burning more energy—not just on patrols anymore—he's starting to get hungry.

Incredibly hungry. He doesn't eat a lot as it is, so he's used to surviving off a little less than what he should be, but now he feels like he's starving.

He goes over to the Bakugou's more often now, and he knows they don't mind, but it still makes him guilty. On the weekends he goes to the pizzeria to help cook and clean, as Ms. Hanako lets him eat whatever he wants on the job—she tries to feed him for free even when he's not working, but Izuku won't have that.

He has to earn food. The family struggles as it is, he shouldn't take anything of theirs without some form of repayment.

And one morning at the park, All Might seems to notice his struggles as well.

Izuku is busy balancing on a bench with his eyes closed, one hand being used to keep himself up, when the hero comes up to him in his smaller form, voice edged with concern.

"You look a little pale there, my boy, are you sure you're alright?"

Izuku, still upside-down with his feet straight in the air, tries for a laugh. "I mean this is kinda difficult, it's taking a lot of focus—"

"You've looked like that all week. It can't possibly be from today's training."

What he means is that's the dumbest excuse I've ever heard.

Izuku can't really form a good response when he's balancing like this, so he instead shakes his free hand in what's hopefully an I don't know, then gesture and purses his lips to pretend like he's concentrating.

He can feel the hero's gaze on him. It's disconcerting.

"Have you been eating enough?"

Izuku's eyes fly open, and the jolt that goes through his body is enough to have him tumbling off the bench and falling onto the sidewalk.

He lays there for a moment and briefly wonders if it's possible to ask whatever god that exists up above to strike him down, only for his world to sway as Small Might carefully picks him up by the back of his shirt and sets him on his feet.

The man is close to him now, close enough to have to crane his neck to peer down at him. Even as Small Might, he's the same height as his hero form.

"I can't help but notice that you've gotten a little lighter, even while gaining muscle." His brows scrunch together. "You are following the meal plan, right?"

If it were any other time, and probably any other person asking this question, Izuku would have said something like so you think I'm skinny? But Small Might doesn't seem to be in the mood for jokes, and Izuku doesn't think changing the subject will do him any good right now.

He doesn't like the way the man is staring at him. It makes him feel like a bug under a microscope, and he doesn't like it one bit.

He's—he's eating, okay? Maybe not a lot, and maybe not nearly enough, but he's eating. He's eating more than he was before he started the training with All Might, and his nonexistent wallet has surely been feeling the toll.

He's trying, is the thing. But it's not like he can tell the man that. He can't be a burden to the number one hero, just can't. The man has other things to worry about. To care about.

Izuku crosses his arms to hide how his hands have started trembling and kicks at the dirt, looking anywhere but at the hero in front of him. "I am following it." Lies. All lies. He hates himself for deceiving his idol, and yet there's no other way to get out of this without creating more problems. "I just—I forget to eat sometimes, you know? With everything going on, it's hard to stay on track, that's all."

With everything going on.

Izuku hopes the man will latch onto that piece of information and leave him alone. That he'll ponder on that instead of the situation at hand and hopefully miss the fact that Izuku is lying to him.

The boy hates manipulating people. Hates planting bombs in his sentences and playing with people's minds, and yet he never stops. Here he is, using one of his many methods of manipulation on a man he never thought he'd dare try any of them on.

It seems to work, though.

After what feels like a while but could've only been ten seconds, Small Might sighs. "I feared so."

Izuku chances a glance back up, expecting to see disappointment or maybe even anger on the man's face, but is instead met with the familiar sight of Small Might transforming into All Might.

"Which is why I brought sandwiches!"

And huh? Izuku is sure he's misheard him.

All Might suddenly jumps onto the bench and then leaps onto a nearby tree, proceeding to pull a whole fucking cooler out of the branches.

Izuku can only watch in mild confusion and a little bit of fear as All Might drops back down and carries the cooler over to a small patch of grass, waving at the boy to follow him.

He does so hesitantly. "Was that there the whole time?"

"Indeed it was!" All Might says cheerfully, taking out a blanket from god knows where and spreading it across the ground. "I figured having a break at the park would be nice, saying as you haven't rested since we first started!"

"But I take breaks on the weekends—"

"And you can take another break today, my boy! A day off won't hurt!" All Might plops down and begins to take out bags of food. "Well? I can't eat all this myself."

You probably could, Izuku thinks, but holds his tongue.

While All Might doesn't have an enhanced metabolism like he does, he still needs to eat a lot to keep up with the energy he uses while maintaining his bigger form.

"Ham or turkey?" The number one hero asks, as if this is fucking normal.

Izuku glances around, trying to see if anybody's looking. "Uh, All Might, won't someone see you? We're in the public park."

"I'm used to publicity, Young Midoriya! But I guess it is better if I don't attract attention this time." A puff of smoke surrounds him for a moment before revealing his natural form. "I don't think you'd want your face to be plastered on the news, right?"

Oh hell no. That's the worse thing that could happen. His father could see it, and that wouldn't end well for anyone involved.

Izuku laughs nervously. "Yeah, I'd rather that didn't happen."

"Understandable," Small Might says. He then hands Izuku a few plastic baggies with sandwiches in them, passing him some chips as well. “I made these in a rush this morning, so forgive me if they’re not the best.”

Izuku’s eyes bug out a little as he takes in just how many sandwiches the man made. There must be, what, thirty? And he just gave Izuku ten—why the hell does he have so much?

“No, no!” Izuku rushes to say. “I’m sure they’re great, but why did you make so many?”

“Well, I figured you would take the remaining with you. I know we both have big appetites.”

He thought about me this morning?

The hero made this much with the intention of giving him the leftovers. Izuku doesn’t know how to process that information.

Izuku takes a bite out of one of the sandwiches, almost choking as he realizes just how fucking great it tastes. Like actually.

It’s not just because Izuku is practically starving at the moment—the food the hero put together actually tastes good.

And Izuku says as much, which causes the man to chuckle a bit as he thanks him.

The boy is equal parts relieved and nervous. The discussion on his eating habits has stopped, at least for now. There’s no telling when All Might will bring it up again.

Izuku places a few chips inside one of his sandwiches to give it a crunchy texture, and he grins at the hero in front of him. “Thank you for this! Everything is delicious!”

Small Might flashes him a smile, eyes crinkling. “Of course. It isn’t often I get to have a picnic like this. It truly is a nice day out, isn’t it?”

Picnic. The word sounds foreign to him, even though he knows, logically, what it is. Izuku has never had one before.

“It is,” Izuku agrees, because there’s nothing else he can say to that. There’s a warm feeling building in his stomach now, and he feels himself start to smile alongside the hero.

There’s a few birds singing a song near them, perched on the bench Izuku was on just a few minutes prior. The boy tears off some bread and throws it at them, giggling when he sees more birds fly over to feast on the food.

He glances at Small Might, who's watching the scene as well with amusement.

He must feel his gaze, as he turns back around and starts on another sandwich. "Tell me a little about you, Young Midoriya. I don't think I've asked you before, which is kind of rude on my part."

Izuku doesn't know what compels him to listen, but he does.

He talks.

He tells him what he can, tells him about Kacchan and Ms. Hanako and his thoughts and analyses on the latest heroes, and the number one eagerly chips in at different times.

It looks like he's actually interested in what Izuku has to say, which only spurs the boy's rambling on even further. No one likes to hear him talk like this—the only person who tolerates it is Kacchan, and even then he playfully insults him about it.

But All Might doesn't. He listens, and when Izuku is done he allows the boy a snippet of his own life outside of his hero career.

So in the end, it's safe to say that Izuku enjoys the first picnic he's ever had.

Present Mic is cool when he's on duty and when he's off, Izuku finds.

He'd guessed that in the beginning, of course, when Yamada saved him from those bullies in the alley, but it's nice to have his theory supported even further.

The man comes into the laundromat Izuku goes to once every other week. Something must have happened to his washer or dryer, the boy thinks, as he never used to see him here a few weeks ago.

Yamada arrives at the laundromat at the same ungodly hour as the previous two times, and if Izuku didn't know better, he'd say that the man is doing it because he knows Izuku goes at that time.

The boy does his laundry every week instead of every other week like normal people—don't judge him, okay, most heroes have multiples of their costumes, he can't afford to have any more than one—so he only sees the voice hero half the time.

He likes to talk with the man and just be there with him. Yamada is funny and nice, and his quirk is bubbly, as weird as it sounds.

It feels soft, and Izuku likes it.

The third time Present Mic comes to the laundromat, hands full with his basket of clothes and laundry detergent, he brings snacks.

Izuku isn't quite ready for it when Yamada suddenly hands him a couple Slim Jims while he's writing in his notebook.

The boy flushes, waving his hands in front of him as he pops his earbuds out so as not to be rude. "Ah, no thank you! I wouldn't want to—"

"It's alright, kiddo, really." Yamada practically drops them onto his lap and turns back to his own snack: a bag of goldfish. "I don't like those anyway. I'd much rather someone else have them so I won't have to throw 'em out, ya dig?"

No, the more logical, no-bullshit part of Izuku's brain says, you saw me eating a Slim Jim the first time you saw me here. You probably went out and bought me some before you came, as you arrived ten minutes later than your usual time.

The gullible, sadder part of his brain says that the man did in fact just give it to him because he didn't want it, and not because he actually went out of his way to buy him some food.

And also, what's with the heroes he knows trying to feed him stuff nowadays? First it was All Might, now Present Mic—who's next, Eraserhead?

Hopefully he didn't just jinx it. Well, hopefully he did. He wants to know what the man would even offer him as food, as Izuku doesn't think he's even seen the man eat during one of their meetings.

But Izuku doesn't say any of that to the voice hero. He just concedes with a quick dip of his head and carefully starts to unwrap one of the Slim Jims, putting one earbud back in like he's done all the other times.

Yamada munches on his goldfish, tapping his foot to an imaginary song.

It's familiar and comfortable. The one laundromat worker that's present at this time is busy sleeping at their desk, and Izuku doesn't blame them. He would be too if he had to be here at this time of night and oversee literally two people and what Izuku swears is a ghost in the front corner.

Izuku is adding more onto his Present Mic page when the man glances over at him, still eating his goldfish.

"Oh, is that me?" He looks excited, almost giddy.

And no, Izuku wants to say, it's not. It's just your doppelgänger who shares the same name and hero costume as you, but Izuku doesn't say it. He's only a bitch on the inside. He actually tries to be nice to people, contrary to popular belief, especially his idols. He wants to be nice. His mind is just an ass, that's all.

"Uh, yeah," Izuku says, his cheeks turning a dark red.

What if he finds it stalkerish? Or weird? It's not normal for someone to take notes on actual people, after all. That's a therapist's job. Or, if Izuku is willing to go deeper down the rabbit hole, a villain's job.

"That sketch is really good, kiddo! You captured my support gear really well!" Yamada turns to face him fully, and Izuku has to force himself not to shrink back at the attention. "Where did you learn to draw like that?"

"Oh! I picked up some tips from videos online. I had to have some basis of anatomy if I wanted to sketch heroes and stuff."

It's not a lie.

Yamada doesn't seem alarmed by this in the slightest. He just smiles wider. "Well it's great! I'm glad to have another artist to talk to."

He's an artist? Another thing to add to the notebook! And while he's here —

"Um, Yamada, I actually have a question about your support gear."

"Shoot! I'm all ears."

Thinking it would be better to just show the man instead of asking, Izuku hastily gives the man the notebook and points to a certain paragraph, pulling back quickly afterwards. "I was wondering if you could fact check this for me? I mean, it is about you."

"Oh, wow," Yamada marvels, eyes skimming over the two pages filled to the brim with notes and small sketches. "You wrote all this?"

Izuku just nods, not having the heart to tell the man that there's actually four more pages dedicated to him right after these two.

"The speakers on my neck actually help control the direction, not so much the output," he corrects kindly after he's read both pages. "I honestly have no say on where I want to direct the sound without them. The only thing I can control by myself is how loud I make it."

"Oh, that makes more sense! I was thinking that, thank you!"

"I'm impressed, though! That's some detailed work you got there." Yamada's washer beeps a few feet away, and he gets up and gives the boy a gentle punch to the shoulder. "You'd be a good hero with that kind of brain, kiddo!"

And Izuku is frozen, his mind coming to a screeching halt. You'd be a good hero. The touch on his shoulder has left but the feeling stays.

It's not good, but it's not bad either. Izuku will give the feeling a seven out of ten. He thinks faintly that he wouldn't mind it if Yamada did it again.

And that brings up the other thing. Izuku told the voice hero his name during their second meeting, but he has a feeling he's forgotten it since he never calls him by it. It's always little listener or kiddo or some variation of the sort. Izuku doesn't mind. It's endearing, and if he can pretend that the voice hero cares, than that's enough for him.

Besides, Yamada calls all of his fans listeners. It's not like he's special.

He gives the man another glance when he comes back, a thought suddenly popping into his head. “Do you have cats?”

“Why do you ask, kiddo?”

He doesn’t sound suspicious or taken aback, just curious, so Izuku doesn’t know why he gets so nervous. He fiddles with his pen before gesturing at the man’s clothing. “It’s just, uh, the hair on your shirt. It’s too thin to be from a dog, and you always have some on your clothes when you come here, so I just assumed you did, but obviously you might not so that’s why I—”

Yamada, thankfully, cuts off his rambling before he can make a fool of himself. “I have three cats, actually! Here, I’ll show you.”

It turns out that the man has a lot of pictures of his cats. He has five albums dedicated to them, to be exact, and Izuku leans over a bit to see them better.

The first picture he shows is of a fluffy gray cat that Yamada says is named Pickles because of her green eyes. The other two are both short-hairs, and one is a calico called Meatball while the other is a light brown tabby by the name of Sushi.

Izuku falls in love immediately.

He’s a sucker for animals. For cats, especially, since they remind him of Kacchan: prickly and angry on the outside, warm and cuddly on the inside.

But what gains his attention is their names. “Why are they all named after—?”

“Food?” Yamada interrupts with a knowing look. “I honestly can’t tell ya, listener. I only named Pickles. My partner chose the other two.”

Partner, huh? Izuku doesn’t ask, though he really wants to. He has an idea who the man might be talking about, but it’s really not his place to speculate.

Izuku is still stuck on the cats. He doesn’t complain when Yamada shows him even more pictures. The more he looks, the more he wants one.

They’re low maintenance, and they’re apparently a little easier to handle than dogs. Maybe he can convince Kacchan to get one so he can visit it when he comes over.

Or maybe Izuku can just get a cat. He may not be responsible enough to feed himself, but he can definitely take care of another creature. A cat would be a good companion.

But then he remembers what he does for a living, and that thought goes down the drain.

Okay, so maybe a pet is a bad idea.

The first official meeting with Eraserhead was awkward. At least for Izuku; he doesn't think the hero is *capabl*e of being awkward.

And every time they meet he still gets spooked by Eraserhead. Every goddamn time, in fact. He doesn't know why, but that doesn't mean he's going to stop trying. Izuku still jumps, he's just gotten a little better at hiding how much it affects him.

It's their fifth meeting, however, when the dynamic changes.

Izuku is sitting there, brows scrunched as he tries to feel for the man's quirk as he's started doing all the other times, when something sounds from behind him.

A scuff of the foot. Casual and light amidst the soft whirring of the wind and the sounds of the city bustling below.

The footsteps are familiar, but only in theory. He knows who it belongs to, but it still sounds wrong. Because Eraserhead doesn't make any sound when he walks. Just like Izuku, they've both been trained in stealth. You can't hear them unless they want you to hear them.

And Izuku can hear him this time. He still couldn't feel his quirk a few moments before, but he hears him. He didn't get spooked.

This makes Izuku frown, and he turns to face Eraserhead before the underground hero can even speak.

“You did that on purpose.”

The man blinks at him, not bothering with a reply. And okay, Izuku figures, maybe he is being a bit cryptic.

“Your shoes,” he elaborates, glaring at Eraserhead as if he’s wronged him somehow. “You made sure I could hear you.”

“Figured you wouldn’t jump this time. I was right.”

This bitch.

The man continues walking closer and sits a few feet away, hanging his legs over the side of the roof. “If it truly bothers you so much I won’t do it next time.”

Izuku tenses. “No, wait—”

He doesn’t miss the hero’s small smirk as he hurries to correct himself.

The next time he sees Eraserhead after that, he’s just Midoriya Izuku.

He’s walking home from the library late at night, as usual, a few books on Japanese Sign Language tucked under his arm, when he hears commotion up ahead.

Great. Another mugging.

This one will hopefully go quick. He’s stopped so many thieves before that it’s almost like second nature to him now.

He places his books carefully on the sidewalk before strolling up and taking in the situation.

A younger man, probably only in his early thirties, is being backed up against a wall with his hands in the air. “Please, I don’t have anything,

I swear! I would've given it to you by now if I did!"

The robber looks to have a mutant type quirk, so Izuku doesn't have to worry about anything. The pointed ears on the man won't do him any harm. "Shaddup and hand me your wallet."

"But—but you told me to keep my hands up, how can I—"

"Do it, or else!"

The man is crying now. "Please, I can't!"

Izuku kind of wants to find out what or else entails, but then he sees the gun being pulled from the criminal's waistband, and that's when he thinks oh, so that's what that bulge was. And here I was thinking the man was packing.

Almost lazily, Izuku raises a palm and slips into the criminal's view. It's dark, he can barely see a thing—which means they won't be able to tell what's happening either. He can use whatever quirk he wants.

Izuku yanks the gun out of the mugger's hand and catches it by the barrel, swiftly jabbing the man in the temple. And like a rock, he's down for the count.

Well. That was easy. And kind of pathetic.

Izuku steps over the criminal and picks up the discarded wallet on the ground. "Hey, dude, you dropped your—"

He's talking to thin air, as when he turns back around the victim is gone. Fuck.

Yep. Izuku really is out of it if he didn't even hear the dude leaving. That just makes his job much worse.

Peeking through the wallet, he sighs. There's only a few bills in there. The person is obviously not very rich, so he won't take anything. The man looks like he probably needs every bit of it. It would be wrong of Izuku to steal it. Especially after fighting for it not to be stolen.

The only logical thing to do is take it to the police. Well, he was already gonna have to do that, saying as he now has a very unconscious criminal on the ground and a dead phone. Usually Izuku just calls Tsukauchi or the police and tells him where the criminal is, but now he can't. And he's sure as hell not wasting his money on a pay phone.

He can't just leave him there; there's no telling what other crimes he'll commit once he wakes up. So he guesses he'll just have to make the five minute walk to the nearest police station.

This is just fantastic, Izuku thinks, hauling the man up over his shoulder—Jesus Christ what does this man eat, he weighs a fucking ton—and grabbing the gun off the ground. He'll set his books on the man's back in hopes that they'll stay there during the duration of the trip.

He was planning on just going home, charging his phone with his solar powered battery, and then reading all of the JSL training books, but of course things don't go his way.

Present Mic has recently revealed to him that he's actually hard of hearing, same as Kacchan is. It seems having quirks that are loud have their disadvantages on both sides. Now, Izuku already knows a little bit of sign language, courtesy of his friend, but now he has even more of a reason to get fluent in it.

And besides, his brain is telling him that if he doesn't perfect the language tonight, he's going to die a very terrible death. He doesn't have the will to argue with himself on how illogical that is and instead becomes resigned to the toxic inner thoughts of his mind.

Izuku smushes his face onto the glass doors of the police station and lets out an evil laugh at the short scream he gets in return. The receptionist hurriedly opens the doors, helping him inside since he does have a criminal on his back.

"Midoriya," the lady starts, sounding both tired and expectant at the same time. "What the hell is that."

He grins. "A body."

"Yeah, I can see that, but what are you—oh good lord." She cuts herself off as Izuku drops the man onto the floor without a care in the world. "Another mugger?"

Izuku nods. "He had a gun."

"What do you get yourself into, sugar? This is the second time you've brought someone in like this." She takes the weapon and wallet from his outstretched hands, beckoning him further inside and away from the would-be-mugger. “Hold on a sec, I’ll call some guards.”

And so Izuku hops up onto the front desk, swinging his legs and popping two of the take only one lollipops into his mouth as he waits.

Might as well get a start on that reading, huh?

Not long after, though, there’s multiple voices coming from the hallway, and then two officers are jogging forward with handcuffs in their hands. They immediately kneel down and check his health, before moving him to stand upright.

It seems the guy is waking up ever so slowly. Izuku didn’t hit him that hard, after all. He’s not cruel.

The next person out of the hallway is Detective Tsukauchi himself, followed by—is that Eraserhead?

Fuck. This is awkward. Izuku met with him not even a few nights ago, and while the man doesn’t really know him as Midoriya Izuku, only as Rabbit, it’s still nerve-racking to be near him. Because what if he finds out.

The detective only shoots him a look before heading for the officers, a tablet in his hand.

Uh-oh.

“Nope,” the female officer reports. “Just a little sore spot on his temple, probably from when he was knocked out. No other injuries that we can see.”

The other officer, who’s busy holding the criminal up with both of his large arms, cuts in. “We’ve been looking for this guy. Has three other incidents on his record, and his poster is actually on the wall over there.”

Izuku looks and sees that the criminal’s ugly face is in fact on the wall. Hm. Maybe he should’ve injured him a bit more, as he’s also listed as a pedophile on the poster.

The first officer speaks again. “He’s been robbing people and threatening them with a gun, which we now have as evidence.”

Izuku watches the detective nod at the officers before turning to the criminal, who's now starting to blink his eyes open. "You, sir, will be going to prison for a long time after a very lengthy trial. I'm sure you'll be very comfy there." He says something else to the cops, and then the criminal is being dragged away, probably into a holding cell before they can conduct an interrogation.

The boy hums around a mouthful of treats. "That was satisfying."

"And you."

Izuku squeaks as the detective's fiery gaze turns to him, and he can't help but smile nervously when the man starts to tap his foot. The boy sees Eraserhead glance between them a few times at the corner of his eye, and he swears he hears the hero mumble an I knew it under his breath.

"You've been quiet for too long, I should've known you'd do something reckless. Again with the martyr complex, son. We've been over this." He sounds done with this conversation. Izuku kind of is too, but the lollipops are giving him some extra energy. "You can't keep putting yourself in danger like this. You don't know what he could've had—in terms of both quirks and weapons."

Izuku crosses his arms petulantly, one of the JSL books still spread out over his lap. "I disarmed him, though, and he has a mutant quirk. 'S not dangerous to me at all."

His voice is kind of garbled due to the sweets, but he knows Tsukauchi can understand him.

"Tell that to his other three victims, one of whom got shot in the foot."

And okay, that makes Izuku wince. He didn't mean to sound insensitive.

"And also." The detective lifts up the tablet to show him something, one hand placed on his hip. "Care to tell me what you're doing in this video?"

And Izuku frowns, leaning forward on the desk to see because what can he possibly be talking about now? What video? He stares at the screen, confused now, because this looks like a bird's eye view of the inside of a mall. He can see people walking around with different bags in their hands, as if they've just got done shopping and are going for more goodies. There are multiple stores on the corners with banners on the walls. He can see a fountain in the middle of the scenery, and—

Oh. The fountain.

Izuku wants the ground to swallow him up and never let him out as he watches screen-Izuku jump into the fountain and then slip on his way out of it. It's pretty clear when this footage was taken. This is from a couple months back when he went to the mall with Kacchan. His friend doesn't show up on the screen, and Izuku is incredibly thankful for that. The last thing he needs is for the blond to get in trouble because of him.

He tears his gaze away from the tablet to look back up at the detective. "Uh, that's not me."

"That's not you? Really?" The man magnifies the footage to focus on the green mess that is Izuku's hair, and also on those familiar red shoes he always wears. "Watch it again, son."

Eraserhead moves a bit to watch it alongside Izuku, causing the boy to want to curl up and die even more. Great, now he's embarrassing himself yet again in front of the underground hero.

As if the flash drive incident wasn't bad enough, now he's got this to think about at three in the morning when he's pretending to sleep.

It's not fair that the camera quality is actually really good, too. Izuku thinks it should be illegal for mall footage to be this clear. It's clearer than his skin, for fuck's sake. This should not be happening.

"I mean, that could be me," Izuku starts slowly. "But since you don't have any concrete evidence..."

Tsukauchi looks like he needs a shot of tequila. "I can't with you right now. Just can't."

Eraserhead takes another look at the screen, then shifts his gaze to Izuku, his face giving nothing away.

The detective starts to rant again, but Izuku barely hears him. He's busy weighing the pros and cons of slapping a pro hero. He wants to slap Eraserhead, just for fun. Just to see what he'll do.

Will he kill him? No, that's too dramatic, and also kind of illegal. He might arrest him, or—no, not that either. It's more likely that the man will just make it his personal mission to make Izuku's life a living hell.

And that thought sounds kind of festive. Hm. He wonders if Eraserhead is the type to just come to terms with Izuku's chaos, like Tsukauchi has, or if he'll shut it down quickly. Or maybe he'll create his own chaos. That'd be fun.

"Are you even listening to me, Midoriya?"

Oh, he should be paying attention to the probably spectacular lecture that the detective is giving him right now, if the incessant hand movements are anything to go by. "Not really."

"For the love of—" Tsukauchi cuts himself off with a sigh, pinching the bridge of his nose. "I can't wait until my shift is over. I need a drink."

"Drinking isn't healthy for you. You told me that once."

The detective shakes his head. "I won't charge you for this, Midoriya, so you're free to go. Thank you for taking in that criminal and turning in the wallet, but I think you should head home now. And please stay there for the rest of the night. I trust you can get back without an escort this time."

Izuku hops off the desk and gives the man a horribly inaccurate salute. "Yessir!"

He gives a brief bow to Eraserhead and then starts to run, limbs burning as he uses the energy the lollipops gave him to rush out of the door, not wanting to test Tsukauchi's patience lest the man changes his mind. He ignores the and stop using your quirk! that comes from behind him, choosing to instead run even faster.

He loves annoying Tsukauchi. Either as Rabbit or as Midoriya Izuku, that's just what brings him the most joy in life.

In fact, pissing people off in general is why he's still alive and kicking. Spite is a very good motivator.

But in Izuku's defense, the fountain incident was almost two months ago. It would be unfair to punish him for it now, which is probably why Tsukauchi let him off the hook.

Besides, it's not technically illegal. Izuku doesn't break every law, thank you.

Just a few of them. No biggie.

Izuku has a tendency to notice every little detail. He magnifies small nuances into major things, largely because small nuances can quickly become breaking points for strangers and villains.

When he's going undercover, or when he's trying to sneak in somewhere for a job, he has to be careful. He has to be able to see.

He's learned how to manage moods and read the room. He can perceive danger in just the order of words that people say. He can read body language and see what other people usually can't—or, won't. This is all a natural outgrowth of him trying to stay alive during his missions and encounters with strangers on the streets.

It's not that everyone else is oblivious, no, of course not. Izuku isn't that naïve. It's more that he has to be like this. It's just that this habit of his is what keeps him alive. This attention to detail that has made him over analyze minor nuances to the extent that it gives him much more anxiety than he would have otherwise—it's kind of like a safety net.

It prevents certain events from happening, and under the worst case scenario where something bad happens anyway, it helps to handle those issues and stop the situation from escalating.

So, in short, Izuku stays alive solely because he can see.

This ability of his also allows him to draw many different conclusions and patterns from events that he's witnessed even the first time around.

Izuku sees things in high definition, and sometimes he sees things that he'd rather not. He can notice and create patterns simply by watching and listening—a skill that has helped him grow into the successful vigilante he is today.

Well, that last part is debatable, but whatever.

Right now, sitting in the library and chewing on his pen, he's noticed another pattern. Though this time he can't really see the advantage from pointing this one out to himself. There's no villain he can use it against, no question he can avoid. It's just kind of sitting there, weighing at the back of his mind like a pile of bricks over wet cardboard.

It'll fall eventually, maybe even sooner rather than later, and Izuku will start to spiral into that awful feeling he gets when he doesn't understand something. When he doesn't know why things are happening.

It seems that the newest adults in his life have been doing similar things to him without Izuku realizing it. They've been joking and conversing with him, either making small talk or just being a genuinely good person around him, and he doesn't mind that, obviously. That's normal, that's polite, that's decent, and that's not why he's so frazzled.

All Might, Present Mic, and Eraserhead are all amazing people. They're great heroes, sure, but just about anyone can be if they try hard enough or have the right mindset. But to be a genuinely good person? That's when it gets a little harder.

They were nice to him. Still are, in fact. It's just that once they deemed it safe, they moved closer.

Both metaphorically and physically.

The first one was Present Mic. Which, now that Izuku has the opportunity to truly think about, isn't surprising. The man always sits in the same seat two spots over from Izuku at the laundromat. He's never sat anywhere else; that's just his spot now, same as how Izuku's spot is near the corner and just out of sight of the door—Izuku can see anyone coming in, but they can't see him.

Yamada never gets too close unless he's passing by or showing him something on his phone. At least, that's how it was for a while. But then, during one of their laundry meetings, he just... moved closer.

He walked in the door, dirty clothes in a basket in one hand and detergent in the other, and sat down right beside him. Izuku didn't even notice it until his shoulder brushed against Yamada's arm when he stood up to put his own clothes in the dryer. The voice hero is tall, just like All Might and Eraserhead, so the new contact made him pause for a moment, because that's never happened before.

A quick, hopefully not suspicious look back confirmed that Yamada had indeed sat in the seat right next to him instead of his usual one two spots over. And since he identified the change, Izuku then noticed the larger shadow that loomed over his seat due to the lamp right to the side of Yamada, hanging from the ceiling.

God. Why is Izuku so short. Or maybe everyone around him is giant. Yes. That's more plausible. His five-foot-two self cries every time.

But back to the point. Neither of them acknowledged it then. It's almost like Yamada didn't notice he did it either, though that's obviously not true.

The next person to do something similar was Eraserhead. It's a couple months into their newfound hero-and-vigilante relationship when it starts. He usually sits on the roof's edge at their meeting spot with a good distance of a least five feet between them. It's more of an unspoken rule: don't get too close lest the other gets uncomfortable.

They both understood that, so everything was cool.

But then the five feet eventually became four. And then three.

Izuku tells himself that he's the one that closed another foot that time only because it's getting chillier with each passing night and Eraserhead is like a heater with that capture weapon around his neck.

If the man noticed it, which he most certainly did, Izuku thinks, he had the decency not to mention it.

Now, the last person to be involved in the pattern is All Might.

While the man has always been the more touchy-feely of the group of three heroes in Izuku's life right now, he's never made any move to outright be physical with him.

Sparring doesn't count, Izuku thinks, whatsoever. A jab to the throat is not a sign of endearment.

But then things changed. Along with getting closer to Izuku metaphorically (the picnics seem to happen more often now; Izuku has a feeling it's not just to give him a break from training), All Might has started to dole out hair ruffles or pats on the back whenever he can. He even stands a little closer to him—the change isn't much, just a few inches, but it's enough for Izuku to note.

These changes made Izuku uncomfortable at first, only for a couple weeks. But now, having quite a lot of time to get used to it, he doesn't even think about it anymore.

It kind of scares Izuku how much he likes it.

He learns something else about All Might a few months into his training.

Izuku is busy writing down different moves he could use with Boost that could help him counter long range attacks when his arm starts to irritate him again. He was sparring with All Might just a half hour prior and stupidly got himself injured, resulting in a bruised arm from one of the hero's stronger punches. In All Might's defense, Izuku should have dodged it.

He saw the blow coming and still didn't move fast enough, so Izuku doesn't know why the man started belting out apologies and questions. Izuku is fine, and no, I don't need a hospital, All Might, it's my fault, don't apologize!

But while he convinced the man not to take him to the hospital—Izuku does not want his blood drawn by anyone for obvious reasons—All Might ended up forcing him to take an hour break.

It feels more like a time-out if Izuku is being honest, as he'd argued with the man about it for five minutes, trying to explain that he doesn't need a break when it was his own fault for being so slow and stupid. All Might was having none of that, however, and instead suggested taking the day off altogether as an alternative.

That shut Izuku up real quick.

So now he's brooding, still a little angry at himself for being so dumb and also a bit irritated at All Might for being annoying.

Izuku flips to his analysis page on Eraserhead, deciding to add a little bit more on the theory he has about the hero's capture weapon and just how the fuck it even works.

Because seriously, that thing defies the laws of gravity! It shouldn't be able to do half the shit Eraserhead does with it. And it can't be because of the man's quirk, as capture weapons can be used by anyone with enough training and dedication.

There's the crunch of sand behind him, signaling his mentor's approach. "I say we do a bit of meditating after this, what do you say, my boy?"

Izuku grunts, not ready to forgive All Might for being the reason they're not still sparring right now.

"Hm. So who are you working on now?" The man leans over to peek at his notebook, letting out a noise of recognition. "Ah, is that Eraserhead?"

Huh?

Izuku twists around to stare at him, wide-eyed, suddenly forgetting about his previous anger toward the man. "How do you know his name? He works underground!"

"Well, he's my soon-to-be coworker, Young Midoriya! I met him a bit ago."

And what—what the actual shit?

"You're becoming a teacher!" His voice cracks on the last word, but Izuku doesn't let himself get too embarrassed by it. "Since when?"

The hero rubs at his neck, smiling. "I actually just completed the paperwork and interviews last week. The principal decided that having a hero with the experience that I do would be a great help in training the younger ones!"

And that—that actually makes sense, which infuriates Izuku, because that's honestly a dumb idea. The man only has a maximum of a few hours in his larger form, so how is he going to juggle both school and heroics?

Izuku stares out into the ocean, mind drawing up blank. All Might? Becoming a teacher?

He kind of wants to laugh and cry at the same time.

“What’s going on here, ladies?”

Izuku steps out of the shadows and grins at how quickly the criminal whips around, gun in hand.

“Who the hell are you?” Bitch Boy asks, just a tad bit shaky. He must be new at this. “And why’re you dressed like that?”

“You don’t know who I am? I won’t lie, I’m kind of offended.” Izuku gestures for the boy cowering in the corner to run. “I’m kind of famous around these parts nowadays.”

Bitch Boy is still holding up his weapon, pointing it at him with such bad form and posture that Izuku can’t help but cringe. Yep. He’s definitely new.

“Not much of a talker? How about you explain why you were sticking up that poor kid.”

That gets a reaction out of him. “I need money, you damn brat. Not everybody’s blessed with a rich mommy and daddy.”

Really? That’s your excuse?

Izuku merely tips his head. “Sure, but that doesn’t change the fact that you’re a criminal.”

“And you aren’t? You’re that vigilante, right? Everybody’s waiting to get a chance to beat your ass, y’know.”

“I do, actually. I have a very nice ass.”

Bitch Boy’s face turns disgusted in the faint light. “You sound twelve, why are you talking like that?”

“Twelve?” Izuku says abruptly, half shocked and half indignant. “I’ll have you know that I am not a child. I'm just a late bloomer."

"Hmph. I don't care how old you are. You come any closer and I'm blowing you to pieces. You made me lose that kid's money."

Izuku wishes the man could see his smirk. "Don't threaten me with a good time, baby."

"Shut the hell up. Don't talk like that."

"Alright, here's the deal." Izuku turns serious, taking a few steps closer despite Bitch Boy's warning. "We both know you don't have the balls to actually pull that trigger. You look new, so I don't think you want a murder charge on you, amirite?"

He gets no reply, as expected.

Izuku continues, stopping only a yard away once the man's back hits the wall of the alley. "I get it, alright? I'm guessing you have to provide for your family, so I'll let you go this one time. Got it?"

Surprise flashes across Bitch Boy's face. "What?"

"I'm letting you go," Izuku repeats. "If I catch you threatening people again, however, I won't be so lenient. There's other ways to get money."

Like being a stripper, his brain helpfully inputs.

"Uh, thank you, I guess?"

"Yep." In one quick movement, Izuku darts forward and snatches the gun out of his hands, immediately moving back right afterwards in case the man decides to retaliate. "Just a quick word of advice, too: if you want to threaten someone with a weapon, make sure the safety is off first."

Izuku points to the safety on the firearm before beginning to unload it. Bitch Boy looks embarrassed, but also a little in awe. He's probably still shocked at how quickly Izuku snatched the gun from him.

"And by the way," the boy warns, "my fashion is well beyond anyone's understanding, so don't insult my costume ever again. I can make you regret it."

And with that he slides back into the shadows, mentally laughing as he stuffs the gun in his pocket after making sure it's empty. Man, one of these days he just wants to say I'm Batman and see how many people get the reference.

The rest of his patrol goes by smoothly. There's not a lot of crime this time of week, so he can take his time tonight.

He stops after just a few more hours, when the moon is dipping low into the sky. It must be early in the morning by now.

The store should be open by now. He just got paid two days ago because of a few of his jobs, and he heard that the mini space heater he's been looking at is on sale this week. He should finally be able to afford it.

Izuku changes out of his Rabbit costume in a deserted alleyway, making sure the gun is still properly taken care of before stuffing it into his carry-on bag. He always keeps a change of clothes on him during weekend patrols.

It's when he's walking back onto the sidewalk, coming from the alley, when he hears something. Was that a meow?

A small shadow prances up to him, causing him to stop short. It's a cat, he realizes. It's fur is long and fluffy, a nice shade of black and white. It looks like a tuxedo cat. He doesn't know a lot about felines, but he knows that most tuxedos have green or yellow eyes, which this one has a mix of.

The streetlight above them allows Izuku to see that the cat's left eye is green while the other one is yellow. A rare sight, the boy thinks.

"Aren't you a lil cutie?"

The cat just meows, pawing at his sweatpants with both paws. It doesn't seem to wanna let him go.

Izuku giggles, reaching down to scratch behind its ears. It purrs, moving to run its head and body all over his legs.

So fucking adorable.

"Alright, cutie, I gotta go. So stay safe, okay?" He gives it another pat before moving on, but after a few seconds of walking the cat appears in front of him again. It's—it's following him? That's a first.

He can't help but give in, bending down to scratch the base of its tail.

That seems to really satisfy it, as it starts to purr even louder. There's no collar, so it's obviously a stray.

Homeless. I guess that makes two of us.

He sighs. "Fine. I guess you can tag along for a little bit. But just until I get to the store."

The entire way there the cat continues to do figure eights around his feet, occasionally meowing at him to reach down and pay attention to it. Each time he obeys, so he's not surprised at all when the cat suddenly jumps up and claws its way up onto his shoulder.

It crouches there, not at all perturbed by the change in height. Izuku smiles a little, not bothering to move the cat—a she, he realizes—off of him.

There's no one out and about right now, and for that he's grateful as he walks into the store he normally goes to.

One of the only workers at the moment, a tall, lanky boy who can't be any older than twenty, does a double take when he looks at him. "Hey, no pets allowed, kid. It says it on the sign outside."

"She's not my pet." Izuku says truthfully. "And besides, you don't get paid enough to care, so kindly screw off."

The boy just rolls his eyes and turns back to his magazine, proving Izuku's words right.

He heads straight for the mini space heater, lugging it over his free shoulder. He's about to be eating good from now on. Well, not good, but better.

He doesn't know why, but he ends up heading for the cat food after getting half a gallon of milk. He's glad that everything's on sale right now, otherwise he wouldn't be able to afford anything.

He glances at the name of the cheapest bag he can find: Missy Cat Food! They're your family, so feed 'em like family!

Izuku narrows his eyes, staring at the words for a moment before moving his eyes to the cat balancing on his shoulder. She kinda looks like the one on the cover of the bag.

"Hm. I'll call you Missy, alright?"

He picks up the bag and heads for the checkout, passing by the collar section. He won't buy one yet. He doesn't even know if the cat will stay for long. It's not like she's going to be his pet.

The cashier gives him another irritated look once he spots the feline, but Izuku just glares right back. He knows it's late, but that doesn't mean the dude can be a dick.

He pays for the stuff and heads home, Missy dutifully staying on her perch. They're not too far from his building, so it doesn't take long before he's walking up the many flights of stairs and nudging open his door. He watches as the cat jumps off of him and slinks inside to investigate the area.

"Well, this is the crib," Izuku announces, kicking the door shut and placing the stuff on the counter. "It's not much, but it's home."

I think that's how the saying goes.

The cat just meows at him and immediately takes claim to the top of the couch, making herself comfortable.

Izuku preens as he puts the milk in the fridge. Thank god his generator allows him a place to store his cold foods.

Turning back around, he finds Missy staring at him with those vibrant green and yellow eyes, laying flat on the couch pillows. She looks like a pancake, he muses.

And honestly, it hasn't set in yet that he practically just took in a cat. He's still too shocked and tired from his patrol.

He doesn't regret it, though.

Drugs are dangerous.

Logically, Izuku knows this. He isn't dumb. Just because he stopped physically going to school after his elementary years doesn't mean he's not educated. His father made sure he got all the knowledge he needed through online classes and courses.

Technically speaking, Izuku doesn't even have to go high school since he's legally completed the required courses. In fact, he's been taking free online classes for college at the library. There's not much else to do besides patrolling, training, or going to the club and Kacchan's house, so why not get his diploma as a teenager?

He's stacked when it comes to education. He's certainly not dumb.

So again, he knows drugs are bad. He's gotten a firsthand account of how terrible they are since his vigilante counterpart has busted a whole lot of drug rings. Drugs can ruin people's lives, and even entire families and relationships.

It's not good. Not at all.

Now, if you do it safely, that's another thing. Izuku doesn't think drugs are bad if you don't misuse them. Only a small amount on certain occasions is completely fine, in Izuku's opinion. The only problem is that once you start drugs, a lot of times you can't stop.

And so here he is, sitting on top of a broken air conditioner with his eyebrows pinched in concentration as he studies the blunt in his hand.

Now, before you get the wrong idea—it's not his. And he's not going to smoke it, either.

It was given to him by one of his newer clients as evidence for this new case. Apparently a man has been going around and selling drugs to teenagers and young adults. Now this wouldn't be that bad or surprising at all (in Izuku's humble opinion) if the drugs weren't being laced.

Which means the weed he's been selling isn't just weed, it's mixed with much more dangerous drugs and chemicals that could really fuck someone up if smoked, and not in the good way.

His client, dubbed with the name Juicer, asked Izuku to take this job since he's been affected by the criminal personally. Apparently Juicer's niece paid for some simple drugs a week ago and ended up in the hospital for an overdose. She survived, thankfully, but only barely.

He takes a lighter out of his pocket and lights the blunt, watching it smolder before eventually starting to smoke up. He takes a quick, experimental sniff of it before busting out in coughs.

That smells fucking terrible—

"What the hell are you doing?"

Izuku startles so hard he nearly falls off the roof. He whirls around, eyes wide, lit blunt in hand, and suddenly realizes how bad this looks. "Eraser!" He pants, clutching at his chest. "What happened to warning me before doing that?"

And why are you even here? We just met yesterday.

Eraserhead ignores his complaint and instead stalks forward, capture weapon floating around his head along with his raven-black hair. He swipes the blunt from him and turns it over in his hand. His head snaps back up to face Izuku, who shivers involuntarily.

"Tell me you were not planning on smoking this!" The hero hisses, eyes flaring in warning.

"I was not planning on smoking this," Izuku deadpans.

"Rabbit."

"Okay, okay!" Izuku waves his hands in front of his body to placate the clearly fuming hero. "I'm not lying! I'm just studying it for this new job I got!"

Eraserhead's eye twitches. "Uh-huh."

Okay, what right does he have to get all upset with me? It's not his business even if I was gonna smoke it!

"And who are you to judge," Izuku says, crossing his arms. "You look like a stoner, so don't get on my ass for holding a blunt when you've probably smoked a whole lot more than this before."

The sudden snort he gets from the man seems to startle them both, and the short silence that follows the noise is incredibly awkward on both sides.

Hm. It seems Eraserhead is capable of being awkward after all.

The hero huffs something between a sigh and another laugh, shaking his head. “Fair enough, kid. Fair enough.”

And woah, there’s no way Izuku was actually right about the stoner part. Who knew Eraserhead of all people used to do weed? And still probably does!

Eraserhead wets his fingers and puts out the lit part, making sure to blow gently into the chamber to get all the smoke out. Probably so the weed doesn’t get stale, Izuku thinks.

Don’t ask how he knows that.

Yep. Eraser has definitely done this before if he knows how to do it so well.

“Yep. He said this dude’s been running around and selling dangerous drugs to kids that don’t know any better.”

Eraserhead quirks an eyebrow at him. “How’d you get one of his blunts?”

He says it as if he expects the boy to say he bought it himself, which is highly unfair and a little pretentious of him to assume. It’s not like Izuku can afford to buy drugs anyway.

“How’d you get the blunt,” Izuku mocks. “My client gave it to me, thank you. Apparently Mr. Dealer dropped it at his last spot, so this is the only piece of evidence I’ve got so far. I just wanted to examine it to see what it’s been laced with; that’s why I lit it.”

“You know what he looks like?”

Izuku rubs his hands up and down his arms to protect against the chilly breeze. “I’ve got an idea. I think he’s got a mental quirk, too, so I’ve been on edge trying to look out for him.”

The hero hums in acknowledgement. “Any recent sightings of him?”

“Only one, and I’ve already combed that area. He’s nowhere to be seen. His patterns are making me think he’s got another dealing tonight, though, so I’ve gotta find him before he does something else.”

There’s a few moments of silence in which the hero seems to think about his next course of action. Finally, once Izuku has decided that he's gonna make a rude joke to piss the man off, he speaks.

"Fine." Eraserhead pockets the blunt, ignoring the offended look Izuku throws him. "We can look for him together."

No way.

Izuku perks up immediately. "You mean like on a patrol? With you?"

"Only if you can keep up."

And then the hero takes off, already clearing the jump before them and landing on the next roof. Izuku is quick to follow, laughing as the wind whips at his face. "Is this a race then?"

"It's not a race if you already know who's gonna win, kid."

The words are almost lost to the boy, but it's clear he's not talking about Izuku being the winner. The boy gasps dramatically, doing a flip before he hits the next ledge. "How dare you!"

Eraserhead is fast, and he may have his capture weapon to help him maneuver around, but Izuku isn't called Rabbit for nothing.

He powers up a little more energy into his legs and starts using the balls of his feet to spring even farther forward. He's practically bouncing, or maybe he should call it aggressive hopping.

It's the fastest he can go without using too much of his energy storage, and it's just enough to keep in pace with the hero. Eraserhead plays dirty, it seems. He continuously jerks in front of Izuku when the boy is about to overtake him, but Izuku is used to this kind of treatment. Kacchan doesn't like to lose either.

Izuku is in tune with all kinds of dirty tricks and methods used for victory, so he can just about avoid anything that comes his way.

The hero-and-vigilante duo stop petty crime along the way, just simple muggings and assaults, and Izuku comes to learn that he likes fighting alongside Eraserhead.

He likes seeing how the man fights. He's only ever seen shaky camera footage of his battles, so he's never been able to get a good analysis down on him. Now is his chance.

But of course, if Izuku is using this time to get more info on the other, then so is Eraserhead. It works both ways.

The hero probably knew that this would happen, and yet he still offered to do this with him.

Wow. He isn't joking about the whole trust thing. He wants Izuku to trust him.

Izuku counts that as a leap in the right direction.

His senses alert him to multiple quirks up ahead, and Izuku comes to a rolling halt, making Eraserhead swerve to the side to avoid crashing into him. Izuku just raises a finger to his mask-covered lips and points to the alley below them.

There's three people down there. One of them, the one on the far right, is holding out a bag full of what looks like edibles. Edibles that are probably laced.

The two buyers, one girl and a boy that look to be around the same age, are fumbling around with some cash. It's obvious that they're probably friends with each other and only came here to have a good time.

They must not know who exactly they're buying from, or they do and they're just under the influence of a quirk.

The criminal looks incredibly anxious. His movements are jerky and his hands twitch ever so slightly under the light of his phone flashlight. He's either high or he's just a piece of shit. Could be both, Izuku reckons. He also has a feeling that it's him.

If he's being honest, Izuku expected more. For all that talk and growing reputation, he kind of wanted some real action. Something not as pathetic as what the upcoming fight will most surely turn out to be.

Eraserhead is already peeking down and taking stock of the situation, fingers deftly moving across his phone keyboard at the same time. Probably sending out a signal to any nearby cops.

So cool, Izuku fanboys.

"Which one is he?" Eraserhead mumbles, voice low so only Izuku can hear it.

"The one on the right."

“You said his quirk can mess with your mind, so it’s best if I deal with him. You make sure the other two are okay.”

And with that the hero is preparing himself to jump down, one hand on the edge and the other gripping his capture weapon. There’s no time for Izuku to argue that I could’ve handled him just fine, but okay, as the man is already dropping down below.

Izuku does as instructed and drops to the floor, wincing at the screams he gets from both older teenagers. They’re obviously delirious, either under the influence or just in a state of shock, and Izuku tries to calm them down while also blocking them from view in case something bad happens.

Though that doesn’t seem likely, as when Izuku turns around the criminal is already being subdued by Eraserhead.

The underground hero has the man pinned on the floor, expression remaining bored even as the criminal starts struggling and bucking wildly to escape.

Confident that the dealer won’t come near them, Izuku turns back to the teens, who have fortunately not yet made a move to run. “Heya,” he starts coolly. “Y’all good?”

No reply, just blank stares. Well great. This makes things a bit more difficult.

He leans closer and notices that their pupils are dilated, which tells him that they’re definitely under the influence of a quirk. This has to be the guy they’re after.

“You said you think you know what he looks like,” Eraserhead calls to him from where he’s busy tying the criminal up, “so go take a look at him. I’ll check them.”

They switch roles, Eraserhead moving to get what’s probably a better diagnosis of the teens than what Izuku was heading towards and Izuku going to get a better identification of the drug dealer.

With black hair and even darker eyes to match, said drug dealer looks scary. Now Izuku isn’t one to judge, but he’d definitely think this man was a serial killer if he ever saw him out in public.

Peeking closer, Izuku sees a small tattoo on the inside of his wrist. It’s faded and kind of hard to see in the faint light, so the boy quickly takes a picture of it to study later. Who knows what it might lead to.

But other than that, Izuku recognizes him immediately. He was just reading about this guy on the police forums last night. He has multiple warrants out for him, all due to drug use and violating probation. And, if Izuku isn't mistaken, a pedophilia charge.

I should light his shoes on fire, just to scare him. Somehow, though, I don't think Mr. Pro Hero over there will like that idea so much.

"His name is Sugita Teruo," Izuku says sourly. "He's already got a bad criminal record."

Eraserhead side eyes him from where he's standing guard by the two teens. "You just know that off the top of your head?"

"Call it a lucky guess," Izuku says cryptically. "He's got a quirk that can make his victims gullible. Or, should I say, more easily swayed. He can spin any lie off of his tongue and they'll believe it."

"I'm assuming that's how he gets his buyers to trust him so easily. He looks sketchy, so I find it hard to believe that anyone would buy drugs off of him otherwise."

Izuku tightens the restraints once more, making sure it's not enough to completely cut off circulation. "Yep! He's also a child toucher."

There's a choke. "I'm sorry, a what?"

"A child toucher." Izuku faces him with a frown. "Y'know, a pedophile?"

Eraserhead stares at him for a solid five seconds before blinking. "Kid, you're something else."

I know.

Izuku finishes the last knot and hauls the squirming criminal to his feet. "Welp. He's all yours."

The hero takes the struggling man from Izuku's hold and wraps him up in his own capture weapon as an added measure. The sirens and lights get closer, reflecting off the windows in the stores across the street.

Eraserhead gives him a meaningful look then. "Good night, Rabbit."

Now that's a dismissal if Izuku's ever heard one. The boy merely grins despite knowing the hero can't see it. "We should do this more often, Eraser. That was kinda fun!"

Eraserhead snorts. "I'll think about it, kid. Now scram before the police get here."

Izuku doesn't need to be told twice. He waves goodbye to the delirious teens before scrambling up the side of the building and disappearing into the night.

Missy is waiting for him.

Chapter Notes

y'all I love you guys so much!! 20k hits??? dsfgdfhghjghk

Present Mic's birthday is the seventh! so happy birthday dadmic!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Izuku understands villains.

Not to say that he endorses them or encourages them, he just understands them.

He knows that not everyone starts out with an advantage in life, that not everyone is loved or blessed enough to have a good family or wealth behind their name. He knows the world is unfair. He knows this, but instead of making it easier to deal with criminals and villains, this knowledge makes it harder.

Because now he feels bad about taking them in or stopping them. Of course, he doesn't feel bad about the murderers and rapists. They still have a choice. There's no excuse for those kinds of people. He's talking about the ones like the guy he let go a little while ago. The ones who feel like they have to steal or break the law to survive, or to provide for their family.

Izuku understands because technically he is one of those people. He's a criminal. He goes out as a vigilante and hurts people to get a paycheck and survive. Having good intentions doesn't change the fact that what he's doing is illegal.

So again, he feels bad when it comes to stuff like that because he knows what it's like.

Now, Bitch Boy shouldn't have threatened a civilian with a gun for his own personal benefit or gain, no matter the reasoning behind it. That much is obvious. Stealing is bad when it's from someone who needs it just as much, if not more than you do.

Now, if you're stealing from the rich...

Izuku does that whenever he gets the chance. While it's still bad and hella illegal, he gets a lot of joy from it. He loves watching his next victim's—ahem, billionaire's face from a distance once they realize their cash is missing from their pocket. They never usually care that much, as the cash they carry around is nothing more than chump change to them.

Again, doesn't make it right, but still. He doesn't stop people for that. It would be hypocritical of him to do so since he literally does the same thing.

Izuku can't help but be a little disappointed, though. Criminals and villains are still human, so they deserve to get a little compassion and sympathy as long as they haven't done anything too bad. But their skills, their drive, their quirks—it's kind of a waste.

They could be using all of that for good, to help the people who can't help themselves. To save people, to make them feel safe and happy, to be a hero. And yet those criminals throw away all of those opportunities for whatever reason.

Different quirks and skill sets can prove to be vital in certain environments. Take the drug dealer he and Eraserhead took down for example. His quirk would've been useful in law enforcement. Or for a negotiator, either in a hostage situation or just to talk down a civilian from making a bad choice. It would've proved useful in rescue missions, as Sugita could convince civilians to trust him and do as he says to escape without hesitating.

The ability to spin any lie off your tongue and have everybody believe it? Izuku could use that power. He wanted it, even when he was standing an entire floor above the guy. His skin had been itching to take that quirk.

It would've been oh so useful to Izuku.

He could use it defensively, to lie his way out of a confrontation or to diffuse a possibly harmful situation. It could also help offensively to get a villain or hero on his side. If trust is forcibly made, information will slip out, giving Izuku the advantage.

There's so many possibilities, and yet the owner of the quirk chose to waste it on convincing young adults to buy his shitty drugs. It's almost kind of funny.

His quirk is powerful, almost overwhelmingly so. Simplicity gives way to complexity when you allow other variables to get involved, and that's just what Izuku would've done had he been in possession of said quirk. But it's unfair to say that Izuku himself wanted it. Extract was practically begging him to take it when he got closer to the drug dealer. It's like it was calling to him.

Extract does that to just about all the quirks he comes across or interacts with, though he's gotten used to pushing it aside and ignoring it. He's already made a promise to himself that he'd never steal anyone's power, no matter their villainous stature or ranking. That would make him just as much a villain as the guy he's taking it from.

Now, mutant quirks don't have the same appeal to Izuku, as a lot of times he wouldn't be able to steal them even if he wanted to. He can still feel their power, but he can't take them. It's like a tease, in a way. One that he in equal parts hates and enjoys.

There are more quirks that stick out to him, not just the drug dealer's. Eraserhead's, for one thing, is pretty strong for such a simple sounding power. Like the previous one, Erasure has a lot of opportunities and advantages that come with it, especially given the fact that it can erase the quirks of multiple people at once.

(Whether or not it can erase multiple quirks belonging to one person is a question that Izuku hasn't had the chance to figure out yet. He has to find a way to try it without Eraserhead realizing it.)

But none of the quirks he's encountered so far have felt as good as One for All does.

It sounds weird, now that he thinks about it. How a quirk can feel good to him when in reality it's just a flow of energy spreading throughout his veins that in all senses shouldn't be having such an effect on him.

And that scares Izuku, how much he likes it, because he knows why he can't have it—literally and figuratively. It's just not meant to happen, and nor would Izuku ever dream of doing that to the hero.

It's wrong, it's villainous, it's dangerous. And Izuku wishes above all else that Extract would stop making him feel so bad for thinking about it when he can't even control it.

Speaking of heroes.

"Hey!"

Eraserhead shoves him out of the way of a stray bullet, darting forward to slam the shooter against the wall and knock him out of the fight.

This jolts Izuku out of his thoughts and brings him back into the fray.

Oh, right. We're in the middle of a gang war.

Izuku grabs the nearest person and throws them into their partner, leveling them both with a flying kick to their chests that sends them flying into an open dumpster. Izuku uses Pull to yank the lid down on their heads, effectively knocking them out.

He's confident no one is paying too much attention to him to realize the oddities of his quirks.

The air crackles behind him and he ducks, narrowly avoiding the jolt of blue electricity that scours the space he was just previously occupying.

See what Izuku means? That's a powerful quirk right there, and yet this gangbanger is using it to fight his own pointless battles.

A gray scarf flies from out of nowhere and wraps around the criminal, yanking them back around to meet Eraserhead's fist.

Damn. What a way to go.

It's not long before both gangs are finished, their members either unconscious and lying on the ground or sitting up against the wall and grumbling about these fucking third parties always ruining shit.

Everyone is down, it looks like. No escapees, either, so that's a plus.

"Well, that was exciting," Izuku pants, turning around for privacy. He pulls down his mask to just above his mouth, wiping at the steady stream of crimson leaking from his nose from a lucky hit. He'd rather not drown in his own blood, thanks. The mask allows oxygen to pass through its material, thank god, but it doesn't do anything for substances as thick as his blood.

Izuku should really find a way to fix that one of these days.

"The hell was that?" Eraserhead asks from behind him. He sounds angry, and when Izuku turns around to look at him, mask pulled back up, he sees that the man's arms are crossed. "That bullet was heading straight for your head, kid. If I hadn't intercepted, there's no telling what would've happened to you."

Izuku doesn't know what to say to that. "Uh, thank you?"

"You should be paying more attention to your surroundings. You can't afford to be careless in the middle of a fight, Rabbit."

Izuku frowns, a little offended and also a little embarrassed. "I know that! I made one mistake, that doesn't make me dumb."

"Didn't say you were," the man counters evenly. "You're usually quicker than that. You've dodged bullets before, so this time shouldn't have been different. Pay attention next time."

The boy mutters an apology under his breath and watches as Eraserhead makes his way farther back into the alley, probably to check that the criminals there are still unconscious.

Or to get away from Izuku. That sounds likely, too.

Great. The boy was having a good night, too, and he just had to ruin it with his own mess of a mind. Now Eraserhead is upset with him.

He probably thinks you're stupid.

Izuku kindly tells that voice at the back of his head to shut the fuck up. He's known the hero long enough to at least be confident that he doesn't think that. Not yet, at least.

There's a snigger to his left, and Izuku glares at the gang member that's sitting up against the wall, sporting a busted lip and black eye. Izuku assumes he got it from fighting one of his rivals, as he and Eraserhead make sure not to use brute force on someone to subdue them. Only when necessary.

"What are you laughing at?" Izuku asks.

The criminal grins, which is a nice change of pace from all the snarling and yelling from earlier. "Is he like your dad or something? Didn't think a hero and vigilante would team up for something like a gang fight."

"Hah?" The boy says loudly, channeling his inner Kacchan. "No, he's not my dad. Why would you even think that?"

He gets a shrug in return. "You're getting defensive, there, son."

Son? Why the fuck—why? The guy doesn't look any older than twenty-five, so why is he calling Izuku son.

"Just how young do you guys think I am?" Izuku says, very much exasperated. "I'm not a child."

"You sound like a child."

"I'm not."

"Prove it."

Izuku kicks a pebble at him, only getting angrier when it harmlessly bounces off the guy's cheek. "I don't have to do anything. You're a criminal, stop talking. You have no rights."

The dude chuckles again. "Okay, son."

Son of a bitch.

"What were you guys fighting over anyways?" Izuku tries to distract himself from his growing frustration. He's not really frustrated at the child thing, more at Eraserhead.

"Ah, the other gang stole my friend's dog."

Izuku blinks, because this sounds suspiciously like a John Wick movie. "That's... that's interesting."

"Yep." The guy fiddles with his hands, not exactly struggling to get out of the restraints on his wrists. "Also, can I have my gun back?"

Izuku turns on him. "So you're the one who tried to shoot me!"

"Yo, chill, it's not like I meant to aim at your head. I was going for you foot."

"My—my foot?" Izuku is incredulous. "There's literally no way you accidentally shot at my head while aiming for my foot. That's on two ends of my body."

"Never said I was a good shot."

Izuku sighs and sits on the dirty ground in the middle of the alley, watching the rest of the criminals until the police arrive. "Whatever. You guys will probably get out on bond since none of you have actually harmed any civilians."

“Sweet.” There’s a moment of silence before the guy speaks again. "Hey, you're pretty cool for a vigilante. I thought you'd be a douche like all the others."

The boy smiles, and he’s surprised to find that it’s genuine. “Thank you. Not a lot of people have said that to me.”

“Sure. Now can I have my gun now?”

Izuku laughs. “That’s not gonna happen. And besides, the cops are gonna take it anyway. If you’re caught with an illegal firearm you’ll have a harder time in court, so just pretend it’s not yours. I won’t snitch.”

Can’t say the same for Mr. Pay Attention Next Time, though.

“Aight, cool. How long until they get here?”

Before Izuku can tell him that he’s not sure, Eraserhead comes back out of the shadows with his hair raised and eyes glowing. Izuku guesses he’s currently erasing somebody’s quirk to keep them from escaping.

“Stop making friends with the criminals,” the hero says, though the amused tilt to his voice contradicts his words. “The police will be here any minute.”

He directs the last part towards Izuku, who rolls his eyes but dutifully gets up, shooting his new friend a glance. “I’ve gotta hide for a bit. If you don’t snitch on me being here, we won’t snitch on you about the gun. Sound good?”

“‘Course, son.”

“I swear to god.”

Izuku has never been in this part of town before, at least not at this time of night. His patrol routes usually start on the outskirts of the city and slowly make their way inwards, so he tends to miss certain areas.

Eraserhead is crouching on the side of the roof, silently watching a cop place quirk suppressants on a robber. He's probably making sure everything goes smoothly.

"Can I ask you a question?"

The words escape his mouth before he can stop them. Izuku stares out into the streets on the other side of the roof, mentally cataloguing every crook and cranny to a folder in his mind. Who knows when he might have to lay low in this area of the city. It's better to be familiar with his surroundings than end up in a bad position later on.

"What is it, kid?"

Izuku turns and slowly makes his way towards the man, hands rubbing up and down his arms at the cold breeze. The thin fabric of his costume isn't always enough for Japan's nightly weather. It's been a few days since the gang fight, and with each passing night the rooftops seem to only get chillier.

"Did you notice that I was injured the night you first talked to me?"

His words are quiet, but Eraserhead must hear it well enough because in the next second he's straightening up, hair whipping at his face as his neck snaps around to look at him. "What?"

"I got shot during the warehouse incident."

"Kid," Eraserhead trails off for a few moments before turning around fully to stare at him. "You were shot? As in, you had a bullet in your body?"

Izuku blinks. "That's what being shot means, yeah. And why do you sound so surprised? If I didn't waste my energy trying not to pass out while bleeding from the stomach, I wouldn't have been so easy to overrun. You wouldn't have caught me."

The man is deadly silent. Izuku doesn't like the expression that settles on his face. There's something there that he can't quite place, and he doesn't like it one bit.

When he speaks, Izuku has to lean forward to hear him over the wind.

“Why didn’t you tell me?”

The words are uncharacteristically soft. Izuku can’t tell if it’s from shock of the situation or from some other emotion. Either way, the boy starts to feel his lips curl downwards.

“Uh, I was under the impression that you’d capture me if I made a wrong move? If I told you I was injured I thought you’d bring me to the hospital and lock me up.”

Would you still do that, I wonder?

Eraserhead lets out a sigh. “How did you get it out? The bullet?”

Izuku shivers at the reminder. He thinks of alcohol and blood and Pull. Thinks of crescents being pressed into the palm of his free hand, leaving behind drops of crimson. He can already taste the iron in his mouth.

“My doctor was unavailable at the time, so I had to improvise.” It’s not a lie. It was too late at night to drag himself to the doctor at the Club. “It was, uh, unpleasant, to say the least.”

Eraserhead crosses the few steps between them and places a heavy hand on his shoulder, eyes suddenly very intense. “Listen, kid. If you get injured, I need you to tell me. I don’t care what time it is, alright? You have my number, so use it.” He shakes Izuku just a little bit with his hand. “I have people who can help you. They’ll keep their mouth shut about your identity.”

And that’s... not quite what Izuku expected. A lump forms in the boy’s throat, and he swallows it back before speaking. “Thank you. I’ll, uh, keep that in mind.”

The hand retracts from his shoulder, and it goes back inside the depths of the hero’s pocket. “What brought this on?”

“Um, I guess I just got reminded of it the other day.” Izuku continues at Eraserhead’s raised eyebrow: “When I almost got shot.”

“Makes sense.”

Izuku nods, scuffing his feet against the gravel. He doesn’t know what else to say, still stuck on the feeling of the man’s hand on his shoulder, so he falls silent, hoping the other will break the awkward air soon.

He doesn't have to wait long before the hero is suddenly shaking his head. "I'm sorry you had to go through that alone, Rabbit. I shouldn't have made you feel like you had to. That's a failure on my part."

Izuku's stomach clenches at the apology. He doesn't like it. The hero shouldn't be the one apologizing, not at all, especially since he's already apologized for his previous shortcomings regarding the warehouse incident. "It's not your fault, Eraser, I hid it from you. And it's not like you seeing it would've changed anything, so we can just forget it never happened."

"You can't," Eraserhead counters. "Not when it probably left you with a nasty scar without proper treatment."

I wouldn't be able to forget it even if it didn't leave a mark.

Izuku tries to sound upbeat and ultimately fails. "Eh, I'm used to scars."

The hero gives him a weird look but doesn't ask for an elaboration, not that he would've gotten one had he asked.

School has been out for a while now. The break is a breath of fresh air for Izuku, despite the fact that Izuku doesn't even physically go to school. His online classes are finished for now, which means he's one year closer to his college diploma.

He gets to hang out with Kacchan more often, which is always nice. The explosive teen graduated middle school at the top of his class—no surprise there, Izuku thinks. His friend has always been super studious, even without Izuku's own encouragement or input.

Izuku is back to losing on terms of their wrestling, though. The more free time they have to spend around each other, the more often Kacchan can fight him at seemingly random times and even more random places. Izuku doesn't think he can ever forget how Kacchan jumped him at the back of a Denny's parking lot that one time.

That was peculiar, to say the least, and also quite scary. At first, Izuku thought that it was the local crackhead trying to rob him instead of his friend, so you can imagine his surprise and bemusement when he was promptly judo-flipped by his attacker. Yeah. Not something a normal crackhead would know how to do.

But whatever. Izuku won that fight, anyways, seeing as he knows the Denny's parking lot terrain like the back of his own hand. Not that it matters much in the long run since they keep trading places in their competition.

One day Izuku is in the lead and the next they're at a tie. It happens over and over again, but it never gets old.

They're evenly matched, much to Kacchan's irritation. The teen tries everything he can to make Izuku use his other quirks, and most of the time, Izuku indulges him.

But on those days, the ones where Izuku can't even think straight for fear of falling into that bottomless pit in his mind, he can barely force himself to use even his basic enhancements. The memories attached to all of his quirks are sharp and studded, and every time he thinks of them, the more scars they leave on his brain.

Kacchan knows that. But he continues to push. Izuku thinks that that's the only thing his friend will never stop fighting him over.

Izuku is going shopping today. It's not too chilly out, not like it's been these past few days, and he's just returned from his trip to the Club to receive his recent paychecks.

It's not much, but Izuku's been saving up enough to at least get some more food and supplies.

The mini heater he bought works amazingly. He uses the pots left over from the last tenant (from around a decade or so ago, don't judge him) to cook basic foods. Now he doesn't have to eat raw ramen and cold coffee. It runs on solar power and/or batteries, so he leaves it on the roof during the day and at night he can cook whatever he's got for him and Missy.

And Missy has made herself quite at home at the apartment. He's gotta buy her some actual toys so she'll stop tearing up the walls and furniture. Not that Izuku minds—everything is already torn up, but he doesn't want it to look like they live in a pigsty. Even though he technically does live in one of the poorest neighborhoods. He lives in a fucking abandoned building for god's sake.

But it's whatever. He's finally got enough money to buy some of the stuff he's been looking at, so now he walks through the pet store, skimming the aisles for a clearance section. He doesn't know shit about cat toys, so he enlists help from one of the workers to inform him on the best brands.

Izuku makes sure to ignore the suspicious looks from the other workers (that's what he gets for looking so homeless; Kacchan's hand-me-down clothes are always a little big on him), and thanks the woman for her kindness. He picks up his stuff and checks out, thinking about how excited Missy will be when she sees what he bought her.

He really hopes she doesn't dislike the toys. While he does love cats, he's not very knowledgeable on them. He knows the basics, like how many different breeds there are, and also on their allergies and do's and don't's.

But again, not on what they like. You can't group an entire species into one category, so Izuku guesses that knowing it wouldn't help anyway, but still. He'll just have to find out.

The worst case scenario is she turns her nose up to all of the toys and Izuku has to donate them to a cat shelter. A few bucks gone, but what can you do?

His extra money is giving him the chance to upgrade his weapons and such. He's already bought more bombs and knives, saying as he lost a few of each during a raid. Now he wants to finish that AI he made for himself.

It's nothing special, just a simple piece of coding that'll help him keep track of things during missions and have access to the internet without having his phone on him. He's thinking of making the AI have a female voice, maybe with an Australian accent or something. That would be funny.

The technologies shop isn't far from where he is, so he arrives relatively quickly to buy some stuff. He's already got the programming down for the AI, he just needs something to incorporate it into. He's thinking about making it into an armband on his wrist or something, that way he can easily transport it and have it on him at all times.

He kind of wants to extend the AI to his own home and have it run security measures while he's gone. Besides, it'd be nice to have somebody to talk to, even if it's a program.

He gets the parts he's missing and walks out with his hands full of bags. Today's been productive. Hopefully he can keep it that way.

He steps out onto the road, planning to cross the street to get home to Missy, when a few shouts up the street make him pause, glancing up from his phone.

A car is barreling down the road at what looks like twice the maximum speed limit, and it doesn't look like it has any intention of stopping, even as people jump out of the way and shout at it.

Izuku quickly steps back, nose crinkling.

Dumbass bitch. Could kill someone going that fast. I have the right of way here, too—

"Mommy, look! A butterfly!"

In this moment, Izuku is pretty sure that the universe hates him. Because it has to be him. It has to happen when he's here, huh?

A little girl, looking no older than six years old, is crossing the road, chasing a pretty black moth. The little girl doesn't know that it's not actually a butterfly, as she's still happily trying to capture it, and she also doesn't seem to notice the car coming straight toward her without any means of slowing down.

Her mother does, though. She's still on the sidewalk, and Izuku watches as her carefree face morphs into one of horror. She starts to rush forward, arms outstretched and mouth open in a yell.

But she won't be quick enough. Izuku can see this. He can just tell, even without doing the math. Hell, not even Pull would be quick enough to yank the girl out of the way at the rate the car is going.

Nobody else is near her. Nobody else will be quick enough.

And so that's what sparks him to move. It happens in the blink of an eye. In one instant, he's dropping his bags onto the sidewalk, thoughts going a million miles per second as he thinks of a plan, and in the next he's in the middle of the street, legs burning, scooping the girl into his arms. He moves so she's cradled against his body, facing away from the approaching vehicle, hand outstretched as added protection—and there's not nearly enough time to get out of the way as the car hits them head on.

They both go flying, and Izuku holds onto the girl tight as they roll a few times, tucking her face into his chest to try and protect her from touching the ground or getting scraped.

Izuku closes his eyes somewhere in the middle of it, and when he opens them, he's flat on his back and looking up at the sky. The girl is wriggling in his grasp and wailing, tears flowing down her face. His vision is suddenly sluggish, his hearing like it's underwater.

There's more screaming and yelling, and faces pop up in his vision. Incoherent words reach his ears, and Izuku blinks against the light in his eyes.

The girl is yanked off of him and into the arms of her mother. There's not a scrape on the child, at least from what Izuku can see.

A group of people hover over him, mouths moving around more sentences and questions that Izuku can't quite hear, because fuck his head is pounding. He just got hit by a goddamn car going forty-five miles per hour.

That's—that's a lot of force. Izuku isn't awake enough to figure out how much it is exactly.

Someone touches his body, as if to get his attention, and the pain explodes in Izuku's shoulder and arm, so sudden and excruciating that the inside of his cheek tears when he bites down on it to keep from screaming out.

Fuck, is it broke? His entire body hurts. His shoulder feels like it's been dislocated, so that's an easy fix. But his arm? What happened to his arm? He cranes his neck to try and see but hands gently push him back down.

The world comes into his view sharply, all his senses too sensitive, too loud. The mother is crying and blubbering out thank you's off to the side while simultaneously scolding her daughter for running out into the street in the first place. She's apologizing to Izuku with the girl still held in her arms.

She's safe. The girl isn't hurt. She's alive.

Someone's on the phone, probably calling the cops or the ambulance.

Where did the driver go? Izuku can see the car from where it crashed into a pole after hitting Izuku and the girl, but the car door is open with nobody inside.

Ambulance. The meaning hits him hard.

"Nuh," he groans, struggling to sit up against the hands pushing him down. "'M good, I don' need a h'sp'tal."

"Son, stay down. You're injured! You gotta—"

Izuku uses his good arm to weakly push the offender away, blinking away the spots dotting at the corners of his vision. He's fine, he has to be. He can't feel his arm anymore, sure, but he can't go to the hospital. He just can't.

He mutters some more of this as the crowd grows. There's police sirens in the distance, and his struggling increases. "Lemme go, 's all good. I c'n't do h'sp'tal's, gotta—"

A cat's face pops into view. Izuku squints at it. Cathead? Is that his officer buddy?

Another push down, and then the world sways. He slips into a void of darkness with fluffy cats on his mind.

When Izuku wakes up, the first thing he does is panic.

Because this—this looks like a fucking hospital. White walls, a computer next to him, the smell of antiseptic—it's like he's in a nightmare.

Oh fuck. He told them, he begged them not to take him to a hospital, and yet here he is.

He shoots up in the bed, eyes wide and frantic. He still has his sweatpants on, but his sweater—Kacchan's old sweater—is gone, exposing the torn undershirt he has on. A thin blanket covers his top half, and when he moves he realizes his arm is bandaged.

So it was broken. It doesn't hurt as much now, but the relief doesn't stop the panic from setting in. This is bad. There are doctors here. They could find him out.

He tosses the blanket off of him and moves off the bed, stumbling to the ground immediately. He instinctively reaches out to grab something to stop his fall, only to forget that his arm is useless right now.

He crashes onto the tiles, arm now throbbing in pain, and scrambles to the door handle a few feet away. He uses it to slide to his feet, jerking it open to run because he can't stay here, I'm going to get killed, I have to leave before—

He gets a face full of black fabric when he shoots forward after opening the door. Izuku is on the defensive immediately, free hand coming up to shove whoever's in front of him, but strong fingers grab his wrist and hold him in that spot.

Izuku tries to jerk away, but the man is strong. The figure steps back and the boy freezes, his heart dropping to his toes.

"Eraserhead?"

Raised eyebrows, a tight frown, but the grip on Izuku's wrist doesn't lighten one bit. "Why are you up?"

Izuku just stares at him, mouth agape. His gaze flicks to the side, realizing that this doesn't look like a hospital anymore. Is this—no. This looks like the inside of the police station.

His mind instantly goes to the worst possibility, but before he can make sense of it all Eraserhead is leading him back into the room, and Izuku surprisingly lets him.

"You should be resting," the hero chides. "A nurse should be by soon to check on you again before you can go."

Izuku is pushed back onto the bed, and he watches as Eraserhead moves to stand by the door with a tired expression. Probably to make sure he won't try to run again. "Why am I here, sir?"

He means how. How the hell did he get here?

“Sansa was close to the scene when the cops were called. He managed to convince them to let him take you to the hospital.” The black-haired man rests his head against the doorframe. “He brought you here instead.”

Izuku is a little confused. “Sansa?”

“The officer with the cat’s face,” Eraserhead explains. He levels the boy with a look. “He also told me that you didn’t want to go to a hospital.”

“Uh, yeah.” The boy has a feeling he’s done something wrong. “That’s true.”

“Why? You broke your arm. You were lucky to even survive the impact, so there was no telling what else was wrong with you. It would’ve been illogical to not receive medical attention.”

He sounds just like he did when he told me to call him if I ever got injured.

In Izuku’s opinion, that’s an unfair question to ask. He doesn’t know how to respond, so he settles for a half-truth. “I can’t afford a hospital. They would’ve made me go, even though I wouldn’t have been able to pay for it.

And that really says something about Izuku’s situation, since Japanese citizens only have to pay thirty percent of their medical bills while the government pays for the remaining seventy percent. The boy is sure Eraserhead is judging him at least a little bit right now.

“Hm,” the hero says disinterestedly. “Your father can’t afford it? Didn’t you say he works a lot?”

Rude, Izuku thinks. And also, how does he remember me saying that? That was the very first time we met.

“That’s not something you say to someone,” he says cautiously, making sure he sounds slightly off-put. He doesn’t want to be disrespectful, but if he can get the man to back off, then maybe it’ll be easier to avoid his questions. “And we have money, I just don’t want to waste it on something so... trivial, I guess.”

The man studies him for a moment before letting out a noncommittal noise. Izuku briefly wonders why the hero’s here, of all places, talking to him. Doesn't he have somewhere more important to be?

"Well, it's a good thing the team here is paid fully by the government. You don't owe a dime for this."

What? Izuku glances up, ignoring the small burst of pain that shoots up his arm at the movement. "Really?"

Eraserhead doesn't reply, not willing to waste breath on a dumb question.

The boy is used to it, though. That's why Cathead took me here, he knew I couldn't afford a hospital. I have to thank him next time I see him.

An awkward feeling settles in the air. Again, only for Izuku. Eraserhead looks more comfortable in silences.

"So, uh, why are you here?"

"Tsukauchi called to tell me to keep an eye on you. I'm waiting for the nurse to come in."

It's such a blunt statement that Izuku feels himself flushing. Of fucking course the detective said that. He knows about his distaste for doctors more than anyone. "Oh, wow. Sorry, I guess?"

As usual, there's a grunt of acknowledgment. If Izuku didn't know any better, he'd assume the hero is falling asleep.

"Eraserhead? Can I ask—"

"It's Aizawa when I'm off-duty."

"Oh." Izuku already knew his name, but okay. "Do you have any cats?"

"Yes."

Interesting.

Izuku subconsciously struggles against the sudden thought to kick the man in the shin as he continues. "How many?"

"Too many."

He laughs a little, still tense. "Are you excited for the new school year?"

“As much as I can be,” he mutters, looking at Izuku with one eye now. “My turn. Why did you run in front of that car?”

Izuku stops short, only to speak once he realizes Eraserhead won’t continue without an answer. “What do you mean? The little girl was in the middle of the road. At the speed that car was going and how small she is—she would’ve died.”

“You could’ve died, too.”

And that stumps Izuku, because he truly doesn’t see why that matters. It was either him or the little girl, and to him, the answer was obvious. She’s younger, she has more potential, it wouldn’t have been fair to let her go so soon. He’s not as young, he’s already lived quite a life, so when it comes to worth, the little girl logically holds more value. So what is Eraserhead’s point?

“But I didn’t,” the boy argues, starting to get defensive. “Are you saying I shouldn’t have done it?”

“No. I’m saying that sometimes you have to think about different opportunities. There were other ways to save her without being so reckless.”

Great. Now he’s getting lectured.

Izuku knows that there were other ways. He knows how reckless his plan was. He knows that the chances of both of them surviving were remain low. But again, he doesn’t see why it matters. In the end, they both got out fine.

“I only had a couple seconds to think,” Izuku mumbles, not liking the uncomfortable feeling that’s spreading over his skin. “I still don’t see how else I could’ve saved her without shoving her out of the way. That would’ve caused her more harm, especially if I wasn’t fast enough and she got clipped anyway.”

Eraserhead nods. “Okay. So you—”

There’s a few knocks, and then the door is being pushed open, revealing a nice looking woman in nurse clothing. “Hi, Midoriya, how are you feeling?”

She gives a brief nod to Eraserhead, who straightens up a little. He looks a little hesitant, as if he’s not sure if he should stay.

Izuku clenches the blanket in his hands. “I’m fine.”

The nurse smiles. “Well I’m glad to hear that! Your arm is already healed and your shoulder relocated, so you should be free to go after I check the rest of your body, does that sound okay?”

Izuku is uncomfortable, but he says yeah nonetheless. This is just protocol, even if the whiteboard on the wall says that a doctor already checked over him when he was knocked out.

He doesn’t know if he’s relieved or not when Eraserhead steps outside, but he tries not to complain as he’s told to take off his undershirt.

The lady peers at his skin and frowns. “When did this happen?”

She’s pointing to the golfball-sized scar on his abdomen. The one from when he got shot. “Uh, a while ago. I got it treated, though.”

“Hm. The stitches were done a bit shabby—if it were done properly the scar wouldn’t be this jagged.”

Wow. Roasted.

“But I guess it’s healed, and there’s no other blemishes I can see, so you’re free to go. You’re body’s just a little sore.” She hands him a small bag of pills. “Take this medication once a day until there’s no more, alright? The pain should go away.”

When Izuku is given back his sweater and shoes, he’s quick to make it out of that too-clean room and head down the hallway. It definitely is the station, as he’s been back here more times than he can count.

He’s about to burst out the doors—holy shit, it’s dark outside! how long was he out?—when Eraserhead (no, Aizawa) suddenly appears from a side hallway. “This just came in a couple hours ago. The couple who brought it in said it belongs to you.”

He hands him a few large bags from off the counter, and Izuku recognizes them immediately. Oh thank fuck.

He forgot about his stuff in the midst of his panic. Hopefully everything is all there. He paid a lot of money for that shit.

“Thank you so much! Have a good night, Aizawa, sir!” He bows quickly at the man and heads for the double doors, wanting to get out of there before he can be studied even further. It’s always awkward being around the man when he's not Rabbit.

"Hold it, kid." The man holds out a packet, and Izuku takes it with hesitant hands. Printed on the top of the first page is the—the UA crest?

UA, the heroics school that Eraserhead (and now All Might) teaches at? UA, the place he used to dream of going to when he was little? The place that he knows, deep down, would be his downfall if he ever tried attending it?

And Aizawa just gave him one of their packets. Why?

"Think about it." Aizawa says, eyes piercing as he searches his face for a reaction. "The exam is less than a month away. They'll still accept applications up until the night before if you email it to the principal."

Izuku is still too shocked to speak, or to do much of anything for that matter, as he's still stuck on his previous question: why?

Why did Eraserhead, someone that Izuku fanboys over just as much as he does All Might (though hopefully neither one of them are aware of it), give him an application to one of the most prestigious schools in Japan? One that's known for its amazing heroics course and teachers?

And to give it to him directly, as if he truly believes Izuku should apply for it—it doesn't make sense.

But the underground hero is already out the door, leaving Izuku standing alone in the deserted police station lobby, wondering what in the hell led him up to this point.

It doesn't matter, though. Izuku won't use it, he can't afford to. Things will become much worse for him if he goes. He's known that for a long time now.

Right?

It's the last week of training. Izuku almost doesn't believe it.

The beach is near spotless, with only a few piles of garbage and household items strewn about. Izuku knows he could probably clean it all up today if he wanted to, but that's not the point.

The point is that he did it. He made it, he's here, and so is All Might. It's been ten months of this grueling training, ten months since he met his favorite heroes, sometimes both in and out of his costume, and he's never been as happy as he is in this moment. He's incredibly stressed and anxious, sure, but still happy.

All Might jumps onto the steps leading down to the beach and crouches there, leaning forward to pick Izuku up by the scruff of his hoodie. He holds him at eye level, which does nothing but remind Izuku just how short he is.

Jesus, couldn't you have just bent down?

"It's almost all cleared, my boy! I'm very proud of you!" He jostles him around a little, and Izuku feels kind of like a limp rag doll in his grip. "I'm sure the locals will be overjoyed once they see what you've done here!"

That was the point, Izuku thinks. I wanted to make them smile again.

The beach used to be beautiful, he knows that much, so it's about time it was fixed back up to its natural state.

All Might straightens up, lifting Izuku even higher. "Now I wanted to ask you a question, Young Midoriya! Since my job is starting up in a few months, that means our training time will be cut short in the mornings. I would like to move our meetups to only weekends, if that's acceptable for you!"

Oh, fucking hell. Izuku doesn't drink—at least not legally—but if he did, he'd probably want some alcohol right about now.

“I know this is hard,” All Might continues, “and you don’t have to, but I feel like I should still ask.”

Izuku is stumped. He was under the impression that All Might would cut off all contact with him after school started back up again. He knows the man has to get to work early, so obviously mornings are a no-go, but to offer to keep training with him on the weekends?

He should say no. He really should. He should’ve said no a long time ago. Why would he keep doing this when he knows it’s just going to end up with him being hurt?

It shouldn’t even be an option for him, really, for reasons that are obvious. But when he really thinks about it, he doesn’t want to get rid of the strange feeling he gets in his chest when he’s near the man. He likes training with him. It makes him feel good about himself, because if All Might believes in him, then that’s all that matters, right? He can sit here and pretend that he deserves the praise and attention, all the while getting help on his skills and moves.

Is it selfish? Maybe. But it’s also cruel, so it all evens out. Izuku knows deep down that it’s all a lie, that he’s somehow fooling the hero into believing in him, so what’s the harm in hanging around just a little while longer before disappearing? Call it self-indulgence, or even self-destruction, it doesn’t really matter.

He just wants to know what All Might is getting out of this.

“If it’s not a bother to you,” Izuku says, offering a half-shrug, “I don’t see why not?”

It’s not like I have anything else to do.

All Might drops him onto the sand and strikes another pose. “Ah, I was hoping you’d say that!” He hops off the steps, a teasing glint in his eye. “Now, let’s fight each other with our quirks! No holding back now!”

Or maybe Izuku will die right here and there. That’s alright, too.

Izuku glares at his friend as he tentatively holds Missy out to him. “It’s a her, Kacchan, not an it! And she’s got a name.”

The blond just snags the feline from his hands and stomps further into the house, leaving Izuku standing in the doorway.

“Have you no manners?” Izuku screeches, stepping in and shutting the door behind him. “You’re supposed to welcome me in!”

Kacchan snorts as Missy starts to climb all over him. “As if I’ve ever done that. And where’s her collar, shitface? Shouldn’t she have one if she’s yours?”

“I thought I told you to watch your fuckin’ language, brat,” Mistuki calls from the kitchen, walking over and instantly preening when she catches sight of her new guest. “Ah, honey, you brought Missy over this time!”

She goes to pet the feline after pulling Izuku into a bone-crushing hug, cooing at the animal in a very non-Mitsuki-like way.

Izuku shoots his friend a glare. “If Auntie remembered her name, you should've, too!”

“Tch, whatever.” Kacchan then starts to argue with his mother about getting in the damn way, and I’m petting her, so screw off until I’m done.

Izuku just watches the scene while shaking his head. It happens every single time, without fail. They always argue about some stupid thing the moment he gets in the door.

Eh. At least he’s used to it.

“Hey, Izuku,” Masaru says from the stairs, walking down with a briefcase in hand. “I gotta work for a bit because a buddy of mine called out, but I wanna show you something when I get back.”

Izuku perks up. “Oh, really? What is it!”

The man ruffles his hair as he walks past, saying goodbye to his wife and son. “Nothing much. I just got my hands on some older hero merch from the Bronze Age and thought you’d wanna take a look.”

The boy shrieks. “What? Where did you even—!”

“Work had some extra, and Katsuki doesn’t want them all, so I figured you’d take them. The shirts are too small for me, anyway.”

“Oh my god! Yes! Thank you!”

The man leaves before Izuku can make a fool of himself, and Izuku is stuck vibrating at a frequency that could break glass. Fuck, he loves the Bronze Age! All Might’s costume in that era is arguably his best.

Izuku may be biased because of the darker colors, but the fact still remains.

“What’s her name again?” Kacchan asks abruptly, and Izuku looks over to see Missy settling into his dandelion hair like a bird in a nest.

“Missy,” he says, glaring at him. “Which you would know if you read my texts.”

“Cry about it. And I do read them, I just don’t care.” His grin grows sharp. “And Missy, huh? Short for missile launcher. I like it.”

“Kacchan, no—”

“Yes.”

Izuku just sighs and goes to help Mitsuki with dinner. It looks like they’re having nizakana tonight, along with other things.

Mitsuki is busy getting the stove ready while Izuku quickly blanches the ingredients. Nizakana refers to any fish that is gently poached in a sweetened dashi stock which is typically flavored with either soy sauce or miso. It’s usually a part of every meal besides breakfast, and Izuku enjoys it greatly when he comes over to the Bakugou’s because he can never usually afford fish.

It’s a nice treat for him, especially since he loves to help make it. While he’s never been good at the art of actually preparing a meal, he’s good at the presentation. He can make any cheap meal look delicious in the end.

Blanching the ingredients is done to subdue the strong natural aromas and flavors of fattier fish, but it also removes the sliminess of it and prevents the broth from becoming cloudy.

While Mitsuki works with the actual fish, Izuku gets out some vegetables. He likes mushrooms and sliced ginger with nizakana, as the zest goes well with the strong and savory flavors of the soy sauce and broth. If you add just a little bit of sugar at the end, the dish tastes perfect.

Izuku chops the ginger and sets it to the side. “‘M okay. I’m not as lonely anymore since I got Missy with me. She’s very playful.”

“Seems like a sweet cat. Where’d ya find her again?”

“On the streets. She had no collar on, and she kinda followed me around.“

A laugh. “I guess she chose you, huh?”

Oh, Izuku thinks, pausing briefly in his chopping. Yeah, I guess she did.

They switch places for a bit, Izuku poaching the fish and Mitsuki gathering the sauces.

“Oi, nerd! Come in here!”

Izuku narrows his eyes, incredibly suspicious at his friend’s jeering tone. “Why?”

“Just fucking come here!”

That doesn’t make him any less worried.

Mitsuki answers before he can. “He’s helping me cook, brat! Maybe you should get off your lazy ass and help me, too.”

“Hah? I cook all the time! The fuck are you implying!”

Izuku sighs and turns the stove down a bit. You don’t wanna boil the fish, just poach it with liquid. Keeping it at a simmer is the best way to do that. He figures it’ll only take five more minutes.

“Shut up, Kacchan. I’m coming.”

A rookie mistake, Izuku learns, as the moment he steps out of the kitchen he’s body-slammed by his friend. He twists just in time to avoid crushing Missy, who apparently followed the explosive teen off the couch, and knees Kacchan in the gut.

He rolls to his feet and springs at him, taking care not to bump into the table against the wall. Breaking Masaru's very expensive vase is not on Izuku's bucket list, no siree.

Kacchan easily throws him over his hip, but Izuku just clings to his clothes and brings him down with him. Missy hisses as she avoids yet another flattening.

"If y'all are gonna roughhouse, do it outside! God knows what the hell ya both gonna break this time."

Izuku squeaks as he remembers breaking Mitsuki's coffee table that one day a few months back. It wasn't his fault, to be fair. Kacchan threw him into it, and since it was made of fucking glass, of course it shattered.

It's a good thing the Bakugou's aren't poor. He still felt bad about it, though, even after Masaru's reassurances that they were planning on getting a new one anyway.

A warm hand grasps his arm and drags him to the back of the house and through the doors. "Use your quirks," Kacchan demands.

"Fuck, not so loud," Izuku hisses. "Are you trying to get me killed? And I'm already worn out from All Might! He kicked my ass, Kacchan."

"Because you weren't using all your powers, nerd. Now come on!"

No. I wouldn't have won even if I used all my quirks, but I appreciate the vote of confidence.

Izuku ducks just in time, the heat from the blond's explosion sizzling his hair. "Hey, watch it!"

"You need a haircut anyway. You look like a fucking piece of broccoli."

"Wow. At least I don't look like a Pomeranian."

Izuku shouldn't have been surprised at the bigger explosion that followed.

“I hope you know you only won because I let you.”

“That’s the shittiest lie you’ve ever told, nerd.”

“I’m sorry, did I ask for your opinion? No.” Izuku points at the leftover fish on the teen’s plate. “Also, are you going to eat that?”

Kacchan practically snarls at him, and Masaru chuckles from his place at the table. He looks tired nowadays, but Izuku figures it must be from work. “There’s more in the kitchen if you want, Izuku. You never have to ask.”

“Here, I’ll get ya some. I was going back for more, too.” Mitsuki takes his plate despite his protests and comes back with the fish, along with a pie in hand.

It’s a wonder I’m not fat by now.

Kacchan suddenly kicks him under the table. “Your cat is being loud.”

Oh. She is. Taking a glance down, Izuku sees that she’s busy scratching at Kacchan’s legs. She must be hungry.

“I brought some of her cat food, so I’ll feed her after this.” He flashes the two adults a smile. “Thank you for letting me bring her over. I feel bad for leaving her all the time.”

The conversation picks up after that. Izuku chimes in here and there, but mostly resolves to cleaning off his plate and eating some pie. He’s gotten better about eating more, but instead of making the issue better, it seems to just make it worse.

Because now that he’s gotten used to eating more than usual, his stomach has stretched back to its normal size, which means that he’s just as hungry.

When Masaru gets up and collects all the plates, Izuku follows him instinctively. While he doesn’t have any jobs or expectations at the Bakugou household, Izuku still tries to clean up or help when he can. If he cleans, he’s technically earning his stay. So he helps Masaru do the dishes and clean up the kitchen, all the while listening to the mother-and-son duo argue about something petty on TV.

When Masaru reminds him of the hero merch he has, Izuku immediately gets giddy. He follows the man up the stairs and soon enough he's staring into a box full of clothing and figurines.

"Holy shit," Izuku whispers, earning a chuckle in response. "This is so cool."

He picks up a nice pink sweater with an older hero on it, holding it up to himself to see if it'll fit him. Most of these clothes look a little big, but Izuku likes them better that way.

"I can have all of them?" he asks, still rummaging around.

"Yep. Katsuki already chose a few, so don't worry about leaving him some. You know how he is."

Izuku does know how his friend is, which is why he's a bit shocked when he comes across a large hoodie with All Might printed on the front. It's definitely from the Bronze Age like Masaru said before; Izuku recognizes the costume immediately.

The hero is giving a thumbs-up as he stands tall and mighty in front of a crowd. He looks younger in this one.

"I'm surprised Kacchan didn't take this," Izuku laughs, clutching it tighter to him as he picks up the remaining pieces of clothing.

Masaru chuckles. "I think he left that one for you, actually. He told me you'd like this one since it's your favorite look."

Oh. That's suspiciously nice.

When Masaru leaves, Izuku takes the two remaining hero figurines and clothes and sprints to Kacchan's room. The boy is already sprawled out on his bed, writing stuff down on a notepad. He grunts when Izuku enters but doesn't say a word until his friend snatches the paper away from him.

"Oi, the fuck are you—"

"Is this your hero costume?" Izuku asks, staring at the frankly horrible sketch and writing off to the side of it. "For UA?"

"What else would it be for?"

Izuku sends him a teasing look before sitting at the boy's desk. "I thought you had to pass the exam first before making this?"

"Eh?" Kacchan probably would've jumped him again had Missy not climbed into the explosive teen's lap. "You think I won't fucking make it?"

"Never said that," Izuku grins. "I'm just saying, aren't you're jumping the gun a little bit?"

The blond rolls his eyes. "You already know I turned in the application a month ago. Besides, we study a bunch of shit for the written part every time you come over. It's gonna be easy."

"Whatever you say."

It turns out that Kacchan actually has a few great ideas. His hero design is fairly simple—a low cut tank top with orange stripes to go with the aesthetic, black cargo pants and matching boots, and also sharp knee guards that strap on over his pants.

Izuku blinks, staring at the notes his friend has written off to the side. "You want to be able to kill someone with your knees?"

Kacchan scoffs from where he's playing with Missy. "I wanna break those extras in the least expected way possible."

"Alright. That's fucked up, but it works."

Izuku adds a few more details of his own, much to Kacchan's annoyance. He figures that while his friend has great ideas, they look a bit shitty on paper. No way is Izuku going to let his friend walk out into the world looking like he just rolled out of a dumpster. He's going to have style.

He puts a little color on the boots and sides, adding a tactical belt to the waist. If UA approves of it, Kacchan could have little grenades on him, kind of like Izuku does.

"I was thinking about putting in a form for some blasters on my arms," Kacchan says when Izuku gives him back the paper. "Something that'll store up my sweat."

"Ah, to make a bigger explosion? That'll be great."

He chuckles darkly. "More firepower to blow up those damn villains."

Yep. Izuku expected him to say that.

It's quiet for a while, and Izuku works on his own ideas in his notebook. His recent jobs have been making him anxious, as most of his supplies and weapons have been worn down. He's gotta make some more stuff to keep up with the increase in villains. Since school is out, tensions are running high. People are more high strung, leading to more crime.

It makes patrols with Eraserhead all the more fun, albeit a lot more tiring.

"The entrance exam is a week away," Kacchan grumbles. He sounds cautious, like he's waiting for something to happen.

Izuku just hums and crosses out a paragraph in his notes.

"You should be joining me."

The grip on the boy's pen tightens a little. Izuku forces a tight smile. "I wish."

"Whaddya mean you wish?" Kacchan's eyes are boring into his back. "You could if you wanted to. You'd make it, too, that's for damn sure."

Here we go again.

"I can't."

"Even without using all those damn quirks, you've still got a brain. It'd be a piece of cake for ya."

"We've been over this, Kacchan. I can't."

"Deku—"

"Stop it," Izuku snaps, the pen cracking between his fingers and leaking ink onto his sketch. "I'm here helping you, aren't I? That's what you wanted, so let me do this. Fucking stop."

Kacchan falls silent, which is usually a bad thing, all things considering.

The shame hits quicker than expected, and Izuku stares hard at the ruined paper before him. There's rustling, and then a pillow is thrown at his head. It falls to the ground and lays there, upside-down, and Missy takes claim to it at once. It didn't hurt nearly as much as it could if Kacchan wanted it to.

Izuku swipes a hand across his face and breathes in deeply. “Sorry.”

“Whatever.” More rustling, and then the lamp on Kacchan’s nightstand flicks off, enveloping the room in darkness. “Hurry up, it’s already past nine.”

Missy purrs as Izuku rubs a foot on her belly, and the boy just pulls out his phone and turns on his flashlight, making sure it’s on the lowest setting. He needs to finish the idea in his head right now or he’s never going to.

What was he thinking about? New boots for his Rabbit costume? Maybe a magnetic knife that he can call back to him whenever he needs it?

Everything is fuzzy now. He can barely concentrate.

“Deku.”

His friend sounds annoyed, like always, but there’s an edge to it that Izuku cringes at. “I heard you, just—just give me a second, Kacchan. I’m almost finished.”

A grumble, but otherwise the teen stays silent.

Izuku doesn’t quite mean to, but he sketches through the night. He scribbles down whatever he’s thinking, and half the time it’s gibberish and half the time it’s nearly illegible, but he writes. He’s very good at that. He can always count on that being something he can do when he doesn’t know what else is there for him.

His Rabbit costume is still great. He doesn’t want to change its features, he just wants a few upgrades. The portable AI is on the way, so that’s off the list. He’s toying with the idea of new knives and homemade bombs. His flamethrower needs to be repaired, so he can check up on that later.

In fact, he hasn’t set anything on fire in a while, and that in itself is a crime. Is he really Rabbit if he hasn’t committed arson at least twice in as many weeks?

Eraserhead doesn’t approve of his fiery tendencies, but Izuku finds that he doesn’t quite care. In fact, he decided a while ago that he’ll continue to set fire to things just to spite the man. It’s not like he burns down perfectly good establishments or police stations—no, he'd rather do that to villain lairs and hideouts.

It does a good job of flushing them out.

I wonder if I can create something for Eraserhead. Maybe give him one of the magnetic knives I'm going to make.

Maybe Present Mic wants something to add to his own costume. Maybe more leather? Weaponized boots?

A claw catches on his sweatpants, scratching the skin underneath the thin fabric, and Izuku glances down at the offender. Missy is sitting there and glaring at him, tail twitching in the faint light.

"No," he tells her quietly. "You gotta behave. He's sleeping."

A slight hiss, and then another whack with her paw. It's like she's trying to tell him something.

"I can't understand you. Go to sleep."

Missy hisses and fluffs up her fur. She doesn't seem to want to give it up.

"Why are you being so—ow!" Izuku abruptly stands up from the desk before Missy can whack him for the fourth time. "Okay, okay!"

He turns off his phone's flashlight and plugs it into the extra charger in the wall. It's after midnight now, and Izuku briefly wonders how he didn't notice how fast the time was going by. He picks the feline up and tosses her onto the bed, earning another hiss in response.

Izuku tidies up the desk as best he can before making his way over to his side of the mattress. Kacchan looks to be asleep, his back turned towards him with his chest rising and falling very slowly.

He looks peaceful, and for a moment Izuku hesitates. This isn't his bed, after all. Most of the time he sleeps on the floor, mostly by choice, but sometimes he does like to be next to his friend. It gives him a form of comfort. But does he even deserve to be near Kacchan after being so rude to him?

Izuku sighs and carefully climbs onto the bed, not wanting to wake him up. He doesn't bother getting under the covers, as he gets hot easily. Besides, he kinda likes the cold.

Missy prances over and curls up on his neck like he's nothing but a fluffy blanket, though Izuku doesn't really mind. He can still breathe, so he turns slowly to face the fan on the nightstand.

If he'd been more aware and hadn't been nodding off to sleep, Izuku probably would have seen the way Kacchan rolled over to look at him.

He probably would have seen the mix of frustration and sadness in his friend's eyes.

"Get up."

A whimper. "No, please. I can't."

"I thought you wanted these quirks. Why are you whining? Do you want to disappoint me?"

"No! I never wanted them! Please—" There's a resounding slap, and the voice cuts off with a cry.

"Pleading will get you nowhere. Need I remind you what happens when you disobey me?"

The short silence is almost deafening. "No, sensei."

"Good. Now get up."

And then there's electricity shooting through his veins, pain dancing across his skin as monsters lurk from the shadows, a hand on his face—

Izuku jolts awake, heart thumping out of his chest. He doesn't know where he is, everything is so dark, so quiet, fuck, why is he here?

Someone grabs his arm and he flinches, hands coming up to protect himself, breaths coming out in pants.

“Hey, kiddo, you alright?” Present Mic stares down at him, brows furrowed in concern.

Izuku blinks once, then twice. “What?”

The voice hero laughs softly, hand leaving Izuku’s arm. “You’re still in the laundromat. You fell asleep about an hour ago.”

An hour ago? The wash doesn’t take that long? What is he—oh.

Yamada gets up to put his clothes in the dryer, which is weird, since Izuku hasn't heard it beep yet. That means it must’ve been done before now. Which can only mean...

Izuku’s eyes widen. “Oh my god! I’m so sorry!” He shoots to his feet and bends down low, his face on fire. “I didn’t mean to disturb you!”

He just slept on Present Mic’s arm. He laid his fucking head on the man’s shoulder, probably making him very uncomfortable and also wasting his time for, what, an hour? How did he even do that? He doesn’t even remember falling asleep!

The hero waves him off. “‘S not a problem at all, kiddo. I don’t mind. You look like you need the extra sleep anyway, yeah?”

Izuku just continues to apologize profusely, not stopping until Yamada comes back and hands him a Slim Jim.

When the air gets less awkward and Izuku isn’t as embarrassed, the boy starts to think about what just happened. He was asleep on the man, and Yamada didn't move him once, even when his clothes were done.

And fuck. It must be almost eleven at night now. He wasted a lot of the hero’s time. That seems to be something he’s good at, huh?

Izuku chews on his Slim Jim and tries to shake off the coil of dread in his stomach.

The nightmare stays with him all the way back to his building. Missy is standing by the door and meowing when he arrives, obviously hungry.

Izuku feels a little bad about being late. He's been trying to make a set schedule for her so she knows what to expect. He usually feeds her dinner around nine, and it's a few hours after that.

"I know, I know, I'm sorry!" He scratches behind her ears and sets his folded clothes on the counter. "Here."

Mixing some wet food and dry food together, he sets her bowl on the floor next to her water dish. Her new collar shines brightly when Izuku flicks on the lights, and he admires the hot pink coloring just for a moment before turning on the hot burner. He's craving some coffee.

If he's not going to eat, he can at least have some caffeine to keep him going.

He still can't get the nightmare out of his mind. He can barely remember it, and yet it stays there, weighing him down with every movement and thought.

Izuku can't quite tell if the nightmare was just that, a nightmare, or if it was a memory. Perhaps a mixture of both.

"Don't you feel this power? I could give it to you. All you have to do is ask nicely."

The boy shudders, hands gripping the edge of the countertop. God, he needs to sleep. But he knows he can't after what just occurred.

Kacchan still hasn't texted him back. Izuku wanted to go paintballing sometime next week, as he's been saving up for it for quite a while. It's pretty cheap this time of year. But his friend hasn't replied back, and it's been a week. Izuku knows the exam is first thing in the morning, so there's no chance he'll respond now, not when he's most likely resting.

His friend does like his schedules.

Izuku's head hurts. His vision starts to spin if he keeps his eyes open for too long, and it feels like they're burning. He glances at his phone and sees that it's an hour or so until midnight.

He—he's disappointed. He doesn't know why. He doesn't know why he's feeling anything right now. Fuck. He needs to buy some sleeping aid.

How much does he need to drink for his enhanced metabolism to process it correctly? A whole bottle? Or is that considered an overdose?

Whatever. That's a stupid idea, one that he'll probably try the next time he gets his hands on it. Maybe he'll negotiate for some of the good stuff from his dealer at the Club. He's usually pretty cheap and reliable when Izuku asks for pain pills.

But there's nothing to do about it now. He doesn't feel like going out, he doesn't think he should even bother trying to sleep, so what is he supposed to do? And great, now he's not disappointed anymore, he's just frustrated. Frustrated at himself, frustrated at the goddamn world.

He's still mortified over the fact that he slept on Present Mic's arm. Does Izuku snore? He doesn't think so. At least, Kacchan has never complained about anything like that before. Did Izuku annoy him as much as he thinks he did?

And on top of all those feelings, Izuku doesn't feel like he belongs anywhere.

The Bakugou's are like his second family, and so is Ms. Hanako and her small family. But it's not really his. It's stolen.

Izuku doesn't deserve it. He's leeching off of them, isn't he? Taking advantage of their ignorance and kindness. He wants so badly to push that feeling away, but each time it just comes back at him and eats at his insides.

The apartment is much hotter all of a sudden, despite it being the top floor of the building and also one of the coldest nights of the year. Izuku pulls off his new All Might sweatshirt and shakes his head against the dizziness it causes.

"Sometimes I just feel so homesick for a place that doesn't even fucking exist." The words come out rough and jagged around the edges, and Izuku digs his palms into his cheeks to try and stop the scream from leaving his lips. He is so angry.

He's frustrated and sad and guilty and everything in between, and the worst part is he doesn't even know why.

There's an inkling there, a nasty voice at the back of his mind that tells him you know exactly fucking why, and you just don't want to admit it to yourself.

"Pathetic. Useless. Traitor."

He's starting to shake now, and Izuku's hands slide off his face and hit the counter with a thud. Get over yourself.

There's a short hiss to his left, and he looks over and sees that Missy is on the arm of the couch, sitting with her paws tucked neatly under her tail, ears flat against her head. She must have already finished eating.

Izuku shakes his head. "Does that make me a bad person? Does it?"

To want more than I have? To want more than I deserve?

The cat just cocks her head and mewls, ears coming back up to its normal position.

She's probably judging me, Izuku thinks sourly, but then she lets out another noise and the boy realizes with a start that she must be begging for more food.

He forces out a smile and goes to get some of her treats, snorting as she immediately jumps off the couch and comes up to him with her tail held high.

She's always polite and gentle when he gives her treats. She'll take them right from his hand, which was kind of surprising at first. He expected a cat like her to not trust him at all until at least a couple months in, and yet here they are.

He watches her chew the small treats and sighs.

"I'm sorry. You'd probably be better off without someone like me taking care of you." He bends down to pet her a little. "Guess we're both stuck with each other now, huh?"

She purrs and slinks off down the hallway, as elegant as always. She goes to sleep right after eating, and Izuku usually does the same.

But now he can't, can't even stomach the mere thought of it, so the only thing to do is straighten up the house and finish some of his projects. His AI is already completed, he just has to take it for a test run during tomorrow's patrol, maybe see how well it holds up. He's worried about the durability.

Oh shit. He doesn't have training tomorrow morning because of the entrance exam. All Might is apparently proctoring it. Possibly to root out potential successors, Izuku guesses. Or maybe because he has to be there since he's just starting out.

Ugh. He doesn't even want to think about UA or heroes right now. His fight with Kacchan is still fresh.

Izuku winces when he remembers how All Might looked at him after telling him about the proctoring. He almost looked... resigned. Because Izuku hasn't changed his mind about going? Or because of something else?

And now that he's thinking about it, maybe Izuku's disappointment in himself is because of this. He just wants to make the man happy, even if he knows it's futile.

Well. Unless.

He thinks of All Might's blinding smile as he tells him the words Izuku has always wanted to hear but never dared to believe in: "Even someone with a villain's quirk can be a hero, my boy."

He thinks of Present Mic patting his shoulder while laughing at one of his own jokes, just barely keeping a hold on his quirk.

He thinks of Eraserhead's burning gaze as he hands him that packet, of the no-nonsense way he speaks to people. The man wouldn't have bothered with Izuku if he didn't think he was worth it.

And lastly, he thinks of Kacchan. How many times has his friend tried to convince him to try harder? To chase after this age-old dream?

He remembers being just shy of six years old and gripping Kacchan's slightly sweaty hand, both of them outside in their All Might onesies with not a care for the world.

"We're gonna be heroes together, right Kacchan?"

"'Course, ya dumb nerd! We'll be the best!"

And he believed him then, too, because why wouldn't he have?

All Might, Present Mic, Eraserhead, Kacchan—they all believe in him, don’t they? Even if it’s fake, wouldn’t it be more of a waste to disappoint them? To have wasted all of their efforts, big and small?

Izuku’s eyes slide over to the discarded papers on his desk, buried under a mountain of notebooks and his Rabbit costume.

He’s going to regret this. He’s not thinking correctly. He really is going to hate himself in the morning.

“They’ll still take them up until the night before.”

He has thirty minutes to spare. He can bullshit his way through this like he’s done with everything else in his life.

Izuku lets out a shaky breath and grabs the UA application.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

UA is enormous.

Izuku finds this out the second he steps onto the school's street. Sitting atop of a forested hill that looks out over Musutafu, UA is huge.

Which is unsurprising given the fact that it's the number one ranked high school for heroics in Japan and, in Izuku's opinion, the world. It has an alumni of famous and successful pro heroes, including that of All Might himself, Endeavor, and even Best Jeanist.

Most of the top heroes all graduated from the same place; that in itself speaks volumes on the credibility of UA's teaching. That's why it's near impossible to even get in.

So, to put it simply, Izuku is nervous.

The campus itself is usually gated and protected from criminals and reporters, but now it stands open for the hundreds of examinees going in. Guests would normally have to have a special ID card to be allowed in—at least, that's what All Might told him, but now isn't the case.

He really shouldn't be here. Nope. The open gate in front of him isn't welcoming at all; it's like the UA Barrier is jeering at him from where it arcs high above him. Like it's just daring him to go through with this.

To be honest, Izuku is surprised his application was even accepted. He does have a criminal record, after all, even if it's not that bad. It's not like he could lie about those specific records either; they most likely would've done a security check and disqualified him immediately for falsifying documents.

UA is very serious about legalities, as the principal and staff can get into a lot of trouble if something were to go wrong regarding students or training.

Izuku had taken pictures of the many pages of the application and emailed them to the principal a few minutes before twelve last night.

There must've been a filtering system attached, as he received the verification email less than a minute afterwards. He'd spent a good twenty minutes before that trying to figure out what he could lie about, however. UA asked for a lot of things: his parent's name and occupation, phone number and address, medical records, a birth certificate, and so on.

It's not like he could put down abandoned building a couple miles away from the bank as his address, so he did end up lying about that, among other things. He just had to make sure that his lies were believable, and also foolproof. Again, he couldn't lie about his criminal record, as that's easy to look up. He just hopes that everything he put down won't be looked into too much.

But anyways. UA is much larger than he expected.

It has to be, he guesses, seeing as the school offers a wide variety of courses to take besides heroics. They have a range of classes, too, like most other schools: A—K. For every letter there's two more of the same class, which means there's thirty three classes always active there. To accommodate all of their students, UA has to be large.

Izuku takes a deep breath and forces himself to move forward. He's only a few minutes early; if he wants to be on time for the written exam he has to get going.

I can do this. They all believe in me. Eraserhead gave me that application directly, I can't disappoint him or—

He trips on air, having been too focused on not chickening out to remember how to walk correctly.

Or I'll just embarrass myself here and become one with the sidewalk. I wonder if UA will let me become their doormat. That's honorable.

His face is hovering over the ground a couple feet, and when he looks down he notices that so are his legs. Huh.

Is this death? He's just floating there, what the fuck.

There's a giggle to his left, and his head snaps up to see a pretty girl with shoulder length brown hair standing right next to him.

"Uh, hi?" He squeaks, because he's still in the air; does that mean she's an angel? He wouldn't be surprised either way.

She laughs again and takes his shoulder to set him down, and Izuku is overcome with dizziness as gravity seems to work again.

“I stopped you with my quirk!” The brunette smiles, fingertips meeting together to form some sort of praying gesture. “I’m sorry I didn’t ask first, but I figured you wouldn’t mind me catching you!”

Izuku just stands there, mouth slightly agape and cheeks reddening. She’s really cute, he thinks. She’s also a girl. He hasn’t talked to many girls before, at least not as Midoriya Izuku. Rabbit gets all kinds of fans, though. But this is different.

He didn’t even hear her come up to him. He’d been so preoccupied with his nervous thinking and doubts that he hadn’t paid any attention to his senses. Now that he can see her, though, he can feel the presence of her quirk burning at his skin. Hm. Another strong power.

It must have something to do with weight and gravity, as she just stopped him from falling. Can she make things float up, or just leave them hanging? And it looks like it’s touch activated, given by the weird praying-gesture she’s doing. Maybe that’s what releases it, or maybe what keeps it active?

And now Izuku feels like an asshole. She must’ve said something before that and he hadn’t answered her. What was it? Something about this all being nerve-wracking? He has to apologize, and also thank her for saving his dignity. She seems really nice, so it’s only polite to—

“Deku?”

Oh fuck. Izuku stiffens, all previous thoughts abandoning him. He hadn’t been planning on seeing Kacchan this early on in the exam. Actually, he’d been hoping that he could avoid his friend the entire day.

“Nope,” he says, not bothering to turn around as he tries to speedily make his way towards the steps, hoping to get a chance to see the girl again. “Wrong number.”

“Deku!” A hand grabs his shoulder and spins him around. Kacchan is glaring at him now, a scarf wrapped around his neck. “The fuck are you doing here! You said you wouldn’t take the exam.”

“Honestly? I don’t know what I’m doing here either.”

“You changed your mind? Why?”

Izuku shrugs off the hand, aware of the stares and whispers coming from the passing examinees. “Wow, it’s almost like you don’t want me here, Kacchan.”

“Don’t be stupid.” The blond starts to drag him towards the entrance. “I’ll let it go for now, shitty nerd, but don’t think you’re getting out of telling me just what the fuck happened. We’re gonna be late for the written portion.”

Izuku is resigned, and as the duo walk into the large building and follow the signs to their testing room, he wishes it wasn't illegal to punch people for seemingly no reason. He doesn’t want to punch Kacchan—well, not now, at least—he wants to punch the bitches who are whispering around the pair as they walk past.

“Isn’t that the boy who held up against the sludge villain?”

“What’s his name again? Bakugou or something?”

“Yeah, he’s the real deal.”

Izuku takes his water bottle out of his jacket pocket and chugs some of it, willing himself not to snap at them. Don’t they realize it’s not nice to bring up somebody’s trauma?

“Are you drinking?” Kacchan asks suddenly, staring at the bottle in his hand. He obviously doesn’t think it’s water.

“Uh, no?” Izuku frowns. “I wouldn’t drink on school campus, Kacchan; I’m not that dumb.”

Izuku doesn’t miss the disbelieving look that passes over his friend’s face.

It turns out that the written exam was easier than Izuku worried it to be. In fact, it seems that he and Kacchan overstudied for it.

Most of it was multiple choice; simple questions about the main four subjects: math, science, Japanese, and history. But then they also had a few open-ended questions about quirk laws and management. Izuku's favorite part, however, was the mini essay on the very back. You only needed to write one page, but Izuku ended up doing five, and that's only because he almost ran out of time.

The essay contained an analytical question that needed to be answered in the form of neat and well-thought out paragraphs. It was a situation about what to do first in the case of a fiery villain attack in the middle of a crowded city. Most of it was easy and simple, at least to Izuku. He answered it to the best of his ability, pencil scratching against the multiple pages at a furious pace.

He must've looked crazy to the others around him. Oh well.

And so here they are, in the UA auditorium, waiting for the short presentation given before the last exam.

The lights suddenly flick on, and Izuku feels the color drain from his face as he sees who's standing on the stage, clad in his full hero costume. Oh, come on.

"What's up UA candidates!" Present Mic screams, making vague gestures with his hands and body. "Thanks for tunin' in to me, your school DJ! Come on and let me hear ya!"

The silence that follows makes Izuku cringe. He would've screamed back had he not been worried about Present Mic recognizing him and calling him out. Izuku shivers just thinking about it.

"Tough crowd, huh? That's alright, I'll skip to the main show! Let's talk about how the practical exam is gonna go down, okay? Are ya ready!" The projector hums to life and displays a huge diagram of UA and its side buildings. "Like the application said, you boys and girls are gonna be out there conducting ten minute mock battles in super-hip urban settings!"

This is weird. I've spent so much time around him when he's off-duty that I forgot how he usually acts around other people.

"Gird your loins, my friends. After I drop the mic here you'll head to your specified battle center, sound good?"

Oh, that's right. Izuku looks down at his card and examinee number. His is one number after Kacchan's, which is why they're sitting together, so that must mean they made the seating chart based on your education.

We went to the same elementary school. They probably didn't know where to put me since I took middle school online, so they just put me next to one of my old classmates.

In UA's defense, Izuku did turn in his application literally last night. It's not like the school had much time to figure out his placement.

Izuku has battle center B while Kacchan has A. The boy doesn't know if he's relieved or disappointed. It'd certainly be harder to get points with his friend in the same center, seeing as Kacchan will most definitely try and take all the robots for himself, but he also kind of wanted the extra motivation.

The blond huffs. "They're splitting us up so we can't work together."

"As if you'd ever work together with me," Izuku taunts. "And my examinee number is one higher than yours, which means I'm automatically better."

Kacchan glares at him. "Stop looking at my card, shitty nerd."

"Okay, okay! Let's check out your targets. There are three types of faux villains in every battle center. You'll earn points based off their level of difficulty. Your goal in this battle is to use your quirk to raise your score by shredding these faux villains like a mid-song guitar solo!" Present Mic does another weird entertainer's pose. "But check it! Make sure you're keeping things heroic. Attacking other examinees is a UA no-no, ya dig?"

Izuku sticks an elbow in his friend's side. "Damn. There goes your plans, Kacchan."

He just barely ducks the swing to his head.

Izuku looks at the projector again, this time realizing that there's only three robot silhouettes. The sheet he'd picked up before entering the auditorium states there's four, however, so something's not right. Hm. It must be a surprise factor. They're obviously keeping it quiet for a reason, Izuku figures.

It seems he's not the only one to notice this.

“Excuse me, sir, but I have a question!”

A spotlight suddenly shines on the new speaker, and Izuku stares at the tall, blue-haired boy as he stands up with his hand straight in the air. He’s kinda handsome.

“On the printout there’s four villains listed, not three. With all due respect, if this is an error on official UA materials, it is shameful! We are exemplary students.” Izuku calls bullshit on that. “And we expect the best from Japan’s most notable school. A mistake such as this won’t do!”

Kacchan mutters something that sounds suspiciously like fucking goody-two-shoes, and Izuku hides a snort behind his palm.

“And additionally, you with the unkept hair!” The boy spins around and points right at Izuku, glasses shining in the projector’s light. “You’ve been muttering with your friend this entire time! Stop that. If you can’t bother to take this seriously, leave! You’re distracting the rest of us.”

Alright, damn. Just call him out like that. He doesn’t seem as handsome anymore.

“Hah?” Kacchan says loudly, eyes promising death. “Only I get to make fun of the damn nerd! Get that stick outta your ass, you fucking extra, and then we’ll talk.”

“That language of yours is hardly appropriate, I must ask that you—”

“Ya wanna know what I think about my language?” Kacchan raises a palm menacingly, and Izuku has to slap his arm down and pull his friend back into the seat when he starts to get up.

The blue-haired boy is a couple rows down, but Izuku knows that wouldn’t stop Kacchan from going after him. “Quit it! You’re embarrassing me!” Turning to look at the taller teen, Izuku dips his head quickly. “Sorry.”

The boy’s eyes just narrow, but thankfully Present Mic saves the day. “All right, all right, examinee number seven-one-one-one! Thanks for calling in with your request.” A new silhouette suddenly appears on the board. “The fourth villain type is worth zero points. That guy is just an obstacle we’ll be throwing in your way. There’s one in every battle center, but try and avoid it, yeah? It's not that it can't be beaten, there's just kinda no point! I recommend you listeners try and ignore it to focus on toppin' the charts."

Blue Boy sits down after bowing stiffly. "Thank you very much! Please continue."

He seems nice, Izuku thinks, still holding onto his seething friend's arm. But still blunt and a bit impolite.

"That's all I got. I'll sign off with a little present: a sample of our school motto! Just as General Napoleon Bonaparte once said..."

Izuku stops listening to the voice hero the moment he hears the name Napoleon, and he groans quietly to himself. Boring. They must be forcing the voice hero to say this spiel, as Izuku knows Present Mic would never stray this far into the rabbit hole. He knows how to entertain, but now he's just spewing school bullcrap.

"...Are you ready to go beyond? Plus ultra!" The man pumps a fist in the air, getting no reply back—no surprise there. "Good luck, and I hope you practiced hitting more than just books."

The bus ride to his battle center isn't long at all, barely three minutes. Again, the fact that they have to take a bus to get to the other side of UA's property is jaw-dropping in itself. UA is rich rich.

Izuku and Kacchan separated at the station, leaving the boy all alone. Which isn't a big deal, really. As long as no one talks to him he should be fine. It's not like he's going to go out of his way to talk to any of the others, anyway. That would be dumb and—

It's the girl from earlier! The one who stopped me from falling!

The brunette is standing in the middle of the crowd of other examinees, looking incredibly nervous. She must be stressing out about this, and Izuku can relate, albeit for an entirely different reason.

He should go talk to her and thank her. He might be able to get her mood up if he cracks a joke.

Izuku forces his legs to move forward, only for an arm to block his way.

Fuck. Blue Boy is back, and it looks like he's already judging him. His gaze flits from Izuku to the girl in question, and then back to him.

“She looks like she’s trying to focus on the trials ahead,” he says. “What are you gonna do? Distract her and ruin her chances to succeed?”

Izuku bristles. “No, no, of course not! I was just gonna thank her for helping me earlier!”

And great, now everyone else is looking. They’re talking about him now, he can feel it. The attention makes him feel small, and Izuku clenches his fists to stop himself from snapping at the boy. He seems nice, if a little pretentious, so it’s not right for Izuku to get upset.

He’s more upset over the fact that everyone else seems to have already written him off, like they think he won’t be able to bring forth anything to this battle. It sucks.

A loud voice comes from above, and Izuku looks up to see Present Mic on a tall tower. “Right, let’s start! Get moving!”

Now that is a command that Izuku knows how to follow. Hell, he’d do just about anything to get away from Blue Boy at the moment. All he has to do is move, and so he does. His limbs burn with the sudden use of power, and he darts through the unsuspecting crowd and rushes inside the battle center.

He’s the first one in, and hopefully he can keep that place on the leaderboard.

“He’s got the right idea!” Present Mic shouts from behind him. “There are no countdowns in real battle, listeners, you’re wasting airtime!”

Izuku can hear the thundering of footsteps behind him and giggles to himself. This is more like it. He practically thrives in battle; he loves the thrill of it. It’s familiar, it’s easy, and he lives for it.

This challenge is the most fun he’s had since he spray painted that dick on one of Endeavor’s billboards.

Don’t judge him. It’s not a crime to deface trash.

Right. So there’s three robots, each worth their own respective amount of points. The higher the number, the more difficult it is to take them down. Sounds easy enough. The only thing to do is actually find them now.

Izuku finds that that's not going to be a problem about two seconds after thinking that, because as soon as Izuku rounds the corner of a street, a huge metallic claw comes crashing down, just barely missing him.

He jumps up and twists his body, leg coming up to kick off the head of the robot, revealing a set of wires and switches underneath. It's still standing, though, and that's when he sees the painted two on it. This one's worth two points, then.

He grabs one of its large fingers and yanks, driving a punch through the middle of its torso. It falls into a heap on the ground, and Izuku wastes no time before sprinting off again.

Oh, this is exciting. Extract is going crazy right now. There are a lot of other examinees in the battle center with him, and he can feel their power all around him. He kind of wishes he could use his quirks to help him out with everything, but he knows there's cameras watching his every move. He can hear the thrum of the drones flying above.

The robots seem to cluster together the closer Izuku gets to the middle of the faux city. Sometimes in pairs, sometimes more.

He is in the middle of the main road, fighting off three robots, one of them a two-pointer and the other two three-pointers, when he realizes that they can be turned off manually.

He dodges a heavy blow from the robot behind him and picks up a piece of shrapnel leftover from one of his other kills, swinging it like a bat at the nearest robot's face. It pops off like something from a cartoon, and Izuku watches as the head hits the third robot in the face and sends it stumbling back. Izuku braces himself and throws the long piece of metal like a spear. The robot shuts down immediately when it gets stuck to the concrete wall, Izuku's makeshift katana sticking out of its abdomen.

Oh, what Izuku would give to have his bōstaff right now.

He goes to fight off his other robot, only to find that the laser beam dude has already taken care of it. The back panel of the machine is open, revealing the same set of wires and switches that he'd seen on the other one. There's one switch, and Izuku can recognize the pattern of the wires and placement of them to realize that this must go to a signal.

It's must be controlled by a program being broadcasted, not by someone watching through its eyes. If Izuku had a little time to spare, he could probably search for the head robot that carries the signal and tear it up, effectively shutting all the remaining robots down at one. But he won't. That's cruel. The other contestants wouldn't have a chance, and who knows how far the range is and if it'll affect the other battle centers or not.

What he will do, however, is take parts of the panel that already fell off of the robot and pocket them. That's expensive metal! Izuku can get a lot of money for it if he sells it to a local scrapper. Or he can use it for himself.

He takes a few pieces and helps a boy up from the rubble of another three-pointer, only nodding in acknowledgement to the thanks he gets in return.

How many points does he have now? He's lost count. And what about the time? They have to at least be five minutes in already.

He wonders how Kacchan is fairing at his battle center.

Izuku spots another robot sneaking up on a girl with vines for hair. She's preoccupied with fighting two, so she doesn't see the one coming up behind he. The boy immediately jumps it, smashing it against the wall with a powerful kick. It was only a one-pointer, so it's down instantly.

The girl gives him a grateful look before returning to the fray, and Izuku does the same.

"Two minutes left, listeners! Get in your last points!"

He's getting a little tired now. He's gotta slow down before he uses too much of his energy. He should have enough points. There's nothing wrong with him taking it slow for a bit, right?

But then there's rumbling. The entire earth shakes and windows rattle as something opens up in the ground around ten buildings away from Izuku.

And holy fucking shit, that's a big bitch.

Standing at what has to be at least a hundred and fifty feet tall, the robot's multiple eyes gleam red as it starts to saunter its way forward, destroying the obstacles in its path with ease. That must be the zero-pointer. The one that Present Mic told them to run from.

The one that the examinees are running from. A lot of them are screaming as they sprint past him, actually. Izuku realizes that he's the only one standing in place, staring in awe at the flawless machinery and design, and he's just about to turn around and head for the exit when a cry rings in his ears.

His head snaps forward, his eyes zeroing in on the figure that's right below the robot, trapped under a large slab of concrete.

Izuku recognizes the light brown hair and is moving before he can think differently. Great. This is just like the speeding car and little girl situation, except this one probably won't end in death or severe injury. At least he hopes so.

She might get stepped on. Aren't there any pros monitoring this right now? There are cameras all around here, there's no way they don't see her right there. Guess he's gotta do it himself.

Izuku forces more of his energy into his legs and knees and jumps onto the edge of a building, hands scrabbling for a hold on the windowsills. He climbs up further and leaps off the wall and onto a nearby roof. He's gotta get to the robot before it gets to her. Maybe he can distract it by fighting it.

He flies across the rooftops of the buildings and squints his eyes against the glare of the sun. He's still not high enough to reach its head, and he needs to if he wants any chance of defeating it. The head is the weakest part.

There's a camera flying by, Izuku can see it hovering right in front of the looming machinery. The girl is still struggling down below, and that knowledge alone is enough to put the idea into Izuku's head.

He veers to the side and springs off the edge of the roof. The camera is large, so it should be able to carry his weight and then some. He lands on it and uses it as a springboard to soar across the remaining distance. The robot's face is right in front of him now, and his fist pulls back, his breath catching in his throat.

And later, when he looks back on this moment, he'll say that that's probably the dumbest idea he'd had in about four minutes time.

His hand goes through the metal of its face, shattering a hole right next to its eye. It does nothing but poke a decent sized hole, however, and his wrist and knuckles explode in white-hot pain. Fuck. He must've just broken his hand. Of course he did. That's straight metal. Reinforced metal. Much stronger than the other, smaller robots.

Wow, he's just the sharpest tool in the shed, huh?

The robot is still moving, even with him holding onto it with one broken hand. He swings his lower body up and uses his legs to smash into the hole yet again. It widens up, and Izuku is relieved to see that the inside is hollow.

He crawls inside the opening, fighting to stay balanced as the robot shifts and tries to get him out. And hah, there it is, the power source!

He was right. This is the one that's sending out the signals to the other ones. It's been active this entire time. Izuku grabs the control panel with his good hand and fucking tears it out.

Electricity sparks from the outlets, liquid pouring from the side of one of the holes. Izuku feels the blood drain from his face. Oh fuck. Bad idea. Bad idea.

Everything starts to crumple in on itself with him still inside, which is very bad because that means it's going to—

Izuku uses one last burst of power from his his legs to spring forward and out of the hole he made, twisting like a corkscrew just as the robot implodes. The parts go flying. Shrapnel flies past his ears and heat licks at his back. He screeches like a dying bird as he plummets through the air, because oh, he's so much higher than he thought he was when he jumped on the camera.

And shit. He's going to hit the ground hard unless he uses Pull, or maybe even Deflect to help with the impact, but honestly he'd rather die than have that can of beans opened. He tries to right himself to land on his legs, knees slightly bent, as he knows that that's the most promising way to land without a parachute.

This kind of reminds me of the whole helicopter bomb thing. Kinda ironic.

The ground rises up to meet him and Izuku braces for the pain, only for a hand to slap him right in the face before he can touch down, making him float again.

Either that or he's actually dead.

He flops onto the concrete when the anti-gravity quirk releases him from its hold. He can barely think with the adrenaline still pumping through his veins and ears. His hand hurts like fuck, but he's had worse.

Izuku lifts his tired head to stare at the brunette, who has, for the second time, saved him from falling. "Hey, thanks for that. I—"

The girl promptly throws up a sea of rainbow and sparkles, and Izuku blinks a few times before turning away to give her privacy. Must be an effect of her quirk. Maybe quirk overuse, which explains why she couldn't get the slab of concrete off of her quick enough in the first place.

Fucking UA and their dangerous and slightly unfair entrance exams.

Izuku finds that the concrete here tastes amazing, almost like it's artificial. This is 10/10 the best concrete he's ever had the pleasure of nearly dying on.

The timer runs out, and Izuku faintly hears Present Mic yell about the exam being officially over. Eh. He doesn't really care in this moment.

He doesn't know how much time passes before a cane pokes him in his side. He was busy trying to take a nap, so he grumbles when he's nudged onto his back, only for his eyes to blow wide open. He knows who the person above him is. He's studied her in his medicinal textbooks!

"Hey there, sonny," Recovery Girl says, voice just slightly raspy with age. "Lemme see that hand of yours."

Oh my god, it's actually her! She's so much smaller in person.

Izuku is aware of the lingering examinees standing off to the side. They must've come back once the zero pointer was defeated. He sees Blue Boy staring very intensely at the ground, seemingly lost in thought. Izuku wonders what he's thinking about now.

"Come here, sugar, and eat these gummies while you're sitting there." She takes his hand gingerly and kisses it after handing him a few vitamins, making Izuku's face practically catch on fire. His embarrassment is short lived, though, as he watches with awe as his hand is enveloped in green light before returning back to its original color.

It doesn't hurt at all anymore. It's—it's completely fixed. That's a lot cooler when I'm not reading it in a textbook.

Izuku doesn't pay attention to the laser beam guy explaining Recovery Girl's job and quirk, as he already knows about all of it and then some. What he does want to know is why the other boy knows about her, too. Oh, maybe they share the same interests!

Recovery Girl hands out more gummies, praising them all and their abilities, but before Izuku can work up the courage to talk to either her or the laser guy, everyone is being ushered out of the arena, being promised with results in only a week's time.

He leaves without a word, trying to escape any possible conversations with the others now that his social battery has run out. He succeeds, for the most part.

And wasn't that some godly adrenaline there? He hasn't felt that high in forever, and it only lasted ten minutes! It felt like an hour to him, though.

That could've gone a little better, he thinks, but there's nothing to do about it now.

"Deku!" A familiar voice rings out, just as Izuku is about to step out onto the street leading down the hill. "Don't think I've forgotten about the fucking explanation you owe me!"

Izuku tenses, meeting Kacchan's primal gaze for only a moment before turning tail and running like his life depends on it, because it kind of does.

When Toshinori sees that familiar mess of green curls pop up on one of the large screens in front of him, he doesn't choke, but it's a close thing.

He swallows back the blood in his throat and jerks forward in his chair, aware of the sudden questioning looks he receives from the other teachers around him. He ignores them, though, as he's too focused on trying to make sure that his mind isn't playing tricks on him right now. Because this has to be fake. Midoriya isn't actually here, tackling two robots at once at an entrance exam he told Toshinori he wasn't even going to think about taking. There's also no way he's doing this good.

That's not to say Toshinori thinks Midoriya is incapable, of course not, it's just that he's never seen his trainee quite like this. He's never seen him in an actual battle setting, fighting off pieces of complex machinery left and right without so much as a breath in between. The change is refreshing, but it's also frightening because why didn't I know he could fight like this? We've sparred together plenty of times.

The camera on the screen changes to a bird's eye view of the center of the mock city, and Midoriya is lost against an ocean of other examinees and robots.

Toshinori is still reeling. He can't really process this. That is definitely Midoriya. His instincts are telling him so, and besides, there's not many other short boys with green eyes and hair in Musutafu these days. At least, not ones that he's seen.

But the fact that the kid is here, taking the exam, means that he had lied to Toshinori—well, not lied. He never promised anything to the hero. The only things he'd said to him were I don't know what I want to do yet, and I'm not going to UA. Toshinori is still uncertain about why he'd specifically said UA and not any hero school in general, but oh well.

The point still stands, though, that Midoriya never promised anything, so it hadn't been a lie. So why does Toshinori feel a little... sad?

He'd been willing to wait. Just a couple more years and Midoriya would've been eligible for the Commission's hero program. Not all pro heroes get their license by going to UA or other available schools. Some can't go to school, or never made it in to their ones of choice. Those aspiring heroes apply for the program the Commission offers once they turn seventeen and are then trained directly by other pros.

It's hard to get in, sure, but with the number one hero's recommendation, Toshinori is sure Midoriya would've done just fine. He would've done fine without a recommendation, he knows, but still.

That's how Hawks had done it, Toshinori is sure, and the young hero is already number three in approval ratings at the age of twenty-two. There's no reason why Midoriya wouldn't be able to do the same. But that plan would have only worked if the boy even agreed to it.

But again, Toshinori had been willing to wait. Hell, he'd even been working up the courage to tell Gran Torino about his trainee if only to get the old man's help in training him. He had been willing to get into contact with his scary as all hell teacher to get Midoriya the best resources he could for training. Yeah, that's how serious he is about this.

Now those plans are going down the drain, though Toshinori can't say he's upset about that. He's more upset about Midoriya not telling him. He had just seen him the day before, so why hadn't he mentioned this? Had he just now changed his mind, or had he kept it a secret as a surprise?

He doesn't know, but he's certainly not complaining. The boy is destroying those robots, after all. There's no way he won't get in.

This is great for Toshinori. Finally, the world seems to be spinning his way. He won't feel so guilty about making Midoriya his successor if the boy actually goes to hero school. He can be trained a lot easier that way. That's how Toshinori's master did it with him, after all.

But all of this excitement doesn't stop Toshinori from physically cringing when the camera changes again a few minutes later and he sees the boy use the camera like a trampoline. He jumps at the robot, fist reared back and brows furrowed in concentration, a certain gleam to his eye. It's when he sees his trainee nearly get blown up when he escapes from the inside of the head just before it implodes that Toshinori really does choke on his own blood.

Everyone in the room tenses as the boy plummets to the ground, and Toshinori can barely breathe until he sees the brunette Midoriya had saved slap him in the face and halt his fall.

He could've died, and yet the boy is smiling as Recovery Girl heals him a few minutes later, face split into a wide grin as he most likely fanboys over the healer and her quirk. He doesn't look too beat up, Toshinori notes, but it's still a reminder that things could've been so much worse.

The number one hero doesn't remember his own entrance exam being so... deadly. Or maybe that's just because he hadn't done something nearly as reckless as his trainee has.

"Who is that?" Kan asks, and Toshinori suddenly remembers that the blood hero is here because his next set of students will be in this mess of an exam. He has to know what he's working with, seeing as he'll be their teacher. Aizawa is there for the same reason, he's pretty sure. The man hasn't said a word to him this entire time, though.

"That would be one Midoriya Izuku," Nezu says, sounding way too pleased with himself as he types on his computer. "Aged fifteen with an emitter type quirk he calls Boost."

"Enhancements?" Kayama guesses. The R-rated hero is lounging off to the side, eyes twinkling as she watches the replays of the battles. She'd told Toshinori that she's only here because of Aizawa.

"Correct!" Nezu chirps. "Not very powerful at first glance, but it seems Midoriya has honed it to be quite the substantial ability."

"He got first place?" Toshinori asks, hoping he sounds nonchalant as he leans back in his chair and clears his throat. He wants to know how many points his successor—ahem, his trainee got, as it had certainly felt like a lot while watching.

The principal moves away from his computer to look at another monitor of his. "His points are still being calculated after the last robot, but as it stands right now, Midoriya is indeed first."

The sudden pride that runs through Toshinori is nothing short of euphoric.

Kan points to the monitor hanging on the wall. “Number two is that exploding kid from Battle Center A with seventy-seven points. None of them are from rescuing, which isn’t something we see very often.”

“Interesting.” Nezu balances a pen on a claw. “It also seems that both Midoriya and Bakugou went to the same elementary school, which would explain why my filters separated them into different centers.”

So that’s his friend, Toshinori concedes. He’s never met him, but he recognizes the name. Midoriya talks about him sometimes when they take the occasional break and eat some sandwiches. He hadn’t expected said friend to be such a riot, especially since Midoriya is like a walking ray of sunshine around the hero and couldn’t possibly be acquainted with a kid like that, but it’s nice to finally have a face to go with the name, Toshinori supposes.

Nezu tilts his head, something akin to a frown settling onto his face as he clicks to another tab on his computer. “It seems, however, that Midoriya has a criminal record. His name is attached to quite a few cases of public quirk usage, assault, and interference with police work.”

Toshinori shrinks in on himself at that, and he swears he can see Aizawa, who’s been hiding in the corner of the commentator’s box, shift on his feet out of the corner of his eye.

“To be quite honest,” the mammal continues, “I don’t know how he made it past my filters. His application should’ve been denied immediately.”

Denied. The word feels heavy in the air. Toshinori knows UA doesn’t joke around about that sort of stuff, so he feels his chest tighten a little bit. UA has a no-record policy, no matter what the charges are for.

Toshinori stiffens as he makes eye contact with Aizawa, who’s currently staring at him with such intensity that he has to fight a shiver. It sets the hairs at the back of Toshinori’s neck on end.

“What?” Aizawa asks, voice as monotone as always even while asking a question. Toshinori’s previous encounters with the man have given him the inkling that the underground hero doesn’t like him very much. “You know the kid?”

And isn’t that a loaded question? Aizawa is smart, Toshinori knows. The man has taken one comment and put the words under a microscope, nitpicking at the underlying details.

Toshinori smiles sheepishly. There’s no point in lying, is there? “Only a little bit, Aizawa. I’ve seen him around. Given him tips on training and whatnot!”

That's not suspicious at all.

Aizawa quirks a brow but still somehow manages to look uninterested. "You’re willing to vouch for a kid you’ve only met in passing?”

Okay, that’s a bit unfair. “Well, he just seems like a bright kid, Aizawa! And besides, aren’t you willing to as well? It hardly seems fair to put me in the spotlight here!”

The hero doesn’t skip a beat. “I’m vouching for him only because he doesn't have zero potential. He also happens to have gotten first in the exam. It would be a waste not to look into him.” Aizawa dips his head, face shadowed. “And as the number one hero, you’d think you’d be used to the spotlight by now.”

Haha, fuck. Why is Toshinori getting so flustered? It’s just a conversation; he doesn’t even have to reply. But now everyone is looking at him and alright, now that he’s thinking about it, maybe it is a little weird to just go out and stick up for a kid he probably has no business knowing, but still.

Before Toshinori can stutter out an answer, the door suddenly bangs open, revealing a disheveled Present Mic.

And that’s when Toshinori decides that he loves his blond coworker. He won’t be able to thank him enough for saving him from Eraserhead.

“Holy shit!” Yamada screams, voice cutting out midway thanks to Aizawa’s erasure. “Did y’all see the end there at Center B? Christ on a stick, Sho! Tell me you saw that!”

He gets a long-suffering sigh in response. “Unfortunately.”

The voice hero just laughs loudly and throws his arms around his friend. “Sho! Sho! You know that kid I was telling you about a while ago?" He shakes him like a child would a present on Christmas. "The one from the laundromat?"

"The one you refuse to stop seeing even though our washer was fixed months ago?" Aizawa asks quietly, still unimpressed. He looks irritated at having this conversation where everyone can hear, and Toshinori doesn't blame him.

He's not really a fan of social interactions either, which is surprising given he's literally the number one hero. He'd rather not get into all that, though, and more than once he's gotten in trouble with his publicist for accidentally missing a few requested interviews.

"That's the one!" Yamada is unfazed by the other hero's indifference. "Well guess what? Guess what, Sho!"

Aizawa seems to have disconnected from his body, however, so Kayama promptly answers for him, eyebrows wagging in delight. "Ooh, what is it, darling?"

That last part makes Toshinori only slightly less confident in his theory that the R-rated hero isn't currently dating anyone. It's hard to tell when she's being serious considering she's a dominatrix. She could probably be dating everyone in this room and Toshinori wouldn't realize it.

"It's the same kid! The one who blew up the zero-pointer!"

And now Toshinori is very confused, as well as a little concerned. What are they even talking about? Midoriya has mentioned meeting Present Mic in the past, but he's never mentioned anything about laundromat meetings.

Aizawa seems to be even more bewildered. "Midoriya?"

Yamada snaps his fingers. "Yep, that's him! I'd recognize the little listener anywhere!"

"Oh my god," Aizawa mutters, holding his face with a palm. "Hizashi, you idiot, why didn't you ever tell me his name?"

I'm definitely missing something here.

"Wait, what's the big deal?" The question just makes the black-haired man shake his head and stare blankly at the other for a few seconds, as if having a silent conversation, and it's not long after when Yamada gasps. “Oh, don’t tell me!”

Aizawa sounds incredibly tired when he speaks. “He’s the delinquent that’s been terrorizing Tsukauchi and I, Hizashi.”

As bewildered as he is, Toshinori can’t help but chuckle at that. It seems his trainee is more famous than he thought, though that might not be the best thing.

Yamada screams again, throwing his head back. “No way! You’ve gotta be fucking with me! We’ve both known him this entire time? No!” He cuts off in a wheeze, doubling over. "Sho that's fucking hilarious. How did you not—?”

He breaks off into another bout of laughter, making Toshinori smile. The voice hero is always good at brightening up a room.

“Well, that solves a few things,” Aizawa says. “Delinquents number two and three are the same kid, and apparently the fourth one I didn’t even know about is also one and the same.”

Four delinquents? Jesus.

Yamada sobers up quick. “The fourth?”

“All Might ran into him before, too, though I’m sure it runs deeper than that.”

Toshinori ignores the obvious jab and instead frowns. “Who’s the first?”

“Not important,” Aizawa says flatly, turning back to argue with Yamada about not telling me his name, damnit.

Ouch.

Kayama rolls her eyes playfully. “I’m sure you’ve heard of Rabbit, All Might. He’s been giving Shouta gray hairs for the past few months, though it’s obvious the kid’s grown on him.”

“The vigilante?” Toshinori asks, just to confirm it. “I didn’t know Aizawa was the one on the case.”

She smirks. “I have a few photos of a certain mural Rabbit painted of Sho, if you’d just give me a minute to find it. I’m sure you’d love to see it, hm?”

Toshinori perks up despite himself, only for Aizawa to whip around and glare at the pair.

“Not another word, Nemuri.”

Kayama just snickers and sends the underground hero a teasing look. “Don’t lie, Shouta, you told me you were flattered.”

“I thought it was beautiful,” Yamada agrees, wiping away a fake tear. “Truly a renaissance painting in its own right.”

The two heroes start to cackle, not at all worried about the growing irritation from Aizawa. The dynamic these three have is incredible, Toshinori thinks.

Kan must feel the same way, as the man curls his lips in mild disgust from where he’s sitting quietly near the other set of monitors, watching the conversation going on with mild interest. “You guys are weird,” he states plainly. “It’s a wonder you two made it to adulthood.”

“I was always in adulthood,” Kayama corrects, causing Yamada to burst into yet another fit of laughter.

Toshinori hides a snort at their antics. They’re way too funny when they’re together.

“If you all are quite done,” Aizawa interrupts pointedly. “I think Nezu has something to say.”

Everyone settles down immediately at that and looks at Nezu, who’s waiting patiently in his seat. “Thank you, Aizawa. I just wanted to say that the points have been calculated and are now displayed on the large screen.”

The projector on the wall flashes to life, and the teachers watch as the highest ranking students are counted down from ten. Everything seems normal, as most of it all comes out as expected anyway, until Midoriya comes up on the number one spot.

Toshinori can only gape at the two boxes next to the boy’s name labeled villain points and rescue points, because there’s just no way.

Yamada is the first to react. “What the fuck?” He screeches. “Is that even possible?”

“One hundred and ninety-eight,” Kayama observes. “That has to be a new record, right?”

It is. Toshinori would know that because he was the previous holder of said record, standing at a whopping one hundred and eight points. The only person who’d ever come close to that is Endeavor himself. For Midoriya to get ninety more points than him?

Toshinori is in equal parts flabbergasted and proud at the same time.

“I agree that such a high number is normally unachievable given the short time frame allowed,” Nezu starts, “so I must admit that I hold a little bit of fault for this unusual occurrence. You see, I made a small mistake in my previous calculations. Can either of you guess what that was?”

The number one hero internally winces. There always seems to be time for a pop quiz with the mammal.

Aizawa is the only one who answers, still sounding bored despite the events going on. “The zero-pointer was the primary transmitter for the other robots. Midoriya destroyed it less than a minute before the exam ended, so the signals were still going out. Destroying it disabled all of the active ones, which effectively immobilized them.”

“Very good,” Nezu nods. “If you look at the footage again, you can get a glimpse of the inside of the zero-pointer’s head. The transmitter seems to have been ripped out.” He lets a self-satisfied smile slip through. “Had Midoriya taken down the zero-pointer any other way, the panel probably would have stayed intact and thus continued to send out signals, as it was designed to do.”

The room is quiet for a few moments after that, and Toshinori can understand why. He’s having trouble wrapping his mind around this. “Do you think he knew?” He asks the principal.

“Perhaps. But whether or not he had won’t change the outcome, being that is he’s now currently the holder of UA’s highest record in history.”

Yep. Toshinori is so taking the boy out for lunch sometime. He deserves it after this. This is just—this is incredible! And the boy did it all on his own!

Kayama rests a chin on her palm, eyes squinting as she glances at Nezu's computer. "It says here that he's already completed all of his high school education, and he's currently working on a college site right now for a standard diploma. That's a lot of studying for a youngster."

Now, that's not really a surprise. Toshinori already knows that Midoriya is finished with high school, but he didn't know about the college thing. He wonders why the boy never mentioned that to him, as that's certainly a big deal given the fact that he's not even sixteen yet. That's a huge feat.

"Really?" Yamada whistles, brows rising to his hairline. "I knew the listener was smart, but damn!"

"If he's already finished with his required education, why are we even considering him? You can't go to high school twice."

That's Kan who's speaking again, voice a deep rumble.

I almost forgot he was there.

"Are you kidding?" Toshinori can't help but ask, pointing to a replay of Midoriya's takedown of the zero-pointer. "Did you see him in action? He earned the highest points out of all the examinees."

Nezu hums in agreement. "As Aizawa said, it would be a shame to let such a promising opportunity pass us by, would it not? His skills are remarkable, as is his strategic planning. It's also worth noting that here it says he left a small comment on the bottom of his application. He claimed that he's only here to try for the hero course, and that he's not interested in any of the others. I'm sure we're all aware that such courses are not offered in basic high school education, which I'm assuming is what he got."

The mammal is staring at the footage with something dark in his beady eyes, and all the teachers in the room let out a full-body shiver.

Damnit. I know you see his potential, too, Nezu. But lay off.

"Legally speaking, it's entirely possible for him to still attend UA and receive his hero credits despite having already done general high school education. It will, however, be up to his homeroom teacher to decide whether or not to require him to do non-heroics related classwork."

He's speaking as if the boy is already enrolled.

"Homeroom teacher, eh?" Yamada says, looking smug all of a sudden.

Toshinori understands why when he sees the look of dread flit across Aizawa's face.

"No," the underground hero says firmly. "Kan can have him."

But it seems that Nezu has already decided, if the manic laugh that escapes the principal is anything to go by. It's a lost cause at this point.

Everyone knows you can't stop the mammal when he's set on something.

Shouta honestly doesn't know what to think anymore.

He hadn't been expecting anything when he walked into the commentator's box and sat down with a few other teachers, screens laid out in front of them like every other time they've done this. He was supposed to be there to get a feel for his potential first years, as this year marks the time of a fresh new batch of students. His third years had graduated two years ago, and his last batch of first years were all expelled. He's trying for a new batch again this year. Hopefully they'll have more potential.

Shouta admits that he's relieved to not have to deal with any of his past students anymore.

Don't get him wrong, he loves his students—well, most of them, anyway—but they're a handful to deal with. He has a feeling this year's group is going to be even worse. Especially since he's been assigned Midoriya.

The kid who's acted way more suspicious in Shouta's eyes than most of the villains he's encountered, though that might be a little unfair to say since he doesn't even know why Midoriya seems suspicious to him, or even what Shouta thinks he'll do if his paranoia turns out right.

He was surprised to hear that the kid he'd been forced to chase after that first time they met is actually the same kid that Hizashi talks about all the time. The one who apparently goes to the laundromat around the same time every couple of weeks. That kid is bright, bubbly, and enthusiastic. His humor and love for heroes is off the charts, along with his laugh—which Hizashi has told Shouta about multiple times, each with growing fondness.

While the Midoriya that Shouta knows is definitely enthusiastic, the hero wouldn't go so far as to call him bright and bubbly. More like nervous and jumpy with a little bit of a troublemaker's mindset mixed in.

But what can you do? The revelation is certainly a big surprise, which is why Shouta is still thinking about it when he and Hizashi are driving home. They can at least enjoy the rest of the break in peace now that all of that is taken care of.

Shouta is leaning back in the leather seats, face turned just a little bit to look out the window when he asks the question. "Didn't you say you found him getting picked on?"

"Who, Midoriya?" Yamada continues at his husband's sharp nod. "Yep. The little monsters cornered him in an alley and took his notebook. They were hitting him, too."

Shouta frowns thoughtfully. "Why didn't he fight back?"

"Beats me, babe. They claimed they were just playing a game, though the kiddo obviously wasn't enjoying it. Had a cut on his eye and everything."

Hm. The entire situation has become even more interesting, if that's even possible.

Shouta doesn't like to butt into places where it doesn't concern him, mostly because he doesn't care enough, but also because he does actually believe in privacy. What's weird, however, is that he finds himself wanting to know more about Midoriya. About his situation. His home line.

From the moment he met him that night up until now, with him watching the kid break his goddamn hand to take down a robot for a high school exam, everything has just been one giant question mark surrounding his name.

And Shouta didn't really mind much at first. He had no reason to care. Midoriya is just some teenage delinquent with a probably subpar father and living situation. Nothing too crazy or out of the ordinary. Now, that would've been okay with Shouta. That would've been enough for him to just leave it at that.

But now that he's getting to know a little bit more about Midoriya, the more he's beginning to realize just how little he really does know.

Shouta knows Midoriya could've fought back in the situation Hizashi described if he wanted to. Very well, in fact. The kid has no qualms with picking fights with actual criminals and potential murderers or thieves, so why wouldn't he in that particular circumstance? Sure, it's different with other children. The law is strict about using your quirk on underage kids, but Midoriya is underage, too. He could've claimed self-defense.

It would've been so easy for him.

Shouta wasn't there, obviously, so he can't really judge, but from what Hizashi has told him, the fight wasn't too brutal. It's still unacceptable, of course, and Shouta wouldn't have stood for it at all, but it wasn't too bad. Midoriya displayed incredible skills at the exam, which confirms to Shouta that the boy could have easily laid those 'friends' out if he so wished.

Was he scared? Is that why he didn't fight back?

Shouta shakes his head. There are too many thoughts running through his mind now, too many unanswered questions.

He couldn't have been more happy to sink onto the couch in their shared apartment after the short drive back. The day seems to slip by, but it happens ever so slowly. Shouta doesn't really mind that, however, not when he has his wonderful husband and three cats to share his life with.

His comfort never lasts long. The events of today are still fresh, and even when they're both supposed to be falling asleep, full from a very nice dinner that Hizashi cooked, Shouta keeps thinking.

Everyone did pretty well during the entrance exam. Shouta spotted several kids with good potential, which almost never happens right off the bat, by the way, and Shouta can already tell he's gonna have a harsh three years in store for him from this new group of students.

And Midoriya.

There's something off about him. Something familiar that he just can't put his finger on. He closes his eyes and keeps seeing the way the green-haired boy fought off three robots at once, ducking and weaving between blows and using fairly complex moves to finish them off. He noted the precision in which Midoriya used shrapnel from a fallen robot to pierce the body of another and pin it to a wall, allowing him time to get a powerful kick in.

He did all of this in the span of a few minutes, gaining the most points since All Might and Endeavor themselves even before defeating the zero-pointer, and he still managed to make time to help other examinees.

Midoriya is skilled. Shouta already knew that; he'd heard it from Tsukauchi, which means quite a lot saying that the detective doesn't praise just anyone. But to see it himself? To witness him fighting firsthand?

Shouta has seen Midoriya fight one time, and even then that was the first time he met him. He'd only gotten a glimpse of him knocking the criminal out, which then led to him having to chase the kid down a few streets to help out Sansa. What was the most confusing part of the night, however, was when he'd caught Midoriya slipping a flash drive from his sleeve into his pocket while Shouta was walking him home.

And if he's being honest, he doesn't know why he let the boy have it. The information on it wasn't anything earth-shattering, as he'd obviously gotten Tsukauchi's files from his office computer, but it did hold a few private records and contacts.

Shouta's contact, for one. That should've been enough for the hero to keep the flash drive and drag the kid back to the station to charge him with government theft, but he didn't. Which is confusing.

He never does that. He very rarely has a lot of patience or sympathy on the best of days, but he'd had just about none that night. And yet he still let him have it.

Again, there's something off about Midoriya. Something unsettling, but not quite in the he poses a threat to everyone around him sort of way, more of in a danger follows him around like some sort of bodyguard way.

And Shouta hates it because it's painful, it's familiar, and it might kill him.

It might kill him soon.

Izuku gets the text the next day.

It's only five words, but when he sees who it's from he gets excited, because All Might is texting him. Him—Midoriya Izuku. Sure, he's done it before multiple times, but it doesn't stop Izuku from feeling a little giddy.

His excitement is replaced with nervousness when he actually reads the text, however.

Meet me at Dagobah tomorrow!!!

Three exclamation points. Izuku is concerned. This can either mean All Might is really happy about something or really upset about something.

Izuku has a feeling it has to do with the entrance exam, because of course it does. The hero was there, after all. There's a high chance he saw Izuku at his battle center.

Is he angry at him? Disappointed? Izuku probably should have told him, right? Even though it was last minute. He owed him that much, at least.

When he shows Kacchan the text to get his opinion on it, the blond slaps him in the back of the head and tells him not to worry so much, which makes Izuku punch his friend in the arm in retaliation. They're walking back to the Bakugou household now. They just went paint-balling, and Izuku is ashamed to admit that it ended with Kacchan winning. Izuku may be a better shot when it comes to guns, but Kacchan definitely knows his friend's movements well.

They can predict each other almost perfectly.

But the next day, when Izuku is at the beach alone, with no Kacchan to make him feel better, he's tense. He's worried. He doesn't know what to expect from All Might when he sees the hero jogging down towards him from the top of the stairs leading to the parking lot.

For some reason, Izuku expects a hit, a lecture, maybe some disappointment, but what he doesn't expect is for the man to pick him up clean off the ground in his small form while spewing out praises and shouts of glee, spinning him around in a circle.

Izuku is pleasantly shocked, but also a bit sick because why are we going so fucking fast, holy shit, is this a rollercoaster?

The boy can barely even understand half of what the hero is saying, so he's grateful when he's eventually put back down on the sand, even though he immediately misses the close contact.

"Young Midoriya, why didn't you tell me you were applying!" The number one hero asks. "I would've put you in as a recommendation student if I had known!"

Well shit. Then I'm glad I only decided last night.

Izuku offers a slight quirk of his lips, rubbing at his arm. "I, uh, I guess I wanted to earn it?"

A small laugh, and then the hero is gripping his shoulders, soft blue eyes burning with intensity as he stares at him. "Well, that doesn't matter now. My boy, you did amazing! You blew us all away—quite literally with that last robot!"

I... did amazing?

Izuku turns red with embarrassment. "Yeah, that part was, uh, not really planned."

"I can tell, but even for such a rushed plan, you did remarkably well! And with such little injuries!"

Izuku wants to remind him that he did break his hand, but then thinks better of it. It's not like that's a major injury, after all. He's had worse.

And so Izuku settles on another shy question. "Did I pass?"

It's All Might's turn to look sheepish. "Well, I cannot tell you that, but I will say that you did just fine! There's no need to worry, trust me!"

And Izuku kind of does, because I wasn't worried about not getting in. I was worried about disappointing you.

They talk for an hour more after that, mostly about Eraserhead and Present Mic, and also about how Izuku never mentioned just how much he knows the heroes. Kacchan also comes up, along with why Izuku changed his mind about applying, so he repeats the same bullshit he told Kacchan about wanting to take risks, and he hopes the man takes the answer.

It's an enjoyable, if not slightly awkward conversation, as Izuku can tell something's wrong.

There's something off with the way All Might is carrying himself. There's a tenseness in his shoulders and a tightness near his eyes. He's hiding something.

For a while there, Izuku is convinced that he has upset the man. He doesn't know why or how, but he has, and it makes him feel terrible.

He's already come to terms with it by the time they run out of things to talk about, or at least until one of them brings up another hero or past life experience. Izuku is prepared for a lecture, for an apology before the words I'm stopping the training comes out. Because that's how it always happens, right? It begins with a false promise and fake hope, and it all ends with the truth of the matter being revealed.

But what's the truth in this case? Is it that All Might actually hates him and is disgusted by him now—because Izuku is sure that that's it. He's heard it from so many people on so many different occasions that it can't be anything but the truth now.

He's ready for it when All Might finally turns to him, face a bit grim now, hand on Izuku's shoulder. He thought he was ready for it, at least, but nothing could have prepared him for what his idol said next.

"My boy, I think it's time I tell you about One for All."

See the end of the chapter for more notes

All Might ends up giving Izuku a week to decide, which is honestly a lot more time than the boy deserves. It's not enough, though. Could any amount of time ever be enough? Not for this, Izuku thinks. Never for this.

He's running through the city, bōstaff clutched tightly in one hand as he glides over rooftops and street wires. It's getting a little warmer out, and he's incredibly thankful for that fact. His costume doesn't do much against the cold.

He has to distract himself, at least for a little while. Patrolling usually does the trick; it helps calm his nerves. Getting into little skirmishes with criminals helps ground him, in a way.

Because here's the thing: Izuku loves the fight. He loves it more than he loves living, because it feels good, because it's familiar, because it's the one thing he can control. Because as insane or sick as it sounds, the split second before his fist connects with bone and flesh is the only second where he can breathe.

And by god does he need to breathe at this very second.

He's very close to breaking down. He can feel it. He can feel the itch under his skin, the tightness near his eyes and mouth; everything feels so acutely wrong and he doesn't know why. Actually, scratch that, he does know. Just doesn't want to admit it.

Izuku already knows the story about One for All. Has known since the very beginning, even before All Might came into his life. How could he not with who his father is?

And that's another issue entirely. Izuku fights because it's all he knows. He wants to fight, because it's easy for him. He needs it, which is why he's out here today. This situation of his is peculiar, and it's making Izuku feel worse than ever.

He's leading All Might on. Deep down, there has always been that small inkling at the back of Izuku's mind that says he's only training me because he's getting old and needs a successor, but he's never let himself believe that for more than a moment. He's not a good choice to be anyone's successor, much less All Might's.

Izuku briefly wonders if All for One is included on that list, but then pushes that thought away. He doesn't need another reason to spiral into that pit of despair.

Maybe his thinking isn't entirely incorrect. Maybe he is nothing but a pawn in All Might's game, just the next step in the course to defeating the evil in this world, as that's what One for All's purpose is, right? To defeat All for One?

Would he have offered it to me if he knew who I was—no, who I am?

Izuku doubts it. He'd probably be in a dark prison cell if the number one hero knew. Tartarus doesn't sound too improbable, if he's being honest, but that would be the best case scenario. More than likely Izuku would be experimented on like some lab rat since having multiple quirks is practically unheard of.

The Commission has done it before. Izuku knows they won't hesitate to do it again, even with a child.

The other thing that's been nagging at Izuku is that he hasn't told Kacchan about All Might's offer. His friend will obviously be on board with it if it means Izuku will tell someone about his powers, which will never happen. Not if he has any say in it, at least.

And Izuku hates it. He hates the situation. Hates the lying and the confusion and the feeling in his gut that's telling him to just give in. He hates himself for even thinking about accepting the quirk. He already knew about it, of course, but it doesn't make it any better. He shouldn't even be near All Might, much less talking to him and training with him and eating fucking sandwiches with him.

He should've said no, right then and there. Right when the words One for All left the hero's mouth. It should've been simple, and yet here he is, thinking about it.

The explanation took a good ten minutes, and that was just All Might explaining the basics of what his quirk does and how the transfer works, of what Izuku, in all senses, shouldn't already know. And the boy stayed quiet the entire time, frozen in thought, because again, he had a feeling this would happen, but it didn't quite set in until that very moment.

"You don't have to say anything right now, Young Midoriya, I am merely informing you of what you might expect should you say yes."

Izuku doesn't speak. Can't speak. Because if he does, he might just blurt out that godforsaken word after all, and then everyone will end up dead one way or another.

"How does a week sound? I don't mean to pressure you."

The boy nods his head. He understands. Deadlines are deadlines. The number one hero has to move on to someone else if Izuku doesn't accept.

That's just the way the world works.

Izuku finds himself pacing on top of a bank near his building a few hours into his impromptu patrol. He never usually strays this close to his house, but it's whatever. It's not like there's specific territory he's not allowed to go in. Most areas are free range for him, being a vigilante and all. Minor rules such as no trespassing don't apply to him.

A gang runs this part of the town, he knows, but he's on good terms with them. They don't harm anyone innocent and never cause much property damage. If anything, the gang kind of protects the residents of this neighborhood from other, more violent organized crime units. So Izuku doesn't snitch on them or take them down, and in return they won't come after him. It's a win-win.

The bank he's on is still open, even at this time of night—well, morning, he should say, as it's currently one o'clock. The lights are still on despite practically no one coming in. That's always how it is in these parts.

The only people who go to a bank at this hour are robbers and vigilantes. And apparently, Izuku finds, underground heroes.

"A figure is approaching to your left."

It seems his AI works after all.

Izuku turns his head just in time to see Eraserhead drop down from a neighboring building and walk toward him, hands in his pockets.

“Rabbit.”

Izuku nods at the greeting and resumes his pacing, not offering any verbal reply.

They still meet at their spot every Friday, but nowadays they seem to see each other more often, even when they’re both patrolling on opposite sides of the city. Izuku is starting to think it’s not as accidental as Eraserhead says.

The hero doesn’t seem put off by his silence, though, and he stops a couple feet away to watch Izuku’s stressed walking. “You know, I was hoping to see you at the entrance exam.”

It’s more of a question. A baited one, at that. Izuku can identify it because he asks those kinds of questions all the time; that’s how you get information out of people. He doesn’t really mind the underground hero doing it to him, so he just plays along, still only half paying attention. “Who’s to say I wasn’t there?”

Eraserhead huffs, sounding amused. “Thought you’d say that. But to be frank, I don’t think you’d have jeopardized your position like that.”

Damn. That’s what Izuku thought, too.

The boy stops his pacing to glare at the other. “I don’t know if I should feel offended or not.”

“Depends on if you actually went and took it.” Eraserhead sits on the ledge, wordlessly beckoning him over. He’s obviously just teasing now; he doesn’t know what Izuku has done. “Here, I brought you something.”

“Please tell me it’s not your mixtape.”

The man shoots him an unimpressed look and throws something at him. “An egg and cheese sandwich, actually.”

“Oh.” Izuku frowns a bit. “Thank you.”

“No problem, kid. Now are you going to stand there all day or come sit down?”

Izuku’s legs move on their own accord. He’s eaten an early breakfast with the hero before, but never like this. And never this close to Izuku's house. If he looks, the boy can just see the top of his building less than half a mile away. It's kind of unsettling, knowing Eraserhead is this close to it.

That feeling is like the cherry on top to everything that's weighing him down right now. Those fears and doubts wash over him again like a tidal wave, and he finds himself glaring at the streets below, the sandwich still clutched between his hands.

Here he is, sitting next to Eraserhead on a roof like they've done a hundred times before, eating breakfast like he's not currently in the middle of a mid-life crisis. And yes, he's going to call it a mid-life crisis because he's not sure what part of his life could be considered the middle. In fact, now that he's thought about it, he's going to have an ongoing crisis.

Eraserhead chews on his own sandwich for a bit—turkey with mayo and mustard, Izuku guesses, as that's what he always gets—before glancing at him. "Came across a few villains tied up at a convenience store a couple blocks away. Was that you?"

Izuku is brought out of his thinking momentarily. "Uh, yeah, that was —that was me, I think." He laughs awkwardly. "Can't really remember right now."

Did he do that? Probably. His knuckles burn a little bit. His gloves only offer so much protection when he punches with his enhancements.

Eraserhead quirks a brow. "You alright?"

Izuku opens his mouth but nothing comes out, the weight of everything crashing down and constricting his throat.

He's not.

Izuku's breaths suddenly come shallow, too shallow. He can barely breathe anymore. But he sits there, face perfectly expressionless, body as still as possible while he's suffocating, knowing the man beside him can feel every centimeter of his movements, every single one of his tells.

They've known each other for quite a while now. Izuku doesn't want to lie, but he also doesn't want to appear weak. Because damn it all he should not be stressing this much over All Might's question; a question that should be easy for Izuku to answer. Why can't he just say no? It's the only option for him. The only choice.

His mind is telling him that it's a bad idea, that this hesitance of his will get him killed, that he'll hurt All Might, he'll hurt everyone. But his instincts are screaming at him to just accept it, because don't you want it? Don't you want that power?

The voice at the back of his head is back, and it's louder than ever. You're not stealing it. He's practically begging for you to take it. Do him a favor and just say yes. You want it.

"Kid?"

Izuku grits his teeth. He recognizes the tone and doesn't quite care for it. It's the tone Eraserhead uses to calm down civilians after rescuing them from a burning building or something. It's not soft, but it doesn't hold his usual gruffness either.

The hero is using that voice on Izuku now, and the boy doesn't like it. "I'm good," he grits out. Because he is. He's okay. As much as he can be, at least.

"Rabbit, are you—"

"Can I ask you a question?"

Eraserhead's gaze burns his skin, but the boy can't bring himself to meet it just yet. He takes the silence as a cue to continue, so he does.

"If someone offers you something that you know you shouldn't have, like you really shouldn't have it, but you really really want it—what do you do? Is there even a choice at that point?"

The sudden silence that follows his outburst stretches on for a good ten seconds, and Izuku winces. Just as he's about to open his mouth to say forget about it, I'm stupid, don't listen to me, Eraserhead speaks.

"I guess it depends on what that something is. For example," he tilts his head, "drugs."

Izuku chokes at the randomness, the sandwich very nearly falling out of his hands when he glares at the man. "What, no! It's not—it's not drugs. Why do you always assume that?"

"I don't. Just wanted to bring you back to yourself."

And oh. Izuku's eyes fall back to the ground, listening to the hero eat the last bite of his turkey sandwich before crumpling up the wrapper and shoving it in his pocket.

(Eraserhead is not, in fact, a litterbug. He's lectured Izuku twice before for throwing something on the ground during patrol. It's safe to say that Izuku doesn't litter anymore, and sometimes he even finds himself yelling at other people who do it.)

"Finish your food before it gets cold," the man orders, pointing to Izuku's own sandwich.

Izuku fights the urge to roll his eyes. It was already cold, he wants to say, but stops himself. He's definitely not ungrateful. And besides, egg and cheese sandwiches taste better cold. He will die on that hill before admitting otherwise.

"And to answer your other question," Eraserhead continues. "There's always a choice. It doesn't matter what anyone says you shouldn't do or have. The only thing you should consider is if you know you shouldn't have it." He stretches, his back popping a couple times. "But even then, most people are biased against themselves. I'm assuming you either can't or won't tell me what it is, right?"

Izuku just nods, feeling the tightness in his chest loosen up as he listens to Eraserhead's voice. The man is smart; he's logical. If Izuku wants anyone's advice, it's his.

"Okay. So I can't really tell you anything of use. What I can tell you, however, is that sometimes it's not always a bad thing to have something you think you shouldn't. Some of the best things in my life have come to me when I thought I'd be best without them."

Is it just Izuku, or is Eraserhead speaking almost wistfully now? He sounds fucking ancient.

"That being said," the hero nudges his shoulder, "do what you want to do. Just make sure you're safe, alright?"

Safe. Will Izuku be safe if he says yes? His first answer is no, not in a million years. Not with who he is and what he was made to be. But the more he thinks about it, the more Izuku realizes that maybe this isn't such a bad idea. The more he realizes that One for All will make him stronger. He can—he can protect himself, right? From who, he isn't quite sure.

And more than that, he can protect others. Sure, he's doing that right now, even when technically being a criminal. He's helping others, and that's enough for the moment. But in the long run, what good is he doing against top-tier villains? Against people like All for One?

Nothing. He's not strong enough for that. He won't be, not ever. But with One for All...

Is this selfish? Wanting a power he's not supposed to have just because of his blood? Wanting another quirk on top of the other stolen ones?

Izuku isn't the one who stole them, at least not all of them, but that doesn't really matter. What matters is that All Might chose him, so that has to mean something.

Or maybe Izuku is looking too far into this and All Might really is desperate. Maybe he doesn't really see Izuku for who he is, he just sees him as a potential vessel.

But would that be unfair to say about the man? With how much time he's put into Izuku?

"What's that on your wrist?"

The boy brightens up immediately, pushing aside his rising panic. So what if Eraserhead is just trying to distract him? He's grateful for it. "It's my new AI. Do you like her? I made her myself!"

"Holy shit, kid." Eraserhead leans closer to peer at the small screen on the boy's forearm. "From scratch?"

"I mean, I stole a few things from some dumpsters, but I put it all together."

The man laughs quietly. "'Course you did. What can it do?"

"It's a her! She's named AINA. Short for Artificial and Intelligent Notification Analyst. A mouthful, I know." Izuku taps on the screen, giggling at the surprised look that crosses Eraserhead's face when the device flashes to life as a mini hologram. "I programmed her to be kind of like a phone, but she can do a lot more than that. She has access to the internet, like most things, but she also has a mind of her own. Here, say something!"

Izuku disables the earbud feature and holds out his arm, gesturing for the hero to speak.

Eraserhead blinks at him in disbelief. “Uh, hello?”

“Welcome, Eraserhead. What activities would you like me to complete today?”

The hero tenses, causing Izuku to immediately wince. “Ah, should’ve warned you first. When I said she has access to the internet, I mean she has access to everything on the internet. She knows your real name, too, hope you don’t mind.”

“Guess I don’t have a choice,” he says, though he doesn’t sound upset. “I’m more surprised at how she recognized my voice.”

“Oh, she’s called an analyst for a reason! She can go through any security footage and match up faces with voices and stuff. Didn’t take me a while to get her coding done, but integrating her into my house and device here was a pain in the ass.”

Eraserhead hums. “That’s a lot of talent, kid. You’d make a damn good support hero.”

Support hero. The words hit him like freight train. Holy fuck, why didn’t I think of that? I could make devices for other heroes and wouldn’t even have to use my quirks.

Damnit. Maybe he should’ve applied for the support course. That would’ve been easier to juggle with the rest of his chaotic life.

When Izuku tunes back in, Eraserhead is already standing up. He looks to have been scrolling through the options and capabilities AINA has while Izuku was dissociating.

“It’s already past two, so I’ve gotta go, alright? My patrol ends soon.” He waits for Izuku to scramble up as well before holding eye contact with him. “Just remember what I said before. Be careful, but do what you think is right. You’ve got a good head, so I know you can do that, problem child.”

It’s said so casually that Izuku almost misses the nickname. He doesn’t whine or complain at the jab, but he does stop and stare at the man for a moment. Because why did that make him happy?

Eraserhead flicks one of the ears on Izuku’s hoodie, causing the boy to give a small smile underneath the mask. And maybe it’s still too sharp, and maybe it still doesn’t quite reach his eyes, but it’s altogether better than the ones he usually wears these days.

Izuku is breathing easier now. He doesn't feel that impending doom crushing him like how he felt just half an hour before. He feels lighter, if only by a little.

Eraserhead rests a heavy hand on Izuku's head before leaving, and the boy knows there's a chance when he doesn't automatically flinch away this time.

Maybe he has a choice in this after all.

"No. I refuse to fucking believe that shit's real!" Kacchan stands up from the couch and storms to the kitchen, probably to go aggressively help Mitsuki with dinner. "There's no fucking way you got that high of a score!"

Izuku, who's sporting a shit-eating grin, just shrugs. "Projector All Might doesn't lie, Kacchan."

The blond appears in the doorway again. "Bullshit! A hundred and ninety eight? You had to have cheated. Don't fucking spew that crap to me."

"I think you're just jealous that I beat you by, what is it, one hundred and twenty-one points?"

"And that's part of the bullshit!" He stomps over and takes the projector from Izuku's hands. "Fucking piece of shit."

Izuku giggles. "I told you what I did. That's not cheating."

"I want to see the footage. I won't believe any of that shit until I see it."

"They don't just give that out, Kacchan. You'll be waiting a long time."

"Son of a—"

Izuku uses Pull just in time to grab the projector before Kacchan can smash it into the ground. “Hey, watch it! You don’t know if we have to send them back or not! It looks expensive!”

His friend just rolls his eyes. “It said on the package we can keep it for memorabilia, dumbass. Now let me break it.”

“Uh, no? This one’s mine! You have your own to destroy!”

“I don’t care!” Kacchan grabs for it again, but Izuku just steps back and sticks his leg out. The blond trips and face plants into the couch, curses getting louder. “You fucking shitty nerd! Give it to me!”

“Fuck off!”

Izuku tries to run for it, but Kacchan is already balancing on the armrest like an angry cat. The blond jumps on his back and sends them both crashing to the floor.

Damn. I’m so glad I didn’t bring Missy. She’d get her fur scorched off.

Izuku rolls over to dislodge him, but Kacchan is still much bigger than him. Using a little bit of power, the green-haired boy knees him right where it hurts and shoves him off. He goes skidding into the dining room, face murderous.

Oh fuck.

Their scuffle turns into more of a brawl. Mitsuki joins in at one point to kick them out of the kitchen after they almost knock a boiling pot of water out of her hands. How they even migrated to the kitchen in the first place is beyond Izuku, but oh well.

“Come on,” Kacchan says, dragging him outside. “We’re settling this right now. I’m gonna beat you, and then you have to admit that I’m better.”

Izuku crosses his arms and digs his feet into the ground. “Nope. Just look at my points. I don’t gotta prove shit.”

In the next second, Izuku is letting out an oof as a fist hits his back and sends him falling forward. He chokes on a mouthful of dirt before groaning. The quick defeat doesn’t come as much of a surprise. The boy hasn’t slept in two days. He’s starting to hallucinate now. He swears there was a clown right behind Kacchan a few seconds ago, but he isn’t gonna be the one to point it out if it wasn’t true.

Hopefully he can rest later. It's not even Thursday, and yet he's still here.

He received the projector a few hours before now in the mail. The address he put down on his application is the same address he led Eraserhead to all those months ago during their first encounter. The lady at the front desk had called him after seeing his name on the package.

While he was definitely excited, Izuku forced himself to wait until he got to Kacchan's house to open it and compare. The only bad thing about his is that he didn't ace his written exam. He missed only a few points, all of them from History.

Figures.

Kacchan promised that he'll keep rubbing it in his face for the rest of time, as he aced it, of course. He's always been the more studious of the two, especially when it comes to History.

What made Izuku blush was the fact that the brunette girl (the one who saved him twice, which Kacchan has helpfully reminded him of every second after watching the projector) wanted to share some of her points with him. Izuku certainly didn't need it, but he's happy all the same. He never thought anyone would do something like that for him.

But all the same, he was incredibly grateful when Present Mic made her keep her hard-earned points.

During all of this fighting and teasing with each other, however, Izuku still doesn't breathe a word to Kacchan about the offer All Might gave him. He should. He really should. That's one of the reasons he even came over to the Bakugou household.

But now that he's actually here, he stays quiet. The guilt is strong in his chest, but Izuku bites his tongue. He'll see how it goes first, and then he'll tell his friend.

That's Izuku's promise to him.

He can't believe he's actually doing this. He has to be crazy. Certifiably insane, in fact.

Why did he agree to this celebration brunch with All Might in the first place? He texted the man his scores (even though he's pretty sure the hero already knew) and was surprised when the man texted him back enthusiastically.

He insisted that they had to celebrate this feat of his, seeing as he apparently made a new record.

Honestly, Izuku can kind of care less about that. The only thing he cares about is the obvious question he's going to have to answer today. The question that he does surprisingly have a set answer for.

He blames Kacchan for this situation, too. It's one hundred percent the boy's fault. No, he will not take criticism. He can still recall his friend's stubbornness just the day before.

"Kacchan. Yes or no."

There's a grunt from below him. Izuku is currently balancing on his friend's back with one hand while reading a book in the other. His sweat drips onto the pages, which is frankly disgusting. Izuku will definitely cringe over it later.

The blond is doing push-ups, still holding steady with Izuku's added weight. They've been training for almost an hour now, but neither are ready to give in. "The fuck are you on about, Deku?"

"Just answer the question! Yes or no!"

"Why should I? I don't even know what it's for!"

Izuku wriggles a little in air, trying to throw his friend off kilter. "Just do it!"

"Fine!" Kacchan drops low to the floor in one abrupt movement, causing Izuku to tumble off of him. "Yes."

And huh? Izuku is confused and also irritated. That's not what he's supposed to say. Not at all.

“No. You have to say no, Kacchan. Say it.”

“Well now that you’re so damn upset about it, my answer’s gonna stay yes.”

“Fuck you! Say no!”

“Yes.”

Izuku throws dirt at him, only to end up eating it for the second time that day.

That entire conversation had been unfair. Kacchan is stupid, and so is Izuku.

He had it all planned out. He had a poll going on in his head, for god’s sake. Eraserhead, for one, said yes—well, technically. He told Izuku to do whatever and to not be afraid to branch out, which is the closest thing to a yes he’ll ever get from the hero.

Izuku already put in his vote: a hard no. Which means Kacchan was the tiebreaker; a terrible decision, really.

He expected him to say no. Hell, Kacchan’s entire personality is like the word no printed in large font and highlighted in the blood of the innocent.

And so Kacchan saying yes in that determined tone of his had Izuku thinking the world was coming to an end.

The two idiots didn’t even know what they were saying yes to! They couldn’t have possibly guessed that Izuku was using them to decide whether or not to accept the Symbol of Peace’s quirk. They were answering it blindly.

Which makes it all even worse.

“This place is really nice,” Izuku whispers. He is not hiding behind Small Might, thank you very much. He’s just a little cold and needs some warmth.

Saying that the restaurant is nice is an understatement. It’s a very expensive restaurant. One that Izuku doesn’t dare look at when he walks past sometimes on the way to the store. He’s gotten dirty looks from the people going inside plenty of times, but it’s different when you’re receiving those looks while going in as well.

To be fair, Small Might had told him to dress casually. And so here Izuku is, in Kacchan's red jeans and dirty converse with an oversized white hoodie on top—an outfit that is not suitable for a place like this.

The hero himself is wearing some nice slacks and a comfy dress shirt, but otherwise he looks casual. Izuku, on the other hand, looks like he just got dragged out of the dumpster wearing okay-ish clothes from a lost and found bin at an orphanage.

I should've borrowed Kacchan's gel. My hair looks like a bush.

Small Might had waited for him outside of the restaurant since he was the one who made the reservation. He didn't say anything bad about the boy's looks, besides a sputtered response after noting the Plus Ultra! on his hoodie, but still.

While Izuku knows the man doesn't care, he still can't help but feel very out of place.

The hostess leads them to the second floor and gives them a table with a nice view of the city with a floor-to-ceiling window.

Ah. This is definitely where rich business people meet.

Apparently All Might goes here all the time with his friends, which explains why he looks so at home. The man proceeds to talk to Izuku about random things, and also about how he's thinking of getting a pet.

This prompts Izuku to show him a picture of Missy. He's talked about her before but never actually shown her to the man. It turns out that he's actually a dog person, though, so Izuku starts to babble on about the different shelters he's been too while picking up strays off the street.

If Izuku is being honest, he's been this close to adopting more stray animals after finding them during his patrols. The only thing stopping him is the fact that he can barely afford to feed himself with Missy there, so how could he afford another animal?

Izuku is relaxing slowly, now. There's quite a few people here, so he makes a game of searching through their quirks and trying to identify what it does just by feeling the energy. He does this all the time, and it's quite fun. Malicious, perhaps, but fun.

When the waiter comes back with their drinks and takes their orders, Izuku just gets what All Might does since he still feels very out of place. Sashimi seems to be a popular dish here.

Izuku doesn't really like raw meat in general, but he knows it must taste good for how expensive it is, so he doesn't mind.

"I've always wondered how you eat without a stomach," Izuku says, hoping to start another conversation. He's starting to get sick of the looks from all the people around them.

Small Might chuckles and delves into the story of how he had to get said organ removed before getting a replacement. He talks about how he's limited to eating certain things now—spicy foods are a no-go, for one—and has to go to the doctor's every month to make sure everything is going fine.

Izuku listens with awe as he nibbles on his food, and he wishes he had his notebook on him because that's definitely something he should put on the hero's page.

Also. How the fuck is All Might even alive?

The brunch is turning out nice, Izuku won't lie. Well, he could be doing anything with All Might and it would probably be enjoyable, but whatever. Everything is nice.

The air is a little tense, however. Only for Izuku.

The boy has to say something. All Might hasn't mentioned anything about their previous conversation, but Izuku knows he's waiting for an answer. He's not dumb. Izuku can see what ulterior motives lie behind the idea of a celebration brunch, as he called it.

It's when All Might orders dessert for Izuku despite his pleadings of you don't have to, really, that's a lot of money that the boy finally works up the courage to tell him.

At first, the hero looks confused as to what he's talking about, though Izuku did just blurt out yes! seemingly out of nowhere, so you can't really blame him.

All Might's eyes widen in realization after a few moments, and then he's talking excitedly, almost too quickly for Izuku to keep up with, and that's saying something.

Again, Izuku is reminded of how much of a happy golden retriever the man can be.

After the rambling is seemingly over and the dessert has already made its way onto the table, All Might tells him that they can do the transfer right after this, saying that it's better to get an early start since school starts very soon.

Izuku hates how easily he matches the hero's enthusiasm and agrees.

And somewhere, not too far from the restaurant All Might and Midoriya Izuku are dining at, a faceless man grins.

The tubes in his chest will only subdue him for a little while longer. His treatments are almost finished, and it won't be long before he can continue where he left off. And then he can take back what's his.

He can take back both of them.

Izuku is glad that All Might suggested they wait until after the celebration brunch to do the transfer. He is so, so glad.

He doesn't think he could've handled the prying gazes from the other diners for much longer. Judgmental fuckers, aren't they? All of them. But besides the uncomfortable staring, he's also glad they left because they kind of need more privacy for this. A crowded restaurant isn't exactly the best place to discuss an age-old secret that has the capability of destroying Japan if discovered by the wrong people.

There's no telling who's watching anymore. Hell, the fucking waiter could've been a spy, though he hadn't raised any red flags in Izuku's mind. And trust him, the boy had watched the man very carefully. He'd watched everyone very carefully.

You can never be too cautious.

They're back at Dagobah beach, standing on the roof of a secluded pavilion for no specific reason. Izuku just likes to be up high, and he only offered one excuse to the hero, saying that the beach has been getting crowded nowadays and they should be where no one can see them. The man had accepted the reasoning with no problem, and so here they are.

The sun is beating down on them at this time of day, as it's always the hottest during the afternoon. Izuku shamefully admits to himself that he just wants this over with, despite Extract being very excited about getting another quirk. It's almost like his given quirk is alive and can read his thoughts, which is kind of scary. Because for one, how does it know? And two, why is it getting happy when it's not even going to be used in the transfer? Izuku doesn't need to steal One for All, not that he'd ever in any other circumstance.

But Izuku can't lie and say he's not a bit excited about this either. He can't wait to see what the new quirk will do to his existing ones. He's practically vibrating with nerves.

That is until All Might holds out his fist and says, with as much conviction as twelve thousand burning stars: "Eat this!"

Izuku is, again, very glad that they're alone, as the noise that comes out of his mouth is one that will embarrass him until the day he dies. He clears his throat to speak. "Eh?"

All Might lifts his fist up a little higher to show the golden strand of hair that's floating in the faint breeze. He looks suddenly sheepish, and he rubs at the back of his neck in a way that Izuku's come to realize as the hero trying to find the right words.

"To inherit my power you have to have some of my DNA," he explains, almost confusedly. "That's how the transfer works, my boy. I told you this, did I not?"

Izuku blinks once, then twice. "Well, yeah, but I just... didn't think it would be this way."

"Well, what were you expecting?"

The boy's mind instantly goes blank. What had he been expecting? It's not like there are many other options for DNA transfers.

"Uh, I don't know. Maybe a blood transfusion?"

He gets a frown in return. "I thought you didn't like doctors, my boy?"

"I don't," Izuku confirms, though he's surprised the man actually remembers that bit of information. The boy himself can't even recall when he'd told the hero that. "But this still isn't exactly how I imagined it."

"So, do you still want my quirk?"

Not really.

"Yes."

"Then let's not waste time! Come on, Young Midoriya, eat!"

Izuku takes an instinctive step back when the hero lifts his hand up again. "Actually, on second thought, I—"

"Eat, my boy!" All Might practically shoves the hair in his face. "Eat!"

"Wait, this isn't—"

"Eat!"

The boy's screams can be heard all the way from the city.

"Stop laughing! It's not funny."

Ms. Hanako merely laughs harder at Izuku's pout. She doubles over, clutching her stomach with a frail arm. "You accidentally ate his hair? Oh my, dearie, that sounds quite interesting."

"It was traumatizing!" He corrects, still mildly offended.

"Don't be so dramatic," Ayaka says, voice heavy with amusement. "Now tell me, what did it taste like?"

Izuku glares at her. "You too? Please, somebody end me."

Ms. Hanako thankfully takes pity on him, and the older woman sends a mischievous look at her daughter. "Now, Ayaka, don't tease him too much. I'm sure it was a rather unpleasant feeling."

"What, like a worm? Or more like string cheese gone wrong?"

Izuku gags. "Please don't! I can still feel it stuck in my throat!"

The two women laugh louder and continue talking, and Izuku can only pretend he's annoyed by it. He's busy putting mini slices of pepperoni on a small pizza, along with some banana peppers and other meats, and once he's done he slides it into the oven.

The shop is closing up earlier than usual today, so he'd stopped by to help them with the last orders. He's been visiting them less and less with everything that's been going on, and he's happy he was finally able to find some time to be with Ms. Hanako.

His jobs are coming more frequently, and it's hard to pass them up when he's already barely scraping by with the money he has.

He moves on to the appetizers as Ms. Hanako goes to the dining area to wait more tables.

Ayaka squeezes past him to get to the soda dispensers. “So, when are ya bringing that kitten of yours?”

“She’s not really a kitten. The vet said she’s just over a year old.”

The woman hums but doesn’t look away from her work. “Vet? I thought you couldn’t afford a vet?”

“I can’t.” He grins. “I guilt-tripped the receptionist lady at one of the walk-in offices to get a free checkup.”

There are only a few circumstances where manipulation is good, Izuku thinks. That being one of them.

“Why am I not surprised?”

Izuku giggles. “In my defense, I had to make sure Missy was healthy. Being on the streets for most of her life isn’t good for her health.”

“Guess not.” Ayaka takes the pizza he prepared out of the oven and sets it on the counter, ringing the bell once to let Ms. Hanako know it’s ready to be sent out. “Say, what was that you were talking about with Mom? Something about UA?”

Glad that they have something else to speak about, Izuku excitedly chatters about the entrance exam and his results. He can’t tell them much about All Might and how exactly he came to eating the hero's hair, but he can tell them whatever he wants about UA.

While it’s good that Ms. Hanako and the rest of the family won’t push him about certain things, Izuku can’t help but feel kind of guilty for not telling them everything. He knows they get it, and he also knows that he’s putting everyone in danger when he tells them anything about All Might or himself, but he just can’t stop.

They’ve shared so much with him, it’s only fair that they know a bit about some of his own life, even if it’s just a little. He doesn’t like being dishonest, despite how much he seems to lie all the time, whether it’s to himself or to the authorities. It makes him feel dirty. Almost like a villain.

And yet, just like any other form of manipulation, he can’t help the lying. Or, rather, the evasion.

It's an hour into work when the restaurant closes for the day. Izuku helps wash the remaining dishes and hums softly to himself, swaying his head to the tune of a classical song playing on an old radio in the corner.

Ms. Hanako joins him in cleaning up the kitchen. It seems Ayaka already left. "What's on your mind, honey?"

"Hm? Nothing. I'm just a bit tired, 's all."

The woman narrows her eyes. "I have plenty of years behind me to know when somebody's lying, child. But as long as you're alright, that's all I can ask."

Izuku sighs to himself. There it is again: the deception. He finds lying easy, he truly does. It's almost natural for him to spin any web of lies off his tongue and pass it as the truth, but that doesn't make it any less shameful to do. It's especially difficult when he lies to someone who truly cares about him.

He wishes they didn't. It would be so much easier that way.

"I just—" He cuts himself off and then frowns. "You remember Kacchan, right?"

A small snort. "How could I not? That boy manages to blow something up every time he comes in here."

Izuku shivers at the reminder and continues to wipe down the stoves. "Well, I haven't been entirely honest with him either about this whole thing, and I feel pretty bad about it." He pauses for a moment, deep in thought. "He's my friend. Shouldn't I be telling him about all this?"

Shouldn't I tell him that I now have the quirk of our shared idol? The man we've both looked up to for the majority of our lives?

The woman tuts. "Well, friendship is based on trust, isn't it? I'm sure you have your reasons for keeping quiet, but I'll tell you this: lying to the ones you love never turns out well. They'll figure it out eventually, and it might not end pretty. For both sides, in fact."

"I know, but I still can't help but feel like something bad will happen if I tell him. It's like—it's like a gut feeling, I guess."

"Are you afraid of what he'll say?" She cocks a hip. "Or of what you think he'll say?"

And if he's being honest with himself, it's definitely the latter, but again, Izuku isn't always honest. Even when it only concerns himself.

"I... I'm not really sure. Maybe both? I know he'll have some strong opinions about it, but I kinda already expect that from him." He wipes his hands on a towel and faces her. "What do you, um, think I should do? You don't have to answer, I just don't know what—"

Ms. Hanako doesn't hesitate. Her eyes are as kind and intelligent as always. "I think you should confide in your friend, seeing as you don't have many at the moment. You never know when you might lose him."

And alright, that makes him feel like shit. The boy knows she's talking from experience.

"But," she continues. "You shouldn't push yourself too hard. If it's a gut feeling, listen to it. You know your own boundaries."

Do I? Or am I just being paranoid like I am with everything?

The truth is that he doesn't want to put Kacchan in danger. Sure, he's already in danger. Since the moment they met when they were just babies, Kacchan has been in danger. But Izuku doesn't want to make that worse.

He doesn't tell Ms. Hanako and Ayaka everything because they're fine with not knowing, they understand.

But Kacchan is different. He understands, of course, but he doesn't seem to care about that. He's always been stubborn, and he's always wanted to be involved. That's not necessarily a bad thing, it just makes Izuku feel like shit when he's faced with situations like this.

If he tells Kacchan about One for All, his friend might become a target. The less he knows, the better. But there's also that sinking feeling in Izuku's heart that tells him that if he were in Kacchan's shoes (hey, he'd grow a couple inches), that he'd want to know about it as well.

And so, to put it simply, everything is fucked. Izuku is either a shitty person who puts their friend in harm's way by telling him a secret, or a shitty person who lies to their friend and acts like nothing's changed. There's no in-between.

Christ. The quirk hasn't even set in yet and Izuku is already panicking.

He's been doing that a lot lately, it seems.

"I'll be heading out now. Everything's finished here, so just make sure to lock the back doors when you leave, alright?"

Izuku nods his head even though he can barely hear her over the fuzz in his ears.

He has to get himself together.

Spying on people is fun. Especially when you're getting paid to do it.

Now don't get the wrong idea. Izuku isn't a stalker, per se. He just likes to study people. He likes to keep tabs on his clients to make sure they're safe, of course, and he also does it as insurance in case something goes wrong.

But he doesn't just spy on his clients, he spies on everyone he's ever come into contact with, either as Rabbit or as Midoriya Izuku. It's a precaution, in a way, and it's also just to give Izuku more leverage. It's something he can use as a bargaining chip whenever he gets himself into a sticky situation.

He tracks their movements, their battles, their weaknesses, you name it. He knows their friends and finances, their every indiscretion. Hell, he even knows the color of their underwear!

This guy, for example, doesn't wear any. Not that he needs the added protection down there; the dude doesn't have the balls to do much of anything good.

Izuku is currently crouching in the rafters of a nearby tower, spying on the wealthy businessman drinking champagne in the building over. He's in one of his many penthouses, chatting with a coworker.

This coworker of his has been coming over very often. Over the past few days, Izuku has come to realize that their relationship goes much deeper than what the man would probably like anyone to know.

He's not meant to take him down or extract him from his location. The client that gave Izuku this job only wants information on the target, at least for now. Izuku didn't ask any questions, not when he'd seen the number of zeroes after the first number on the promised check.

Sometimes it's best not to know what he's getting himself into. It's not like he's going to murder the guy, nor is he going to give away top secret information.

The businessman is cheating on his wife, that's all. Not to say that that's okay! It's just that things could be a lot worse. That little bit of information, however, will make Izuku's client very happy. It's an easy way to take down politicians and people of high power.

"AINA," the boy whispers, detaching the armband and holding it up like a camera phone at the window. "Can you zoom in for me?"

"Of course. Would you like to send this footage directly to your pinned contact?"

Izuku smirks to himself. "Why not? Give him a live shot."

He might enjoy ruining politicians' lives a little too much.

The thing is that Izuku can figure out a lot about his targets in a short amount of time. It's even easier now with AINA, who can search all the records with this guy's name and billing information. It seems he dabbles into the Black Market almost just as much as he cheats on his wife.

Which, for one, is kind of creepy, and for two, only adds to his rich boy-slash-douchebag personality.

Even Izuku doesn't spend ten hours a day surfing the dark web, and he does that pretty often to get the best deals on mechanical parts and weapons.

This guy is sick, so Izuku is glad his client brought this to his attention. Even if he doesn't get paid for the extra work, Izuku is going to make sure this man gets arrested. Hm. He should probably text Eraserhead or Tsukauchi about it. They'd be within legal grounds to take him down with the evidence Izuku has.

It might be faulty evidence since he isn't obtaining it legally, but nobody has to know that.

Speaking of Eraserhead, Izuku hasn't seen the underground hero in a few days. Their meeting is coming up soon, so he's looking forward to it. He wants to hear the man's voice again.

Does that make me clingy? The hell is wrong with me.

It's been a few hours after the transfer with All Might, and the sun is starting to go down. Izuku can feel the quirk taking effect. It's almost scary.

Of course, he'd felt the change immediately after inhaling the hair due to Extract and it's sensory awareness, but he's only just now feeling the power of it. And oh boy can he feel it.

Something itches at the back of his throat, and Izuku frowns a little. When he coughs into his hand he can see little specks of blood on his palm.

He knows instantly why that's happening, so he doesn't freak out too bad.

Extract used to do that to him all the time when he was younger. The quirk basically forces him to take other people's powers, and so when he doesn't, he's the one who pays for it. He's scared Kacchan and the rest of the Bakugou family plenty of times like that before.

It hasn't done it in forever, not since... not since he acquired the multiple quirks he has now. It calmed down after that happened. And for it to be starting up again now, that can only mean one thing: One for All is indeed strengthening his other quirks.

And fuck, that's a great thing; that's exactly what he'd been hoping for out of all this. But that's also a very, very bad thing.

That bad feeling he gets with Extract now will only grow exponentially with this new addition, and Izuku suddenly realizes how fucked he really is. The sudden increase in strength and power in his core is making him feel a little dizzy, and he has to shake himself out of his thoughts to focus on reality.

It's time that he experiments a bit.

"AINA, initiate Shutdown Protocol Four, please!"

Instead of a verbal response, the AI just flashes the words of course, I'll speak with you later, Izuku, before shutting off completely. He fluffs out his unkempt hair to hide the earbuds before dropping down from the rafters. He's on the top floor of this building, and there's nobody there since it's usually reserved for business meetings. He'd done quite a bit of research on this company before sneaking in, just to make sure.

He smooths out his clothes a little bit since he's not even in his Rabbit costume and takes the elevator down to the bottom level. It's almost laughable how easy it was to bypass their security. He didn't even need to mess with their cameras and stuff, he just had to create a diversion so he could get past the guard just inside the front doors.

The same guard that's staring at Izuku in utter disbelief as the boy slips out of the doors. He doesn't dare stop him, though.

Like Izuku said. Pathetically laughable.

What makes it worse is that the company is all about home and cyber security. Yeah. Not too secure, huh?

The sky is pitch black by the time he puts a halt to his other spying deals and stops on top of another building, this time for a different reason. He wants to get a feel for things. The transfer is complete by now, he knows it. It has to be with the sudden giddiness he's experiencing.

He can feel the energy buzzing under his skin. It's so much stronger than his usual enhancements. He's almost drunk off the feeling, and his previous dizziness makes way for euphoria as he tests out Boost in his legs and feet. It's obviously different: it's stronger. He can run quicker than before.

Not by too much, but the change is noticeable enough. If Izuku wanted to, he could train himself to go a little farther. He could be even faster.

Boost isn't the only quirk affected, just as he thought. He'll have to find time to test out his other powers and write down his findings, but for now, Izuku wants to try out the newest addition to his quirks.

The one that matters the most, now. By far. He has to protect this one more than the others, that's for sure. It holds the greatest face value, and also the greatest personal value. There's no way he's going to let this one slip out from his grasp now that he's got it.

He holds up a fist and glances around, trying to find a nice target for practice. What better time for training is there than right now, on a deserted rooftop at just a little past ten at night? Anyone could see him if they really looked.

He doesn't know exactly how to activate One for All. It sounds silly, but the only information All Might offered him on the topic was just clench your butt cheeks and think of greatness! It'll come to you naturally, my boy! So, yeah. He's basically starting from scratch.

He's sure it's similar to Boost, as they're both power types and a form of body enhancement, so it should be like powering up a battery. He just has to imagine it, right?

Izuku stands in front of a large billboard and wrinkles his nose. It's showcasing an ad on Endeavor merchandise. The flame hero doesn't get a lot of screen time on any news outlets or videos, so it's a bit of a surprise that his face is even on here.

A welcome surprise, now that Izuku can vandalize it. The hero should be grateful that the boy is too lazy to get his spray cans as well. He would've had a field day with the man's chiseled face; a face perfect for drawing dicks on.

Izuku rears back a fist and gets into a stance, his back against the billboard railing. He clenches his butt like All Might said (who knows, maybe that is how you use it) and imagines himself opening up its vast energy reserves in his mind. His heart beats a little faster inside his ribcage, and he forces himself to calm down.

He knew how to work it. He told me how to work it a long time ago. I can do this.

Izuku pictures it all in his mind, recalling terrible, terrible words of instruction, and releases everything he can as he drives his fist forward.

The huge gust of wind that follows nearly knocks him off the small ledge he's on, and Izuku has to hold on as his fist goes straight through the reinforced metal billboard with a crackle of red lightning.

Almost like it was nothing more than wet paper.

It seems to take an entire ten seconds for the air around him to return to normal, and Izuku is left reeling, eyes wide as saucers.

Oh. Wow. That was cool as fuck. And also: he hopes no one just saw that, because the billboard is fucking destroyed, and so is part of the building a little ways behind it—the courthouse, he realizes.

Okay, that one wasn't his fault this time.

But fucking shit does his arm hurt now. What in the holy hell did he just—oh. Why does his shoulder burn so much?

When Izuku looks, he's mildly surprised to see that his entire arm is mangled. He can see it better once he angles his body into the light from a nearby streetlamp. All the way from his shoulder to the tips of his fingers his skin is a deep mixture of purple and black, and the faintest bit of steam rises from the appendage. The pain is spreading like a wildfire all of a sudden, and he stumbles a little, holding back a hiss.

What the hell just happened? He obviously punched Endeavor in the throat, evident by how there's literally nothing left of the billboard in front of him, but how did that lead to him breaking his entire arm?

Too much power, Izuku thinks, still riding out the waves of white-hot pain that continue to course through him at different levels. He must have tried to use too much of One for All's power without any personal energy or strength to back it up. But still. Why did it recoil that much? It's an emitter type quirk, so it should have some obvious drawbacks, but not like that.

Fuck. How does All Might deal with that?

Lights flicker on in the apartments and houses around him, and Izuku scrambles down from the billboard immediately. He does not want to get caught like this, nosiree. That's a definite trip to jail if anyone who cared enough were to see him.

He won't be able to get home quickly without the use of one of his arms; his dominant arm, to be exact. He's gonna have to walk back the normal way. Just for a few minutes until he can get close.

The few people on the streets at this time of night are giving him strange looks, which only serve to piss Izuku off more. He's getting really tired of folks looking at him like that.

To be fair, his right arm is kind of mangled. They might be a little irked upon seeing that, but still. Doesn't give them the right to judge or ogle. He's not an animal. He only looks like a rat half the time.

“Hey, kid! What are you doing out here?”

Great. Just fan-fucking-tastic. Izuku doesn’t even have to look behind him to know it’s a cop. A new one, at that.

In this part of town, Izuku knows practically every officer and hero. He’s run into trouble with all of them at least once by now, and they all know him by name. They also know not to disturb him unless he’s doing something worse than just breaking curfew.

Which means this cop is definitely a rookie. He doesn’t know Izuku, so he won’t let him off the hook like all the other cops.

And so Izuku does the only thing he can think of: he runs. He hadn’t planned on booking it home, and yet here he is.

He’s run from so many cops and police officers in just the past couple of years alone that the process is practically ingrained into his brain by now. Get up high and don’t look back, that’s his rule.

Unless an underground hero is following you, then you’re just fucked. Getting up high doesn’t do shit. Learned that the hard way the first time around.

Detective Tsukauchi works late on these kinds of nights, and Izuku could do without a lecture right now. Running is his only option.

It turns out that the rookie cop must have been informed about him in one way or another, as he curses loudly when Izuku scales the side of a small shop and runs across the roof.

“Damn you, kid, get down!”

“No, you get down!”

Another curse, this one slightly more confused than before, but Izuku keeps sprinting. He has to hold onto his broken arm as he goes, which fucking hurts.

Time seems to blur along with the pain, and before he knows it he’s shouldering open his door after climbing the stairs and booking it to his first aid kit. He can’t do much about it right now, but he can wrap it up so he doesn't jostle it. Yeah. That sounds like a good idea.

“Hiya, Missy! Didn’t get into too much trouble while I was gone, right?”

He doesn't waste any time in feeding her after fixing up his arm, petting her all the while. He makes sure to put a dish of warm lactose-free milk on the ground beside her water as a small treat. She loves milk, and so of course he's going to spoil her with it. He doesn't use milk for anything anyway, so he doesn't bother getting the regular kind.

Most cats can't have cow milk since their digestive system can't always process it correctly. Other kinds of milk are usually best for them, and it's not like he minds spending the extra money.

He's been living off of coffee and instant ramen and rice for this long now; it's not like he needs anything else.

Using his left hand to sketch out ideas instead of his right is hard, but not as hard as he'd thought it'd be. He's not exactly ambidextrous, but he was trained on how to use his non-dominant limbs almost as easily as his other ones. He's a little thankful for that now as he lays out all the facts.

Okay, so he's not strong enough to use the full potential of One for All. The small part of Izuku's mind, the prideful part, is kind of offended by that fact, but the other part isn't all that surprised. The boy is honestly a little more disappointed in himself more than anything. It's his own fault for not being a good vessel for the quirk.

Another negative as to why I shouldn't have said yes.

But that's alright, he'll have to work up to it. The quicker the better, no matter what he has to do. He doesn't think One for All affects the metabolism, though Izuku already knows he's going to have a problem with that because of Boost. He's sure his hunger will spike even worse than it is.

It's a nuisance to have to keep breaking bones every time he uses it, and learning to control the output at this rate is still hazardous, so he has to create something that'll suppress it. Something that'll limit how much he can use of it, but also something that won't suppress the usage of his other quirks as well. As much as he'd like to pretend that most of those quirks don't exist, they do come in handy when he's in awful situations.

It's best to keep them ready as a backup, even if he can't use them publicly.

He also needs something that'll take off the edge of Extract. That's the main thing on his mind. He can't be throwing up blood everywhere like All Might. Especially since High School starts up in spring—just a couple weeks away.

Hm. He made AINA, right? So how hard can making a quirk suppressor with that many limitations be?

A suppressor that doesn't need batteries or some other source to power it all the time, and one that won't affect his regular enhancements or quirks but affect only two in particular? Okay, so maybe it'll be a little difficult.

His eyes shift over to the extra parts and junk on his desk, and the ideas and blueprints that suddenly shoot through his mind like a slideshow causes him to shake his head. "Nothing can ever be easy for me, huh?"

Missy meows, and the boy dutifully takes that as a no.

Chapter Notes

When Toshinori sees his protégé running up to him at the park only a few hours after texting the boy to meet him there, he nearly has an aneurysm. Because what the actual hell is Midoriya doing?

The hero deflates almost instantly with a puff of smoke and a bloody cough, which is probably for the best seeing as he's in public and not hidden from any wandering eyes. Now isn't the time for any media attention or impromptu interviews.

His gaze immediately zeroes in on Midoriya's right arm, which is covered in what looks like cheap bandages from a discount store. It looks like an entire roll of medical tape has been haphazardly wrapped around his arm, not close at all to the level of care one should normally use when dealing with an injury of that degree. The boy's entire limb is hanging limply at his side and swinging with every stride.

It's sickening, if Toshinori is being honest, and that's saying something considering he's seen and had his own fair share of horrible wounds.

Why is he running with an injury like that? Is he insane!

"Woah, kid!" He stumbles toward the boy, waving his hands frantically to get him to halt. "What are you doing?"

Midoriya stops immediately and takes a tiny step away from the hero. "Huh?" He winces suddenly, green eyes flashing. "Ah, sorry! Did—did I do something wrong?"

He says it like he's unsure, like he thinks he's going to get yelled at for whatever he thinks he's done. The thought makes something weird coil in Toshinori's stomach, because why would the boy ever feel like that with him? Toshinori has never raised his voice at him, nor has he ever raised a hand against him outside of sparring. In fact, the only time the man has ever so much as raised his voice was when the kid refused to take a break that one day when he looked to be on the verge of passing out, and even then Toshinori had only done so to get his attention.

He's never truly yelled at Midoriya before, nor does he ever want to. So seeing the boy cower like that, as if he thinks he's done something wrong, breaks Toshinori's heart.

"No, my boy, of course not, but—your arm! How did this even happen?" He closes the distance between them again and carefully takes hold of his wrist, not missing the grimace the kid makes. "You were just fine yesterday!"

The boy rubs at his neck with his good hand. "I, uh, tried it out like you told me to."

"One for All?" Toshinori asks, horrified. "You broke your arm using One for All?"

"Er, yes? Was I... not supposed to?"

And oh god, is he seriously asking that? Toshinori is so stupid, so unequivocally stupid that it's almost funny. But in this current situation, the hero can't bring himself to laugh.

"I am so sorry, my boy," he says instead. He gently releases the wrist and shakes his head. "I should've warned you about the repercussions of using One for All. You see, I had been under the assumption that your previous enhancements would have already strengthened your body."

Midoriya tips his head, quick to catch on. "So this is normal?" he asks.

What irks Toshinori is that he doesn't sound apprehensive or disappointed when he asks—merely curious. As if the answer to that question doesn't really matter as long as the kid can get some interesting information out of it.

"Well, not really," the hero tries. "When my master passed One for All down to me, I could use it almost perfectly immediately after receiving it. I fortunately never had an issue with breaking my limbs." He sighs and takes another look at the boy's bandaged arm. "But it seems I was incorrect in my assumptions. Your body is still too small to use it at full power."

For a moment, Midoriya looks indignant, as if he's about to protest the comment about his size, but then he thinks better of it. "That can be fixed though, right?"

Still so keen. There's a reason I chose you as my successor.

"Of course, but unless you can make yourself grow bigger, Young Midoriya, I don't think there is a quick remedy for this." Toshinori smiles at him. "It will take a lot more training, though I'm sure it won't be too much of a challenge for you. You just have to work at it, and eventually, I think One for All will grow alongside you."

The boy nods, seemingly deep in thought. "That's what I was thinking, too. It might take a while, but if you think I can do it, then I'll try my hardest!"

Toshinori looks at Midoriya, noting how the sun shines on his face and reflects in his eyes, and suddenly he sees himself. The hero swears he remembers saying something like that to his own master a long time ago, back when she was still alive, and doesn't that make him feel old.

Warmth blooms inside his chest, and it has nothing to do with the humidity of the park around them.

"We can work out the details of this new training later, as I'm curious to see how much of One for All you can use at this very moment, but first." The hero hopes he sounds firm as he continues. "We must get that injury of yours treated, and soon. UA is close by, and I know Recovery Girl is on the job at all times; I can take you there."

As expected, Midoriya stiffens at the mere mention of the last part. "I don't like doctors."

"I'm aware, my boy, but this isn't something you can deal with yourself. You should have immediately gone to get that treated, or at least contacted someone to help you!" Toshinori frowns as a thought occurs to him. "Was your father not with you when this happened? I can't imagine he'd let you continue on with an injury like this."

The boy blinks, averting his gaze. "He's been away for work."

Again? Every time I ask about him it seems like he's never home. How often does he even see his son?

"Did you at least text him to make him aware of your situation? This is something he should know about, Young Midoriya. You might not have told him about One for All, but I'm sure you could've come up with some excuse."

“Well…” The boy chuckles sheepishly. “It’s not like he can do anything about it when he’s halfway across the world. It’s fine.”

Toshinori can only stare at the absolute fool in front of him. But then again, he’s the one who’s teaching him, so maybe the real fool here is Toshinori himself.

He makes sure Midoriya’s attention is back on him before continuing. “I guess that's reasonable thinking. But I do need you to promise me that if you get injured again, no matter how insignificant it may seem, you’ll contact me. Trust me when I say that I don’t mind what time it is or where you are. You are my successor now, and I care for your wellbeing, my boy. If you feel like you can’t tell your father, please, tell me.”

The teen stays silent for a few moments, and Toshinori is once again reminded of how hard it is to tell what’s going on in the kid’s mind.

“Yes,” Midoriya says finally. He turns back and offers a mischievous smile, though Toshinori can still see some hesitance in those eyes. “But only if you let me ride on your back on the way to UA.”

Toshinori lets out a guffaw. “Are you really trying to negotiate this?”

The hero gets a cackle in reply. “I am.”

He sighs, and after taking a quick glance around to make sure no one is looking, he inflates into his larger form. “You’re acting like you broke a leg instead of an arm, Young Midoriya!”

“I will snap my ankle right now, don’t test me.”

Toshinori doesn’t doubt the validity of that statement, though it does raise his concern by that much more. The meter’s been doing that a lot these days.

And as they jump through the park and into the city, going quickly so no one can snap a picture, Toshinori can’t help but let his mind wander.

I’d care about you even if you didn’t end up becoming my successor. Though I can’t quite figure out why.

Izuku trusts All Might. He really does.

If he didn't, well, it's safe to say that the boy never would have said yes to him. He wouldn't have said yes to any of it. The training, the entrance exam, the quirk—none of it.

It doesn't matter what everyone else said or gave to him as advice, it's plain simple: Izuku would not have agreed to be All Might's successor had he not thought the hero to be one hundred percent trustworthy.

And All Might trusts Recovery Girl, so, by default, Izuku does too.

"She won't do anything you don't want her to," the hero reassures as he leads Izuku through the hallways of UA. "I know you're not a fan of doctors, but I must ask that you please give her a chance. She's not like the others."

Of course she isn't, Izuku thinks to himself. She's a nurse at one of the most prestigious hero schools in Japan with one of the most important quirks to ever exist.

In all seriousness, Izuku doesn't know why he agreed to come here. Well, it's not like he had much of a choice. It was either this or a real hospital, according to All Might. Obviously Izuku would rather go for this one.

But now he's starting to feel nervous. His good hand is starting to get shaky, and he wants nothing more than to cross his arms or do something with it to stop the obvious nerves. He also wants to run, but he stops himself on the off chance that All Might will go after him. He doesn't want to disappoint him.

It seems that the hero is having the same thoughts, as he keeps glancing at Izuku from time to time as they walk, not really out of suspicion, but probably more to reassure him.

Izuku clears his throat. "She won't take my blood, right?"

"I would think not. This is only to fix your arm." He tips his head.

“Why do you ask?”

“I just don’t like needles, that’s all.”

That’s not a lie. It’s more of a half-truth. So why does it still make Izuku feel bad?

“I don’t either, my boy. It’s an understandable fear.”

Is it, though? Izuku doesn’t care about the pain. It’s only a slight pinch, after all. He’s a lot more concerned about what’s in the needle, although that’s another issue entirely. Shots can be tolerated in certain settings; taking blood, for obvious reasons, cannot be.

No one can have it or else they can find out about everything.

“This place always amazes me,” All Might says, looking around the halls. “It’s so beautiful.”

“Didn’t you graduate from here?”

The man nods. “It’s changed quite a lot from when I attended, however. When I came here a few months ago to have my meeting with the principal, it was my first time seeing it since graduation. I must’ve spent an entire hour just walking around.”

“Oh, that’s cool,” Izuku agrees. He felt the same way when he took the entrance exam, so he kind of gets it. UA is filthy rich, so it’s only natural that it’s as grand as it is. Izuku would be a bit disappointed otherwise. But he can’t imagine what it must feel like to come back to your old school, maybe twenty or thirty years later, and see how much it’s grown. “Was it smaller back then?”

“Oh, yes!” He laughs a little. “It was still fairly large compared to other hero schools, but if I’m not mistaken it’s nearly tripled in size since I left.”

“Probably to keep up with the decrease in quirkless people in the newer generations.”

All Might gives him a sidelong glance, eyebrows furrowed a little. He’s in his small form now, having deflated right after entering the double doors. “I never thought of it like that, but that’s a good point.”

Of course it is. It’s only logical, right? Evolution and all that. All Might’s generation is bound to have more quirkless people in it, especially since Japan's quirkless population of twenty percent is nearly all older people. Being young and without a quirk must have been a lot more common then, though.

Nowadays, not so much.

"This is it, my boy."

All Might knocks on the door even thought it's cracked open, and a voice comes from further inside the room.

"Come in, you two!"

Yep. That's definitely Recovery Girl. Izuku feels himself start to relax slightly at the fact. No one else is going to bother you. It's just her.

The number one hero gestures for Izuku to enter first, and so he steps through the doorway and glances around. It's a small room, but Izuku can see another entry leading to what's probably the nurse's private office.

Izuku stiffens when he hears the click of the door shutting behind him, but All Might is already leading him further in.

There's the sound of light footsteps, followed by a dull clunking. Recovery Girl hobbles out of her office with her cane and eyes the hero distastefully. "What have you done to yourself this time, All Might?"

"Chiyo, thank you for agreeing to this," All Might starts, "but I regret to say that it's not for me this time."

First name basis? They must be familiar with each other.

The old lady huffs, turning her watchful gaze onto Izuku. "Oh dear, you should've brought him here immediately, All Might. Or at least texted me in more detail." She gestures with her cane to the bed pushed to the corner of the room. "Have a seat right there, honey. I'll have to take those bandages off first."

After a reassuring push from All Might, Izuku hesitantly does as the healer says. "Thank you," the boy says, echoing the number one hero. "You didn't have to agree to this."

"Nonsense, dearie. I'm not doing much these days anyway, at least until school starts back up, that is." She hops onto a rolling stool and slides over, peering at Izuku's limp arm. "I'm going to touch it, is that alright?"

She's asking permission to touch his injury? That's a first.

"Oh, uh, sure!" He looks back up at All Might, who's standing a little awkwardly to the side.

The hero sends him a pointed look, as if to say see? This isn't so bad, right?

Izuku just blinks at him, being brought out of his thinking when Recovery Girl starts to peel off the bandages. She tuts when she sees the purple skin underneath.

"My, my," she says disapprovingly, glancing at Izuku with narrowed eyes. "How long have you left it like that?"

"Uh, just overnight?"

The healer immediately swivels around in her stool to glare at All Might. "You! Didn't you tell him what would happen if he used too much of it in one go? How irresponsible can you be, boy! You're supposed to be training him!"

Izuku's jaw drops. Oh my god, she's lecturing All Might.

"I told her about One for All a while ago," the hero says to him, obviously misinterpreting his shock to be for something else. He shrinks back underneath the wrath of Recovery Girl's cane. "And it was a slight miscalculation on my part, Chiyo! It won't happen again!"

The lady shakes her head. "Still so reckless, hm? I thought Gran put a stop to that, but I guess not." She turns back after giving the hero another warning look and sighs. "You managed to shatter your entire arm, dearie. I can heal it, of course, but it'll take a lot of energy out of you. You'll have to rest here for a couple of hours before heading home, alright?"

Izuku, whose mind is still stuck on am I thinking of the same Gran, can only nod. "Yeah, that's—that's fine."

Recovery Girl throws away the bandages and clasps her hands together. "Alright. I remember you from the entrance exam, so I assume you know how my quirk works. Since this injury is of a larger degree than your last one, you're going to feel a lot more tired than before. You can sleep here, and when you wake up you can leave after I ask a few closing questions."

Before Izuku can even open his mouth to ask what kind of questions, the healer is leaning forward and pressing a kiss to his shoulder.

It's just like the entrance exam, except this time the wave of exhaustion that hits him is more like a tsunami. He watches in awe as his arm glows green and then starts to reshape itself. It feels like a dull burn, kind of like how your legs feel when they fall asleep and start to prickle when you move.

His hand didn't exactly feel like this when she healed it at the entrance exam, so the side effects of her healing obviously depend on the severity or size of the injury.

"That's so cool," he whispers, and oh. He's falling backward.

His head hits a pillow, and then he's staring up at the too-clean ceiling. He wonders who they pay to dust up there all the time, as it looks like it was just recently cleaned. And maybe freshly painted, too. In fact, everything here looks brand new.

Or maybe Izuku is just used to poor neighborhoods and abandoned buildings. Huh. That could be a very good reason.

"That boy looks terrible, All Might, what have you been doing to him?"

"I think he's been overworking himself. I'll talk to him about it, Chiyo, I promise."

Izuku frowns to himself as the voices filter into his ears like he's underwater. His eyes shut on their own accord, and then he's being pulled into the darkness.

He is not looking forward to that talk.

Izuku needs to piss.

That's the first thought that comes into his mind when he wakes up. The second thought, however, is that he's alone. When he pushes himself up, he suddenly realizes just how much better he feels. He's used to pain, and so the lack of it now leaves him feeling kind of empty.

He can't tell if it's a good thing or a bad thing.

Extract tells him that there's nobody near him at this second, so he rubs the sleep out of his eyes and allows himself a small moment of vulnerability, a small moment to get back to himself. He yawns and slides off the surprisingly comfy bed. It's hard as a rock, which is just the way he likes it.

And damn, that was a good nap. That's the best nap Izuku has had in ages, though to be fair that's the only nap he's had in ages.

Somebody took off his shoes for him while he was asleep. There are neon pink slippers next to the bed, but he doesn't know if it's for him. It certainly wasn't there when Izuku first came in, but he still isn't sure.

Should he call All Might? Recovery Girl said he was free to leave after answering a few questions, but she's nowhere to be seen. Izuku guesses he could search for her with his quirk, but he doesn't want to invade her privacy.

And besides, what's the harm in finding her himself?

After a moment's consideration, Izuku puts on the slippers and pads quietly toward the door. There's still no one near him, so he doesn't have to be so quiet.

He sneaks out of the room—no, he corrects to himself, it's not sneaking around, he was invited here—and starts to walk around. He downloaded a map of UA right before he took the entrance exam, so he knows where everything is, but he hasn't actually gotten to know the place. The quick trek here with All Might didn't show him much.

Wouldn't it be impolite to start my education at a place I'm not even familiar with?

He finds a bathroom relatively quickly and ends up splashing water in his face after he's done to wake himself up more. But instead of continuing his search for Recovery Girl and All Might, he skips around and looks inside the classrooms. UA is quite a few stories tall, and there are multiple sets of stairs and elevators on each floor for public use.

As he said before: fucking rich.

Izuku flexes his right arm, and when he's satisfied that it's healed completely, he powers up Boost. He can get across the school much faster if he uses it.

He jumps at a wall and nearly slams into the concrete because of the extra force. Oh, that's right. He keeps forgetting that One for All increased the strength and durability of his other quirks as well. He has to try them out when he gets back home.

The boy proceeds to bounce between the walls like a ball in a pinball machine, occasionally sneaking glances into classrooms and closets he finds of interest.

New students are supposed to get their schedules in a week or so, meaning he doesn't know which room is going to be his. Kind of a letdown, but oh well. He can't have too much fun.

Izuku sees a flash of light above him and leaps upward, grabbing onto a vent hatch. He dangles in the air for a moment before popping it, letting it fall open like a trapdoor. When he swings himself inside, the boy can't help but give an appreciative whistle.

It's actually pretty wide in here, giving him a good amount of room to turn around if he needs to. It's the perfect size.

He replaces the hatch and begins his crawl around the entire school. It's chilly, but not too bad.

Izuku comes across a few janitors cleaning up the classrooms and hallways when he gets the chance to peek down. There aren't many people here other than them. The first teacher he comes across looks to be doing some preparations for his future students.

It's still a very large classroom, but compared to the ones Izuku saw just prior to this, it's more of a medium-sized room. Maybe for a support class, he reckons, since those classes tend to have fewer students.

He feels the man's quirk and hums to himself. He knows exactly who this is.

Power Loader; Quirk: Iron Claws.

Izuku watches the hero work for a bit before moving to continue his crawl. He wonders if that'll be his homeroom teacher if the man ends up not being a teacher for the support course this year. All Might won't tell him anything about the other teachers, so Izuku is left guessing.

The man sneezes, and Izuku instinctively lets out a bless you, instantly freezing after he processes what he's done.

Fuck.

There's a bit of silence before a quiet god? comes from below.

Izuku snickers quietly to himself and hastily moves on lest the teacher decide to check the vents.

He finishes the first floor and does his pinball method again to go up to the second floor. All the while he checks the classrooms and scans for any other teachers and staff.

It's fun. Kind of like a game of some sort. He then tries to see how fast he can go through the vents without bumping into the sides too much, and the answer to that? Pretty fast. Though it probably sounds like a raccoon bumbling around to anyone else.

He slows down after a bit and taps his wristband. "Hey, AINA," he whispers.

"Yes, Izuku?" She's always quiet when she needs to be. He programmed her to be that way in case he has to go on stealth missions.

"What time is it?"

"It is currently a few minutes past four in the afternoon."

Izuku's head shoots up and hits the roof of the vent. "Ow—shit! It's what? How?"

"You were asleep for approximately six hours. Would you like me to call

All Might and inform him of your awakened state?"

Christ. Izuku needs to fix how she talks. Way too formal, in his opinion. They're supposed to be buddies, almost friends, not associates of a company.

"Uh, no thanks. I kinda wanna sneak around some more. Do some spy shit, y'know?"

"Of course. I am here when you need me."

Izuku rubs the bump on his head and moves forward. It's starting to get even chillier the more he goes. The air conditioners must be located at the top of UA, not the bottom like most other schools around here.

There's someone underneath him. He can feel their quirk; it's faint, but it's there. Which means they're either asleep and don't have their quirk active, or that their quirk is a mutant type and thus doesn't emit a lot of energy. But wait, it feels kind of familiar—

The vent gives way beneath him, and then Izuku is dropping like a rock. He tries to right himself in air to try and break the fall, but he doesn't have much time to do anything before he lands with an oof onto the classroom floor.

His head spins, as it feels like he'd hit the corner of something. Knowing his luck it was probably a desk. Wouldn't that be fantastic? He'd have to ask Recovery Girl to heal another injury of his.

"Fucking hell," he says to himself, glancing back up at the ceiling. There's a hole in the vents where he'd fallen, and Izuku is surprised to notice that it's actually a trapdoor with wires attached to it. Hm. So this isn't the case of faulty roofing—it was intentional.

The hatch is probably controlled via remote or signal. Which means somebody must have activated it.

Great. So he was being watched this entire time. The knowledge makes him feel creeped out, and also a little offended.

He shoves himself into a sitting position, only to realize that while his head had indeed hit the side of a large desk, the rest of his body actually landed on something soft.

Oh. Oh god no.

For a few terrifying seconds, Izuku is frozen in fear. Because there was someone below him before he fell, wasn't there?

He turns his head slowly, as if in a horror movie, and all but screeches when all he sees is a pale face surrounded by puffy yellow fabric.

Izuku scrambles back, fumbling as he tries to get away from the caterpillar thing in front of him. Soulless black eyes stare back at him, and Izuku chokes on another scream.

Holy fucking shit! Did I kill him? Or is he about to kill me? Please, I can't die like this—

"Midoriya."

Izuku's panicked thoughts come to a stuttering halt as he recognizes the voice, and thus the face attached with it. His heart is still racing, and he's still backed up against what appears to be a student's desk, but the relief that suddenly runs through him is almost nauseating.

He feels incredibly dumb now.

"Eraserhead?" He asks. You know, like an idiot. "What are you doing here?"

The blank look he gets in reply has Izuku wincing. He works here, dumbass. That sounds suspiciously like Kacchan's voice.

"This is my classroom. The question should be what are you doing here."

Izuku takes a moment to catch his breath and take stock of the situation. Okay. So he just fell through the vents and landed on his caterpillar-of-a-hero friend-ish thing, and now he's being questioned as to why he'd fallen through said vents.

"Oh, well, I just thought I'd have a look around UA, sir!" He gives a nervous chuckle, eyeing the hand that's still holding onto one end of the hero's capture weapon. How the man is able to wear that inside of the sleeping bag is a question Izuku thinks he might just be murdered for asking. "So, uh, how are you? Nice day today, isn't it?"

Eraserhead hasn't blinked once yet, as if he thinks he can just erase this entire conversation from happening. He's still lying sideways on the ground, not having moved an inch.

Before the hero can reply, though, Izuku feels a sharp spike in his mind from Extract, and then the doors to the classroom are bursting open, revealing a disheveled All Might in his larger form.

The number one hero is panting and practically breathing smoke, and in the next second he's suddenly right in front of Izuku. "My boy, I heard you yell! Are you hurt? What's wrong?"

Was I really that loud? Damn. And how did he get here so quickly? Did he run here?

"Uh, I'm not hurt at all. Is there something wrong?"

All Might doesn't seem to believe him, as he checks over Izuku's body quickly to make sure there are no other injuries. He wipes a dust bunny from Izuku's shirt, courtesy of the vents, and only then does he seem satisfied. He deflates with a long-suffering sigh, resting a hand on the boy's healed shoulder.

"Why are you out of bed?" He scolds lightly. "You're supposed to be resting!"

Izuku fights back a pout. "I woke up and you were gone, so I just thought I'd explore. You told me this place was beautiful, didn't you? How could you not expect me to have a look around!"

All Might pauses for a second, as if to decide if he's kidding, and then lets out another sigh. "You are something else, Young Midoriya."

I'm going to take that as a compliment.

There's the sound of a zipper being moved, and both mentor and protégé stare in confusion as Eraserhead stands up and slinks out of his sleeping bag like a newly born butterfly.

All Might coughs. "Aizawa! I didn't expect to see you here!"

The man huffs in irritation. "Again. My classroom."

"Of course, I just meant that it's—"

Izuku tunes All Might out, his brain having brought back an important point: he had felt Eraserhead. He'd felt his quirk even before he saw or knew he was there.

He's never been able to do that before, even as Rabbit. Does that mean he can only be sensed while he's asleep? Or when he's extremely tired? It would make sense.

Izuku pauses and briefly wishes whatever god up above will strike him down. There are too many confusing things happening nowadays, and it's making him want to shrivel up and die.

All Might nudges him, and Izuku realizes Eraserhead is speaking to him now.

"Didn't think you'd actually end up trying out for the exam, Midoriya."

Why is he looking at me like that? I mean, sure, I did just fall on him, but that's not my fault. Or maybe he always looks like this when he's at work.

"Yeah, I didn't either until last minute!" Izuku dips his head quickly. "Again, thank you for the application, Eraserhead!"

The man just grunts. "I remember telling you to call me by my name when I'm off-duty, kid." He studies Izuku with narrowed eyes. "Also. Just because you set the new record for this school doesn't mean you can slack off. I expect a lot from you when you get here."

A lecture? Already? With the way this conversation is going, Izuku hopes he doesn't get him as a teacher. It wouldn't end well for him.

Eraserhead—no, Aizawa, sets his sleeping bag on his desk and raises a dark brow at All Might. "You two seem close." He skillfully ignores the blond hero's squawk. "You told me you only knew each other in passing, All Might."

"Ah, we do! This is just one of those times, you see!"

Izuku suppresses an eye-roll. The man is fumbling with his words. He obviously doesn't know how to lie, at least, not to Aizawa. Izuku decides to help out, as it is their shared secret now. "I broke my arm and he took me to see Recovery Girl, sir. She healed it a few hours ago!"

He holds up the appendage in question, as if to further prove his point.

"You broke your arm?" Aizawa repeats, and is it just Izuku, or does he sound suspicious?

Why is he acting like this? Izuku has done no wrong, ever. It's not like he was caught stealing government files the first time they met, so why is he so suspicious of him?

...Or maybe he's just suspicious of All Might. It seems like the two have a strained relationship at best.

"Yeah," Izuku continues. "I broke it while doing, ah, teenager things."

And okay, even All Might cringes visibly after hearing that.

Great, now who's shit at lying?

"Teenager things."

Izuku shrugs. "Yes."

"Well," Aizawa says dryly, "try not to make a habit of doing that. The old lady has other things to do than take care of careless injuries, understand?"

Asshole. Annoying asshole. But still a nice person and an amazing hero. Which makes him even more annoying. It reminds Izuku of Kacchan, minus the explosions and obvious temper, of course.

"Of course, sir! I'll be more careful from now on!"

That seems to be the answer he's looking for, as Aizawa turns away, not even sparing All Might another glance.

"Good. Now will the both of you please get out? I need to finish my nap before I start planning."

Izuku can only wish for another nap of his own, knowing he probably won't be able to sleep like that again for a very long time.

It's when they're almost back to the entrance of UA when All Might speaks for the first time after leaving Recovery Girl's office. "Aizawa is certainly a character, isn't he?"

Izuku hums in agreement, currently skipping alongside him from leftover nerves. "Kind of scary, too."

The blond shivers. "Indeed. Also, I have a question for you, Young Midoriya."

Oh no. Not another question.

The only things Recovery Girl wanted to ask was his full name, phone number, and his father's full name and contact information. It's apparently to start his medical file since his old one is outdated. He hasn't gone to see any doctors since he was a child. He has most of his required vaccines and shots, however, but that was all through a private company his father had hired. How that was even legal is beyond Izuku.

"Yes?" He says, hoping the question is nothing bad.

"What is that on your finger, my boy?"

And oh! Now that's something he can answer. It's a good distraction from everything that's happened so far.

"It's a ring I made last night!" Izuku explains, holding up his left hand. There, sitting on his middle finger, is a shiny metal band. "I had a few extra parts lying around, so I decided to make the most of it."

"It looks very nice," All Might praises, obviously noting the engraved bunny running around the edge.

"It's a quirk suppressor! I thought it would help with One for All's control since I broke an entire arm just by using it."

All Might chokes, stopping in his tracks to stare at him. "It's a what? You made that?"

Izuku frowns. "Well, yeah. I figured it would take a while to get control of the new quirk, so I sorta stayed up a bit to make this ring here. It was a lot of trial and error, but I'm ultimately happy with how it came out!" He bounces on the balls of his feet, not able to contain his excitement. "The rabbit glows in the dark, too!"

That last part was a pain to do, but not as painful as it was to try and make the suppressor only work on Extract and One for All.

Once he has the ring on, it acts as a duller of sorts. It only works on his strongest quirks, those being Extract, One for All, and Force.

Force was a surprise, though a welcome one at that. It's not like he ever uses that one. He never wants to use it.

"That's amazing," All Might says, breaking off into a frown, "though you really need to take better care of yourself, young man. You look dead on your feet most days, but today you look even worse."

Izuku wrinkles his nose. "It was only one night! I usually sleep more than that, I promise."

I promise? Where did that come from?

"Hm." The hero stops and faces him directly, looking much more serious. "Listen, Young Midoriya, I am here to help you the best that I can. I don't have much experience when it comes to training others, but I'll do my best."

Izuku doesn't know how to respond to the sudden kindness and topic change, so he stays quiet.

"I'm going to help you train One for All so we can get through this together, my boy! Right?"

Together? Izuku looks up at the man and sees something brighter in his gaze. There's a mixture of kindness and honesty in there that Izuku doesn't quite know how to deal with, and he's not even certain if he deserves it.

"Right," he says, and maybe this time he kind of believes it.

The boy has a feeling the few weeks until school starts will go by much quicker than expected.

THIS IS THE BEGINNING OF ACT II

Forgetting things can be easy.

It's easy to forget your nonexistent car keys. It's easy to forget to water your fake plants. It's easy to forget where you put your phone.

It's easy to forget where you are. It's easy to forget that you're not in danger. It's easy to forget that you're safe.

Especially when you're running through the city, dodging almost a dozen police officers as they chase after you.

Okay, that's probably the only thing Izuku isn't forgetting anytime soon.

Holy shit, Izuku thinks, I'm gonna be late.

The first day of school and he's already off to a bad start. Just fantastic, huh? In his defense, the morning started out great. He didn't sleep at all last night in favor of testing out his quirks for the umpteenth time, and his right hand is still shaking from all the writing he'd done in his notebook, but that's okay! If anything, he's even more motivated now.

He was ready to go with a coffee in hand and a few fresh notebooks he'd gotten at a dollar store, excited to kick off the school year. Which is really telling since excitement isn't an emotion he feels often unless pizza or quirks are involved. Damn, he really needs to eat at Tony's again for some Friday Night Free Breadsticks.

Another good thing that's happened is that Kacchan gave him a nice backpack from his parents' work to use for school supplies. Izuku always forgets that Mitsuki and Masaru work at a fashion company, so he was surprised when Kacchan threw the bright pink backpack at him.

So, yes, to put it short, he was having a good day. He would've arrived at UA twenty minutes earlier than needed had things worked out; enough time to prepare for the day ahead and calm down his jitters so he wouldn't scare anyone.

But then he ended up stopping a guy from robbing this homeless man on the side of the street, which prompted an entire crowd of people to watch as Izuku smashed the criminal's face into a nearby fire hydrant, breaking his nose.

And okay, that was a complete accident. Izuku was aiming to shove his face into the sidewalk, but the panic rising inside him instead made him miscalculate by just a couple inches. To be fair, though, Izuku was in a rush, as he did not want to get caught doing this today of all days, nosiree.

Tsukauchi is on duty at the moment. Izuku doesn't want to face the detective's wrath, especially since it's one of his busiest work days. The boy would be skinned alive, probably.

But despite his wishful thinking, things just don't go his way.

A police officer, one who obviously isn't familiar with Izuku or his antics, had been in the crowd when it happened. He ran forward, attempting to pry Izuku off of the robber, and had promptly handcuffed the boy when Izuku stood up. Which is kind of a betrayal, seeing as the boy was listening to him and not resisting, but whatever.

Izuku was okay with it at first, figuring that the cuffs would come off once he proved his obedience, but then the officer just had to say: "I'm taking you in for assault, son."

Yeah. Fuck that.

Cue Izuku running through the city, hands still cuffed behind his back, trying to frantically lose the people tailing him among the throngs of workers. It's a busy morning with kids and adults alike going to school and work, so it's pretty crowded on the sidewalks.

"Hey, somebody stop that kid!"

It's almost laughable how not a single person listens to the cop's shout. Izuku zig-zags through the people, trying not to be rude and shove them like he normally does, and eyes a nice pole at the corner of a crosswalk up ahead. It seems to be broken from an accident or villain fight, as the top part of it is missing, leaving behind rough, jagged edges.

Edges that are sharp enough for Izuku to use.

He speeds up, a maniacal grin falling onto his face. There's a car parked on the curb a few yards away, which is just perfect. He steps onto a bench and leaps toward the car, using the hood as leverage to tuck his feet into his chest as he rolls over it. He slips his bound hands under his legs and to the front of his body, putting the cuffs in perfect position.

Izuku hits the ground running, now slightly more balanced with his arms in front of him. He yells at people to move out of his way as he nears the pole, and, with Boost providing extra force, brings both of his wrists down onto the jagged edges. The chain connecting the handcuffs together snaps, releasing Izuku from the restraints.

The cuffs still hang on both wrists and bite into his skin, but Izuku can worry about that later.

He chances a glance behind him to see that some of the cops have caught up, their faces flushed red from the chase. Izuku just laughs and throws them the middle fingers, channeling some extra strength into his legs to go faster.

He could use One for All, as that would be much quicker, though that would probably be obvious to the feds chasing him. He'd definitely have another case of public quirk usage on his file if someone saw the red sparks coming off of him. Which, by the way, is fucking wack. All Might told him so. Apparently not many other users have had that happen to them.

It's probably because I'm so small. Curse this fucking planet.

Even with a suppressor on, he's always going to emit a little too much power, thus the lightning. Kind of like a circuitboard, in a way. If the input is too much, it'll end up sparking.

"See ya, ladies!" Izuku shouts, blowing them a kiss as he veers off the side of the street and heads toward UA. It took him a good ten minutes to shake most of them off, so now he has to run for it since he doesn't want to be late.

He can't be late. Kacchan would kill him. Hell, All Might would probably give him that disappointed frown of his without saying anything if he found out, which never fails to make Izuku guilty.

Fuck. He promised he'd be on time. He was supposed to be on time.

Izuku runs up the large hill and pushes through the gates, relieved at the fact that he didn't forget his school ID. The entrance doors have been left open, and Izuku shoots through them and heads down the hallway.

Students received their schedules a week ago, but he never looked at his. The only thing he knows is that he shares the same class as Kacchan, thankfully. What's it called? Class 1-A?

He's panting and frantically trying to put on his tie correctly, as it'd come undone while he was running. He doesn't know where he's going. He remembers Kacchan saying something about the fourth floor, so he's gonna have to search for his class. Great.

Elevators are too slow. He decides fuck it and uses One for All to take the stairs five at a time. Thanks to the couple weeks of training with All Might, he's gotten used to the increase of power in his body.

It seems One for All and Boost overlap each other. If he uses them together he can use twice as much power while minimizing the damage to his limbs. They can be stacked on top of each other seeing as they're both enhancement quirks. It's exhausting to use them both at the same time, but if done correctly he should be just as fine as before, if not better. Patrol has been even more fun than he previously imagined it would be.

Yep. Izuku is definitely late. He hasn't seen a single student or teacher milling about. The boy rushes out of the stairwell and skids to a halt after zooming halfway through the hall. A large door, one that could probably fit a giant through it, is standing before him. The words 1-A hang on a sign right above him, confirming his suspicions.

There's not one sound behind that door. This is going to be hella awkward.

Izuku tries to smooth out his hair and clothes, aware that his tie looks like a goddamn toddler did it, and carefully pushes open the large door, heart in his throat.

Should I have knocked? Oh fuck, too late now.

When he sees the teacher standing at the podium in front of the whole class, book in hand, Izuku wants to scream. Because of fucking course it's him. The world hates Izuku. It just wants to watch him burn, huh?

"Midoriya," Aizawa says tiredly, not looking up from his book, "you're four minutes late on the first day of class."

Izuku steps inside and bows his head low, flushing red when he feels the eyes of all the other students on him. "I'm sorry, sir. It won't happen again."

"See to it that it doesn't." The man gestures vaguely with a hand. "I trust you won't have a problem finding your seat."

Nope. Izuku will not have a problem, seeing as his is obviously the only one unoccupied. "No, sir! Sorry."

He shuffles past the man, grip tightening on the straps of his hot pink backpack. Okay, so maybe this isn't a very good idea. The students closest to him are eyeing the handcuffs on his wrists and gawking, but he forces himself to ignore them.

Yep. He remembers why he hates school now.

Kacchan is sat right in front of Izuku's seat and snickers as his friend passes him with a glare.

"Now that everyone is here," Aizawa drawls, causing Izuku to wince, "we can continue." He reaches under his desk and pulls out a large box of clothing. "Change into your gym clothes and head out to the testing grounds. Make it quick."

With that, their new homeroom teacher snags a clipboard off his desk and walks right out of the classroom. Huh. This is interesting. Aren't they supposed to have orientation today?

The moment the door clicks shut, the students all rush toward the bin to get their own set of clothes and head to the locker rooms. It's only then that Izuku realizes he recognizes most of the students here. He saw them during the entrance exam, either in the auditorium or in his own battle center.

"Kacchan," Izuku whispers, sticking close to his friend's side as the blond practically scares everyone away from them. "What did I miss?"

"Hah? Nothing, shitty nerd. The hobo ninja just fucking slid in here and told us all his name. The extras here are more annoying than in middle school."

"Once again," a familiar boy with dark blue hair and glasses says, chopping the air as they make their way to the lockers. "It is rude to call people extras! I must insist that you—"

"Shove a stick up your ass, you fucking prick!" Kacchan cuts off. "I don't have time for you losers."

Oh boy. People are staring now.

Izuku gives a sheepish smile and pinches his friend. "Sorry about him," he apologizes. "He gets a little angry sometimes."

The blue haired boy's demeanor changes instantly upon seeing him. "Ah, you're from the entrance exam! I'm afraid we got off to the wrong start, so let me introduce myself properly. I am Iida Tenya."

Iida. The name is like a slap to the face. Now Izuku knows where he recognizes the boy's quirk from. The engines give it away.

"You're Ingenium's brother," he says, nerves evaporating all at once. "It's nice to meet you! Well, properly, like you said. I'm Midoriya Izuku."

Iida nods kindly as they enter the boys' locker room together, Kacchan having already stomped off. "Midoriya. You perceived the true nature of that practical exam, didn't you? That's why you saved that girl."

Izuku frowns. "Um, I mean, partially?"

It's an exam for the hero course. Of course they'd score you on rescue points. Isn't that the whole point of being a hero? To save people?

"You're a lot more skilled than I previously assumed. Forgive me for being so rude to you. I misjudged you! I hate to admit it, but you were the superior candidate." Iida bows his head in an apology, and Izuku stands there awkwardly for a moment before seeming to jolt back into action, frantically waving him off.

"Ah, it's fine, really! You weren't rude." That's a fat lie, one that Iida doesn't seem to buy either, but the boy just nods and apologizes again after saying a brief farewell.

Izuku looks around for his friend now that he's alone, and he spots him almost immediately. "Kacchan," he hisses. "Help me take these off."

He holds out his hands, cuffs clearly visible, but Kacchan just cackles. "Why should I?"

“Kacchan, I am not in the mood for this. I have to get these off, or else I’m gonna get—”

“Woah, dude, are those handcuffs?”

Please, somebody hit Izuku with a bus. When he dies he wants his body to be hurled through All for One’s window at seventy miles per hour with the Unravel OST playing in the background. He wants his death to be weaponized.

Izuku turns to see a boy with spiky red hair staring at him. “Er, no?”

“That’s pretty manly, bro! Are they real?” Spiky Dude is half naked as he pulls on his gym clothes, and Izuku briefly wonders how one can hold a full conversation with a stranger while changing. It’s then that he notices a cut on one of his eyebrows, making him guess as to what the boy’s quirk is.

The question captures the attention of all the other boys in the locker room, and some of them crowd around Izuku, asking him varying questions. It seems they all heard about what happened during the entrance exam and want to ask him about it. Which, admittedly, is not fun for someone who’s as anxious and paranoid as Izuku.

“Back the fuck off!” Kacchan hisses, glaring daggers at them. “You guys are a waste of our time!”

Great. Now they’re gonna think we’re stuck up. Fantastic.

Izuku quickly pulls on his gym clothes during the commotion and slips past the other boys, heading outside. The sunlight makes him cringe, which is why he tries not to patrol during the day. He’s not meant to be in the sun. Wait, does that make him a vampire?

For a few moments, Izuku thinks he might be lost, but then he spots a tall figure waiting in one of the fields, and he walks a little quicker to wait beside him. He’s the first one out, apparently, which is surprising. The rest of the students are probably still chatting with each other in the lockers.

“Midoriya.”

Izuku jerks out of his thoughts to see that Aizawa is staring at him now. “Yes, sensei?”

The honorific slips out casually, but Aizawa doesn’t seem to care. Why would he, now that that's his title? "Do I want to ask why you have those on your wrist?"

Izuku's face is on fire now, he's sure of it. "I, uh, don't think so, sir. It's a rather long story."

"Hm. Good thing we don't have the time." He turns away and glances back at his clipboard. "Everyone else should be arriving soon. I expect those off by tomorrow."

After another minute passes, the rest of the class trails out, a fact that Aizawa is quick to call them out on.

"That took too long. You should all be quicker while changing. UA only has three years to make you into fine heroes, so there's no time to waste with chatting and making friends. Today we're going to do a quirk apprehension test."

Immediately, the students all begin to clamor.

"What about orientation?" A very familiar brunette says, looking appalled. "Or our guidance sessions?"

Aizawa merely blinks. "As I said, there's no time to waste on stuff like that if you want to become heroes. UA is known for its freestyle educational system. That applies to us teachers as well."

In layman's terms, it means he can do whatever the hell he wants and no one can stop him.

Kacchan whispers something that sounds suspiciously like I like this bastard, and Izuku hides a laugh behind a palm.

"Midoriya," Aizawa says, making Izuku fall silent instantly. "You got first in the entrance exam. Step into that circle right there."

Oh god. This kind of feels like an execution. Izuku doesn't like being the center of attention, and yet he once again has eyes all over him.

Aizawa starts naming a bunch of exercises and physical testing procedures that Izuku can't bring himself to pay attention to. He's too busy trying not to look too awkward but also not too comfortable at the eyes all over him.

"You did all these in middle school, yes?" The teacher asks, pointedly addressing the rest of the students and not Izuku. "Your standard noquirks-allowed gym tests. This country unfortunately still insists on prohibiting quirks when calculating the averages of those records. It's not rational."

Izuku kind of understands what he means. The department of education is just procrastinating. Wouldn't it be better in the long run to get students used to their quirks, or lack thereof, right after getting them?

"Midoriya. How far can you throw without using your quirk?"

"Oh, uh, sixty-five meters, sensei."

Kacchan can throw sixty-seven meters, the petulant part of his brain says, and Izuku pushes that thought away. No use getting upset over it.

"Great," Aizawa says, tossing a ball in the air. "Now try it with your quirk. Do whatever you need to. Just don't leave the circle."

And it's only now that Izuku freezes. Oh. He's actually the dumbest person alive. He is the fucking dirt that people walk on. Holy shit.

I haven't told Kacchan about One for All yet.

He meant to. He truly did. Right after his talk with Ms. Hanako and Eraserhead, Izuku planned on finding a good time to sit down and tell his friend about everything that's happened.

Kacchan already knows about his meetings with All Might, of course, and technically he did vote yes for Izuku to accept the quirk, despite not knowing what he was even saying yes to, but he doesn't know that Izuku has One for All. Actually, does he even know that such a quirk exists? Has Izuku ever told him about that piece of information or no? He can't remember right now.

Izuku's hands get shaky, and his nerves come back to him instantly and cause him to sweat despite it not being too hot out. He grits his teeth, still frozen, and the ball Aizawa threw a moment prior hits him in the chest and bounces to the ground.

Alright. That's embarrassing.

A few snickers come from the crowd of students watching, mostly from Kacchan himself, and Izuku scrambles to pick it up. Whatever. He can deal with the repercussions of this later. All he knows is that he has to at least try his best.

He's not stupid. He can feel All Might watching from the corner of a nearby building; Extract can always recognize One for All.

Izuku doesn't take off his ring. Doesn't need to.

"That looks to be about 15%, my boy!" All Might says during one of their training sessions, having just watched Izuku use One for All with his suppressor on.

"Yeah," Izuku mumbles, voice tight. "That's all I can use without hurting myself, though. It's not enough."

"That's still pretty good, all things considered! Your previous enhancements must have done some good to your body after all."

Izuku darkly thinks that it's not just because of Boost, but he agrees nonetheless.

He rolls the ball between his fingertips and tries to think quickly. He can regulate One for All like how All Might told him to. Even with his suppressor it's a bit too strong, so if he just imagines himself reining it back in, kind of like an egg in a microwave, trying not to explode, then he can use it without any physical consequences.

Or he can just use Boost and get a score in the late 100's, which is still fairly good. But he knows that All Might is watching, and he'd probably question Izuku later as to why he didn't see the telltale red lightning associated with him using One for All.

Does he want me to use it? Would he even care? Why else would he be watching?

Damnit. He's taking too long. Well. Here goes nothing.

Izuku rears back his arm and pivots on his heel, that familiar burn racing up his arm as he sends the ball soaring with a short burst of wind. Sparks dance across his upper body, but only for a moment. The throw wasn't that strong, all things considering. Not nearly as strong as it could've been had he actually been willing to injure himself in front of Aizawa, so Izuku is nothing short of shocked when he turns around to see the score on the device held in the teacher's hand.

574.1 meters.

“It’s important for us to know our limits,” Aizawa says, looking pleasantly surprised. “That’s the first rational step to figuring out what kind of heroes you’ll be.”

There’s the sound of cackling, and Izuku pales, wincing as he turns around to meet Kacchan’s eyes. The blond’s expression is unreadable, but Izuku has a feeling he knows what’s happening even before Kacchan starts forward.

“What the hell?” The blond is suddenly stalking toward him, voice low. “The fuck was that, Deku?”

Does he think this is one of my previous quirks?

Izuku holds his hands up to ease Kacchan’s growing anger and confusion, preparing for more sharp words, but then there’s a flash of gray and Kacchan is being restrained by Aizawa’s capture weapon, halting him just a few feet away from Izuku.

Kacchan hisses like a raccoon with rabies, twisting to glare at the man. “Damn scarf. Let me go!”

He’s not surprised in the slightest by the capture weapon, probably since Izuku’s rambled about it to him before.

“No,” Aizawa deadpans, done with life. “Stop using your quirk already. I have dry-eye.”

Kacchan obeys after only a few more moments of struggling, and the tendrils fall away from him and return to Aizawa’s shoulders. Something like hurt flashes across his face as he glances back at Izuku, and then he’s storming away, back towards the group of now silent students. “You’re explaining this later, shitty nerd.”

Izuku laughs nervously, shaking slightly now. He’d expected a response like this, but he was hoping it wouldn’t happen in public. He can only pray he hasn’t hurt the other by keeping him out of the loop.

His friend knows about most of his quirks and what they do, and so it must be confusing to see what looks to be another one popping up out of nowhere. And for Izuku to use it in public? That must be surprising as well.

Aizawa sighs. “What a waste of time. The demonstration is over now.”

This prompts the rest of the class to start talking over each other again, most of them in awe over Izuku's score.

"Almost 600 meters? Seriously?"

"Woah, this is awesome!"

"We can use our quirks for real! The hero course is great!"

Izuku winces. He knows that these comments are a mistake as soon as he hears them. He's known Aizawa long enough to be able to figure out what's coming.

"Awesome?" Aizawa repeats dryly. "You're hoping to become heroes after just three years here, and you thinks it'll be all fun and games?" His expression darkens. "Right. The one with the lowest score across all eight events will be judged hopeless and be expelled."

The amount of shocked cries and yelling this sparks is even higher than before, but Aizawa ignores it easily.

"Your fates are in our hands," he says sarcastically. "Welcome, this is the hero course at UA High!"

The same brunette that Izuku still hasn't thanked for making sure he didn't turn into a pancake twice over on the day of the entrance exam, speaks up again. "Sir, it's only the first day! I mean, even if it wasn't, that's totally unfair."

"The world is full of unfair things. Heroes are the ones who correct all that unfairness. That's Plus Ultra, right? Use your strengths to overcome this challenge, as they'll be plenty more coming your way." He bends a finger teasingly, sporting a wry grin. "So bring it."

The first event is the 50-meter dash, which is easy enough. Iida beats everyone with a time of 3.04 seconds, which isn't surprising considering the fact that he has engines for legs. Izuku still can't believe he didn't recognize him during the entrance exam. He loves Ingenium, so he's a bit disappointed that he didn't recognize the hero's brother.

A girl with an obvious frog-related quirk bounces forward to get a pretty decent score. The brunette uses her quirk—zero gravity, Izuku learns—to lighten her clothes and shoes to help herself go faster. The boy with a frankly amazing fashion taste uses his naval laser to get him across the distance in short bursts. It's still a bit slow, but it works.

God, Izuku really wants his analysis notebook right now.

And then it's Kacchan and Izuku's turn. Both boys are extremely competitive against each other, but the current situation seems to make Kacchan even more eager to beat him. Izuku hasn't really had the time to practice running with One for All, as it's harder to control in his legs, so he sticks to using Boost this time.

In the end, Kacchan gets 4.13 while Izuku gets 4.26 seconds—which only adds fuel to his friend's rising anger. Kacchan has a sharp grin on his face at the small victory, and Izuku just glares right back.

The second event is grip strength. Izuku does great on that, as he can do that well enough on any given day even without his enhancements. The only reason he didn't get first in that is because his arm still hurts like hell from the ball throw, and also because the octopus guy ended up getting 540 kilograms.

The standing long jump is next. Izuku obviously doesn't get as far as Kacchan since the blond can literally fly using his explosions, but he likes to think he does okay.

Boost is really coming in clutch. It seems One for All will only be used for certain situations at the moment, at least until he can get a little better control over it.

Side-stepping is a little more difficult. Izuku can go incredibly fast, but not for too long. It's easy to lose his balance. A weird, perverted grape student does well on that only because he uses the balls on his head to bounce himself back and forth.

Smart, Izuku thinks, but still dumb, if that even makes sense.

The ball throw is next, and Izuku is forced to watch as Kacchan gets an amazing score of 705.2 meters, which is definitely higher than Izuku's own score. The students marvel over him, and Izuku can't help but do the same thing.

The guy with spiky red hair laughs from beside Izuku. "Die?" He says, echoing Kacchan.

Everyone else seems a bit confused, too.

The brunette, however, gets an infinity. Izuku had suspected at such, given that she can literally send things up into space if she wants to. And she did, actually.

Terrifyingly beautiful.

The seated toe touch feels more like a warmup to Izuku and Kacchan, in all honesty. Both boys are very flexible, as they do stretching exercises almost every other day. Iida is surprisingly flexible as well despite his stocky build.

Even more beautiful.

Upper body training consists of simple pull ups, and when both Izuku and Kacchan are asked to do it on the same pole, it's only logical that it turns into yet another competition. Izuku keeps going until Kacchan slips from the raised pole due to sweat, and only then does Izuku drop to the floor, panting.

He's ignoring me. Fuck.

The octopus guy finished third in that one, and next up was endurance running. Izuku has quite a bit of stamina thanks to being a vigilante and also training almost every day of the week, so he's one of the last up.

After what feels like forever, the tests seem to be concluded and the scores ready to be shown.

"Move along," Aizawa commands. "Time for the results." He clicks a button on the same device in his hand, resulting in a holographic screen popping up and displaying the rankings. "Also. I was lying about expelling someone. That was a logical ruse meant to bring out the best in all of you."

Everyone promptly screams and groans. Izuku, after realizing that he should probably be acting dismayed as well, joins in for just a second.

See, Izuku is used to Aizawa's logical ruses, as he's been subjected to them plenty of times as Rabbit. But this deception, however, is a little concerning.

"Well, of course it was a lie." A tall, black-haired girl with a high ponytail says. "Didn't take much to figure that out."

In a way, she's kind of right. It's hard to believe that anyone would follow through with a threat like that. But Izuku also knows that Aizawa has expelled an entire class of first years before. He knows this because the man had straight up told him. So Izuku knows the threat wasn't really a lie; it was more of a motivational factor if anything, and if he felt inclined to at any time, Izuku knows Aizawa wouldn't have hesitated to do good on the promise in the end.

It turns out that Izuku got fourth place while Kacchan, of course, got third. He always seems to be one step ahead of his friend.

It was expected really. Izuku probably could've used more power if he wanted to, but he would've injured himself and, knowing Aizawa, would've gotten lectured and probably expelled for it.

Eraserhead has scolded him plenty of times about how recklessness doesn't equate for much in the face of a dangerous situation. It may help in certain instances where quick thinking is needed, but overall it will get somebody killed.

"Oftentimes," Eraserhead says pointedly. "Yourself."

When Kacchan grips his shoulder and steers him out of UA after they changed back into their uniforms, Izuku is starting to think that that option isn't so bad.

Great. Now he's gotta avoid getting murdered by his best friend.

Kacchan is eerily silent now. Izuku told him they couldn't talk about it here, so at least the blond has the sense not to go demanding answers anymore. He's gonna snap again, though, Izuku just knows it, so he might as well prepare for the best in a secluded area.

The two boys are almost out of the gates when Iida comes running up to them. "Midoriya, how are you!"

I just saw him, Izuku thinks, confused. Why is he asking me that?

"Oh, I'm fine, Iida, thank you!"

"Aizawa-sensei sure fooled us. He made me think that this is how it is at the top when he threatened us with expulsion, but then he deceived us—our own instructor!"

Izuku listens to him talk with fondness. The green-haired boy had admittedly thought Iida to be a bit pompous at first, but now it seems he's just super serious. Incredibly intelligent, too.

A good hero in the making.

"Hey, you two!"

Kacchan grumbles something about another fucking annoyance, but Izuku pays him no mind once he recognizes who's bouncing up to them.

She's still really pretty.

"Ah, the infinity girl," Iida greets.

"I'm Uraraka Ochaco!" She says excitedly. "Um, youre Iida Tenya and Midoriya, ah, Deku, right?"

Izuku jolts at theguess. "Deku? That's not my—"

"Oi," Kacchan interrupts harshly, hands stuffed inside his pockets. "Only I can call the shitty nerd that, got it?"

Izuku elbows him. "It's fine, Kacchan." He presents what's hopefully a polite smile at the girl. "Ah, actually my real name is Izuku. Kacchan just calls me that to tease me."

"A derogatory pet name, then?" Iida says, brows furrowed.

Alright, Izuku wouldn't go that far. A pet name?

"Oh, sorry! I just thought Deku meant to do your best, you know? Like you can do it!" Uraraka pumps a fist into the air. "I think it sounds nice! Like dekiru!"

Izuku's eyes bulge, and it's almost embarrassing how fast he replies: "That's fine!"

"Hah?"

"Midoriya, show a bit of backbone!" Iida starts chopping the air again. "It's an insult, isn't it? It's like the Copernican Revolution!"

The fucking what? No wonder Izuku didn't ace the history part of the written exam.

Uraraka seems to be in the same boat. "Coperni-who?"

While Iida starts to rant about the revolution and its similarities to Izuku's predicament, the green-haired boy can't help but feel kind of giddy and confused at the same time.

Did I... just make two new friends?

Izuku coughs, not meaning to have said that aloud. “N-Nothing! Just mumbling!”

Uraraka nods. “By the way, I never thanked you for saving me! I would’ve been crushed by the zero-pointer if you didn’t take it down when you did!” She laughs a little, but before Izuku can even reply, to thank her for a similar reason, she’s already continuing her conversation with Iida.

I made friends?

If the knowing look Kacchan throws his way says anything, Izuku definitely did.

The boy doesn’t know if he regrets it or not.

Shouta is tired. Way too tired for this. He does quirk apprehension tests every year instead of taking his class to orientation, and he still hasn’t seen anything wonderful happen. He expected a bit more from this group of students, if he’s being honest.

“Aizawa, you liar!”

The underground hero just sighs, having heard and seen his new workmate hiding behind the corner of the wall. He wouldn’t be surprised if some of the other students saw him as well. “All Might,” he greets flatly, not caring to remember his last name. “So you were watching. Good to know you don’t mind wasting time.”

“A logical ruse?” The blond echoes, hands on his hips. “April Fool’s Day passed a while ago.”

“I’m aware.”

All Might continues after a brief, contemplative pause. “That boy. You sense his potential as well, yes?"

Shouta doesn't have to ask who he's referring to. "As well?"

"Will you be supporting him? I understand that's not usually your style, but it seems that you've taken quite a liking to him."

Troublesome. All Might isn't completely idiotic, otherwise he wouldn't have gotten to the ranking he's at, but Shouta can't help but think he's a little dense. He doesn't know when to mind his business.

"He doesn't have zero potential," Shouta grants. He's stopped walking now, tilting his face to stare tiredly up at the much taller hero. "That's all I can say."

Midoriya seems to be the one with the most potential out of them all. His actions during the entrance exam proved that.

It is true, however, that if one of the students had shown no prospects, Shouta would have cut them loose. His threat of expulsion wasn't a lie, not at the time.

There's nothing crueler than letting someone chase their half-baked dreams. Shouta wouldn't do that to someone.

The problem with Midoriya, however, is that there's a lot of things Shouta doesn't know. Or at least understand. He doesn't truly get some of the information he's been exposed to.

He's had a few personal interactions with the boy, and so he pretty much thought he knew what his quirk was: basic enhancements. Pretty simple and common, yet powerful if utilized in the correct way. But now, after seeing the display of raw power Midoriya showed during the ball throw, Shouta isn't quite certain anymore.

That doesn't seem like basic enhancements. That seems like All Might level enhancements.

Actually. Now that he's thinking about it.

"Why such an interest in the kid? Is it because he knows about your time limit?"

"Ah, sorry?"

Shouta rolls his eyes as the hero hacks up a lung. "Less than three weeks ago, All Might, you powered down in front of him when you brought him here to heal his arm. I was there." He tips his head. "The kid obviously knew beforehand. How?"

Why is what he really means. Why does a seemingly random kid know about the number one hero's secret? And why does said hero favor him so openly when he's supposedly only come in contact with him a few times?

"Well, er, I'm sure you remember the sludge villain I took down a little while back?"

Shouta nods once, already impatient. "The one that gave Tsukauchi a week's worth of paperwork, yes. What are you getting at?"

"You see, Young Bakugou wasn't the only one who was attacked." The hero suddenly turns solemn. "Midoriya was actually the first victim. I was already nearing my limit when I came across the villain suffocating him, and I saved him as quickly as I could."

And that's... a little surprising. Shouta heard about there being another victim before the explosive teen, but he didn't know it was Midoriya.

"And you accidentally powered down in front of him?" Shouta finishes for him. He doesn't wait for a reply. "While that explains why he knows your secret, that doesn't explain why he's your favorite student after having only a few points of contact with him. Isn't that what you told me?"

The tall blond sputters, waving his hands in front of him at the thinly hidden accusation. "I do not have favorites! It is unbecoming of a new teacher to have—"

And that's my cue to leave.

Shouta just walks past him, already tuning him out. It doesn't seem like he's going to get much more information from the man, so why bother? It's not like he particularly cares. He could always research things himself if he felt like it.

Which he doesn't. What he does feel like doing, however, is heading for the vending machine in the teacher's lounge. There's a cold can of coffee in there with his name on it.

He has a feeling he's going to need quite a lot of caffeine in the upcoming weeks to withstand this new group of hellions. They have potential; he wasn't lying. He might only have to expel one of them after all, and that's only because of their perverted tendencies.

Yeah. He didn't miss that particular brat's wandering eyes and hands. He'll give him another day or so to judge his character, and then he'll decide whether or not he's worth keeping.

But besides that, Shouta is willing to admit that maybe this new wave of heroes-in-training won't be so bad.

And that kind of scares him.

"Isn't it great hanging out?" Kacchan's voice drips with sarcasm. "Just the four of us: you, me, and the wall of lies you've built between us."

Izuku frowns. "Wait, who's the fourth one?"

"Really. That's what you fucking got out of that? It's Missy."

"Oh, yeah!" Izuku picks up said cat, who's been busy rubbing her face all over his pant legs, and places her on the table. "Isn't she a cutie, today?"

A paper book is thrown at his head, and Izuku dodges it at the same that Missy lets out a hiss. The boy glares at Kacchan, teeth bared.

"Hey, you could've hit her!"

Kacchan doesn't seem to care, though. "That's what I said yes to that day, isn't it?"

"What are you—?"

"When you asked me that stupid question while we were working out." His red eyes narrow. "Yes or no, right? You didn't give me any context, but you were asking if you should accept that damn quirk, huh?"

Oh. Hit the nail right on the head.

“Mayhaps.”

“I swear to fucking god,” Kacchan says, holding up another book threateningly. “I’m going to kill you.”

Izuku hums to himself as Missy places herself in his lap. “Please do not. We’re in public. Besides, Missy will be sad. Right, Missy?”

She meows in agreement, and Izuku gives her another treat as a reward. They’re currently in a cat café, Izuku having been dragged there right after school ended. He quickly picked up Missy along the way, though, feeling bad for leaving her alone the entire day.

There’s only a couple other people in the small diner, and none of them are within hearing range, so Izuku doesn’t worry about them eavesdropping. They’ve already discussed the important parts, that being about All Might and the offer and just why the fuck did you not tell me, shitty nerd?

It’s nearing five o’clock. They have a few hours left until Kacchan wishes to go back home to sleep. That’s another thing Izuku’s never understood: schedules. Why the fuck does anyone choose to go to sleep on time? It’s a waste of a perfectly long night.

“Actually,” Kacchan says after a while, obviously having been stewing in anger. “I’m fucking glad I said yes. You obviously didn’t want it, so there. I guess I screwed you over anyway.” He crosses his arms over his chest with a smirk. “That counts as a win.”

Izuku shakes his head vehemently. “Uh, no? It certainly does not.”

“Too bad. I’m one above you now.”

“Whatever. I’ll get you back one way or another.”

The two lapse into a silence as they study. Today was only the first day, so Aizawa didn’t assign any homework, though he did tell them not to expect such leniency again. So instead of homework, the both of them are working on their own little projects. While Izuku continues some analysis for his clients and upcoming missions, Kacchan starts on more ideas for his hero costume.

They haven’t even seen their costumes yet and the blond is already making improvements. Izuku handed in his own papers about his costume a few days after his vent adventures. As much as he wanted to keep his red and green aesthetic, he can't look too similar to Rabbit or else people will raise their eyebrows.

Specifically his homeroom teacher. Izuku doesn't know how in the world he's going to survive three years as his student while also meeting with him at least once a week as his vigilante counterpart.

Ugh. Izuku has a headache now.

"I'm sorry I didn't tell you before," he mumbles, still petting Missy and the other random cat that decided to jump on him. "I didn't... know how."

Kacchan just gives him a look before scoffing. "Whatever. I'm still not forgiving you."

The yet goes unspoken, and Izuku feels the tightness in his chest loosen a bit so he can breathe again. He pouts a little. "You're mean."

"I don't care. What are you working on now?"

Izuku tells him what he can about his latest assignment. He usually doesn't try to keep his missions a secret from his friend, he just doesn't go out of his way to tell him about them. Now, though, he doesn't mind. There's an arms deal going on tomorrow night, and Izuku has been ready for it for a week. It's supposedly not going to be huge, so he isn't expecting much. He already has a plan worked out and everything.

Maybe Izuku can snag some of their weapons while he's at it. Is it really stealing if he's taking it from other thieves? Doesn't it just cancel out, kind of like PEMDAS?

Izuku looks up from his rambling to see Kacchan leaning back against the booth cushions with his eyes clouded. He looks, dare Izuku say, soft.

The green haired boy feels something hard settle into the pit of his stomach. Are you tired of me yet?

Kacchan must notice his expression, because his eyes sharpen and narrow on him. "Did I say you could fucking stop talking?"

And Izuku smiles, entirely content in this moment. Because right now, with the both of them drinking tea in a café with Missy and some other cats on his lap, everything seems okay. Kacchan doesn't know about the blood that's now constantly threatening to escape Izuku's lips again. Doesn't know about the thoughts that plague his mind due to Extract once the ring comes off.

He knows about One for All now. That's one less secret, Izuku figures, but it doesn't feel like it lightened the load any.

Izuku is going to have a meeting with the doctor tomorrow. The one at the Club—the only one he trusts with his secrets. All of them. Professional help, that's what he needs, and that's what he's going to get.

He'll ask the doctor what's wrong with him, and only then can he figure out what to do.

The suppressor he made doesn't seem to be capable of permanently fixing his issues, and he doesn't know if there's anything he can do about it.

He can only hope there is.

“Alright, who can find the mistake in the following English sentence?”

Silence follows Present Mic’s question, which is a big mood. Izuku is sitting in his assigned seat on only the second day of school, bored out of his mind.

He knows English. His bitch of a father made him learn it because, and he quotes, it’s always beneficial to be well-versed in every tongue. You never know when you might need it.

Izuku knows a few other languages, too, but he’s not as fluent in them as he is in English. Which means he’s busy scribbling in his journal and acting like he’s taking notes when in reality he’s finishing his analysis on the arms deal he busted a few hours ago.

He’s not tired, not at all; he’s past that point. He’s had so little sleep in the past few days that his grip on reality and emotions has left him. Everything is a blur now, just simple dull colors.

The deal went well, but he’d almost been caught smuggling a few of the weapons out. He could only get away with a small rocket launcher and another flamethrower, but the latter apparently has a longer range than his older, slightly more broken one does, so he likes to think that it was definitely worth the trouble.

All in all, it was a good night. He’s going to pick up his check later at the Club when he goes to talk with the doctor, which means he can go grocery shopping for more supplies. He’s low on tuna for Missy, for one. He also needs more bandages and antiseptic for his patrols.

“Come on everybody, hands up! Show me some spirit!”

Izuku hides a small smirk at that. The rest of his classmates all have the same emotions on their faces: boredom, irritation, and confusion. Only a few are actually paying attention, namely Iida and that one girl with the high black ponytail.

Overachievers, Izuku thinks, but then decides that that’s too harsh. After all, he’d be in the same boat if he didn’t already know the language being taught. The conjunction is in the wrong place. It'd be choice four.

Iida answers correctly as well, and Izuku goes back to his journal. He can move on to his notes about his classmates now that his previous analysis is done.

He knows his classmates' names courtesy of UA's private files and records, but that doesn't mean he actually uses them. He can't really bother to get to know them personally. It's not like they could be bothered with talking to him, either. Uraraka and Iida are the only exceptions. They're outliers; they weren't supposed to become friends with him, and yet they had under their own discretion.

Which is suspicious.

In the morning, students have normal classes just like everyone else. English is by far Izuku's favorite, not only because he gets to basically slack off the entire time, but also because he gets to talk more with Present Mic.

No, Yamada-sensei. He's his teacher now, the same as Aizawa. Not just some random hero who'd been kind enough to give him Slim Jims at the local laundromat. He teaches him English now. He's his teacher. The man was excited when he first laid eyes on him in class, and he didn't hesitate to call him out with a loud greeting.

The rest of Izuku's classmates probably think he's a teacher's pet, not that the boy cares that much. Not when it concerns Yamada.

Midnight teaches modern hero art history, and while Izuku hates the subject itself, he's relieved to say that the R-rated hero actually makes it interesting. He doesn't dislike it that much anymore. Cementoss is boring, but that's to be expected with the subject he teaches: modern literature. Ectoplasm is by far the most exciting, though. Izuku loves math. He loves the challenge of working out problems with set formulas and solutions. He likes math because there's always an answer no matter what the question is, and because usually there are multiple ways you can solve said problem. It gets his brain moving faster than any fight, and so Izuku can already tell he's going to be looking forward to that period each and every day.

At lunchtime, the students eat top-notch food for dirt cheap in the cafeteria. Izuku is very glad that UA offers a free line, as he wouldn't be able to afford to eat their food every day anyway. The free line doesn't have that many choices, but Izuku doesn't care at all. The plain white rice is comforting, and it fills him up quicker than most foods, so it's a win-win.

Lunch Rush is weird to look at in person, but that doesn't stop Izuku from getting his autograph. The cook hero seemed very flattered when he asked for it.

After lunch, it's time for the afternoon class, which is what everyone has been looking forward to: hero basics training!

Izuku perks up when he feels that familiar core of energy strolling up to the classroom from the hallway, and he only has to fake half of his surprise when All Might throws open the door and says, in a booming voice, "I have come through the door like a normal person!" He lets out his signature laugh, and Izuku just shakes his head.

His position is anything but normal. He's using the doorframe to lean forward on his tiptoes, his cape billowing forward and around his body as his head is thrown up to look at the ceiling in a weird pose.

It's amazing no one's ever called him out for acting like an excitable puppy. A puppy that can kill you in at least twenty different ways in under three seconds, but a puppy nonetheless.

The rest of the class seems to have differing thoughts than Izuku, as most of them gasp and start chatting amongst themselves immediately.

"It's All Might? Incredible!"

"He's really gonna teach us! The schedules were right!"

"He looks so different in person. It gives me goosebumps!"

And if Izuku is still a little starstruck even after knowing the man for close to a year, then nobody but himself has to know. Besides, is that his Silver Age costume?

"Hero Basic Training!" All Might booms, jumping onto the teacher's desk in the front of the classroom so he can strike another interesting pose. "The class that'll put you through all sorts of special training to mold you into heroes!"

It gets you a helluva lot of credits, too, not that I really need them.

"There's no time to dally, as I'm sure you all know who I am! Today's activity is this!" All Might pulls out a large card and presents it to the class. "Battle training!"

For a moment there, Izuku is sure he just ascended, as the endorphins that immediately rush to his brain at the words are comparable to the ones you get from the crack you buy off of some twitchy drug dealer on the side of the road at two in the morning; the good shit.

"Oh, fuck yeah," Izuku whispers, catching sight of Kacchan's almost shark-like grin.

"And for that," All Might continues, having not noticed the duo practically getting high off the words alone, "you need these!"

He clicks a button, and then the wall to the left of Izuku starts to shift and buzz, revealing multiple rows of lockers with large numbers on them. They're not even done pulling out all the way before some of the students are out of their seats and rushing towards them. It doesn't take a genius to figure out what's inside.

"In accordance with the Quirk Registry and the special request forms you filled out upon being admitted, I present to you, your costumes!"

Kacchan is the first one up and unlocking his locker, but instead of following suit like normal, Izuku forces himself to stay seated and wait until the clamor dies down. He already knows the general basis of what his costume looks like. While he personally wanted the design to be similar to that of his Rabbit costume, Izuku knew how terrible of a decision that would be. So, to pay a little homage to his vigilante persona, the only thing he added was little bunny ears to the hood. Not quite the same as the ones on the vigilante costume, but similar enough.

"After you change, come out in ranking order to Ground Beta!" All Might watches them all scramble to open their metal boxes and take a peek at what's inside. "Looking good is very important, students! So look alive now, because from today on, you're all heroes!"

Heroes. Izuku repeats the word in his head, as if trying it out for size. Just a few months ago, he probably would've laughed had someone told him he'd be here right now, receiving training and guidance to be the one thing he thought he could never hope to be.

"Damn right we are," Kacchan says, dropping Izuku's costume onto the boy's desk. He says it pointedly, obviously smug at the fact that his friend is going to UA with him after all.

No, they're not. They're not heroes yet. All Might's thinking is flawed, Izuku thinks. They still have three years to go, and that's if they even make it that far.

But all too soon all of the students are making their way onto the specified grounds with their costumes on, ready for the new challenge. Izuku had successfully dodged any possible social interactions in the locker room by staying close to Kacchan, so that's a plus.

"Well," All Might starts, grinning. "Shall we begin, my wards? It's time for battle training!"

If Izuku didn't know the hero outside of school, he'd probably think All Might has a permanent smile on his face at all times.

"You really went through with those fucking ears, huh?" Kacchan mutters to him, scowling. Now, Izuku can safely say that Kacchan has a permanent scowl.

"I did," Izuku says hotly. "And what of it?"

"Nothing you damn nerd. You just look ridiculous."

Izuku feigns a gasp of horror, only to see Uraraka bouncing up to them at the corner of his eye. The brunette must've heard the tail end of their conversation.

"I don't think it looks bad at all, Deku! Very practical and intense looking!" She blushes then, as if shy. "I wish I would've been more specific on my request forms. It's embarrassing how puffy and curvy my suit is."

Izuku honestly doesn't think it's embarrassing at all. The brunette's costume compliments her features, though he can definitely see how it might be uncomfortable for her. Hell, Izuku would be uncomfortable with a suit as skintight as that.

"Being in the hero course is the best," a voice from below says, and Izuku has to stop himself from punting the speaker once he sees who it is.

It's the little grape fucker. The one that Izuku hadn't missed being grabby and disrespectful to the girls yesterday during the apprehension test. Why he's still here is a mystery to Izuku, as he knows that Aizawa has expelled students for way less than the chaos Pervy Boy is sure to bring.

He's staring at Uraraka's suit, which is not going to fly.

“Wow, and I thought I was short,” Izuku says lowly, glaring pointedly at the other student and effectively warding him off. It’s a good thing, too, as Kacchan looked ready to blow any minute.

“Are we all here, then?” All Might cuts in from where he’s standing at the entrance to the battle zone. “Looking good!”

His eyes meet Izuku’s, and then the hero suddenly covers his mouth and turns away, leaving the boy frowning. Is he making fun of my costume?

“Sensei!” Iida says, always the most outspoken of the class. “This appears to be the same field used in the entrance exam. Will we once again be performing cityscape maneuvers?”

The blue-haired teen looks badass in his knight costume, which goes well with his personality and quirk. Izuku likes it a lot.

All Might seems to recover from his giggling fit. “Nope! You’ll be moving on to step two: indoor anti-personnel battle training!”

And oh? Izuku is vibrating with so much excitement that Kacchan has to physically shove him to get him to stop rocking back and forth on his heels.

“Villain battles are most commonly seen outdoors, but statistically, the most heinous villains are more likely to appear indoors!”

That’s true. Izuku would definitely know, too. Between confinement, house arrest, and black market deals, the cleverest of villains lurk indoors. Why would they commit crime more often in public when there’s more chance of a hero catching you? That’s another problem with the hero-filled society these days; while they can’t really help it, they push outdoor criminals into underground dealings and make some matters worse.

“You’ll now be split into villain teams and hero teams,” All Might continues, “to face off in two-on-two indoor battles!”

It’s Izuku’s turn to shove his friend when Kacchan won’t stop cackling maniacally.

The situation is dangerous. The number one hero before them is supposed to be training them on how to use their quirks and hone their skills, not be throwing them into a battle setting and hoping for the best. But again, Izuku can't really find it in himself to complain.

All Might clenches a fist. "Practical experience teaches you the basics! The distinction here is that you won't be fighting disposable robots."

"What determines victory?" High Ponytail asks.

"Can I just blast everyone away?" Kacchan grumbles, causing Izuku to snort.

Uraraka looks concerned. "Are you threatening to expel someone like Aizawa-sensei did?"

"How do we proceed to divide ourselves into teams?" Iida throws in amongst the onslaught of questions.

"How fabulous is my cape?"

That last one makes Izuku whip around to stare at the boy with the naval laser. "Very fabulous," he answers, receiving a surprised yet pleased laugh in response.

"One at a time! My quirk isn't super hearing!" All Might looks distressed with having to deal with so many teenagers. "Actually, just listen up! The villains will be hiding a nuclear weapon in the hideout, and it's the heroes' job to go in and take care of it!"

A plot from a western comic, Izuku realizes. He sees where the inspiration came from.

All Might whips out a cheat sheet. "The heroes have a limited amount of time to either capture the villains or secure the weapon. The villains must either capture the heroes or protect the weapon until the time is up!" He protrudes a few boxes out of nowhere. "Your battle partners will be decided by drawing lots!"

"Is that really the best way?" Iida asks, sounding scandalized.

The ponytail girl responds instead of All Might, largely because the hero doesn't have a good answer. "That would make sense seeing as pros often have to team up with heroes from other agencies on the spot during emergencies."

Huh. But this isn't an emergency? This is a training exercise.

"I see!" Iida retracts. "I apologize for getting ahead of myself. My mistake!"

All Might just waves him off and gets right into business. The teams turn out to be pretty well-balanced, in Izuku's own opinion. He unfortunately didn't get partnered with Kacchan, but he is with Uraraka.

The brunette smiles widely and pumps her fists in the air. "Nice! It must be fate! Let's do this!"

Izuku can only pity poor Iida, who'd been partnered up with Kacchan of all people.

"Moving on! First up is—" All Might draws two lots from their respective boxes. "—Hero Team A versus Villain Team D!"

Alright, maybe Izuku had been wrong. Maybe the gods do favor him. He glances at Kacchan, who is looking at him like Christmas just came early. And honestly, it kind of did; the present being a chance to go all out on each other with their new costumes and, in Kacchan's case, support gear.

This is about to get funky.

The villain team goes in first. The timer is set for five minutes when Izuku and Uraraka sneak in. The rest of the students will be watching the cameras from a basement monitor room in a building off to the side.

While All Might tells the villain team to adopt a villain mindset and not hold back, Izuku is busy heading out into the city and plotting the best course of action with Uraraka.

"The building blueprints," Uraraka says to herself, holding the paper given to them by All Might in hand. "Better memorize this! There's no punishment for failure like with Aizawa-sensei, so I'm not too worried! All Might is nice, just like on TV." She glances at him, eyes widening. "Woah, you look focused, Deku!"

Izuku, who'd been staring intently off into space, tilts his head in consideration. "Well, we are up against Kacchan and Iida, who are both very powerful by themselves. It'd be better to stay on guard."

“Oh, yeah,” Uraraka says, looking sad all of a sudden. “Bakugou is the one who bullies you, right?”

And that jolts Izuku out of his planning. He turns to her with a frown. “Um, not really? We’re best friends, actually. Have been since we were babies! He may be a jerk, but he’s still amazing! His goals and confidence make him very strong, so I kind of look up to him, y’know? He's very nice when he wants to be.”

Uraraka hums, her attention still trained on him. Izuku is slightly put off by that; he’s not used to being listened to. He’s never had the pleasure of having the floor to himself for very long, if at all, so he doesn’t know how to feel by the change.

“He doesn’t work well with other people, though,” he continues. “So he’s definitely going to leave Iida on guarding duty to target me. We’ve gotta be ready for that. I really don’t wanna lose to him since we’ve kind of got a running bet going on.”

If he wins this, he’ll rub it in my face for the rest of time. It’ll also count as another point in our personal fighting scores, which will put him back in the lead.

Yeah. Over Izuku’s dead body.

“Indoor anti-personnel battle training. Start.”

Izuku doesn’t hesitate at the announcement. He grabs Uraraka’s hand and rushes further into the faux city, searching for the building All Might described. He mutters plans and different theories under his breath the whole way, and it’s only when they’re climbing in through a window that Izuku realizes Uraraka could hear him the entire time.

“Lots of blind corners,” Izuku says lowly, eyes immediately scouring the halls around them. “We have to watch out.”

He still can’t regulate One for All perfectly—not even close, actually. So it’s best if he refrains from using it directly on another student. The ring on his finger only provides so much help in controlling the output. A good thing, too, as one hundred percent power would most definitely kill them.

But with Uraraka’s zero gravity and his own enhancements, even if he’s limited with what he can do with One for All, they should be fine.

They still stand a damn good chance.

Scope out the whole place. Gotta remember my notes on indoor scenarios and tight spaces in general.

Izuku feels him before he hears him. Extract goes off like an alarm in his head, and the boy only just has time to duck as Kacchan comes flying at him from behind the corner of a wall, explosions leaving his palms. Izuku drops low to the ground and instinctively reaches a hand up to grab his friend by the ankle. Boost is almost always active now, so the slight burning in his limbs is barely noticeable as he throws Kacchan against the opposite wall.

He stays crouched with Uraraka in a defensive position a little ways behind him, and he tracks Kacchan's movements as his friend regains his balance. "A sneak attack, huh?"

"Nice dodging, nerd," the blond responds, and it only sounds half-sarcastic. "I admit, I'm excited to beat your ass this time around."

So is Izuku. Well, not to get his ass beat, but to give the ass beating. They've never fought each other like this before, not in a battle setting that's intended to mock real life. They've only ever fought directly in hand-to-hand combat, so this is a nice change of pace. One that they probably didn't need but wanted all the same.

Izuku isn't given a chance to reply before Kacchan is rushing at him again. Now, this is familiar. This is something he can get behind.

Kacchan always leads with a right hook. Even after so many fights with each other, some things never change.

He sidesteps and grabs one of the large gauntlets on the other teen's wrist, skillfully throwing him over his shoulder. He didn't even have to use Boost for that.

Kacchan was prepared for it, though, as he grabs Izuku's hoodie and brings him down with him. They start to grapple, which is how their fights usually start. The next ten seconds are crucial, as that's when the power play can be flipped into the other's favor.

Without Izuku's enhancements, Kacchan is objectively stronger than him due to his size and weight. That's why wrestling is usually straightforward for them when they don't use their quirks. If Izuku can't find a pressure point in time, he'll get pinned down for the count.

Now, though, he can use Boost and One for All. So when Kacchan flips him over and points a smoking palm at him in warning, it's almost too easy for Izuku to send the boy skidding back with a super-powered punch to the gut.

Now the blond is standing in between Izuku and Uraraka, who looks to be itching to help with the fight but also stuck on what to do.

There's the crackle of static, and Izuku hears someone speaking through Kacchan's transceiver. He can barely make out the words, but he doesn't have to as Kacchan responds even before his teammate finishes: "Shut up and keep watch! I'm about to wreck someone!"

Izuku begs to differ.

His friend never wastes time. Kacchan is after him once more, completely ignoring Uraraka standing behind him. That's one of his only faults, Izuku thinks. When he gets something in his head, he's too stubborn to listen to anyone else.

"Find the bomb, Uraraka!" Izuku calls, hand already reaching into his pocket to get out the capture tape All Might had given them. He twists it around Kacchan's ankle, dodging the kick aimed at his side, and tries to throw him off balance. His attempts are blasted off immediately, however, and the heat of the mini-explosion has Izuku backing off and taking stock of the situation in the blink of an eye.

"Worry about yourself, Deku!" Kacchan hisses.

Uraraka is already gone, which is a big relief. They only have fifteen minutes; it would be stupid for both of them to waste it on subduing Kacchan. The best Izuku can do is hold him off or end up capturing him while Uraraka goes for the weapon. The only problem is that Iida is most likely guarding it. While Izuku has no qualms about Uraraka's capabilities, he still doesn't want to leave her alone to fight him. A two-v-one is a better chance, anyway. With their combination of quirks, it'd be almost a guaranteed win.

A harsh blow to the head makes Izuku stumble, bringing him out of his thoughts.

"Daydreaming, hah?" Kacchan jabs, falling back into his usual pattern of tease-and-hit. "Is this as boring for you as it is for me, nerd?"

"The only thing boring me is your face."

Izuku expects the punch and works around it, trying to wrap the capture tape yet again anywhere on him. His attempt earns him a heated strike to the face, and Izuku doesn't allow himself to think twice about his next actions before turning tail and running.

He had him, but it doesn't seem that capture tape can hold him. His only excuse for fleeing is that he needs to come up with a better strategy. Sure, he could sit there for quite a while and fight with Kacchan, but that wouldn't be beneficial in the long run. They're all being graded individually, not on if they won or lost. Technique matters, something that Kacchan lacks in some ways.

Iida should've been the vanguard, given his superior maneuverability, and Izuku suspects that the boy knew this. So Izuku had been right: this is just Kacchan rampaging on his own to have an excuse to fight Izuku. There's no teamwork on the villain side.

If both of them had come right at us from the start, our chances at winning would've been much slimmer. It was a good plan, splitting up with Uraraka. Izuku just has to find a way to incapacitate Kacchan and then go after her.

Sounds easy enough, right? So then why is he suddenly getting this bad feeling in his stomach?

"Deku!"

He straightens up immediately, pressing on the transceiver near his ear. "Uraraka! What is it?"

"Iida found me! Sorry!" She sounds a bit shaky. "I'm inching back, but __"

"Where are you?"

"Fifth floor, right in the center!"

Oh. That's right above Izuku. That'll make this easier then. There's only a little time left, so the win will belong to the villains if he doesn't do anything soon. He can't lose. Not here, at least. He may not have much pride, but he refuses to get bested by his friend.

Izuku is crouched and ready by the time Kacchan rounds the corner, having finally found him.

"I'm loaded up," the blond threatens. A predatory look passes across his face. “Why not use them? You mocking me, nerd?”

The boy freezes. The words are ominous at most to others, but they mean a lot to Izuku. Why not use them? Is he talking about what I think he’s talking about?

His friend must notice the change in his expression, as he laughs. It sounds sharp, like nails on a chalkboard. He's upset about something, Izuku thinks. Fuck, what is he planning? Why didn't I notice this before now?

“Come on. I’m not accepting an easy win, got it?”

Oh, he is definitely talking about what Izuku thinks he is.

“Kacchan,” he says tightly, a clear warning. This doesn’t seem like a funny battle anymore. It’s almost unnerving how quickly everything turned.

Christ. How long have you been thinking about this, Kacchan?

“Guessin’ you know this since you helped me design them,” Kacchan starts, gesturing with one of his large gauntlets. “But I’ll explain anyway for the extras that don’t know. Assuming those asshats honored the design requests, this gauntlet’s been storing the nitroglycerin in my sweat for one grand explosion.”

Oh fuck. Izuku knows exactly what’s coming, as he had indeed helped his friend with the idea of those support items. He hadn’t done much of the design, only the mechanical part of it, but he’d looked at it enough to know that right now he’s royally screwed.

Static crackles on all of the students’ transceivers, and All Might’s voice sounds in their ears. “Bakugou, stop it now! You trying to kill him?”

Kacchan widens his stance and grabs at the pin. “He won’t die if he dodges!” His tone drops considerably, and he's not smiling anymore. His face looks grim. “Or if he deflects.”

Deflect.

It’s altogether too clear what he’s doing now. He’s trying to make him use his quirks. He’s probably more focused on One for All, as he’s already gotten a taste of some of Izuku’s other quirks, but still. The explosive teen has never accepted half-assed battles from him. He won't accept a win like this, either. Not that Izuku would ever let him win, but that's not the point. There's another part of Izuku's mind that's nagging at him.

He wants me to use my quirks so All Might will see, isn't he? He's trying to expose me, but why? Because he thinks I can get help now just because I'm at UA?

That's probably not it, Izuku knows, but the thought stays nonetheless. He'd like to hope that Kacchan isn't that stupid. He's never like this.

"Why don't you just tell them, shitty nerd? They could help."

"You know why."

Izuku lied to him for three weeks about inheriting All Might's quirk. This next thought is also unfair, but perhaps Kacchan is doing this to get back at him for that, saying as he just found out yesterday.

Ping.

The pin falls to the ground, and the sudden wave of heat and pressure that washes over Izuku has him gritting his teeth to stop himself from crying out as he's thrown back a few feet. The smoke goes up his lungs and he coughs, trying to right himself lest his friend tries to attack him directly. He glances up, jaw dropping.

The entire side of the building has crumbled away, chunks of debris having been blown to the floor and ground far below.

"Awesome, huh?" Kacchan asks, stalking towards him.

Any other time and Izuku would have agreed. Instead of answering, though, he presses on his earpiece. He can't do anything about the situation now, so he has to make do. He has to focus on the objective here, because Kacchan isn't going to get what he wants. "What's happening, Uraraka?"

There's no reply at first.

"Ooh, ignoring me, eh?" His friend says.

"Bakugou." The transceiver cuts in, but it's not Uraraka's voice, it's All Might's. "Use that move again and I will forcibly end the match. You will lose. Using massive attacks like that indoors is just asking to have your own stronghold destroyed."

A good way to lose points, too, Izuku thinks absentmindedly.

Kacchan throws his head back in irritation. “Ya serious? Come on, I'm helping him!”

“Get to the pillar by the window, got it?” Izuku says into the transceiver, hoping his teammate can still hear him.

Before he can receive an answer, though, Kacchan is rushing him yet again.

Izuku can’t dodge this one. His friend will either do two things: go for a straightforward and open attack, or use his explosion to simultaneously feint to the side and change his tact. He’s done it before, and Izuku honestly isn’t able to predict which one he’ll go for this time. So, in a split-second decision, the boy spins on his heel and lets his foot crack against the side of Kacchan’s face.

Huh. He’d planned a feint after all.

Kacchan isn’t easily deterred, though, and he keeps raining miniature explosions and hits down on the other. Most likely saving for another big explosion despite All Might’s words.

And Izuku for sure knows what he wants now. The blond wants Izuku to use one of his other quirks, but if he's not going to do that, Kacchan is going to make him use One for All since that’s the one with the rawest power. But Izuku is still hesitant. He has his ring on. He hasn’t taken it off since he made it almost three weeks ago, and he’s not keen on doing so now.

But if he wants his plan to work perfectly, he’ll have to do it. He doesn’t think fifteen percent of One for All’s power is enough to do the damage he’s looking for, and that’s all the suppressor will allow him to do as long as it’s on.

Kacchan knows how Izuku thinks. He knows that the best way to work around his friend’s plans is to make sure he doesn’t get enough time to think.

He has the advantage at the moment. Izuku’s hesitance is giving him that advantage. He could have finished this so easily if he just used his other quirks in tandem with one another.

Izuku sees an opening and scurries back again. He’s not much of a runner, and yet he seems to find himself becoming one around Kacchan more often than not.

“Just use ‘em, you damn nerd. I know it's not that fucking hard.”

Kacchan doesn’t sound angry anymore. He just sounds slightly annoyed, as if he wishes this could be over with. As if he truly believes he’s helping Izuku by trying to force him to use his other powers in front of an audience.

You idiot, Izuku thinks in frustration. I've told you why I can't do this so many times before, so why are you bringing it up again? And now, of all times?

In a moment of uncanny timing, they both race for each other, fists pulled back, but both for entirely different reasons. And at this point, Izuku has a choice. He can keep his ring on and try to carry out his plan no matter the outcome, or he can take off the suppressor and take comfort in knowing that this will work.

His body longs for the second option, and his mind pushes for the first. But all choice in the matter is taken away once Izuku thinks of what will happen if he lets himself lose. This is different than the quirk apprehension test simply because here he has something to prove here. Boost simply won’t be enough.

He has to do his best, at least on the outside. He owes it to his friend. He owes it to Uraraka and All Might.

If I do this, it'll shut Kacchan up and make All Might happy, I think.

By the time Kacchan’s explosion is sizzling a foot away from Izuku’s face, the boy’s ring has already been slid off his finger and is being clutched tightly in his other hand. His body and mind scream at him at the sudden onslaught of power and quirks being freed, and then Izuku’s arm feels like it’s on fire when he calls upon One for All to direct the explosion upward.

“Now, Uraraka!”

It works better than he thought it would. The force of the blast easily destroys the concrete floors above and below the two boys, and Izuku can faintly hear Uraraka yelling something at Iida from high above. He trusts she can do her part. Besides, he’s a little preoccupied with something.

His arm is mangled again, but that’s the least of his worries. Extract is still buzzing inside of him, happy at the release. Three weeks of having that damned quirk partially suppressed, and now all of that's coming undone. Izuku can tell this because oh god, he can feel it coming up his throat—

He turns to the side and heaves up large clots of blood. This is worse than actual vomit because this feels heavy and warm and much thicker than throw-up, and for a moment Izuku thinks he's going to choke on the blood since some of it won't come out.

The boy can only pray that the cameras aren't catching this. He made sure to face away from the camera hidden in the corner of the hallway behind him, but still.

"Deku?"

Izuku slips the ring back on with a shuddering breath and immediately slumps to the floor, lifting a meek hand to wave at his traitorous friend.

"The hero team wins!"

He snorts, because yeah, he sure fucking hopes so after that shitshow.

The familiar nullification his suppressor provides is enough to give him whiplash, and dark spots corner the edges of Izuku's vision.

And isn't that just wonderful? He just has to pass out right now, huh?

Mother Nature exclaims, not two seconds after that thought, that he does have to pass out right now.

Again. Wonderful.

"The year's only just started and it's his third time here!"

Toshinori winces as Chiyo starts to scold him. He's in his deflated form now, having run to the nurse's office after finishing up the rest of the battles. Midoriya was the only one with severe injuries, thank goodness, but the fact that he was injured at all to this extreme is unacceptable.

A point that Recovery Girl is quick to point out.

But even while she starts to thoroughly lecture him about why he shouldn't be indulging the boy too much despite him being his successor, and also why Toshinori must learn how to guide Midoriya properly, the hero can't find it in himself to feel too guilty.

He could hear what the two boys were saying to each other the entire time. None of the other students could. And while Toshinori was completely lost on what the hell they were talking about, he knew that it must've been important.

Midoriya wanted to win, and Toshinori wasn't about to be the one to take that away from him.

He just wishes the boy would stop breaking his bones all the time.

"You broke your arm."

It's not a question. More of a demand of an answer.

Izuku blinks. "Uh, yes?"

"Again?" Aizawa says, looking way too tired to be having this conversation.

"Unfortunately, sensei."

The man stares at him for a good ten seconds, and after going through what looks like the five stages of grief, just nods his head and turns back to his desk, where he promptly pulls out his sleeping bag and slides back into it. He faces the wall and starts his pre-scheduled nap, a clear dismissal.

Huh. It turns out that Izuku was unconscious for the whole rest of the day. He'd been carried out of Ground Beta by medical robots and taken to Recovery Girl to treat his injuries.

But since he hasn't gotten a wink of sleep since the day he popped out of the womb, Izuku couldn't quite get his arm healed all the way. He'll have to come back later once he is, in Recovery Girl's words, more properly rested.

The moment he entered the classroom, however, Izuku had been ambushed by the rest of his classmates. They all beamed at him and complimented him on his fight with Bakugou, and they talked about how pumped up they all were after watching it. The names came next, and then the polite greetings.

Izuku is still, quite honestly, perplexed about the whole thing. Because that's also never happened to him before. He's never been complimented so generously before. And it's not like they have anything to gain, so why were they being so friendly?

The boy would like to believe they really do just want to be friends with him, but after today, he doesn't know what to expect anymore.

Speaking of. Now that he's completed his mission of innocently disturbing Aizawa's sleep schedule to pass on Recovery Girl's message, he's now searching for Kacchan, who had just clammed up and headed home during Izuku's ambush. He didn't even help his green-haired friend out.

But that's whatever. Izuku needs to talk with him, and if he has to chase him down the street to do that, then so be it.

He's not going to let his friend walk away like that. Not from him. They've been through too much together for that.

"So, what did you say happens to you when you take off the ring?"

Izuku sighs, fiddling with his cast from just a few hours before. The doctor before him is apparently very intelligent, and yet he's asking the most stupid and repetitive questions ever. "I get nauseous and end up spewing blood. That's the most vital info, but I did experience a migraine and some chronic pain after doing it today."

The young man types out another note on his computer. "Can you take off the ring for me? I want to see what happens myself."

Are you fucking serious?

"I don't think that's a good idea," Izuku says, but does so anyway with some hesitance.

Dumbass or not, the boy trusts this doctor. He's part of the reason Izuku even joined the Club anyway.

The dizziness hits him full force once again. Izuku's teeth are clenched so tightly together that it hurts his head. He's shaking, and it feels like something is buzzing, on his skin, under his skin, everywhere. Nausea. He feels an itch at the back of his throat and jolts forward, using his sleeve to stop the sudden mixture of saliva and crimson from hitting any of the machinery in here. That would be unsanitary, after all.

"Hm. Seems it's definitely gotten worse." The man hands him a napkin in case he continues spewing up bile. "A result of your newly acquired quirk, no doubt. You can put the ring back on, by the way."

Izuku doesn't need to be told twice. "Yeah. What can I do to fix that?"

"Well, that's not really a problem at face value. Sometimes you have to bleed to know that you're alive, right?"

Izuku rolls his eyes. The doctor's always been a bit unhinged. "Obviously I'm alive. I'm here because I want to know if I'm gonna stay that way. It's affecting my work. I need to fix it. The sooner the better."

"Of course. I just took your vitals, so I'll be back with the results." He stands up and makes for the door, taking the readings with him. "It'll be five minutes, tops, so don't go breaking any more bones."

"You're hilarious."

Izuku slumps in on himself the moment the doctor leaves.

He really just wants to get this over with. He came here immediately after his argument with Kacchan, which had ended in venomous words being exchanged on both sides. Neither of them meant it, but the fact still remains that Kacchan had refused to apologize for trying to push his friend past the breaking point, and also that Izuku had lied to Kacchan about his newest quirk in the first place. The last one is a day-old argument, by the way. One that he's already apologized for.

Something that Kacchan is refusing to do, even though he fully intended to make Izuku use one of his other quirks so as not to get grievously hurt by his ministrations.

It's all fucked up. Having to watch Kacchan's retreating back (since he definitely wouldn't have been welcome to walk home beside him) was one of the hardest things Izuku has ever done.

And it nearly shattered him.

But this is just an argument, right? They have spats all the time, and they always resolve them one way or another. So why does this one in particular hurt so bad?

On top of all of that, the doctor has just recently told him about why this is all happening. Well, he guessed. The results are coming back soon, but Izuku doesn't think the verdict's going to be any different. The man told him about how his original quirk and more recent quirk are strengthening each other. A good thing, at first thought, and exactly what Izuku had figured out on his own. But this means that it also increases each other's weaknesses and side effects.

In simple terms, Extract is causing him this much pain and annoyance because of One for All.

And in a sick, entirely twisted way, Izuku had already known this. How could he not, with what said quirks are fated to do to each other? But hearing it set in stone, hearing the consequences of him having both quirks at once (which are proving to be a far cry from what he'd ever expected)—it worries him. Much more than it had when he first received the quirk that fateful afternoon.

And when the doctor comes back in, exactly five minutes and sixteen seconds later, it's the look on his face that makes something inside Izuku crack. The man looks grim, as if he'd just learned something awful.

Either that or he's constipated. One can only hope it's the second.

“Well?” Izuku asks, thankful that his voice changer hides his shakiness. He still has a reputation to uphold, even here.

Even with his doctor.

The man turns to him with sad eyes, and when he opens up his mouth and reads the boy his notes, Izuku feels himself shatter a little bit more.

You know when you put a seashell against your ear, and you hear the sound that adults always tried to convince you was the sound of the sea, but as you got older you realized it was just the sound of the emptiness that filled the shell? Izuku is that sound.

He's empty and alone. So, so alone. And it's his own fault. He should've tried harder to be something that his parents could love. Should've tried harder to actually tell Kacchan about One for All instead of being a weak little bitch and resolving to keep it quiet. Should've tried harder to not let their simple argument turn into something bigger.

So yeah. It's no wonder he doesn't have many friends. He's pathetic.

This is all his fault. That's how it always is, right? He works toward something and hits all the right notes along the way, but then he does something stupid that screws it all up to the point of no return. It's like that's just what he was made to do: build and then destroy. He can make an entire essay on that specific argument.

It was his own stupidity that made Inko push him away. That made All for One think he'd be a good vessel for all his ideals and quirks. That made Kacchan blow up on him, which added even more strain to their all-or-nothing friendship. It was his own stupidity that made Ms. Hanako and all of the new heroes in his life trust him—and sure, he hasn't done anything to harm them specifically, but just by being who he is Izuku is putting them in danger.

What's even worse is that he's being selfish by even allowing them in his life. He said yes to One for All, knowing that the small ripple it would undoubtedly create would eventually turn into a tsunami and decimate everything in its path. He broke Kacchan's trust, and that hurts more than any blow or bullet wound.

Izuku blinks slowly, looking mutely at the streets far below him. It's always pretty at this time of night. The colorful lights of the city always serve as a reminder to Izuku of the beauty of the world, but right now it does nothing but give the boy a migraine.

He didn't plan on patrolling tonight. His arm isn't fully healed yet, after all, even though he'd taken his cast off immediately after leaving the doctor's. He should be fine if he takes it slow. Besides, the painkillers he was given don't just work for Extract. The regular nuances and burning in his body have been reduced to nothing more than a slight prickle.

Damn pills cost me my entire check, so I'd hope so.

Someone is speaking. His phone must still be playing the news story he was watching on YouTube a couple minutes ago, but Izuku isn't listening anymore. Only one sound is filling his ears, and it's emptiness.

He can barely remember when he used to feel. Can barely remember what love and happiness and safety and fear and despair and crushing loneliness felt like. It's as though Izuku only has a monthly allowance of feelings, and he's used it all up within the first few days, and now he's left empty and numb until the new month comes along.

God, he's so—so stupid. He should've never said yes to All Might. He should've known what would happen; should've known that the very quirk that's been giving him the only semblance of hope he's had in a long time would be the one to eventually kill him.

And he doesn't even fucking know when. The why is easy; the doctor had explained that part to him. It's the timestamp that's giving the boy a bit of an issue.

With the rate his body is going, it'll be anywhere between one and thirty years. Not very specific at all, right? Which is bullshit, because Izuku hates the unknown more than anything in this world. If he had a date, or at least a more specific estimate, he'd be okay. He could come to terms with it. But now he's left thinking and worrying about it.

He's never worried about death before. While he's never actively sought it out, it's always been at the back of his mind. He used to think that if he died, well, that was it. His death wouldn't matter in the long run, right? But now he is worrying. He finds that he's suddenly scared.

Not of dying, no. There are far worse things than that. He just doesn't want to leave this all behind. Not after all the hard work he's done. Not now that he's just been made All Might's successor. Not when Eraserhead and Present Mic and, hell, even Detective Tsukauchi believe in him for some odd reason.

They don't believe in just Rabbit—they believe in Izuku. They believe in him.

They've changed his outlook on life without even knowing it, and it sucks to think that it won't even matter in the future.

Izuku feels a shift in the air and straightens up, trying to force his face into a more neutral expression when he catches sight of the figure approaching. "You know, stalking a minor is illegal and can get you a minimum of two years in jail."

"You're upset."

It's blunt, as is Eraserhead's way, though not cruel. Izuku doesn't bother facing him fully. He can feel his quirk now that he's seen and heard him, which is yet another thing the boy has yet to look into more. All quirks seem to have a damper on them while their hosts are asleep or extremely tired, but with Eraserhead, it seems like the hero doesn't have a quirk factor at all without Izuku seeing or hearing him first.

Izuku hums in question. "Upset? How can you tell?"

The man sits beside him on the roof's edge—a little too close, and Izuku presses his nails into his palms to calm his discomfort. If the hero notices, he doesn't mention it. Izuku wonders if he sat close on purpose to gauge his reactions.

"Your voice," he says, like it's obvious. "It's higher than usual, even with the voice changer. It's also three in the morning, which is two hours past your normal routine."

His analysis makes Izuku tense just a fraction, but he pushes it away with a smile. "I just like the way the stars look tonight, that's all. Wanna take it all in."

Eraserhead blinks, unamused. "You can't see the stars in this part of Japan."

"Ah," Izuku nods, gravely serious. "So it must be the concussion making me see those lights."

"That's not funny."

Izuku just smirks, letting a snort escape his mouth as he swings his legs over the side like a small child, trying and failing to appear nonchalant.

“You do remember you’re a vigilante and I can still legally kick your ass, right?” Is all Eraserhead says, eyebrow quirked, and Izuku doesn’t doubt it.

They lapse into silence, both of them feeling the cool night air and watching the city lights below them. It’s relatively quiet, save for the faint beeping of horns and hushed voices.

We have that field trip tomorrow. Izuku suddenly remembers, eyes widening under his hood. It’s going to be even harder hiding my other abilities now.

The boy didn't mean to find out about their trip to the USJ. Honestly. He’d been looking through their security systems, trying to see what he could possibly get away with at UA and also figure out who the fuck controls the hatches to the vents, when he just so happened to stumble upon the email of approval. Aizawa and All Might had asked to take them there, and Principal Nezu approved it.

So now Izuku knows about it, which is kind of thrilling and terrifying at the same time. He has a feeling the albino stoat knows that he knows, too, and that thought is just another thing for Izuku to worry about.

His nails dig even further into his skin, breaking the surface, and it’s Eraserhead that breaks him out of his daze.

“You can talk to me about anything, you know. Even if it’s unrelated to Rabbit.” He turns to face him, and Izuku tilts his head. “Especially if it’s unrelated.”

“Oh.” The teen wipes his hands on his dark pants and swallows something hard in his throat. At least it’s not blood this time. “Thanks. I’ll keep that in mind.”

The man hums, and then the silence falls upon them once more. It’s not quite uncomfortable or awkward, hasn’t been for a long time. They’re okay around each other. They trust each other now. But it's a little disconcerting for Izuku to be sitting next to his teacher. The hero doesn’t even know he’s his teacher, which is the exact problem.

It’s difficult for him to connect Eraserhead and Aizawa to one person because Izuku doesn’t even see Rabbit and himself to be one person. When he’s Izuku, the man sitting next to him is strictly Aizawa; his new sensei, a part-time caterpillar and hobo ninja that also happens to be UA's harshest teacher. His first time seeing Izuku was in a rundown pizzeria in the middle of the night with said boy sporting a black eye and drinking a milkshake. Now, Izuku certainly isn't the best when it comes to social interactions, but he's pretty sure that that doesn't exactly count as an ideal first impression. It doesn't help that Aizawa also caught Izuku later that same night trying to steal government files.

It's a miracle the boy hasn't been arrested for good yet.

But when Izuku is Rabbit, however, the man beside him is Eraserhead: someone who he can joke around with and trust to have his back during a fight. Someone who won't hesitate to call him out on his bullshit or even make sure he doesn't do something idiotic like litter. Someone who can match Izuku's sass and even keep up with his ramblings when he gets a little too excited.

It's the little details, Izuku thinks, that make all the difference. Logically, he knows that Eraserhead and Aizawa are the same person, but he can't help but think of them as two separate beings when he's forced to act differently around the man depending on who he is at the moment.

And from an outsider's perspective, Izuku can safely say that that sounds completely fucked. It's probably unhealthy for him to think of himself and Rabbit to be two different people, or for him to think of his teacher and his hero counterpart to be different, and yet he can't change it.

When he's Izuku, he's shy and timid. He's awkward, weak, a bit too weird and blunt when it comes to social settings in general, and a bit of a dumbass. And, sure, he may act differently when he's with someone like Kacchan, but that's to be expected. To everyone else, though, that's just who he is: easy to be pushed around, easy to be picked on.

Hell, that day when those three kids pushed him around in that alley is proof enough of that. Izuku let them bully him, so he doesn't have to right complain.

But Rabbit makes him feel different. He's no longer weak and pathetic. He can fight back, take on villains and challenges without breaking stride, he can save people. He's still a dumbass, but that's beside the point.

So now, sitting here in the comfort and safety of his Rabbit costume with Eraserhead by his side, Izuku doesn't know why he's feeling so... weak.

"You look dead on your feet," the hero interrupts suddenly. "Are you getting enough sleep?"

Izuku wrinkles his nose, kind of wishing the man could see it. "Are you?"

A scoff. "Seems like I'm getting more than you these days, kid. What's up?"

"Nothing, actually." Izuku leans back so he's laying on the roof, moving his arms to cross under his head. "And of course you're getting more than me. I hear old people love their naps, amirite?"

Eraserhead scowls. "I'm not that old, you brat." He leans back as well, his bones cracking and popping along the way. Izuku opens his mouth, eyes alight with mischief, but the hero just glares at him. "Not one word."

Izuku giggles and goes back to staring at the sky. The man is right. You can't see the stars in Japan. Not in this city, at least. A few districts over, where there are less traffic and lights, and you might just be able to.

Missy hasn't been anywhere besides Musutafu. I should find the time to take her stargazing once I finally get everything figured out.

If the boy can even make it that long.

He winces, the reminder leaving a sour taste on his tongue. He still can't quite make sense of it. It's not exactly denial, more of a delayed reaction. The meaning hasn't really set in yet.

"You can talk to me about anything."

Izuku finds himself speaking before he can think better of it.

"If you went to the doctor," he begins quietly, carefully, "and they told you it was too late for treatment, what would you do?"

Eraserhead shifts his head to look at him, and Izuku pretends he doesn't notice.

There's a brief pause spent with Izuku fidgeting under the man's intense gaze, and when the hero speaks, it's low and slightly suspicious. "What do you mean? Are you hurt?"

Izuku coughs, head thunking back against the concrete. "Ah! No! It's just a hypothetical question."

"Hypothetical?" He echoes, unconvinced.

"Yeah!" Izuku forces himself to calm down. If he freaks out now, the hero will see right through him. "I just read something the other day and was curious about what you'd do. Like what if you'd suddenly lose your balance out of nowhere, and your vision would wipe out for a few seconds at a time? And, uh, maybe you couldn't swallow anything other than liquids on the worst days?" The boy takes in a quick breath, deciding to just go all in. "You'd have such a burning in your throat that sometimes you cough up blood and dry heave? Oh, and nausea, too! You'd feel nauseous a lot."

When Izuku stops rambling, Eraserhead is still staring at him with those all-knowing eyes.

He hesitates, which is something unusual in itself. "Is this honestly just hypothetical?"

"I know this is hard for you."

Izuku thinks of the bottle of pills the doctor gave him just a few hours prior. He thinks of the blood he feels constantly gathering at the back of his throat, only held back by the ring on his finger. He thinks of the singular cure the doctor presented him with, of the words that had Izuku stomping off the Club's grounds before the sentence could even finish.

"But you should consider tying up any loose ends while you still have the chance. If you won't accept the cure, then the amount of time you have left is not long."

Is that even fair? To burden Eraserhead with his troubles? After all the man has done for him? No. It's not. And besides, if Izuku told him, their dynamic would change drastically. The hero would no doubt force him into some type of experimentation if only to try and find another cure for his condition. Another cure that, according to the doctor, doesn't exist.

Izuku only has one option, and he's not going to take it.

I can't let him know.

"Yes," he breathes, and the lie is so heavy on his tongue that Izuku has to bite his lip to stop himself from screaming the truth. "Of course."

Eraserhead doesn't answer immediately. He seems to be searching for something on Izuku's face; not that it matters much because of the mask, however.

"First," the black-haired man says slowly. "I would talk to someone. Another medical professional to get their own opinion on the matter. Sometimes you need another pair of eyes. I would also tell friends or family that I trust." His eyes flash red for the briefest of seconds. "Lying to them about it would be like lying to yourself."

The last part is a jab: a clear warning. It's clear that he's testing him, but for what, Izuku doesn't know. To see if he's included on that very short list of people that Izuku trusts? To see if the vigilante will actually heed his advice for once instead of brushing it off? The why remains unclear, though it could be either. Maybe even both.

"Oh," Izuku says intelligently.

Eraserhead could set him on fire with that intense expression he's wearing right now. He's looking at Izuku as if he's a puzzle, as if he's something that needs to be figured out or put together.

The boy doesn't want to be figured out. He isn't a puzzle; he's one singular piece, and he isn't sure where he fits in just yet.

Izuku settles on a cough before standing up. "Thank you for the input. It's about time I go, though. I wanna get in another round before daylight!"

He throws in a wink for good measure, spinning on his heel and making for the neighboring rooftop.

Eraserhead's suspicious gaze feels hot on his back.

The day starts off bad and only gets worse.

He's hounded by a sea of reporters the moment he rounds the corner of UA's street and steps toward its gates. The vultures are busy harassing students and teachers as they walk through the entrance, and most of the students seem to be enjoying the attention. Others, however, do not.

Izuku is one of them.

It doesn't help that he's already agitated and sleep-deprived from his patrol. A criminal decided to be a little extra for him and sprayed him with pepper spray. Now, Izuku doesn't really need to rely on his vision to be able to tell where everything around him is, but the short moment of burning and hissing upon contact had still given the criminal enough time to smash a crowbar into the boy's kneecaps.

Now he has a limp on his left side, a pair of red, puffy eyes with dark bags underneath them, and a bad temper on top of all of that. Missy also decided to scratch him before he left for school, probably in an attempt to stop him from mixing that energy drink with his coffee, but whatever. She's still in the wrong.

Even if he did steal that can of Red Bull.

And it also sucks that Kacchan doesn't even look at him as he shoves past his friend on the pathway leading up to the gate. Yep. They're definitely not on speaking terms. Why would they be when it's only been a day since the battle trials?

"Hey, kid, you're in the Hero Course! Tell us about All Might!"

Izuku yawns, not sparing the reporter a glance as the crowd turns to him like sharks smelling blood. "No."

"Oh, c'mon! One sentence, kid, and then we'll let you leave!"

Let. The boy almost laughs at the irony. Do they really think they have him trapped? And also, how stupid do they think he is? Reporters are vultures. They'll just dig for more after the first tease of information, and even then they won't stop until they gnaw the carcass clean.

A few men with cameras step in front of him, blocking him. Izuku would feel almost threatened if it'd been any other time. His sleep-deprived self is too out of it to even process what the fuck is happening.

“You’re All Might’s student!” One of them starts, pressing the button on their camera and making it blink red. “Tell us how the Symbol of Peace is managing to teach the next generation of heroes!”

“Please move.” He may be agitated, but he still has manners. At least when they’re recording him. After all, he’s gotta keep up that perfect image of himself, no matter how nonexistent it may be.

“Kid, over here! How does it feel to be taught by the number one hero, someone who isn’t even certified to train students?”

The phrasing of the question strikes Izuku as odd, and the boy stops pushing past the reporters to spin around and face the woman, taking a long swig of his flask before opening his mouth, as if to answer her question. All of the reporters lean forward with bated breath, ready for the tea he’s about to spill—only to shrink back in disgust when Izuku dips his head down to deepthroat the mic.

It tastes like a sponge, which, in all fairness, is what’s covering the microphone. The lady yanks it back with a shriek: “What the fuck?”

Izuku just takes another sip of his abomination of an energy drink and turns away, aware of the fearful looks from the passing students and the shocked murmurs from the reporters behind him.

Huh. At least they’re not harassing students anymore.

Recovery Girl was less than pleased when he came in without his cast on. She scolded him furiously about the dangers of not taking his injuries seriously and about not listening to doctor’s orders, and Izuku could do nothing but sheepishly apologize.

She went on to warn him that if he got another stupid injury, she wouldn’t be the one to heal him. He’s already starting to accumulate scars on his hand, a fact that she made sure he was aware of. Izuku doesn’t blame her for her harshness, though. It’s his own fault he got injured anyway.

“You still look exhausted,” she lectures with a click of her tongue, “but I guess it’ll have to do. If you fall asleep in class, boy, that’s on you. Is that clear?”

“Yes, ma’am. Thank you again.”

The old lady just shakes her head and points to the door, ranting quietly to herself about how Izuku is apparently just like All Might. The boy refrains from pointing out that that’s not actually the worst thing.

At least he’s not limping anymore. He’s not even tired now thanks to his even-god-is-disappointed-in-this energy drink.

So now he’s sitting at his desk, vibrating slightly with the pent-up energy and having to listen to Aizawa drone on about how he reviewed their grades and evaluations from their battle training.

“Bakugou. Grow up already. Stop wasting your talent.”

Any other time and Izuku would’ve laughed. The blond in front of him growls at the order but grinds out a got it anyways.

“Midoriya.” The boy in question blinks, feeling like he’s about to astral project. “Learn to control your quirk. I hate repeating myself, but breaking a limb every time you go overboard isn’t going to cut it. Work at it.”

Izuku nods in understanding, biting his tongue to keep a snarky reply from pushing past his lips. That’s one of the bad things about this state of his: it makes him have trouble keeping a filter. He can’t afford to slip up here.

On an unrelated note, does Aizawa allow drinks other than water in his classroom? Because Izuku has a can of cold lemonade he stole from the vending machine on his way here after leaving the nurse’s office, and he’s already downed half of his energy drink and coffee mixture. The lemonade is sitting just inside his backpack, but he doesn’t want to risk taking it out lest Aizawa confiscates it.

The teacher goes on to do short reviews of everyone else, and Izuku is left feeling kind of intrigued. He'd missed the trials for the rest of the teams since he fainted, but after his impromptu meeting with Eraserhead and another hour of patrol, Izuku had gone home and busied himself with analyzing the footage for his notes.

UA really needs to review their security if I can get into it this easily.

Izuku is curious as to what Aizawa thinks of the trials, and it comes as a surprise when the hero doesn't even comment on Todoroki's unnecessary display of power. While strong indeed, the boy's lack of communication and teamwork would have been a major downfall had this been a real situation. Even Izuku, who's shit at every social interaction, had managed to scrape up enough effort to create a plan with his teammate.

That boy's got daddy issues written all over him. Izuku wants to pick him apart. There are so many things he needs to ask him about his quirk, and also his home life—though that last part will probably get him frozen. Speaking of, why hasn't the teen used his left side the entire time here? He only uses it for a short amount of time to melt the ice he creates, but nothing any longer than that. Doesn't his file say that his fire holds more strength than his ice? So why does he favor the ice?

Izuku just needs to talk to him so he can fill out the blanks in his analysis notebook.

"Now, on to homeroom business. Sorry for the sudden announcement, but today you'll be picking your class president."

Oh no. It's such a normal, school-like thing that Izuku wants to bang his head against his desk. His headache is back full force, and he's not in the mood to have to deal with the immediate response this elicits from his classmates. Most of them start to shout over one another to be heard, as if the loudest voice will be automatically granted the position. Izuku understands the thrill, though.

While class councils don't mean much in elementary school, they have a whole new meaning in high school. Especially since this is the hero's course. It means leading the group; it's a position suited for a top hero in the making. One that doesn't have a temper as short as Endeavor's.

Iida thankfully gets everyone to quiet down by warning them of the troubles of leadership, and also of the responsibilities a class president would have. "This sacred office demands the trust of its constituents! If this is to be a democracy, then I put forward the notion that our true leader is chosen by election!"

Izuku doesn't care much about the argument that ensues, but he does think that things are a bit haywire. This is just a classroom, after all, not the government. Though this does seem to be the only logical way to complete the task of choosing council members. Iida has a point when he says that anyone who actually manages to earn multiple votes will be the best individual for the job.

But what's surprising is that Aizawa actually allows the vote to happen, and what's even more surprising is finding out that he has three fucking votes.

Which puts him at the top, making him the class president and the high ponytail girl named Yaoyorozu the vice president.

Kacchan immediately explodes out of his seat. “What the hell! Who voted for shitty Deku!”

Well, guess I know you weren’t one of them, though I expected as much.

Iida hisses quietly to himself about how he got zero votes, reasoning that this is the harsh reality of this office. It seems he’s taking this a bit too seriously, or perhaps as serious as a class president should.

Izuku really wants to know why the hell he was even voted for, but then the lunch bell rings and the class is dismissed, leaving Izuku standing at the front of the classroom with Yaoyorozu for a few awkward seconds. He should probably say something to her, but then he thinks better of it and walks away.

Like a complete asshat.

She actually deserves a high position, in Izuku’s own opinion, as she’s really intelligent and can analyze things on the spot, so for Izuku to get class president—a rank above her? He’s incredibly confused.

Have his classmates been looking at a different version of Izuku this entire time? Perhaps one that didn’t break his arm just the day before during a silly exercise?

Yeah. It doesn’t make sense to him. Not at all.

Izuku doesn’t sit with Kacchan at lunch this time. His blond friend instead hangs near Kirishima and his friend group, and Izuku isn’t jealous. Nope. If anything, he’s actually quite happy to see the boy hanging out with other people.

The green-haired boy is pulled to sit with Iida and Uraraka, and Izuku catches sight of Todoroki at a neighboring table, sitting all alone.

Should I invite him over? No, that’s too early. Tomorrow I will.

As always, there's a lot of kids in the cafeteria today. Besides the hero course, there are also students from the support and business courses. They all come together for lunch, which is probably to help with UA's solidarity.

"This rice is tasty!" Uraraka exclaims, smiling widely as she shovels down her rice.

Izuku nods in agreement before humming. He should probably say something; that's how conversations work. Hm, maybe he should say something about recent events? Something emotional to bring more of a human connection?

He frowns down at his food. "I'm just a little worried about whether or not I can really be class president."

Nailed it.

"You can, Deku!" The brunette encourages, immediately taking some of the rice Izuku silently offers her. He's not very hungry today.

"Worry not, Midoriya, for your grit and decisiveness in a pinch makes you perfectly suited to lead us all." Iida takes a courteous sip of his drink. "That is why I voted for you."

Oh, wow. Okay, Izuku actually didn't see that one coming.

Thankfully, Izuku doesn't have to force himself to converse for much longer, as Iida continues to talk about how ambition and suitability are two different matters, and also about how he feels the correct choice had been made in choosing Izuku.

He's flattered, really, but he's also kind of embarrassed. He didn't mean to give them standards. You can't disappoint someone if they don't have high expectations for you anyway.

Iida's word choice prompts Uraraka to ask him if he's a rich kid, which leads the trio into a sweet conversation about the boy's brother. Izuku, who already knows about Ingenium, tunes the conversation out, only listening to minor details that he might be questioned on later. His hands itch to write down the information Iida is giving out about his brother, but he can't. He'll probably be called weird. A stalker, perhaps. And Izuku doesn't want to ruin the careful friendship that's been building up since the entrance exam.

God. He wishes Kacchan would just talk to him. His friend knows

Izuku gets upset when he's not around him for longer than—

It's an alarm that causes everyone to panic suddenly: a shrill, piercing alarm that drives Izuku's nerves to the edge. Oh, yeah, his head definitely hates him now.

"Security level three has been broken. All students please evacuate in an orderly fashion."

Level three. Izuku racks his mind for what it means and comes to a conclusion at the same as a student answers Iida's question.

"It means someone's infiltrated the building! Hasn't happened in my three years here!" They turn and rush off into the growing crowd of running students. "Anyway, hurry up and get out of here!"

That's all it takes for everyone else to start scrambling. All of the students in the cafeteria push and shove each other to get to the exit first, some of them even screaming while they're doing it. Izuku stays in his seat, hands clenching the fabric of his pants as everyone squeezes past him. Iida and Uraraka have been separated from him, so he forces himself to stand on the table to check for a better explanation.

And said explanation is there—right at the window. A large sea of reporters, most of them with faces Izuku can recognize from this morning, is pressing forward on the front lawn, trying to get to the school itself.

Now Izuku is confused. He knows the alarm system well because of his recent surfings of UA's files and online systems. The alarm wouldn't have gone off for a press breach, no matter the size or animosity of the group. Hell, the press wouldn't have gotten in anyway without outside intervention.

Izuku gazes longingly at the white rice that had fallen to the floor amidst the chaos and watches as teenagers are dragged further into the mob of students. He stands there for a moment, dazed, mind running a mile a second. His stomach is coiled tightly all of a sudden. Something is wrong.

He pushes in the opposite direction of the bumbling students and heads for the roof. If it really is a breach, then it had to begin at the front gate. That's the only entrance and exit to the school grounds.

UA is quite high up, and Izuku shivers as a cold breeze passes by the moment he steps onto the roof. He digs inside the pockets he'd sewn into the inside of his school jacket and pulls out AINA. He doesn't keep the AI on his wrist anymore in case anyone happens to see it and make the connection to Rabbit. Especially Aizawa. He'd be the first one to do so.

He double taps the screen and pops in an earbud. "Hey, AINA, can you zoom in on the fence over there, please? And record it while you're at it."

"Of course, Izuku. Welcome back."

He aims the screen at the gate and allows the AI to do the rest. The camera zooms in on a few figures standing near the entrance, herding the press back outside. Izuku recognizes Aizawa and a couple more teachers—even Yamada. This means that this is serious, much more serious than he previously thought.

But at the moment, Izuku is more focused on the gate itself. It's partially disintegrated, the entirety of the concrete having been reduced to a pile of dust on the ground, almost like it decayed like a rotting plant.

Decay. It decayed.

Izuku feels sick. There's a good chance he's about to throw up the rice he just ate. Because he knows what could have caused this. UA's security gate is made out of very thick, nearly indestructible concrete and metal. It couldn't have been a normal machine or chemical that caused this degree of damage in such little time. This is the result of a quirk.

A very powerful quirk.

He lets out a shaky breath, tucking the device back into his pocket. "I'm going to mute you now. Please analyze that footage when you can."

Another affirmative from his AI and then Izuku's jogging back to the cafeteria with an added urgency to his stride. The alarm told them that it was a breach, and the students all assumed it to be from the press, but Izuku doesn't think that's the entire truth.

He pushes back to where he was sitting before the alarm, only to see Iida up ahead suddenly starting to float into the air and spin toward the exit, no doubt a result of Uraraka's quirk. He must be aiming to try and calm the students down.

“Everyone!” He commands, voice loud and precise. “Everything is fine! It’s just the press!”

It’s not, Izuku thinks, but he doesn’t dare say that when the entire cafeteria has gone dead silent. Iida’s words are apparently doing the trick, as everyone starts to settle down as the boy continues.

“There’s nothing to panic about, we’re fine! This is UA; behave in a way befitting to this institution!”

Izuku is too strung up to pay attention to the comforting words. They’re fake, as most everything is in his life nowadays. The meaning of what just happened is slowly starting to seep into his skin, and the panic comes with it in waves.

Does he know I’m here? Is that why he did that? As a warning? Or was it a distraction? He could be in this school at this very moment and we wouldn’t even know.

Fuck. What is he supposed to do? Izuku doesn’t know if he should tell anyone about his musings, as he could very well be overreacting. There's no proof that it's who Izuku thinks it is. He could be wrong. He knows all about Shigaraki Tomura, sure, but is this really him? The disintegrated gate looks like his work. And that’s one hundred percent something that he’d do, too. So it’s possible.

The staff has probably already figured out that it’s not a simple press break-in. They’re probably scouring for any clues or information they can get their hands on, and Izuku has that information. He could give it to them. All of it.

But that’s dangerous. He’d be questioned as to how he knows this, and also as to why he hasn’t said anything before. Hm. It’d be best for Izuku to deliver a packet or something as Rabbit after school, just as a tip or something. Being a vigilante with a lot of connections will give him an excuse if people end up asking why he knows certain things.

A clear of the throat. Izuku jolts as he realizes that Yaoyorozu is staring at him. Oh. So is the entire class. He’s in front of the classroom now. He doesn’t remember getting here.

“Oh, yes! We’d, uh, like to choose the other student council members, but before that…” He pauses, not really for dramatic effect, more for him to gather his scrambled thoughts. “I believe that Iida is better suited to be class president."

The boy in question looks shocked at the admission, as does everyone else. Izuku hurries to continue before they can try and change his mind.

"He led everyone well in that crisis during lunch, so I think he's the correct choice for this job." He dips his head and starts back toward his seat, giving what he hopes is a soft smile in Iida's direction.

Kirishima is the first to break the silence with his agreement. "That sounds good! Iida really showed his stuff back in the cafeteria!" He glances at Izuku quickly. "Not that I've got anything against Midoriya!"

"He was like a beacon pointing to the emergency exit," Kaminari says just as enthusiastically.

The rest of the class starts to add in their approval as well, and Izuku notes how Aizawa starts to slurp on another jelly pouch. This one looks to be apple-flavored. "Whatever," the teacher grumbles. "Just get on with it. This is a waste of time."

Izuku is relieved when Iida finally accepts the position. The green-haired boy doesn't think he could've handled another thing on his plate.

Not now that he has a mystery to solve.

Izuku isn't nearly as excited about the trip to the USJ as he should've been. Paralyzing fear and exhaustion does that to you, he guesses. The coffee from this morning is wearing off, so now he's experiencing a withdrawal.

Hopefully it won't affect his performance.

Rescue training is promising, and Izuku isn't exactly not looking forward to it, he's just nonchalant about it.

“You wore your gym clothes, Deku? Where’s your costume?”

Izuku pales, knowing that Kacchan is within earshot as he answers Uraraka’s question. “It didn’t make it through battle training in one piece. I just have to wait until the support company is finished with it.”

The students had been given the choice of whether or not to wear their costumes, and most of Izuku’s classmates had. The boy probably would’ve too under different circumstances.

The bus ride to the USJ is nice, though Iida is obviously still upset about the seats not allowing the students to fill them up in an orderly fashion.

Izuku sits next to Asui and Satou, bummed at not being able to be with Kacchan. He shakes off the hurt, though. They’ll have their friendship fixed in a couple of days at most.

Izuku frowns. “Oh? What is it, Asui?”

“Call me Tsuyu.” She doesn’t even hesitate. “Your quirk largely resembles All Might’s.”

Hm. The fact that she even pointed that out speaks volumes about her attention to detail. Izuku makes sure to keep his face carefully blank, but luckily, Kirishima comes to his defense.

“Hold up, Tsuyu. All Might doesn’t get hurt, though.” He tips his head. “They’re already different in that way.”

I fucking owe you my life you spiky cinnamon roll.

Kirishima continues with a sort of awe in his voice. “But that sort of simple strength enhancement is awesome! You can do a lot of cool stuff with it! Not like my Hardening; I’m good in a fight, but it’s real boring.”

Now that, Izuku can understand, but that doesn’t stop him from furrowing his brows. “I think that’s pretty neat actually. Your quirk’s more than enough if you wanna go pro.”

“Pro,” another student repeats. “But don’t forget that heroes also have to worry about popular appeal.”

Aoyama rests his chin on both palms. “My naval laser is both strong and cool. Perfect for a hero.”

The look the pink-skinned girl gets in return makes Izuku think of that one frog meme he’d seen a while back.

“You wanna talk strong and cool? That’d be Todoroki and Bakugou.”

Oh, fuck, here we go.

“But Bakugou’s so unhinged,” Tsuyu counters. “He’d never be popular.”

The blond, who’s been eavesdropping on their conversation this entire time, leaps to his feet, disturbing Jirou beside him. “What’d you say, frog-face?”

Kaminari smirks at the explosive teen. “We’ve only barely started socializing and already you’ve made it abundantly clear to us the unpleasantness of your steamed turd of a personality.”

Izuku can’t stop the laugh from escaping him this time, because holy shit! It’s ironic to think that Kacchan’s the one getting bullied now. The boy shuts up immediately when his friend turns his fiery gaze upon him.

That’s right. They’re not friends right now, which means Izuku can’t laugh at any of those jokes.

“Yeah, okay, Mr. Vocabulary, how ‘bout I pound you?”

Izuku really wishes he could make a dirty joke right now.

It turns out that the USJ is even better looking than the pictures. Izuku knows what the simulation joint does, and also what different zones it houses, so it’s no surprise how big it is. The other students obviously don’t think so.

“Woah!”

“Is this Universal Studios Japan?”

Izuku sighs to himself, because don’t they all wish that?

Thirteen is waiting for them just out by the steps. “There’s the flood zone, landslide zone, conflagration zone, etcetera. Every disaster and accident you can imagine. I built this facility myself, and I call it the Unforeseen Simulation Joint!”

The hero before them specializes in rescue scenarios because of their quirk capabilities. It’s no wonder they built the USJ.

Uraraka squeals from beside Izuku. “Ooh, I love Thirteen!”

Izuku listens to his friend excitedly talk about how she used to admire Thirteen a lot as a kid, and Izuku hums along when needed. His attention is focused on Aizawa, though, as their homeroom teacher is seemingly asking the rescue hero a question.

The boy knows exactly what when he sees the three fingers Thirteen puts up. All Might already used up his time for today? That would explain why he’s not here.

“Before we get started,” Thirteen says, starting to count on their gloved fingers. “I have one or two points. Or three. Or four.”

A lot of points, then.

“As I’m sure many of you are aware, my quirk is called Black Hole. It can suck in and tear apart anything.”

“And you’ve used it to save people in all sorts of disasters,” Izuku adds, starting to get affected by Uraraka’s bouncing.

“Indeed. However, my quirk could easily kill.” Their voice turns a little more somber. “I’ve no doubt there are some among you with similar abilities. In this class, you will learn how to utilize your quirks to save lives.”

The group is silent now, each looking down at their own hands and wondering what those words could mean, and if they even hold any merit. Izuku doesn’t need to think about it. He knows it’s true for himself, even disregarding One for All and Boost.

In a superpowered society, the use of quirks is heavily restricted and monitored. It may seem to anyone on the outside that this system is a stable one, but it's hard to forget that it only takes one wrong move with an uncontrollable quirk for people to die.

Izuku is all too aware of that.

"Your powers are not meant to inflict harm," Thirteen finishes. "I hope you leave here today with an understanding that you're meant to help people."

For the second time that day, the class erupts, clapping and cheering at the incredible speech. Izuku is kind of impressed, too. It'd been moving for everyone there, so the thing that happens next is kind of ironic.

It's only fitting that it's when Aizawa starts to speak that it happens.

His head suddenly explodes in pain, and not even the heavy pills in his body can stop him from stumbling slightly, palm coming up to smack the side of his head. Fuck.

Uraraka gives him a concerned look, opening her mouth to ask what's wrong, but Aizawa beats her to it. "Midoriya?"

And then the boy suddenly feels them. The increase in the number of quirks and the power all around him. There must be a hundred or more of them at least, which means there are a hundred or more people attached with said quirks.

His eyes snap forward, and the sight far below him is enough to have the boy swallowing back the white rice creeping up his throat.

Purple mist. Familiar hands. A hundred thirsty criminals here for bloodshed. A large, muscular creature that looms over the others.

"Sensei," he chokes.

The hero follows his gaze, and by now the class is talking loudly amongst themselves, asking if this is a test or one of their simulations.

But Izuku knows better. He's starting to figure out why he'd woken up this morning feeling off, as if the world had been knocked off its kilter and caused everything to have a certain edge to it.

The gate had been a warning after all.

Aizawa is the first to move, as always. That's one of the many things Izuku admires about the hero; he doesn't hesitate. He's always the first to move and the first to save. It's something that Izuku has come to rely on during their patrols. It's steady, concrete, and so Izuku isn't surprised when his teacher slides on his goggles and readies himself.

"Huddle up and don't move!" Aizawa orders, throwing an arm out. "Thirteen, protect the students!"

Izuku's ears start to ring at the sudden overload of energy, and he's faintly aware of Uraraka saying something from beside him, but he can only see her mouth moving from the corner of his vision. He's more focused on the ground far below, at where the purple mist is growing larger, allowing more criminals to step through.

He was wrong. There's a lot more than a hundred. Izuku can count close to two hundred, and that's only the ones his eyes can see. A few of them are as large as All Might due to what look likes their mutation quirks, but others are small and lanky, probably with emitter type powers. Those people are more dangerous, though, as now Izuku has to guess what their powers are.

Kirishima has stepped forward by the time Izuku manages to shake himself from his panic. "What the heck's that? More battle robots? Like during the entrance exam?"

No, but everything would be so much better that way. He digs his nails into his palms hard enough to draw blood, body trembling now as he forces himself to breathe. He has to focus. This isn't the time for a meltdown. He can't afford to be weak little Izuku right now. He has to improvise.

But then that familiar light blue hair catches his attention once more and Izuku is stumbling back on instinct, hiding from view. His mouth goes dry, as if the ability to swallow his own spit has been stripped from him, and it leaves him struggling to even breathe properly.

His first time seeing Tomura—no, Shigaraki, in four years, and this is his response. It's pathetic, but it's not at all surprising.

Someone's looking at him now. Izuku can feel the slight burn at the back of his neck.

He turns his head and makes eye contact with Kacchan, who's staring at him across the platform with an unreadable expression. There might be a question in those eyes, Izuku thinks, but the boy is too far out of it to really check.

Aizawa curses as more of the students try to get a better look. They obviously haven't sensed the urgency in the situation yet. "Don't move! Those are real villains!"

The mist is swirling around now, revealing glowing yellow eyes that garner everyone's attention. "Thirteen and Eraserhead, is it?" The voice is a rumble, and Izuku nearly chokes as the words resonate up the stairs. He hasn't heard Kurogiri in a long, long time. "According to the staff schedule I received, All Might is supposed to be here."

All Might. They're here for All Might, not Izuku, which leaves the boy to wonder if they even know he's here.

They didn't come for me?

"Of course that whole incident today was the doing of you louts," Aizawa hisses, having already connected the villains to the gate situation; another thing Izuku admires about Eraserhead—his ability to draw patterns and connections between the most unusual things.

But back to the matter at hand.

Shigaraki seems to be the leader in this attack, that much is clear. It's a shocking turn of events, as Kurogiri used to be the one calling the shots under All for One's command, but now it seems that Shigaraki has taken on that role.

The very role Izuku would have been forced into had he stayed.

"Where is he...?" Shigaraki starts, sounding even more crazed than Izuku remembers. "We've come all this way and brought so many playmates. All Might, the Symbol of Peace... is he here?" A pause, and then he tips his head back in thought, the villains spreading out around him. "I wonder if some dead kids will bring him here?"

Izuku's blood runs cold, and his classmates stiffen, the weight of the situation suddenly crashing down onto their shoulders. Aizawa moves to stand at the top of the stairs, hands gripping his capture weapon.

He's going to fight them by himself. He's going to hold them off. The realization sends an icy wave of dread running down Izuku's spine.

The boy can only stay where he is and watch, feet glued to the floor. A sweaty hand lands on his shoulder, and a gruff voice tickles the skin near his ear. "Deku."

Izuku doesn't register it at first. He's still reeling, mind going a million miles per hour as he tries to figure out what the fuck he's supposed to do. Is Shigaraki really just here for All Might? Is that why he brought that—that creature that's standing next to him? And does All for One even know about this? He scratches that last part out immediately. Of course he knows; he knows everything. He can see and hear what others can't, which leads Izuku to believe that he must've orchestrated this invasion himself. There's no way he doesn't know.

"That's him?" Kacchan asks roughly, eyes fixed on the scene far below.

Izuku just nods, too terrified to even question why Kacchan's talking to him all of a sudden when just five minutes ago he was glaring daggers at him. His friend has never seen Shigaraki or Kurogiri before, but Izuku has talked about them a few times before. It would make sense for Kacchan to make that connection, especially with how Izuku is acting.

"Villains?" A student asks shakily. It sounds like Mineta. "No way! What villains would be dumb enough to sneak into a school for heroes?"

The kind Izuku knows. The kind the rest of the class knows now, too, so it seems.

Izuku is faintly aware of Yaoyorozu talking quickly with Thirteen, asking the hero if there are any alarms for situations like this one. And of course there are—it's UA, for god's sake. The school has money out the ass, and so of course it's going to have security measures. Which can only mean that someone's quirk is blocking any transmissions from here to the main building. That's why none of the alarms are sounding.

If they were working they would've sounded the very moment Kurogiri's portal appeared.

The boy jolts suddenly. Are there villains at the main building as well? He can't sense anything out of the ordinary past this building, but there's always a possibility he's wrong. And that would be terrible, because that means there'll be no chance of backup arriving even if they managed to get the word out in the first place.

The USJ is far from campus. Shigaraki has picked a place where there'd be few people around, so it's obvious that Izuku's brother isn't as stupid as he used to be. He must have an objective, because this isn't some uncoordinated surprise attack—this is an ambush.

They were waiting for them. For All Might specifically. And for what? To kill him?

Todoroki seems to be on the same train of thought, as he voices these musings aloud just as Aizawa seems to make up his mind.

"Thirteen, begin evacuation! Try calling the school! One of these villains must be jamming the sensors." The hero turns to face the crowd of students. "Kaminari. Try using your quirk to signal for help. There's a good chance that one of their electric-types is causing the interference."

The blond nods weakly. "Got it!"

And then Aizawa is moving, strips of his capture weapon already floating high above his head in preparation, and Izuku has seen and been in so many fights with the man that he knows what's about to happen next. He knows what the hero is going to do to those criminals; he knows that he'll be okay, and yet Izuku can't help but reach out anyway.

"Sensei...!" Izuku blurts, trailing off when he realizes that there's really nothing for him to say. He trusts Aizawa's capabilities. He knows his teacher isn't incapable, but the worry that overtakes him at the idea of Aizawa going down there alone is like hot acid burning through his skin.

Aizawa senses his hesitance and shakes his head once before turning away. "No good hero is a one-trick pony."

Oh. That's the same line he told Izuku once during one of their patrols, back when the boy had asked him why he decided to use a capture scarf as a support item. At that time, his answer had been a mere explanation, but now it sounds more like a reassurance. Like a worry about yourself and the others, I'll be fine.

And Izuku doesn't doubt it, but his mind is still screaming at him to do something. Aizawa leaps down the stairs as a distraction, throwing a quick Thirteen, take care of them! over his shoulder, so Izuku doesn't have time to dwell on his thoughts.

The villains are obviously taken aback when they see the pro hero flying toward them. Aizawa doesn't look like much from an outsider's perspective, that much is true. He still looks like that homeless probably-a-murderer in Izuku's mind from the first time they saw each other, so it's understandable why the villains underestimate him at first.

Aizawa has no problem taking down the first two through sheer force and power alone. The criminals don't expect their quirks to be gone so suddenly, and the pro hero uses the shock factor to his advantage as he skillfully works through them five at a time.

(And holy shit. Izuku is amazed every time when he watches the hero fight. Of course he can hold his own even while being outnumbered.)

Izuku drags his eyes away to see Kurogiri and Shigaraki conversing with each other, the handsy man looking irritated at the sight of Aizawa—Eraserhead, now, fighting his numbers with ease. His hatred toward heroes has never been a secret, so Izuku can kind of guess what his brother is thinking right now.

Ordinary villains don't stand a chance against pros, especially pros like Eraserhead. The man's skill and experience is good for Izuku and the rest of the class, but bad for the villains.

"This is no time for internal analysis!" Iida shouts, chopping the air frantically as he tries to get Izuku's attention. Oh. Izuku's the only one by the ledge now, Kacchan having been dragged back already. "Hurry up and evacuate!"

What? Izuku blinks stupidly. Evacuation for himself is not on the table. Whether or not Shigaraki is there for him specifically doesn't matter, what matters is that Izuku knows more about the two main villains than anyone else here. He is, for lack of a better term, important.

A word he never thought he'd ever use for himself.

Izuku can't allow himself to leave, not now. Not until this entire shitshow is over and everyone is safe. And what about that creature? He's never seen them look like that before.

They've never been so big.

His mind explodes once again, something sharp digging into the back of his skull. He turns around immediately, locking eyes with vibrant yellow eyes framed by purple mist. Hm. Family reunion time, eh?

"I won't allow that," Kurogiri states simply, contradicting Iida's previous words. The villain looms over them, slowly expanding to surround the group of students. He doesn't bother to acknowledge Izuku whatsoever. "Greetings. We are the League of Villains." The mist parts to reveal his signature neckpiece, and Izuku notices that it looks different than the last time he saw it. It must've been upgraded. "Forgive our audacity, but we've come here to UA High School—this bastion of heroism, to end the life of All Might, the Symbol of Peace."

Straight and to the point. Some things never change. Izuku feels a hot surge of anger rush through him now that he's pushed his nerves and fear to the back of his mind. He has a job to do now.

Think of this as just another mission, he thinks. Except instead of like busting a drug deal, this is more like a crossover between Keeping up with the Kardashians and John Wick, with the added threat of his entire class and two teachers being brutally murdered. Yep. Definitely a normal mission for him.

He's not Rabbit right now, though, and yet he doesn't quite feel like Izuku either. He's in a weird in-between zone, and by the time he's done dissociating, Kurogiri is almost finished talking.

"My role remains unchanged," he says, his mist darkening slightly in what Izuku can identity as him about to activate his quirk. The void wraps all the way around them, but before they can be teleported to who knows where, Kacchan and Kirishima are rushing at him.

And fuck does that make Izuku almost have a heart attack right then and there. It's not that he doesn't trust the two of them, it's just that they don't know what Kurogiri is capable of. They're acting rashly!

The two of them attack in tandem, Kirishima aiming a hardened kick at Kurogiri and Bakugou shooting out an explosion. The blond aims at the collar; a good choice, really, seeing as that's one of Kurogiri's few weaknesses. It's the only visible spot you can go for when fighting him.

Izuku knows that from many, many training sessions with him.

“Not if we end you first!” Kirishima yells, skidding to a halt when he lands back on the ground. “Betcha didn’t see that coming!”

Kurogiri wavers slightly. “That was close. Yes. Students though you may be, you are the best of the best.”

Sure, but we’re about to be dead students soon.

“No, get back! Both of you!” Thirteen says, obviously on the same level of thinking. The rescue hero positions themself in front of the students and holds up an arm.

Kurogiri is faster, though, and the mist suddenly tightens around the hero and sucks them in. Izuku can barely see anymore, but he can hear the villain’s words clear enough: “Go. Writhe in torment until you breathe your last.”

A few yelps and cries sound out from around him, and Izuku feels the powers around him starting to decrease. Fuck! He’s teleporting the students. He’s sectioning them off in twos and threes. Oh god. Izuku has a feeling he knows what the plan is.

He has to keep us occupied so we can’t escape, even if that means teleporting us farther inside the building.

Izuku is ready for it when his own portal opens up right beside him, ready to scoop him up—a rookie mistake. Kurogiri should know better. Under-the-feet attacks used to be his go-to option while fighting against the boy. That strategy is the only one that would almost always work.

He dodges it in the blink of an eye, trying to make his way out of the mist. He dances around the other openings, wildly glancing around to see if he can get close enough to yank one of his friends out of the way. But he can only see a few feet in front of his face, and all too soon Izuku is left with just a few other students in the blink of an eye. The mist disappears, going back towards Kurogiri.

There’s quite a few others spread out around him; Izuku can see Iida, Uraraka, Mina, Shoji, Satou, and evening Sero off to the side. Thirteen is running for them, having been left as well. Kurogiri either left them purposely or couldn’t manage to get them in his portal.

It’s more than likely the second. Kuro needs to keep his eyes on them.

Izuku shifts on his feet. He should tell them his knowledge, he doesn’t care about the consequences he might face now that it's life or death for everyone here. He knows all about Kurogiri and Shigaraki—he can tell them. Should have told them right after the gate incident.

But then he hears the mist swirling around again, ready for a second try at splitting them all up, and he forces himself to move. Aim for the neckpiece. Just like in training.

His legs burn as he leaps at his former caretaker, ignoring the calls of his friends behind him. He has his foot reared back, ready to kick the piece of heavy metal that's keeping Kurogiri's body hidden, eyes alight in determination.

Their gazes lock, and Izuku really wishes he could read the villain's expression. It's nearly impossible to do so in general, given by the lack of a face, but now more than ever it seems to be an issue.

Damn you.

The tip of Izuku's shoe is a mere inch from touching the metal when the mist appears before him once again and swallows him whole. And just like that he's dropped onto the stairs leading down to the plaza. He tumbles down the last few steps, cursing himself. He just left his friends alone to deal with him.

At least Thirteen is there. The pro hero should be able to keep them relatively safe.

He scrambles to his feet, taking a look around. He was dropped in the middle of the fight, it seems. Eraserhead is not too far off, still fighting the villains. His movements are sluggish now, as he's obviously tired, but he's still getting the job done. He's like a fish swimming upstream, taking down any obstacles in his way on his journey to get to Shigaraki.

The large creature is still standing by Izuku's brother, barely moving with the exception of its heavy breathing. Is it a human? No, the exposed brain says otherwise. This is a pet. He was made.

And that means… No. They couldn't have. They… he made it? He perfected them?

Izuku recalls All for One mentioning something about how the progress of his newest projects were going, back before Izuku escaped that dreadful facility. He remembers dark basements filled with monsters, shadows with eyes in them, and the boy starts to shake.

Is this a newer, repaired version of one of those projects?

God, he really wishes he hadn't left AINA in his backpack after changing into his gym uniform. She could've helped a lot, even if he kept her hidden inside his pocket.

The boy briefly wonders why Kurogiri dropped him here, right by Shigaraki. Was it on purpose, or was it a decision made in a blind panic to keep him from getting the collar off?

Izuku slaps himself from him thoughts and gradually slips into his attack mode. He can worry and scream about this all later, but for now he has to deal with things one step at a time.

The only thing he can do is help his teacher fight now that he's here. There are a ton of villains in the plaza, and probably a lot more all spread out in the various zones. He has to stay out of sight as well, though, so he starts by taking down the villains on the outskirts of the area—as far away from Shigaraki as possible. He'll only be a distraction to Eraserhead if he suddenly pops up in the middle of it, and Shigaraki will probably throw a tantrum once he sees him—unless they do actually know he's here. It would be very surprising, however, as Izuku his still under the impression that his brother would sell him out immediately, even if he didn't actually see him. But he's said nothing of the sort yet.

The boy hikes up a leg and grabs the emergency knife from his boot, thinking absentmindedly that he'll have to make up an excuse later for having it if he gets caught. Students aren't allowed to have undocumented support weapons, after all, especially knives. But he hopes that this counts as an emergency.

Izuku slowly works his way to the middle of the jumble of villains, ignoring the shocked calls from the lowlife criminals. Apparently he's not supposed to be this skilled, not at his young age. Which is kind of ageist.

The boy darts in and smashes one of the criminals to the ground, simultaneously deflecting a knife meant for his teacher, who does a double take upon seeing him. "Midoriya! What are you—?"

"Looked like you needed some help!" He cuts him off, albeit apologetically. He ducks a mutant's thin tail and sends the man barreling into another. "I wasn't going to leave you, sensei!"

"You should not be here," he hisses, sounding pissed. Oh well. Izuku can deal with that later, if there even is a later for them.

“The mist guy has a teleportation quirk that works as a portal,” Izuku continues as if the man never spoke. “Very dangerous.”

A muffled curse. Izuku slices the straps of someone’s leather whip and grabs hold of the end piece, jerking them forward. He moves out of the way in time for Eraserhead to deal the finishing blow, and then they’re suddenly back-to-back. They move around each other like that, falling back into that familiar pattern.

Izuku can only pray that Eraserhead is too preoccupied to wonder why they’re fighting together so fluently.

“Five-point disintegration,” the boy starts again. “That’s what Handy Man over there has. Don’t let him touch you!”

“He’s the one who damaged the gate, then,” Eraserhead says, more to himself than anything. But then he looks suddenly bewildered. “How do you—”

“A lucky guess. I’m going to help draw them to the plaza! The more here, the more we have accounted for. Besides, it’ll take attention away from the other students!”

He also wants to get out of Shigaraki’s eyesight.

Eraserhead flashes him another warning look. “No. You need to get back!”

Izuku isn’t sorry at all. Of course the hero can more than hold his own out here, but it’s too much for him. He knew that, too, and yet he jumped in anyway to protect the students. If Izuku can do anything to help him like how he’s helping them, he won’t hesitate to do it.

The boy doesn’t bother replying before zipping through the crowd and dragging some of the nearest criminals along with him. He can draw them all to one place, and if he makes a big enough commotion, all of the others will follow suit. It’ll be less for the other students to deal with, too.

“Midoriya—!” Eraserhead shouts, but the boy pretends he doesn’t hear him.

He can at least help lighten the load until backup arrives. Hopefully Iida or somebody can escape Kurogiri and get help. It’s most likely that whoever is messing with the system has hidden themselves, as the alarms haven't turned on even with Eraserhead nullifying nearly everyone's quirks. If a student can get outside, they should be able to contact the school quickly. Or at least run to the main building. Villains wouldn't be able to follow because the alarms only work inside the building. They'd be found out the moment they stepped outside.

Izuku continues his separate brawl, and he swears he only looks away for a moment when it happens.

"Twenty-four seconds."

Oh. Fuck.

Izuku turns, and from his place all the way across the plaza, he can see Shigaraki running at Eraserhead. The hero was able to create a pathway to the villain since Izuku has drawn most of the other criminals back. But that wasn't supposed to be the goddamn point! He's supposed to keep his distance, not go straight for him! Screw it all!

"So, you're the boss?" Eraserhead calls, and Izuku's breath shudders.

"Twenty-three." Shigaraki grabs the end of the hero's scarf between his fingers. "Twenty seconds."

Eraserhead moves past the creature, who's merely standing there like a doll waiting for orders, and dives at the younger man.

"Seventeen."

The hero yanks on his end of the capture weapon and drives his elbow directly into the villain's stomach.

Izuku can't hear past the ringing in his ears, but he can see his brother's mouth moving, and he has a vague idea what he's saying.

He's figured it out. The time limit. It's hard to tell when he's fighting, but Eraserhead's hair falls down when he deactivates his quirk—so whenever he blinks. Every time he finishes a big move his max duration gets shorter. That explains why Shigaraki was counting.

He's definitely not as dumb as he used to be. Izuku isn't sure what to think of that new info.

But then Izuku can see the dust floating in the air, and it's only then that he realizes that Shigaraki grabbed onto Eraserhead's elbow before he could pull away, the skin and muscle being disintegrated instantly.

Izuku wants to throw up and scream at the same time, but he settles on punching his current victim with a lot more force than necessary because I fucking told you to keep your distance!

Eraserhead takes it in stride and shoves the young villain away, though Izuku can spot the dawning horror and realization on his face as he sees Shigaraki's quirk in action.

Two more villains lunge at the hero to distract him, and Izuku can tell his teacher is slowing down even more. The man barely dodges a stab to the shoulder, and he ends up just shoving both criminals back for a second to right himself.

Izuku is sliced in the cheek with a katana, and he parries the next blow before easily swiping the criminal's legs out from under her and throwing his dagger into the chest of her partner. He pulls the dude forward and jabs his knee in the center of his face, knocking him out cold. He grips his knife even tighter and tries to make his way back to the center, back to Eraserhead. Because there's that feeling again, that something wrong is happening. That the world is turning upside-down once more.

He gets close enough to hear the tail end of Shigaraki's monologue. "So cool. So cool. But by the way, hero," his grin turns sickening, "I'm not the boss here."

What? Izuku grits his teeth. What is he talking about? It can't be one of those low level thugs.

The creature moves with breathtaking speed. The light reflects off of its oily black skin as it grabs onto a thrashing Eraserhead and lifts him up with one meaty hand. A hand that could crush skulls with ease, Izuku knows.

The boy is fighting with more vigor now, trying to avoid the villains crowding him this time so he can get to his teacher, so he can help.

And then the Nomu is smashing Eraserhead into the ground at breakneck speed, the sick snap of bone sounding clearly through the air before the crack of the concrete makes itself known. Large hands pound down on the man's arms and elbows.

Once. Twice.

The hero is smashed further into the ground with every hit, and even this far away, Izuku can see the blood trickling down his face and pooling around him.

It's dark and shiny. Thick like sludge.

Izuku really does almost vomit this time, as the screams that's leaving Eraserhead's mouth causes something ugly to churn in his stomach. He feels suddenly cold, the knife in his hand a steady heat as he stands there, glued to the ground yet again, as the creature raises its meaty arms, ready to hit Eraserhead for the third time—ready to kill him, it looks, as the hit is directed at his head. The teacher is barely moving.

"Meet the anti-symbol of peace," Shigaraki says snidely. "The bio-engineered Nomu."

Nomu. A name to go with the monster that used to plague Izuku's living nightmares back then. It sounds fitting.

Instead of dealing a finishing blow, the creature lifts the hero's head off the ground and pauses for a moment, obviously waiting for the final command before it slams him face-first into the ground; a brutal move. And that's when Izuku starts running.

There are only a few criminals remaining around him, and even they have already backed off, eyes wide now that they are fully witnessing the Nomu's destructive power. Which means there's nobody to stop him as Izuku practically flies towards the anti-symbol of peace.

Time always seems to move faster when it's running out. To others, it seems that Izuku simply reappears in front of the creature, arm raised with red lightning crackling along his skin, but to Izuku the milliseconds between the point of contact ticks on for hours.

The Nomu is fast, but only artificially so. It drops Eraserhead with a thud and pivots, its own fist coming up to meet Izuku's before the boy can land the hit to its face. And the sheer shock that runs through him when their fists meet is enough to have Izuku yelping as he's blown backwards, the wind roaring in his ears.

And the Nomu barely stumbles.

Izuku hits the ground hard, a round of blood leaving him from his mouth and nose. He coughs it out wetly, pushing himself to rest on his knees as he stares up at the Nomu, who's still standing over Eraserhead, wild eyes transfixed on the boy like a lion with its prey.

Waiting. Always waiting. It can't think for itself.

Izuku's arm is burning now, and he chances a glance down to find it perfectly intact. So it's not even fractured, which is good considering he still has that stupid ring on.

The Nomu doesn't make another move. It doesn't even look fazed from Izuku's fifteen percent punch. Shock absorption, perhaps? It's bio-engineered, so it could have multiple quirks like me. This is gonna make things a hell of a lot harder, but also a hell of a lot more enjoyable since I can't get hurt from using One for All directly.

Izuku stands up and walks towards the creature, steps slow and purposeful. He needs to distract it—do anything that'll make sure it won't hit the pro hero beneath him even one more time.

The boy really hopes Eraserhead is unconscious at this point; he can feel the man's quirk dimming ever so slightly. He hasn't even lifted up his head yet.

"This is my replacement?" Izuku moves a few more yards so he's standing in front of his limp teacher, tense, in case the Nomu decides to go again. "I have to say, I'm a little disappointed."

Shigaraki scratches at his neck in agitation. It seems Izuku's brother never did get rid of that tic of his. "You. You're not supposed to be here."

Izuku grits his teeth, fists clenching. "Neither are you, Crusty Lips. Now that we're done stating the obvious, how about you tell me what kind of fucking power that thing has."

He points at the Nomu, the mindless creature that almost killed Eraserhead. His teacher and mentor. One of the only adults who's ever showed Izuku any care. He could've been gone. Just like that. That could still happen, really. It's hard to tell what's going on at this point.

"The Nomu?" Shigaraki sounds like he's grinning behind the hand on his face. "He's my new sidekick." He rolls his head around sensually. "Sensei gave it to me as a pet. He's a high level, you see."

Izuku scoffs, trying to keep his anger at bay. "He? That thing is a monster. Not a person."

"Well, I guess that makes sense." There's a manic uptilt to his lips. "He would've been you."

Izuku reels back in disgust, even as he registers that he himself just joked about that. He just didn't expect that to be true.

That Nomu is a mindless, soulless creature. How could they? How could they make something like this?

Shivers go down Izuku's spine. It really is like a little plaything. And that would've been me if I didn't leave when I did.

"Hey, Nomu!" He waves at it, as if to get its attention, but it doesn't even blink.

"He only answers to me," Shigaraki says. "He listens to my orders."

So, in other words, he's just here to protect you and kill All Might. Like an attack dog.

"Now, how did you manage to cheat your way into this place?" His brother continues, eyes sharpening with interest. His fingers are twitching. Shigaraki is positively itching to hurt his brother. "I doubt these little heroes know what you are, right?"

Ignore him. Ignore him. Ignore him—

Familiar purple mist swirls behind his brother, and Kurogiri manifests from it. "Tomura," the villain starts.

"Kurogiri. Is Thirteen dead?"

"Incapacitated," he states, sending a rush of relief through Izuku. "But there were some students I couldn't warp away, and one of them escaped to the main building."

Iida. Or maybe Kaminari.

Shigaraki turns to him and starts to laugh lowly, a dangerous sound. "Oh?" The scratching intensifies, almost to the point of blood. Izuku cringes at the sight. "Kurogiri... I'd turn you to dust if you weren't our ticket out of here."

The boy doesn't doubt it. His brother has never been as close to the warp villain as Izuku was. As if sensing his thoughts, Kurogiri shifts his yellow eyes to look at him.

"Izuku." The villain tips his shadowy head. "We were not informed of your attendance today."

So All for One kept this from them, as Izuku knows that the man must have been aware. Is he testing him? Trying to see what he'll do? Or is he testing Shigaraki? It could be both, in all honesty.

"This is a surprise on both sides then," Izuku mutters.

Shigaraki doesn't seem to care at the implications of this, though, as he's still scratching at his neck. "We won't stand a chance against dozens of pros. It's game over. It's game over for now." He clenches his hand into a fist. "We're leaving."

And—what? No. That's not right. Can't be right. To go through all of this trouble, only to leave at the mere mention of backup arriving? It's unusual. It's not like his brother to give up so easily.

So when Shigaraki twists his head, Izuku isn't really surprised at the words that leave him. "But before that... I think we should do some damage here. Leaving some dead kids behind should wound the pride of the Symbol of Peace a little bit, at least." His older brother turns, crazed eyes locking onto Izuku's. "And I think we should start with you."

The blood is rushing through his ears now, so he doesn't quite hear the command given to the Nomu, but it's not that hard to imagine what it was.

He doesn't have time to dodge as the fist slams into his stomach, sending him flying. The blow has him crashing into the wall on the other side of the plaza, the air leaving his lungs all at once. The Nomu is on him instantly, though, grabbing Izuku around the torso with one large hand and throwing him again.

Izuku rights himself just in time and rolls when he hits the ground, crouching down in a defensive position on instinct, strategies running through his mind.

It snapped Eraserhead's arm like a twig. Looking at any part of its body should have nullified any of its potential quirks, which means that the strength he used against Eraserhead is just his base strength. He's easily as strong as All Might even without external factors.

No strength quirk, it seems. Definitely shock absorption, but what about any others? Izuku is going in practically blind, which isn't good. Not at all.

Shigaraki just wants me dead, or else he would've gone for one of the other students. That part isn't surprising, at least.

Izuku's previous blows weren't doing anything. That's mostly due to the shock absorption, but also due to his ring. Izuku only has a few seconds to make up his mind. He slides off his ring and pockets it. He can use One for All without hurting his arms or legs directly, as the absorption will save him from that. But the moment the suppressor comes off, Izuku is doubling over, bright blood bubbling past his lips.

Shigaraki laughs from the side. "It's just as Sensei said, isn't it? You should have listened."

The boy just sends him the middle finger as he straightens up, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand. It's his third day of school and it's already the second time he's had to take off his ring. Just fantastic.

The Nomu shifts ever so slightly, a telltale sign of it about to move, and Izuku shoots for it first. He grips the knife in his left hand while he aims another blow with his right. But this time he activates Pull right before he can be thrown backwards, and he flies towards the Nomu's face. He slices it, just barely missing the eyes. Fuck.

He has to go for the weak points. That's the joints and visible organs. The brain is the biggest one, it seems. It might as well be a neon sign that tells Izuku to just go for me!

The Nomu's arm hits his chest and shoves him aside. Izuku drops down to form an x with his arms just as another punch rains down on him. Deflect seems to be useful after all. Another blow, and the invisible shield seems to crack under the force.

Izuku lets it up and leaps at the Nomu, his knee smashing into its chin before it can stop him, and the boy is about to stab his knife through its brain when its hand grabs him by the ankle and chucks him. It descends upon him instantly, and Izuku isn't quick enough to fully dodge the hit. His leg takes the brunt of it, and Izuku cries out as he throws his knife to get it to back off.

Izuku pulls the blade back toward him and forces himself up. The Nomu has an arm raised, another punch just waiting for him, but Izuku ducks between its legs and pivots on his heel, slicing the backs of its knees. The skin is too thick, however, revealing only pale flesh. It doesn't do the expected damage, but it's close enough.

He watches the Nomu fumble a bit before righting itself. It spins around in the blink of an eye, and the boy grabs onto its outstretched arm and swings himself up, trying to aim for the brain once again. A large palm comes up to smack his back like a fly, and Izuku is thrown directly beneath it. Its dark shadow looms over the boy's body, blocking out the light. When Izuku glances up he's met with soulless eyes staring back at him. He rolls to the side, trying to avoid being smashed into the ground like Eraserhead, only to get kicked like a goddamn soccer ball.

That's the one time Izuku doesn't roll, however.

He's lifted up by the back of his shirt, and Izuku is brought close to the Nomu's face. Its mouth is lined with a row of jagged teeth, not unlike Kirishima's. But these are bigger, and they look more like someone took a hammer to its regular teeth and chipped off the tops.

Izuku slices the wrist holding him and jumps up onto its arm, running along it with newfound determination. He doesn't miss the eyes this time, and the black blood that spurts in his face temporarily blinds him. He smears it in attempts to wipe it off, and the moment of distraction gives the Nomu enough time to twist around and punch him directly in the face. His nose breaks on impact, and Izuku bites back a cry of pain.

He can't miss his window, though, so he pulls himself back in and digs his knife into the Nomu's back, leaving it there like a foothold on a mountain. He wishes he had his bombs, or any of his weapons for that matter. This would be so much easier.

This is the only way Izuku can attack him without dying. It's like a game of cat and mouse, except Izuku frequently annoys the cat into lunging for him, which creates an opening for Izuku to duck in and land yet another heavy blow. It doesn't seem to be doing much but slow the creature down ever so slightly.

Izuku is getting tired. So tired. He might not be breaking his arms or legs because of the shock absorption, but the continuous use of his quirks is putting him in a craze. It doesn't help that his ring had flown out of his pocket during one of his moves.

At one point the Nomu's bone-like knee guard shatters upon one of Izuku's well-placed kicks, but the victory is short lived as a piece of the bone lodges itself inside Izuku's stomach. He tears it out immediately, using it as a sort of secondary knife, which is most definitely a bad thing. That's a big rule Eraserhead makes him follow during patrols: you don't rip any weapon out of you unless you're sure it didn't hit an artery or some otherwise important organ or vein.

If you take it out, you'll just bleed even faster, most likely to death.

But Izuku thinks that even Eraserhead wouldn't fault him too much for this one given the current situation.

The Nomu can't reach him when Izuku manages to leap high onto its back, so it instead tries to dislodge him. The boy jerks out the blade he left in his flesh and stabs it once, twice in the brain, and the Nomu shrieks. It's so loud that the boy has to cover his ears and nearly falls off of the thing. A large hand yanks him by the foot and swings him around, throwing him into the ground with all of its strength like the boy's nothing more than a rag doll.

Izuku screams at the pressure to his spine, and he only prays that there will be no permanent damage. It's like he's paralyzed for a few seconds, as the boy can only lay there and try to steady his breathing.

The dust from the impact settles around him, and Izuku is taken aback by the silence.

Even without his ring, his senses are dull and frenzied. He feels like his head's been submerged beneath the concrete he lies sprawled upon, sealing his ears shut and making his eyes water. His limbs still ache with the phantom pain of the punch to his stomach, arms trembling as he pulls himself up from the ground.

Out of all his reckless ideas, Izuku thinks that this one has to be the worst by far.

But he's made it this long. He has to keep going.

Izuku lets himself cough roughly, the stolen air from his lungs replenishing itself with dust and bits of concrete. Groaning, he makes his way slowly to his feet, stumbling slightly as his body recalibrates how to distribute his weight. He blinks sluggishly, trying to clear his vision as he moves towards the epicenter of the plaza.

He doesn't make it more than a few feet before a rush of movement cuts through the haze of dust, knocking him off his feet and flipping him backwards over the ground. There's a blinding flash of pain in his leg, and Izuku realizes belatedly that his bone has just fractured from the repeated abuse. Fuck.

The whistle of wind grates through the ringing in his muffled ears as he turns himself over again.

Ah. The Nomu is still walking. Didn't Izuku incapacitate it? He felt its quirks die down, right? That's why it let go of him in the first place.

So why is it still fucking moving?

The answer comes to him quickly. Regeneration. The Nomu has a regeneration quirk.

And now that he's really thinking about it, Izuku can think past the soreness to his body and feel the pressure in his mind. The familiar pull that Extract is causing in his nerves. Oh. Izuku wants that quirk. Not so much the shock absorption—he wants the regeneration.

A sick thought pops up into his mind: if he steals it, will it cure the symptoms he's been experiencing? Should he even steal it? It's just a creature, after all, not a human. It doesn't count. He'd still be within the parameters of his promise to himself.

But is it still wrong?

The hand grabs him by the throat and wrenches him off the ground, dangling him in the air. Izuku can barely breathe, and he's suddenly aware of just how easy it would be for the Nomu to snap his neck. His leg is throbbing and burning, making it hard to think past the pain. He should take it right now. Both of his hands are free. His ring isn't on. His mind is screaming at him to just do it.

It's right there. Nobody would know. Nobody except Izuku and probably All for One.

Shigaraki whips around the moment the red lightning starts to dance hesitantly across Izuku's skin. "You wouldn't," he hisses, eyes blown wide.

...and his brother would know.

Smart. So fucking smart. It's almost scary how smart Shigaraki's become since the last time Izuku has seen him. It seems he was forced to grow up after All for One's prized possession left. Shigaraki knows Izuku's given quirk. How could he not?

"You're cheating!" He screams, the itching coming back full force. Izuku pauses, which is a mistake he'll regret for a long while after.

“Fine, fine. Do whatever, you traitor. I can just... I can just kill those other two.”

Shigaraki is darting towards Tsuyu and Mineta. How he even noticed them crouching in the waters of the flood zone is beyond Izuku. The boy is busy trying to escape from the chokehold now, writhing like a dying fish. His vision is growing dark, and he’s painfully aware of the fact that he can’t get to them, not with the hand around his throat. Extract takes a few seconds to complete the process, so it’s not even worth doing now. None of his abilities are fast enough to stop what Shigaraki’s going to do. He watches as his brother’s hand reaches for Tsuyu’s face, and he yells. It sounds more like a yelp and a plea mixed together, but he doesn’t care.

Because all he can see is her face, slightly confused and worried, and then Mineta, right beside her and oblivious with fear. He won’t be fast enough. Never fast enough.

They don’t deserve this. Not even Mineta, who should’ve been expelled the moment he stepped on campus. Nobody deserves to die like that.

Izuku holds out a trembling hand, palm up. He doesn’t care anymore. Whatever it takes to save them. Pull is on the tips of his fingertips, but he’s still too late. Shigaraki’s hand lands on her face, but—

Nothing happens.

Izuku turns his head as much as he can to see Eraserhead. The man is just barely awake now, clinging onto consciousness with his head lifted a few inches off the ground. His eyes are tinted red, and blood covers every inch of his face. Thank god, Izuku practically cries, but then the meaning of his awakening is enough to have the boy wincing, because that means the Erasure hero might’ve heard some of what Izuku said to Shigaraki.

“Oh. You really are cool, Eraserhead.”

The underground hero goes limp only a few moments after that, energy depleted, and Izuku doesn’t waste any more time. He yanks Shigaraki back as far as Pull’s energy will allow, far away from his classmates. He hopes Tsuyu and Mineta are too scared to be able to recall those details in the future. The Nomu flings him halfway across the plaza yet again, and the boy falls into the crater he’d been in moments before. He chokes on the blood coming up his throat. He’s had his ring off for too long now. He can’t even find it.

Something sharp digs into his side, and Izuku cranes his neck to see a flash of dirty silver beside him. His knife.

Izuku picks up the fallen blade beside him and aims, desperate now. He counts five of the Nomu's steps before he throws it, the sharp metal landing in between the divots of its brain. It sinks in all the way with the force that Izuku threw it with, and the Nomu freezes, twitching as the knife hits that special mark. The creature's skin seems to crackle and tear as the regeneration starts to fail in keeping up with its injuries. Izuku pulls the blade back with his remaining energy, clutching it tightly in his hand.

The Nomu stumbles forward, the ground vibrating underneath Izuku with every large step. Fuck it. Izuku can't move quickly anymore, not with his broken leg, so he'll just have to let the creature come at him again and take the quirk when it descends upon him. He still doesn't have much of a chance against the creature's raw power, but anything helps at this point.

The Nomu is walking towards him at an unsteady pace. It looks like it's going to keel over, black sludge running down its arms and abdomen. Izuku only needs a few seconds for Extract to work. He only needs to get both palms on his skin. He can do it. The regeneration is calling his name.

But then there's an explosion that rocks the earth, and everyone freezes and looks up the steps leading to the entrance.

"Fear not!" All Might shouts in all of his glory, steam coming off of his skin as he stands in front of a large hole in the wall. "I am here!"

And for once, he's not smiling.

Izuku shivers, lying limp on the ground as the realization that they're going to be okay comes into mind. It's okay.

The Nomu is already pretty wounded. It won't take much more to finish him off. It's Shigaraki and Kurogiri that he's worried about.

There's more shouted words, but Izuku can't bring himself to listen to them. Izuku sees All Might fly overhead, and he realizes with overwhelming relief that he's heading for Eraserhead. He's going to get Tsuyu and Mineta out of there, too.

Izuku feels the chains around his heart loosen up at the knowledge.

When All Might comes back, it's less than five seconds later, and he's empty handed. He must've already deposited the others up by the entrance.

Eraserhead is okay, then. And so are the other two.

His face looks horrified as he steps down into the crater and picks Izuku up in his arms. "My boy," he says lowly. "I am so sorry. I had a bad feeling about this and came as soon as I could."

Izuku just shakes his head. "Shock absorption," he grits out, continuing at the man's confused look. "The creature. It has regen. Tear it apart, don't waste time on heavy attacks."

All Might nods curtly. "You all did wonderful holding out. I'm proud of you." He grips him tighter as he leaves the crater, and Izuku would probably feel more embarrassed at being held bridal style if he didn't currently feel two steps away from death. The hero bypasses the few remaining criminals, who are busy gawking at the number one's presence, and only stops to face Shigaraki when the younger man speaks.

"I've been waiting, hero." Shigaraki sounds happy all of a sudden, as if he hadn't just been having a tantrum a few minutes prior. "You're worthless. Throwing punches to save people. Hah. That's our state-censored violence."

All Might stiffens, and Izuku feels irritation rush through him as Shigaraki continues.

"You're fast. Too fast to keep up with, but not as fast as expected. Could it really be true..." He takes the hand off his face and grins. "That you're getting weaker?"

Damn. He didn't have to call him out like that.

All Might sets him down on the edge of the steps. "Sit tight," he orders, as if Izuku can go anywhere else in the condition he's in. His mentor starts to move towards the trio of villains, eyes narrowed.

"Shigaraki," Kurogiri warns. "The Nomu is not at full function. We must retreat."

"Ah, what's the harm in staying a few minutes longer? I want to see if Sensei's predictions were correct."

All Might doesn't even ask who Sensei is, he just heads directly for the Nomu. He seems to have taken Izuku's advice seriously, as he doesn't even blink when the Nomu takes the hero's heavy punch with ease. All Might simply moves around it and grabs a hold of its back, preparing to slam it into the ground to cease its power. But then the mist is spiraling up again, and the Nomu goes through the ground, reappearing right underneath All Might's torso. Its huge arms grab onto him and try to drag him under, and that's when Izuku understands Kurogiri's new plan.

All Might's going to get cut in half.

Izuku raises a palm, staring at his old caretaker. He can pull the neckpiece and throw him off kilter, which will hopefully stop his concentration on the portals. But before Izuku can potentially reveal his secret, there's a loud explosion to his right, and Kacchan comes flying out of nowhere, Kirishima right beside him. They attack Kurogiri first, and this time they don't fail. The warp villain is thrown to the ground, and then Shigaraki is forced to dodge as Kirishima goes for him next.

"Crap!" The redhead falls back beside Kacchan. "Almost had him!"

The air around them is suddenly chilly, and then Todoroki is appearing from behind Izuku, walking over to the other boys. "So I heard you people were here to kill All Might." Ice suddenly shoots from his foot and frosts over the ground, crawling up the Nomu's side. "But scum like you could never kill the Symbol of Peace."

Oh thank fuck.

All Might wrenches free from the Nomu's grip and readies himself again. He's bleeding from the torso due to the creature's nails, but other than that, the injuries on him don't look fatal.

Kacchan pins down Kurogiri with ease, practically spitting on the villain as he snarls, "If I decide you're doing anything fishy, I'll blow your ass up so bad they'll be piecing you back together for weeks."

Izuku almost laughs at the familiarity of those words. It's good to have one constant in this whole mess.

"Ooh, that doesn't sound very heroic," Kirishima says. It almost sounds like a tease.

"Nomu," Shigaraki orders angrily. "Take out the explosive brat. We need our escape route back."

The creature gets to its feet, swaying even worse. Its hyper regeneration isn't as good as it was before, that's for sure. The blood that's now spurting from its brain and body is proof of that. Before the Nomu can even begin to reach Kacchan, All Might is tackling the thing out of the way and wrestling with it. Izuku breathes out a sigh of relief, knowing the blond is spared.

"Deku," his friend says, staring down at him intensely.

Izuku answers the silent question with a nod. He's fine. He can hold out for now. Who knew that a gym uniform could soak up so much blood?

Shigaraki is obviously starting to get agitated. This is when Izuku's brother starts to get petty, just as he used to back in those days. He doesn't like when things don't go his way. "Violence in the name of saving others is admirable? Isn't it, hero? You know what, that pisses me off. Heroes and villains both thrive on violence, but we're still categorized. You're good, and you're bad. That's how it is."

"God, shut the hell up," Izuku mutters to himself. He thinks he hears Kacchan snort at that, but he's not sure.

"Symbol of peace, hah? In the end, you're just a tool for violence, made to keep us down! And violence only breeds more violence."

"What a load a crap," All Might grunts, still working to push back the creature. Izuku silently cheers for him. "Idealistic criminals have a different sort of fire in their eyes."

And in a way, they're both correct. Shigaraki has a good point, but the fact that he's using it to justify what he's doing invalidates the actual meaning of the argument. The Symbol of Peace is one hundred percent correct as well, as violence against violence is the only way to solve anything these days. You really do have to fight fire with fire sometimes.

You can't have good without evil. It's not just one without the other. That's where Shigaraki's thinking is slightly flawed.

All Might's blows are so fast and brutal that not even Izuku can truly make them out. It's like a blur, and the boy knows what his mentor is doing. The Nomu's quirk is absorption, after all, not negation, which means there's a limit. He can just exceed that limit, and then an opening will be created. And since Izuku tired the Nomu out, the regeneration won't be as frequent.

It's a winning battle, but not one without consequence.

All Might keeps hitting blow after blow, just like Izuku tried to do. Except where Izuku had only been able to land hits all around the Nomu to avoid getting grabbed, All Might can afford to stay in one place and keep up his flurry of attacks. He's breaking down its defenses with each brutal punch.

And when the smoke and blood starts to trail out of the man's mouth, everyone can only watch in awe as All Might crouches down low and delivers one final smash. The world shakes as the shockwave of All Might's powerful blow hits them like a tidal wave. The Nomu is sent flying up and out of the USJ altogether, smashing through the glass ceiling and disappearing from view.

"Like straight outta the comics." Kirishima whispers in awe once the wind dies down. "He smashed his way past the absorption. The ultimate bruiser! And against that power, the regeneration wasn't able to keep up with the hits."

Izuku lets out a shaky smile. That's what the best of the best looks like. This is the top. The top world of the pros. All Might is the best of the best.

"I am slowing down." The number one hero admits, facing Shigaraki and Kurogiri. "In my prime, only five of those hits would've been enough. But if you think you can take me, go right ahead."

It's a bluff. All Might looks to only have less than a minute left. He's trying to scare them off, and it might just work.

Izuku feels another wave of nausea overcome him suddenly and throws up on the side of the steps.

"All of you cheated." Shigaraki stares straight at Izuku with a glint in his crazed eyes. "And you killed my Nomu!"

Whiny fuck.

He's angry now, which makes him all the more dangerous. The villain moves forward, towards the students, and Izuku straightens up. All Might won't be able to do anything this time without transforming. He can't even take another step, Izuku can tell. The smoke coming off of his body gives it away.

Shigaraki ignores the warnings from Kurogiri and rushes forward, ready to take Kacchan and the other two head on, only for shots to ring out in the air.

The younger villain stumbles back, blood suddenly darkening his black shirt. He got hit in the shoulders.

Snipe. Which can only mean—

“Sorry everyone!” Principal Nezu calls from the top of the stairs. “We’re a little late. We brought everyone we could.”

Iida made it. The boy brought reinforcements.

Izuku can barely lift his head, but he can sense the familiar powers of his teachers now that he’s looking for them. He can feel Midnight, Cementoss, Present Mic, and even more. Is that Vlad King and Power Loader as well? The unfamiliar one must be Hound Dog, then.

“They’re here. Game over,” Shigaraki says quietly, seething. “Guess we have to try again another time, Kurogiri.”

Snipe aims again, but Kurogiri’s mist sucks them in before they can hit. Shigaraki starts to move backwards, into the larger portal the villain had created, but Thirteen starts to pull him back. The rescue hero seems to be in bad shape, but they’re still pulling through. Izuku could help, too, if he wanted. Pull could probably succeed in holding Shigaraki back, but he doesn’t do a thing.

Izuku lets him go, and the worst part is he doesn’t even know why. He doesn’t even care about the prospect of his teachers finding out about his powers. Not while he’s beginning to get so delirious.

Shigaraki locks eyes with the heroes and says one last thing before disappearing into the void. “The next time we meet, you’re dead.”

Izuku doesn’t think he’s just referring to All Might.

And then the villains are gone, just like that, leaving behind the rest of the students and heroes. The giggle that Izuku lets out is almost scary to those that hear it. Now that he’s completely sure they’re gone, that the threat has been taken care of, the exhaustion takes over him. He can barely respond to the students talking to him. He hopes All Might is covered from view, as he certainly must have transformed by now.

And what a way that would be to get your secret revealed, huh?

The next few minutes blur together. The next thing he can remember is someone holding him bridal style again, his vision suddenly bright. Are they outside now? He smells something sweet. That must be Kacchan holding him then. Does this count as the blond's apology? Izuku would accept it immediately if that's the case.

Warmth hits his face. They definitely must be outside now. The knife in his hand, still coated in the Nomu's black blood, drops to the floor with a clang. He didn't realize he'd been holding onto it so tightly.

Izuku's fingers itch for it on instinct, even when he's long past the point of consciousness.

Tomura is agitated.

He falls to the ground the moment he steps through Kurogiri's mist, face-planting into the old hardwood flooring of the bar. The villain lets out a hiss and squirms the rest of the way out of the portal, seething. The events of today are plaguing his mind and crowding his thoughts, and he stays in his crumpled up position to try and curb his frustration.

"I was shot," Tomura reports, knowing full well that the small television sitting on the counter is listening. "Both arms and both legs. We got crushed." He moves his head to try and sit up, but some of the blood pooling from his shoulder gets on Father's hand and makes him frantically yank the appendage off his face to wipe it clean. "My Nomu was taken down in a flash. Even those kids were strong."

The disgust edges back into his voice near the end, and Tomura shifts so he's looking at the dusty ceiling. His injuries will be healed soon enough, so he'll be fine. He's more focused on the anger that's now burning at his skin, on the fingers scratching at his neck with a newfound vigor.

"The Symbol of Peace is in perfect health! You were wrong, master."

The monitor crackles. "No, I wasn't." A slight pause; Tomura writhes on the floor for a moment to contain his irritation. "We merely got ahead of ourselves. Yes, we underestimated him. It is a good thing the villains came cheap."

That's an understatement. Those petty criminals had no business associating with the League of Villains. In fact, if Tomura had his way, they wouldn't have even hired such low-level thugs. The so-called villains just made the League look bad with how easily they were taken down by one pro hero. They were simple NPC's, not important for anything except keeping the background active and interesting, and Tomura hates that the League had to stoop so low just to fail in the end.

"And what of our creation? Did you retrieve him?"

Tomura just growls and turns back on his side, glaring at Kurogiri as the villain manifests into his usual attire and answers for him.

“He was sent flying. And unless we ascertain his precise coordinates, no amount of warping will let us find him.” The bartender starts to wipe the insides of the hanging wine glasses on the back wall one at a time. “I couldn’t spare the time back there.”

The static starts up again. “After all the trouble we went through to make him as strong as All Might, hm? Well, that’s too bad. A real shame.”

“Right. Strong.” Tomura fidgets from his place on the floor, his next words tumbling from his mouth before he can think better of them. Not that he would’ve kept quiet even if he had, of course. “There was one. One kid who seemed just as fast as All Might.”

“Oh?”

Fake. Even through speakers, Tomura can hear the amused tilt to All for One’s tone. The boy hisses again, practically whining. “Sensei, you knew he would be there, didn’t you?” It’s more of an accusation than a question. “He deserves to pay for what he’s done, so why didn’t you tell me? We wouldn’t have failed!”

“Now, Tomura, your brother is very independent.” The centuries-old villain sounds like he’s smiling, all sharp teeth and bloodstained lips. “Having you bring him back today or even kill him would have been counterproductive. Besides, I think little Izuku needs more time to be left alone before his punishment.”

Ah. Tomura is starting to understand now. The only reason Midoriya Izuku isn’t in their clutches right now is because All for One wills it so. It’s been a few years since the brat’s escape, which would have been more than enough time for the villain to get him back. Sure, Izuku’s very slick when he wants to be, and he’s also very hard to find, but in the end there’s nothing anyone can do against All for One’s wit and power. It’s simply the way things are.

Sensei wants to wait. He wants to give Izuku the illusion of freedom, and then he wants to rip the rug right out from under him and take the boy back by force. It’s cruel, it’s sinister, and it’s the perfect way to make sure Izuku knows where he belongs. His antics have gone on for far too long, not that Tomura is complaining. He doesn’t miss his brother’s company one bit.

The brat was favored by All for One anyway. He was trained personally and given all of these special powers—and then he just left. He was fed on a gold fucking spoon, and then he threw that all away. Midoriya Izuku is spoiled rotten, and Tomura hates him. He wants to kill him.

Sensei probably doesn't have the same sentiment, but he doesn't care. All for One will most likely try to make use of the boy despite his unwillingness, as if Izuku is even worth anything anymore after his betrayal. He's not. He's just an obstacle in Tomura's way.

He doesn't want him to return. He might take back his place as All for One's prized possession, and that wouldn't be good at all. For anyone involved.

The pain in his limbs have dulled away to a numb sort of throbbing, pulling Tomura back from his thinking. "Without that pest, we might have killed All Might... but that brat damaged the Nomu before he got there."

"No use crying over spilled milk, Tomura. He will get his dues. First he dares to associate with his fated rival, knowing the consequences of such foolishness, and then he attempts to become a hero at a school for fakes. Selfish, wouldn't you say?" His voice is a low rumble from the television. "This endeavor was not a complete loss, however. Find stronger troops; take all the time you need."

Tomura plans to. He won't make this mistake again. He won't fail his sensei a second time.

"We can't move freely just yet. That's why we need a symbol like you, Tomura! Next time, the world will know of the terror you represent."

It sounds like a promise. Like a mere statement of fact. And that's how Tomura knows it's true; All for One will make sure it is.

It always feels good to be praised by his master. He never used to get this when Izuku was still around, so that's another reason he's glad the boy's going to be six feet under soon. Tomura will become the next anti-symbol of peace in his place. He will make everyone fear his name and tremble at his very presence, and that's a promise, too. He's going to make those heroes regret ever being born.

And he's going to start with his little brother.

When Izuku wakes up, he's not alone. That's the first thing he notices. His brain is fuzzy, and he can barely think past the pounding in his temples, but he manages to sit himself up with difficulty.

Hm. His leg has been healed.

A quick glance around tells Izuku that this is the nurse's room, but it feels a little more crowded than it was just this morning. Another bed has been brought in for All Might, and the—

Wait. All Might?

Izuku's eyes blow wide as the memories of the most recent events come back to him, and he nearly falls off his bed in his attempts to get up and move. His arm is yanked back, and that's when he realizes there's an IV taped to the inside of his elbow. Which can only mean—

"My boy, are you alright?"

His head snaps around to face his mentor, who's sitting up as well. The hero looks rough, to put it nicely. He looks like he just rolled out of some bushes and fell into a meat grinder with the bandages all around his chest and stomach. He must've pushed himself past his limit yet again, damaging himself even further. It's a wonder he's even alive right now, in all honesty.

"Midoriya?"

That's Recovery Girl's voice. The healer is sitting on the rolling stool by her computer, staring at him with a frown.

"My blood!" Is the only thing that comes out of his mouth. Izuku freezes, realizing just how stupid that sounds. He really is a dumbass, huh? "My blood," he repeats, more composed this time. "Did you take it?"

Recovery Girl takes off her glasses and peers at him curiously. "You're asking if I did a blood test, dear?"

Izuku can't speak for fear of saying something he might regret, so he just nods.

"I didn't, sonny. What's going in your arm right now is a simple pain killer, so I didn't need to test anything before putting it in. Though from the look on your face I don't think it's quite working to the extent it should." She tilts her head. "I'm guessing you have a high metabolism due to your enhancements?"

All Might is staring at him as well, silently listening to their conversation with a concerned downturn of his lips.

"Uh, yeah," Izuku grits out, voice rough. His body feels a little prickly, almost as if it's trying to get numb but can't quite get there. "It's fine, though."

"Hm, if you say so. Next time, however, I will make some changes to make sure you have what you need. Something that'll actually work." She turns back to her computer, and Izuku feels slightly better at the knowledge that his blood hasn't been taken. Not this time, at least.

He needs to be more careful in the future. This conversation could've been singing a very different tune right now.

"The situation being what it was," Recovery Girl continues tiredly. "I can't scold you two this time."

All Might sighs. "I think I've probably shortened my time limit again. I'll be lucky if I still get an hour a day."

Guilt hits Izuku like a speeding truck, making the boy wince. Not even an hour? There's not much the number one hero can do in that time frame. He still has an appearance to keep up, and if he only shows up for a short while the people are bound to get concerned. And coupled with being a teacher at UA, where his classes are expected to be more than an hour long sometimes, the man's future doesn't look too good now.

I caused that, Izuku thinks sourly. If only I'd told them my suspicions, if only I'd been better. I should've been able to take down that Nomu completely so he wouldn't have had to push himself.

His fault. The weight of the words are like bricks tied to his feet.

"All Might..." Izuku whispers, trailing off.

“Ah, whaddya gonna do!” The blond shrugs, panting just a little bit as he shifts to sit criss-cross applesauce. “Bad things happen! This was bound to happen sooner or later.”

But did it have to be this soon?

A fizz of energy hits the back of Izuku’s mind, and the boy lifts his head to glance at the door just as a few knocks ring out. The door opens a moment later, and Detective Tsukauchi walks through.

“Pardon me,” the man says, lifting off his hat in such a funny fashion that Izuku has to snap his jaw shut so he won’t tease him about it. He’s done that multiple times before, most of those as Rabbit. “Long time no see, All Might.”

Izuku then realizes two things at once: the first being that Tsukauchi knows about One for All, something that Izuku had only assumed before now. He’s pretty sure All Might must have told Izuku that at one point, but if so, the boy forgot all about it. The second being that All Might has probably talked to Tsukauchi about Izuku, seeing as the detective doesn’t blink an eye at Izuku being in the same room as a deflated All Might.

“Tsukauchi,” the hero starts, choking up blood. “Didn’t know you were here!”

“I’m just here to ask some questions regarding the attack. Is this a good time?”

All Might seems to straighten up, a lot more serious. “Wait, hold on. First, are the students all right? And Aizawa and Thirteen?”

At the mention of his classmates and teachers, Izuku swallows back the blood threatening to rise up his throat and forces himself to listen.

Tsukauchi lets out a small breath. “Besides Midoriya over there, the students’ve got nothing more than a few bumps and bruises. And Aizawa and Thirteen are out of danger for now.”

For now. They shouldn’t have even been hurt to begin with. None of this should’ve happened. There must’ve been talk of the invasion on the streets since Shigaraki was hiring, Izuku thinks. If I had concentrated more on my patrols, maybe I would’ve heard something. We would’ve been prepared. Why didn’t I hear something about this?

“The students wouldn’t have made it out unscathed.”

Izuku thinks of Thirteen’s cracked helmet, of the parts of the rescue hero that seemed to have been destroyed by their own quirk. That must’ve been Kurogiri’s doing.

He thinks of All Might’s reduced time limit, of the bandages covering his middle. His mentor’s secret was almost found out today. He guesses that one of the other pros got him out of there before he could be seen by one of the students.

And then Izuku thinks of Aizawa. His sensei, broken and bloody, being pounded further into the ground with each sickening blow of the Nomu’s fist. He thinks of Aizawa gathering up the last bit of his strength to protect Tsuyu and Mineta where Izuku couldn’t. Where Izuku failed to.

So close to dying. So close to leaving behind the world forever, of leaving behind his partner—someone Izuku is seventy percent sure he knows the identity of. He was so close to leaving behind Izuku, and maybe that’s a selfish thing to think, but it’s only one of the many, many thoughts bumbling around inside Izuku’s head.

He tunes back in to hear All Might talking about how the students put their lives on the line, too. About how they were thrown into a real battle at such a young age, and how they now know how cruel and scary the world can be—but Izuku can’t get himself to focus on the conversation anymore.

His mentor is right. The battle is serving as a kind of eye-opener for Izuku. He’s fought villains before, of course, there’s just something about this particular fight that makes it so different. It’s the circumstances that are causing a hole to be carved inside his chest, hollowing out his insides. His patrols are different from this precisely because the rest of the students were there this time. He rarely has to protect such a large group of people, and rarely does he ever have to fight a creature as strong as the Nomu.

Today has been one of the scariest and hardest battles of his life, and Izuku has a feeling that it’s pretty high up there on All Might’s own list of terrible battles.

Even if it’s only because of how terrifying it was.

“Aizawa,” Izuku begins, glancing up from where he was fiddling with the corners of his thin blanket. “Are his eyes okay?”

Tsukauchi turns to him for what feels like the first time since he entered the room, and Izuku's gut clenches at the look in his eye. There's something there he doesn't like. "He's going to be in casts for a bit of time, son, but his vision is going to be alright. No blindness or loss of sight."

"What about his Erasure?"

It's Recovery Girl who answers, having been silently typing away at her computer until now. "His own time limit has decreased, but only by a few seconds. His quirk hasn't been damaged otherwise."

But his body has. Izuku can still remember the dust floating up into the air as the hero's elbow disintegrated under Shigaraki's touch, can still remember the chills that went down his own spine upon hearing the snap of Aizawa's bone when the Nomu pinned him to the concrete. He can still hear the man's cut-off scream echoing in his ears.

He wants to throw up. In fact, the only reason he hasn't coughed up any more blood is because of the painkillers his body is burning through. It's not much, but it's helping.

He needs to find his—

"And by the way, Midoriya," Tsukauchi reaches into his tan overcoat and pulls out something small. He crosses the distance between them and presses the object into his palm. "Your friend found this in the rubble. Wouldn't let me leave until I promised to give it to you."

Izuku's eyes widen when he sees the ring sitting in his hand now. It's definitely his—the running rabbit on the side is proof of that. And even before Izuku frantically slides it on without hesitation, the boy can feel the comfort it provides from where it's resting in his palm. It's like all of his senses have been dulled the moment he slips it back into its normal spot, and he revels in the feeling. Oh, thank god.

"That boy really is scary," Tsukauchi mutters, All Might nodding sagely in agreement.

The detective must be referring to Kacchan, though how the blond even managed to find it so quickly is beyond Izuku. He must've noticed how Izuku didn't have it on while carrying him. So much for having to search for it. I'm gonna hug him so fucking hard when I see him.

Again. He really hopes that these small actions are Kacchan's way of apologizing. Izuku doesn't like staying mad at the boy for long. He can't handle being alone, not anymore.

"But back to the matter at hand," Tsukauchi continues with a sigh. He thanks Recovery Girl for pulling out a chair for him and sits down. "Sorry to do this so soon, but I'd like to get both of your accounts on what happened. I already interviewed the other students, this is just for the record." He turns a pointed eyebrow towards Izuku. "Especially since you were the closest to the leaders of this attack, right?"

Izuku just nods, and he's thankful when the detective starts with All Might first. He listens only to the first part of his explanation. Apparently the hero was on the way to the USJ after having bad feelings about not being there, only to run into Iida.

That's luck, if Izuku's ever seen it.

When his own turn comes around, Izuku swallows down his nerves and acts.

He can't lie, not to Tsukauchi, so instead he answers vaguely and makes sure to drop certain details that throw the man off track. He tells them the truth about fighting the Nomu and how he tried to go for the weak spots, only for his moments of distraction to allow Shigaraki time to go for his two classmates. He tells them that he talked to Crusty Lips about his motives and why he brought the Nomu —which isn't a lie, technically. He did do that, among other things. Izuku just makes sure to leave out the incriminating parts.

And by the time he's done, Tsukauchi has a few pages of information down and All Might is staring at Izuku with something sad in his blue eyes.

Recovery Girl finishes up his healing in that timeframe, making another bout of exhaustion threaten to overtake the boy. Tsukauchi is the first one to leave the nurse's room, and Izuku avoids any further conversation with the hero sitting beside him.

The guilt is eating him up again. He can barely stand being in the same space as All Might right now.

He can only hope that everything turns out alright.

When Izuku gets home after a long, painstaking walk, he gets to work.

First he opens up the security footage from the USJ. He takes time to review the recovered video and takes notes of the criminals and students he sees.

He was right. Multiple groups of students were sent to different zones that rendered their quirks close to useless, putting them at a disadvantage. He watches his classmates fight and eventually win their own battles, writing the information down all the while in a new journal of his. This one is going to be dedicated solely to the attack, and he's planning on giving it to Eraserhead.

He has an excuse as to why he knows so much about the villains: he fought them alongside his teacher. No one should think much of the amount of information he's going to give.

Izuku moves on to the most pressing matter, however: his fight with the Nomu. Most of the sound files during Izuku's conversation with Shigaraki are easy enough to get rid of, so that's one thing he doesn't have to worry about, but you can still clearly see him use Pull and even Deflect at one point of the video. The angles are a bit suspicious, but it's still there, and those powers are obviously not a part of One for All.

If someone is familiar with Izuku and his two enhancement quirks, it'll be easy to figure out that there's more to what's going on.

He needs to get rid of this section. Corrupt the data in case Principal Nezu tries to review it himself.

It takes longer than expected, and Izuku can only hope that the mammal didn't already do this and copy the files onto a hard drive or something—then Izuku would be screwed.

He skips over Aizawa's fight with the Nomu, not wanting to be reminded of the gory scene still playing on repeat in his mind, and instead watches what happens after All Might arrives.

He watches as he takes Mineta and Tsuyu up to the top of the stairs, followed by an unmoving Aizawa, and he tips his head when All Might drops screen-Izuku off to the side before dealing with the threat.

Izuku raises his brows in mild surprise when Kacchan and Kirishima appear from seemingly nowhere and help out. Todoroki enters from a neighboring zone and freezes the Nomu, allowing All Might to break free.

They were all fighting together. They were helping. Izuku wasn't alone.

But that's—that's not quite right.

He only has himself. He can only afford to act alone; it's a system he's been clinging onto since the day he left his father's clutches. But now he has more friends, he has more people who care about him. More people who actually want to be around him. The thought is slightly horrifying, as Izuku knows firsthand what happens when he gets close to others.

He's going to have to keep his distance from here on out, no matter how hard or mean it is. It's his own fault for letting himself get close to them anyways, and look where that's gotten them? In the midst of a villain attack on their third day of school.

My fault. Should've known. Should've listened more intently to other vigilantes and heroes, and then I might've heard about the League's plans and would have been able to prevent it.

Whether or not the attack happened because of Izuku directly is unclear, but that doesn't matter.

The system has changed a little bit recently, just enough to allow more people through. Just enough for Izuku to feel that lingering panic after every sentence he utters to his new friends. Because friend isn't a word he's supposed to know. Kacchan is a friend, sure, but somehow he's more than that. Izuku has never really called him that because he's always just been there; a steady calm in the storm that is Izuku's life.

And maybe Kacchan did used to bully him, and maybe he did abandon Izuku once before, right after Inko did, but that doesn't matter either. What matters is that he's here now, and he cares. In his own way.

After Izuku escaped the grasp of his father, he swore that he'd make a better life for himself. He wouldn't be anyone's puppet. He would find a new normal, and he'd be alright.

And he has been finding it, It's just been taking some time, that's all.

Some days, everything flows. He gets up and finds his rhythm and lives his new normal. His bones protest the motion of forward but he keeps going and going and going, because he has to.

But sometimes, Izuku wakes up and he can't move. He wakes up and he doesn't want to do anything or be anything, and darkness threatens to stain every inch of a world he once knew to be bright.

There are days when Izuku feels like the world is too big, but his insides are squeezed tight until they feel like they'll pop. The days he'll curl up into a ball on the bathroom floor and press his hands over his ears to try and make his brain just stop.

These are the days Izuku can only see blood on a man's face or watch the knife in his hand dig into an innocent person's back until they fall slack on the floor. The days he'll hear himself scream and gurgle from the spit built in his mouth, white-hot electricity running through his veins and burning beneath his skin. The days where he'll see gnawing teeth barking at him, the harsh words cutting through the invisible fog in his mind like a blade.

"Don't stop. Not until you've taken the last remnants of their being and made it your own. Not until they stop begging for you to leave them and instead start begging for you to finish the job."

Izuku snatches some clothes off the floor and throws himself into the shower, washing and rinsing himself with vigor. The icy cold water seems to calm the burning sensation under his skin, but not for long.

He doesn't know why he's thinking all of this. It must be because of his surprise family reunion today. Must be because of the knowledge that All for One knows. He knows about Izuku's attendance at UA, probably knows about his closeness with All Might, and probably knows about a whole bunch of other shit that Izuku can't even begin to think of right now.

And it's sending the boy into a spiral of self-doubt and hatred.

His head still hurts from the sharp waves of pain that pulse through it, and it's made even worse when he tries to pull on his clothes. He has to stop after putting his pants on and sit with his head in his hands, trying not to throw up from the pain.

It truly feels like someone has hammered a nail into his skull, piercing it in half while his ears ache in a different way. They seem too sensitive and keen, something he isn't used to.

He can hear every little drip of water in his abandoned apartment, every little creak of the pipes and soft pawsteps from Missy, and all he wants to do is rip his own ears out.

Izuku pants out a steamy breath, peeling himself off of the closed toilet. He finally throws on his shirt and adjusts it so it lies flat.

He has to get back to his desk. He has to finish watching the camera footage so he has an idea of where to patrol tomorrow night.

Oh, right. He hasn't even turned in that essay for Present Mic. Fuck.

The voice hero assigned it yesterday, and it's not even that difficult. It's just a simple one page assignment where they're supposed to introduce themselves and write down their favorite hobbies—not even in English, for god's sake. He would've finished it that same class period had he actually put in the effort, but now he's stuck scrambling.

Izuku doubts the man would make it due the day back now that everything's gone to shit, but still. He needs to get it done sometime soon.

Cold breath slithers up the column of his neck and he gags. It crawls up further, covering his chin, his cheeks, everything—

Izuku collapses on his way out the bathroom door, legs giving out on him as his head feels like it's being pierced again by a spike. The chill continues to crawl up his face and leave nothing but pain behind.

He shakily raises his hands up to grasp at his head, settling them in his mess of dark hair. He grips at the green curls, feeling the pinpricks of pain as he pulls on the strands.

He has to get up, get up, get up, get up—

Izuku manages to pull one of his legs underneath him and then the other, now kneeling on the damp floor, hands still buried in his wet hair.

Another sharp pain pierces through his skull.

Izuku can smell iron in his nose, the heavy, metallic scent overwhelming him, a warning sign that his nose is about to start bleeding.

Drip. Drip.

“No, no, no, no—” Izuku chokes out, wiping his nose with the back of his hand and seeing the crimson liquid that now coats the skin. He covers his nose and runs to the kitchen, grabbing a towel to replace his hand.

He can feel the blood coat the back of his throat and mouth with that acrid metallic taste. He spits, filling the sink with dark bile.

Izuku shakily removes the stained cloth from his nose and folds it over itself, now covering his mouth.

He slumps against the counter for who knows how long, blood steadily streaming out of his nose and dribbling from his mouth until eventually it ceases to a few drops.

He is so incredibly tired.

He took his pill today. He has his ring on. So why the fuck is this happening? He shouldn’t be feeling like this, shouldn’t be struggling this much. His emotions are a mess, his mind a hurricane, and now his body is trembling and breaking apart.

Is this his punishment for not taking the quirk? The regeneration that Extract so badly wanted?

He should’ve. He really should have. Izuku knows how much it would’ve helped. It probably would’ve stopped all of this from happening, actually, but now he’s stuck with it. He didn’t take it, and he still can’t figure out why he hesitated. It’s not human. It’s a creature, right? It could barely think for itself, so if anything Izuku would’ve been doing it a favor by taking its power. It would’ve been defeated so much more easily. Wouldn’t have had to go through that pain and trouble.

But if it feels pain then that means it still has human qualities. It’d let out the most ear-piercing shriek when Izuku sliced open its brain, so it definitely feels pain. Meaning it still would've been wrong for him to steal the quirk since Extract hurts to use. For both sides. It's essentially tearing a piece of somebody's soul away, ripping it from their being and forcing it to be Izuku's own. It's unpleasant, to say the least, and it would've been terrible.

Immoral. Even for a creature.

He can blame All Might's interruption all he wants, as he'd convinced himself to steal it anyway at that specific moment before the hero's entrance, but the truth remains that there were so many other opportunities for him to take it. And he didn't. He just let it slip through his fingers.

So now Extract is punishing him.

Izuku is finally back in his chair after somewhat successfully avoiding bleeding out. So far, he's sacrificed two towelettes, having to chuck them out of his window and onto a nearby roof to avoid any patrolling heroes finding them on the ground.

His pain isn't gone completely. It's just turned into an aching thump at the back of his skull—nothing a few pain-relievers can't handle. He grabs at the bottle of pills that the doctor at the Club gave him and swallows down two more tablets. He should only have to take one a day, according to the doctor himself, but it doesn't seem that that's working so great now. Has he built up an immunity to it this quickly? There's no way.

Izuku falls onto the couch after having AINA submit his bullshit essay, not even caring that he's still in his clothes. He can still smell the faint iron scent in his nose and rubs at it, flaking away some of the blood still caked on the inside.

Maybe he doesn't have a good hold on Extract or One for All.

Maybe he is still going to struggle with the pain, with the aching, the sickness, the itch—

Izuku scratches absently at his wrist, noting the new scars that cover the sides of his hand. He didn't break any bones beside his leg this time, but Recovery Girl had made sure to tell him after Tsukauchi left that even with the Nomu having a shock absorption quirk, he shouldn't have used One for All continuously the way he did, especially not at full power. If he keeps this up, he's going to have nerve damage.

Which sounds metal, but also really, really troublesome.

Sick, cloying panic starts to creep up the back of his throat the longer he thinks about his mistakes today.

He wasn't fast enough, nor was he smart enough. His slip-ups were accidents that he could have easily prevented, but also could have been severely hurt by. No, that doesn't matter. His friends could have been severely hurt by them.

Aizawa was. So was Thirteen. All Might just barely managed to keep his secret safe. They all almost died.

Izuku's counter to the Nomu's attack could have killed him, and Izuku still remembers the haunted look in the creature's eyes when it realized something was different after its brain had been sliced open. That its regeneration wasn't the same anymore, that it couldn't do the things it was most definitely trained to do. It almost looked, dare Izuku say, scared. Izuku thinks about when he fought beside Aizawa before the whole Nomu thing went down, and he remembers the obvious worry the man had shown when Izuku was in the middle of dodging a nasty blow to the throat.

People shouldn't have to be afraid of a hero. Nor should they have to worry about them.

Heroes should be reassuring and comforting simply by existing, like how All Might was when he smashed into the USJ to save them. His mere presence was like a gift from the heavens; a promise of survival. Heroes should be comforting like how Present Mic was when he woke Izuku up from that nightmare at the laundromat that day. They should be like how Eraserhead continues to be with every single meeting he's had with Rabbit: an anchor. A lifeline. For Izuku has been navigating uncharted waters for the majority of his life, and having something there to tether him to the ground, to bring him back to reality—it's something he's never dared to hope for, even in his most childish dreams.

Izuku doesn't have that same effect around people. And sure, he's not a hero yet, never will be, but he should at least be able to make people stop worrying. It seems that all he manages to do is screw up, though.

Take today for example. He used his quirks. He does that sometimes as Rabbit, but only when he's sure nobody can see or remember it correctly. This time is different, however. Mineta and Tsuyu must have seen it. Aizawa was there, too. Whether or not he was conscious enough to really see it is debatable, but the chance is still there, and it's still too strong.

And his knife. He took out a dangerous, undocumented support weapon and used it during the battle. Again, Izuku isn't sure Aizawa actually processed that little detail, as they had more pressing matters to deal with at the time, but still.

He's made so many mistakes in just the past few hours that he wants to scream. He wants to hit something. Maybe himself. He wants to go after Shigaraki and his father and fucking show them why targeting his school, his mentor, is a bad idea. Is, not was, because Izuku knows that this won't be the only time this happens.

Maybe it's Izuku's fault and maybe it isn't, but all the boy knows is that he's angry in a way he hasn't been in for a long, long time, and he's starting to think that maybe UA isn't the best place for him after all. His previous reasons for not applying were valid. He sees that now. He worried that attending this school would put everyone in danger, and he was right.

Kacchan will hate me if I drop out. Maybe if I can find a subtle way to get expelled or something I'll have a better excuse.

It shouldn't be too hard with Aizawa as his teacher. The man would probably expel him for breathing too heavily. Izuku knows the best ways to piss him off, too, so he should be golden.

But the more Izuku starts to think, the more his mind wanders to the unimportant things. He thinks of the criminals Shigaraki most definitely hired as a distraction, the ones that are now sitting in jail.

They were willing to hurt Izuku. They were willing to kill him and all of the other students—mere children. And for what? A few hundred bucks each? Or was it more than that? They probably just wanted a chance to brag about the fact that they got to work with the new League of Villains.

Those aren't just criminals in Izuku's mind anymore. They're monsters. He knows, logically, that they must have their own reasons for being so cold and bloodthirsty, but he can't find it in himself to care. Who knows how many of his classmates they would've killed had they been given the chance?

He thinks once again about their faces, about how some of them even seemed familiar to him. As if he's seen them before in passing or on patrol.

Or maybe even at the Club.

The anger bubbles up inside him again, and Izuku turns on his side to glare at the wall. The couch is as uncomfortable as always, but the slight pain helps with giving him something to focus on. Missy jumps up and curls into his chest, and Izuku forces the tension out of his body so he doesn't scare her. It's a good thing he's already fed her, as he doesn't think he has the energy to do much of anything right now other than glower.

The Club only has a few rules, and Izuku knows them by heart. He knows that harming anyone underage is not allowed under any circumstance. For a member of the Club to participate in something like the attack that occurred today? It would be a violation of the agreement everyone was forced to sign upon becoming a member. And Izuku is sure he recognized some of those faces at the USJ, and he's also sure that there are a couple others who must have known about the attack before it happened, and thus failed to say anything about it. Which is also a violation.

Professionals have standards, even if they're criminals. Not saying something is the same as committing the crime yourself, at least in this situation. At least when it involves children.

Oh, he's going to have a fun time with those select few. All he has to do is go through the police's files on the villains they arrested today and connect the dots. What he's going to do to them is simple, pleasing, and nothing if not justified.

Another wave of pain wracks through him, and Izuku starts to cough up another mixture of saliva and crimson, scaring Missy to the point where she nearly scratches him in her alarm.

Fuck. He's glad that school is canceled tomorrow. He doesn't think this is going to get better by morning.

Yeah, I should've taken its quirk.

The Nomu isn't alive, but at the same time it is. It was by pure chance that he didn't end up taking it—an accident, in all honesty, but a dire mistake all the same.

And now he’s paying for it.

The next day passes by much quicker than he would've hoped.

Students were given the day off from school since they all nearly died, which means Izuku has nothing else to do but research more on the attack and go out patrolling. It's a Thursday, which means he's supposed to go over to Kacchan's house for dinner tonight, but Izuku can't bring himself to actually interact with anyone right now. His nerves are shot, and he can barely focus on anything besides the work laid out in front of him.

His blond friend has been texting him nonstop since Izuku told him he wouldn't be able to make it, and while Izuku is glad Kacchan cares, each ping of his phone makes him want to rip out his hair.

He ends up silencing it, telling AINA to only patch through messages from his clients or Eraserhead.

Izuku is happy that he and his friend are back on speaking terms, of course, it just sucks that it had to be a villain fight that brought them back together.

Patrol was busy this morning. News of the incident made national headlines, and the League's daring attack on the best heroics school in Japan seemed to have inspired many other criminals and villains to act out.

He unfortunately had to cut his patrol short, however, due to a random local hero chasing him halfway into the city. This is why Izuku is currently at home right now, the sun's last rays peeking in through the broken balcony windows as he finishes up on his new prototype ring. The one he has on now isn't working the way he wanted it to anymore, and he can't exactly pop five of those pills to stop the symptoms from appearing again, so a new ring is a must. All he needs for it is a few more materials and then he should hopefully be set.

No more impromptu vomit or bloody coughs. He can pretend nothing bad is happening and just move on, just like how he's been doing with everything.

He has to perfect his USJ journal before going out for another patrol. His character analysis for each criminal and student is done, so now a quick rewatch of all the footage is due, just for Izuku to see if he missed anything.

Missy comes and sits on his keyboard halfway through, not moving until Izuku goes to pick her some catnip off the plant in his bedroom —if he stole the potted plant from one of the Home Decor stores during his patrol today, well, nobody but the store manager has to know.

He jots down little notes and bullet points here and there, sipping on the leftover cold coffee he made that morning. He's going to give the journal to Aizawa tomorrow, as he's sure the man isn't gonna let any amount of injuries stop him from teaching. He'll be at school for sure.

It's only right for Izuku to share his knowledge. This isn't some petty gang or something—this is about the League of Villains. This is about the attack that nearly killed three teachers and twenty students. He has no choice but to tell them.

The only thing he's leaving out from the journal is information about All for One. Only briefly did he mention how a higher person must be operating from behind the curtains and pulling the strings. Shigaraki Tomura is a man-child, so there's no way he's the one making the major decisions. Izuku wishes he could tell them everything he knows without screwing things up, but unfortunately it just doesn't seem to be the right way to go.

He's kind of dreading tomorrow. He doesn't want to imagine the look on Aizawa's face when he gets handed the notebook.

Izuku sits back in his rolling chair and spins around, chewing on the tip of his pen as he thinks. Missy is curled up on the back of the couch with her paws tucked neatly into her chest, eyes half-lidded as she stares at him. She is most definitely judging him, even while slightly high off catnip.

Kurogiri said during the attack that he was practically given the information about the teachers' schedules and plans, which means that there was someone privy to that information beforehand. As far as Izuku knows, there have been no security breaches at UA besides the gate incident that happened during lunch—and also besides the boy's own personal endeavors, of course, but that hardly counts.

The point is that UA wasn't hacked. This information must've been passed on to Kurogiri in one form or another. The warp villain is usually very specific; his word choice is always delicate. He was most likely given it, so he didn't take it. Stealing isn't the way he normally goes anyway.

The existence of a traitor is the most probable theory that's answering the question blooming at the back of Izuku's mind. It would make the most sense, but this theory is born of fear, not evidence. Izuku has a feeling there are more details that he's missing, more variables that he has yet to figure out.

It has to be someone on the outside looking in, right? Rather than someone already inside?

Izuku doesn't even want to think about the possibility of a traitor, because that would mean all the staff at UA would need to be labeled as suspects until proven otherwise. The chances of it being a student are low, though not impossible. Missing files or glitches in the system are easy enough to explain or debunk, so a student traitor is still on the table. There are things they could learn or gain information to that they could just write off as accidental eavesdropping or curiosity to anyone who asks them about it.

It could be any teacher or student in any course, though the Heroics course is the most likely. And boy does that thought not sit well with Izuku.

Could be one of my classmates. One of my friends. Hell, even one of my own teachers.

The word traitor leaves a nasty taste in Izuku's mouth, and the boy tries to swallow it down. He starts to write down the basic points of the theory in his notebook. He may not like it so much, but he still has to write down potential suspects to fully explore the idea. He has to flesh out all of the potential variables.

He still thinks it has to be something else though. A traitor seems almost too easy—too obvious. All for One orchestrated the attack, that much is clear, so he wouldn't leave his tracks this clear for anybody to follow. Especially when he probably already knew Izuku would be there. Of all people, All for One should know that Izuku won't stop searching until he finds the answer.

It's too easy, but it's still a plausible theory. If it's not a traitor, then what's the answer? How did his father even know about the schedules or the trip to the USJ without breaking through UA's security?

Sure, Izuku does it all the time, but he isn't dumb. He knows he leaves behind some sort of a trace when he does it. He knows that if one were to specifically look for it, they would find that someone's been tampering with their walls. Izuku has looked, and no one besides himself and Principal Nezu has been playing around with UA's online systems, meaning Kurogiri isn't lying. He was given that information. And said info must have been learned through eye-and-ear only.

So is there really a traitor at UA, or is it just a case of at the wrong place at the wrong time? Perhaps there's a spy lurking from outside the gates? Bugs implanted in the teacher's offices? An unwilling or even unknowing traitor?

The possibilities seem to be endless. God, this is so—so frustrating.

Izuku flicks his pen out of his mouth and lodges it into the wall, scowling when it just misses the bullseye. He painted a sort of dartboard on a section of the wall just next to his door a few weeks ago. He hasn't had the opportunity to shoot a gun in a while, so he painted the board to help practice his aim, even if it's not nearly the same.

Missy meows, having turned her head to watch the pen just miss the inner circle of the red section. It sounds like she's making fun of him.

"Yeah, yeah, laugh it up!" Izuku pulls out another pen and turns to the next page of his analysis. He needs to finish this in the next hour if he wants to be able to go out patrolling again.

He hopes he's not making a mistake in his decision to hand his notes over to Aizawa.

Izuku isn't late, but it's a close thing. Three minutes before the last bell rings the boy is hurrying through the nearly empty hallways and up the stairs. Elevators take too long, in his own fine opinion.

He doesn't bother fixing his tie as he skids to a halt in front of the door.

Not late, but he might as well be with how everyone stops and stares at him when he walks in.

And that's... new. Nobody's ever done that before. Not here.

He heard them talking with each other when he was walking past the other classrooms, so why did they quiet down when he walked in? Were they talking about him?

Every single person in the room is staring at him, even Kacchan. The blond doesn't have the same look in his eye, though. He's glaring at Izuku as if he's annoyed, which is normal. The others are more skeptical. Wary.

They look almost scared. But of what?

Izuku keeps his head down, staring at his shoes as he walks quickly to his seat. His neck prickles with the attention, ears turning a nice shade of red. Why are they acting like that? What did he do to them?

What didn't you do? That snide voice says, almost making him stumble into the side of Kacchan's desk as he passes.

"Watch it, nerd!"

Izuku barely hears him, too busy trying to calm the sudden anxiety boiling in the pit of his stomach. Did I do something wrong?

He grips his backpack tightly as he sits down, staring at the back of Kacchan's head as if his friend will save him. The conversations start to pick back up, but it's quieter this time. More careful. He doesn't miss the glances being thrown his way every few seconds.

Izuku hates how just a few actions can reduce him to this pathetic, anxiety-ridden mess.

A punch to the shoulder brings him back to reality. "That's for skipping out on last night," Kacchan hisses. He's turned around in his chair, eyes blazing with the promise of revenge. "You owe me now."

Izuku sighs, knuckles turning white from how hard he's gripping the backpack in his lap. "Sure, Kacchan. What do you—"

"So drink this."

Huh? Izuku stares at the energy drink his friend shoved into his chest, blinking in surprise. He looks up, still confused, only to flinch back when Kacchan is suddenly a few centimeters from his face. “What the hell!”

“You look like you just crawled out of a fucking dumpster fire, Shitku.“ His eyes narrow. “And what’s with the eyebags? The old lady told ya to get some damn sleep.”

Izuku matches Kacchan’s expression. “I have been sleeping, thanks. Worry about yourself; you don’t look too hot either.”

Kacchan would’ve hit Izuku with the can of energy juice had the boy not ducked just in time. “Drink it or I’ll shove it down your throat.”

Izuku rolls his eyes but opens the drink anyway. He does need it, if he’s being honest. He hasn’t gotten a wink of sleep since he woke up in Recovery Girl’s office, and that was over twenty-four hours ago. Besides, he needs something to distract himself from the obvious change in his classmates’ actions.

Everyone is bound to be closer to their classmates now that they’ve survived a villain attack together, and Izuku knows that they’re probably going to be warier and more on edge than before, but to avoid him completely? Izuku knows he’s done something wrong.

Kacchan scowls again. “I better see you eat something at lunch. You look dead.”

He’s halfway through the drink when he gathers the courage to look around. There’s less than a minute before the bell. Aizawa should be here any second. He’s never been late to any of his classes before and definitely won’t break that now.

Izuku notices a certain feeling of emptiness behind him and frowns, glancing back to see that the seat behind him is empty. He should’ve known things were too quiet. The lack of crude jokes and unwanted groping of the girls should have been proof of that.

Did Mineta get expelled?

Familiar energy spikes from the hallway, and Izuku straightens up and downs the rest of the can in one gulp, stuffing the drink in his backpack just before the door clicks open.

The students immediately go silent, and Izuku feels a few more stares at the back of his neck. Fuck, can they quit that already? Do they realize how obvious they're being?

"Morning," Aizawa says, as monotone as always. His arms are covered in bandages and held in slings, though his face doesn't look much better. The only thing you can see besides the medical tape is dark eyes peeking through the white.

The class immediately explodes.

"You're back already, Aizawa-sensei?" That sounds like Yaoyorozu.

"What an undeniable pro," Kirishima whispers in awe.

Izuku frowns, slightly surprised that no one else saw this coming. Did they really think a villain attack would stop Aizawa from doing his job? The man who hasn't called out or been late to work even once?

The underground hero doesn't care. To him, his health isn't important. And holy fuck does Izuku want to call him out on that bullshit. How many times has Eraserhead lectured him on taking care of himself during patrol? How many times has he embarrassed Izuku by scolding him in front of the latest Villain of the Week for being careless with his health?

Iida's hand shoots in the air despite everyone else not bothering to doing so. "Glad to see you doing well, sensei!"

"If you can call that doing well," Uraraka mutters, eyeing the wide expanse of bandages covering the man's face.

Izuku agrees with her, and it takes all of his willpower not to glare at the man. You dumb fucking hypocrite.

"My welfare isn't important." Aizawa wobbles as he moves to stand behind the podium. "And before we begin, I'm sure most of you have noticed the empty seat in class today." All of the girls have, no doubt. The teacher continues with a slight tremor to his body. "Mineta has dropped out of UA, and no, I will not be answering any further questions on that because I don't care."

Izuku doesn't blame Mineta for leaving. He was kind of cowardice from the beginning, not to mention handsy. Is it bad that Izuku is kind of glad he's gone? Sure it sucks that he had to leave because of a traumatic experience, but he was a pervert. Aizawa would've expelled him anyway sooner or later if he kept up that kind of attitude towards the girls.

“But back on topic.” The class quiets down from their hushed whispering. “Your fight is far from over, so don’t get too excited.”

Oh no. Izuku thinks he knows what Aizawa is talking about.

Kaminari groans from his place across the room. “Don’t tell me there’s more villains?”

I might just actually die if that’s the case.

“UA’s Sports Festival is fast approaching.”

And oh. Oh fuck.

Izuku had completely forgotten about that. It’s held every year, one for each grade, and it gives students from all courses a chance to shine and make a name for themself.

Which means the entire class is going to be in the spotlight. Something that Izuku definitely doesn’t need.

The rest of the students gasp and cry about how they finally have something normal to look forward to, and all the while Izuku is sitting in his seat, back ramrod straight. He doesn’t think the principal will let him sit this one out, not without a good excuse, so he’s just gonna have to find another plan to account for this.

Maybe I should have AINA google ways to get expelled. I’ve gotta make it lowkey, though.

It’s Izuku’s turn to punch his friend when Kacchan flashes him a smug look, obviously aware of his latest dilemma.

“We just had that villain attack,” Kirishima starts. “Is this really the best idea?”

“It’s necessary to demonstrate that UA’s crisis management protocols are sound. At least, that’s the thinking behind it.” Aizawa tips his head forward, seeming to long for his sleeping bag. “Compared to past years, there’ll be five times the police presence. Anyhow, our Sports Festival is the greatest opportunity you’ll get here.”

Izuku begs to differ, but okay. He knows, logically, that the event would never have been canceled over just a few villains, no matter how dangerous the attack was. It's one of Japan's biggest national events, having taken the place of the Olympics in terms of popularity.

"The nation's top heroes will be watching, right?" Yaoyorozu asks, hand still raised in the air. "They'll be there as scouts!"

Kaminari looks suddenly excited as he turns to Jirou. "They'll be looking to hire us as sidekicks after we graduate! That's how it's done."

"And a lot of those sidekicks never manage to go solo," Jirou deadpans. "That'll be you, Kaminari, you dunce."

I think they'd be cute together.

Aizawa lets out a long-suffering sigh. "Naturally, you'll gain valuable experience and popularity if you're picked up by a big-name hero, but your time is limited. Show the pros what you're made of here, and you'll make futures for yourselves."

They have three years: three chances to put themselves into the spotlight.

But Izuku doesn't need that. He's working on a plan to get expelled as Aizawa speaks, and even if he wanted to continue training as a hero, he would go for a more underground approach. He's more suited for stealth than anything.

Would All Might approve of that? You're his successor. You're supposed to be in the public eye.

Damnit. Izuku works his jaw in frustration. He's stuck on what to do, that much is true, but what he does know is that he's in dire need of a nap to deal with all this rising bullshit. He's going to jump on that plan the moment he's given the chance.

Lunch comes quickly after modern literature, and Izuku is glued close to Kacchan's side as they make their way out of the classroom. He can't quite share the enthusiasm of his classmates regarding the Sports Festival, as it's only going to cause him more problems. He's not very thrilled about the idea of attending. Hopefully he can get expelled before then.

Why did he bring his notebook along again? It's already finished, so he has no reason to carry it on him at lunch. He just has to give it to Aizawa after school.

"Hey, Deku!"

Kacchan drags him along quickly, not allowing Izuku a chance to stop and talk with Iida and Uraraka when they call him over.

They seem to be the only ones who want to talk to me. Everyone else is avoiding me.

"Kacchan, come on, you're making me look rude!" Izuku digs his heels into the waxed floors just to be difficult. "I need to talk to them."

"Not until I see you eat something for once, you idiot."

Izuku comes to a sudden halt when Extract warns him of another familiar presence walking his way.

"Jesus, stop resisting you broccoli fuck—"

All Might interrupts Kacchan's annoyed hiss by jumping out from a random hallway corner, signature grin ever-present on his shadowy face. "Young Midoriya," he booms, "is here!"

Izuku blinks, his mentor's loud words bouncing around inside his mind like an old DVD screensaver. He can only hope that every time the words hit the corner of his skull perfectly he'll experience a Big Brain moment.

"All Might? What are you doing here?" It's not that he's annoyed; he's just genuinely confused. Isn't this his break as well? Why is he still in his large form?

"I brought lunch!" The man says awkwardly. He holds up a bento box as if to show proof, eyes crinkling as his smile becomes more genuine. "Wanna eat with me?"

Golden retriever. That's what he is.

Izuku flushes and promptly kicks his friend in the back of the knee. The blond goes tumbling to the floor, still cackling. “Ah, sure!” Izuku says, rubbing his arm nervously out of habit.

He knows All Might has something important to say, saying as he’s ambushing Izuku right before lunch is supposed to start. And once the pair heads for the teacher’s lounge, leaving behind a smug Kacchan, it doesn’t take long for the boy to figure out what’s so important.

“Fifty minutes?” He chokes out, coughing up a piece of fried pork from the bento box they’re supposed to be sharing; All Might brought it solely for Izuku, though, that much is obvious. He can’t even eat most of the foods he put in there, so it’s only logical to assume he made it for Izuku. It would almost feel like one of their picnic days if not for the sudden heaviness in the air.

“Yes,” Small Might says, pouring tea into the fancy cups sitting on the table in front of them. “My time limit’s getting shorter by the day. As I said the other day, I can barely maintain my muscle form for an hour.”

So it really is that bad. Izuku thought so—he prepared himself for it. But actually hearing it come from his mentor’s mouth makes it seem more real. More final.

I should’ve been able to stop the Nomu. Then he wouldn’t have had to push himself over his time limit to fight it.

Is Izuku that weak that he couldn’t even put a stop to one of his father’s creations? He couldn’t even do one simple thing. He almost got Tsuyu killed. Aizawa and Thirteen almost died, too, all due to Izuku’s own stupid failures.

For the umpteenth time, Izuku is reminded of how weak he is.

“All Might, I’m so sorr—”

The hero spits up blood as he laughs, and he has to turn away to try and hide his chortles. “Don’t apologize, my boy! We’re so alike, you and I.”

Are we?

“What I really want to talk about is the Sports Festival. At what percent can you use One for All now?”

Izuku texted him last night about the increase in power he’s been experiencing lately regarding One for All. His quirks seem to be getting used to the suppressor he wears, so when Izuku tried it out during his early morning patrol today by aiming a punch at a wall, he was mildly surprised at the much harsher kickback he received in return.

“Uh, maybe twenty percent at the moment of impact? A little less than that?” He holds out his right hand and runs a finger along the faint scars lining his knuckles. He probably shouldn’t have actually made contact with the wall while punching, at least not without proper protection, but whatever.

Izuku doesn’t mention how this new increase of strength is hurting him even worse than before.

“Well, that’s good to hear! I’ll have to see you test it out during class next week. But in the meantime, I think you should start focusing on trying to regulate it without your quirk suppressor, as it won’t always be there to help you.”

Izuku nods. He does understand. He knows that having his ring on for long periods of time will stunt his growth quirk-wise, but at the same time it’s a necessity for reasons that he won’t dare tell his mentor. “I’ve been trying,” he starts sheepishly. “I think I have a better image of what it’s like to control it, it’s just a little hard to maintain a certain input.”

It’s not a lie. On the few occasions Izuku has tried, the end result usually included cursing and more pain. Not to mention property damage and a small pile of blood on the floor. It doesn’t end well, to put it simply, and it’s not like Izuku can take off his ring long enough to truly test out One for All’s limits.

The quirk is like an ocean of energy, its waves constantly crashing against Izuku’s mind and pushing and pulling at his skin. What his suppressor is doing is making a sort of pool that allows him to take what power he wants from it without the threat of damaging himself. He doesn’t have to worry about drowning underneath the ocean’s waves.

It’s a temporary fix, one that’s becoming more evident by the day as Izuku loses what little control he already has over it. Some of that ocean is spilling over into his pool, and it's going to cause the dam to break eventually.

“That’s progress, in any case.” Small Might’s expression darkens slightly. “I’m sure you’re already aware, but the time I’ve got left as the Symbol of Peace is quickly running out. And among those with villainous intent, there are some who have started to realize that.”

Izuku does not like where this is going. This is exactly what he was stressing over during homeroom.

“I granted you my power so that you could succeed me,” his mentor continues. “This Sports Festival—it’s an event the whole country’ll be watching! And that means just one thing for us!”

Us. The word weighs down on Izuku’s shoulder. They’re a team now. No, they have been for a while, Izuku just didn't let himself believe it before now.

“You. The next Pillar of Justice, the fledgling symbol,” he pokes Izuku in the chest to further accentuate the importance of what he’s saying. “I need you to tell the world I am here.”

It would be so easy to just say yes. It would be simple, almost, for Izuku to grin and excitedly spew his agreement, but the boy can’t make himself do it this time. There’s too much at stake, too many thoughts making his mind feel fuzzy.

Izuku doesn’t know how to feel about this, and yet he finds himself nodding anyway.

By the time half of the bento box is empty and their conversation is close to done, with Small Might insisting that Izuku take the leftover lunch with him in case he gets hungry in the future, there are around fifteen minutes before the next class period.

Izuku shows his mentor a few pictures of Missy before he leaves, making sure to include the ones that’ll embarrass Kacchan the most—one of Missy sitting on top of the blond's spiky hair without a care in the world, another of Missy resting directly on his face while he's trying to sleep, and a funnier one of Missy hissing at Kacchan as the teen attempts to climb up the refrigerator to stop her from pushing off a small vase of flowers.

His social battery having been drained for the day, Izuku only has one option upon leaving the teacher's lounge.

The vents.

He doesn't want to interact with anyone, and there's still time before next period. He doesn't want to go back to the lunchroom, either. His best bet? Snooping around in the vents.

Izuku glances around quickly to make sure no one's watching him before powering up Boost to jump up the wall to his left. He grabs onto the nearest hatch and swings himself up exactly like he had the first time around, only this time he does it with more confidence.

He starts to crawl around the vents for the second time, mentally sketching out a map inside his mind. It won't hurt to know all of the entrances and exits to each room in the building, as it might be useful later. He only managed to look at a little bit of the school when he first came here to get his arm healed, so now's the perfect opportunity to complete his layout.

He squeezes past a tight corner and stops suddenly, his palm touching something soft. Looking down, he realizes that he's stumbled upon a nest of some sort. Multiple blankets and very expensive-looking pillows cover the ground and the side of the vent's walls, and Izuku feels a frown tug at his lips. What kind of critter is using this space? And why would it have a nest with a miniature chess set off to the side?

Izuku stops himself from investigating further. There's only one creature this nest could belong to, and if he's right in his guess, he definitely doesn't want to upset him by touching his stuff. But even despite that, Izuku can't help but feel kind of irritated. This area of the vents is his now. Maybe he should go back later and move just a few pillows to show his superiority.

His notebook presses uncomfortably into his side as he crawls, and the boy realizes thoughtfully that his allergies aren't acting up this time around. It's clean in here; no more thin layer of dust clinging to the stainless steel like the last time he did this. Did someone clean it up for him? No, that's not possible. Nobody even knows he does this. It must have been for the other resident vent gremlin. Okay, he has to be right. Izuku is willing to bet that it's—

"Midoriya."

Izuku startles so bad that the top of his head bangs against the vent's ceiling. Fuck. That's the second time in as many adventures. He covers his mouth before the ow! can escape him, freezing like a deer caught in headlights. He knows that voice.

He also knows whose classroom he's over right now.

The boy clears his throat awkwardly, voice echoing down the tunnel. "Uh, yes, sensei?"

Aizawa sounds exasperated when he replies from below. "Get out of the vents, please."

How? How did he even know it was Izuku? Is he that suspicious? That loud?

Izuku swings open the hatch after a moment's hesitation and drops to the floor with practiced ease. The notebook falls from his pocket and lands on the ground with a flop, making Izuku's face turn beet red as he locks eyes with his teacher. Aizawa is leaning against the wall on the floor, covered up to his elbows in his sleeping bag. Which begs the question: how did he manage to zip it up with his bandaged arms?

Izuku suddenly has this hilarious image of his teacher trying to grab hold of the zipper while in casts and pulling it up. Another thought enters his brain: how is he going to get the zipper down? Is he going to squirm a bunch like an actual caterpillar until he's released from his cocoon?

The boy gasps inwardly. Maybe his partner did it for him. That would support Izuku's idea that the hero's lover is at this school and actually —

Aizawa raises a brow, and when Izuku shakes himself from his ramblings he sees his teacher staring at him expectantly. Oh shit.

He coughs into his hand. "Sorry, sir, can you repeat that?"

Aizawa sighs. "I asked why you were in the vents."

Hm. Now that is a very good question, one that Izuku can't really answer without seeming like a cryptid. "I was just thinking?"

The caterpillar is unimpressed. "You can't think on the ground? Or maybe in the lunchroom? Which," he glances at the clock on the back wall, "is where you're supposed to be right now."

Haha, fuck.

Izuku scrambles for something to say. He can't exactly tell him that he had lunch with All Might, that would be weird. And plus, Aizawa doesn't care for the number one hero at all, so Izuku bringing him up would only further irritate him.

Well, I do need a reason to get expelled. Maybe I should do that.

After a moment's hesitation where Kacchan's face pops up threateningly in Izuku's mind, the boy hastily bends down to pick up his notebook and hand it to his teacher, deciding that this is as good a time as ever to hand it to him—only to freeze halfway, arm still outstretched in horror as he realizes what he's done.

Aizawa can't hold it.

Izuku retracts his hand instantly and instead places the journal on top of Aizawa's desk, not meeting the glare that the man is so obviously giving him.

Aizawa glances between him and the journal, not making any more movements than he has to. "Why're you giving me that?"

"Um, well." Okay, maybe he should've worked on an explanation before he came to school today. That would've been the smart thing to do. "It's my analysis. On the attack."

Aizawa stares at him for a solid ten seconds before replying, words slow, as if not quite believing Izuku's words. "Your analysis."

Izuku nods shakily, fidgeting with his fingers behind his back. Please don't make me feel dumb, please don't make me feel dumb, please don't—

"You are aware that I didn't assign your class anything like this?"

Izuku jolts forward. "No, I know! I just did it because I thought it would be, uh, you know," he bites the inside of his cheek, praying that he won't come off as pretentious, "useful?"

Aizawa hums and leans forward, moving his arms to sweep the journal off the desk. It falls open on his sleeping-bag-covered lap, and it takes every last bit of Izuku's strength not to make a joke about how he just looked like Squidward on that one episode of Spongebob.

Making a joke like that is something Rabbit would do, not Izuku.

He shifts on his feet, glancing longingly at the vents above. "There's, uh, notes on every criminal that was there, along with what quirks they have and which zones they were put in."

Aizawa gives a slight tilt of his head when he looks back up at the boy. "You do this stuff for fun?"

I did at first, Izuku almost says, snapping his mouth shut just in time. Why the hell did I just think that? "It's more of a hobby," he settles on. A hobby that's detrimental to his survival, but a hobby nonetheless.

Aizawa nods, seeming to accept the answer. "I'll review it. Thank you for sharing it with me."

Izuku bows quickly in acknowledgment, trying to escape from the classroom so he doesn't have to be in the suffocating presence of his homeroom teacher any longer. He's scary when he's like this. Izuku can't see his face, so spotting his tells is a lot harder than before. He can't get a good read on him at the moment.

"Hold it," Aizawa says when Izuku makes for the door. "I was planning on having this discussion with you later, but you're already here, so let's get this over with."

Izuku freezes, panic gripping his heart like icy claws at the ominous words. There's no way he knows.

The boy swallows, trying to force his face into one of indifference. He can't freak out or act suspiciously on the off chance that this isn't what he thinks it's about. "Sir?"

Aizawa nods toward his desk. "Check the first drawer."

Confused and a little scared, Izuku obeys. He knows Aizawa doesn't like to be kept waiting for long. He has thin patience on the best of days, and he obviously doesn't look like he's had the greatest time lately.

Izuku blinks at the glint of metal that greets him, frown deepening. It's his knife. The one he had during the attack—the twin of the blade he has inside his right shoe right now.

“Tsukauchi told me one of his officers picked it up just outside the entrance to the USJ. Now, I specifically remember you using it as you fought those villains. You wielded it very comfortably, in fact.”

It’s not phrased like a question, but Izuku hears what he’s getting at anyway. “It’s not mine, sensei.” His voice is silky smooth; innocent but also intrigued. Is it enough to fool Aizawa, though? “I was fighting the criminals and one of them dropped it. I thought it would help me if I used it, and it did.”

“Uh-huh,” the underground hero grunts. That alone tells Izuku that he does not believe him in the slightest, but since he has no actual proof of anything happening otherwise, he can’t do anything about it. “Which brings me to my other point.” His eyes narrow, and the sudden change in topic almost gives Izuku whiplash. “You disobeyed a direct order of mine when I told you to get back, Midoriya.”

Izuku’s ears burn at the familiar nickname, not liking the tone Aizawa is using. He’s been lectured by the man before, but he never seems to be able to get used to it, not as Rabbit or as Izuku. “I was just doing what I thought was best, sensei. I had the opportunity to help, so I... took it.”

“So I figured. But what you need to understand is that when I tell you to do something, especially when we’re in the middle of a villain attack,” his words grow sharper near the end, “I expect you to listen. In order to be a hero, you must first be able to follow orders. That kind of recklessness is what gets people killed on the field, Midoriya.”

Fuck. His throat tightens on its own accord. It’s kind of unfair, Izuku thinks childishly, that he’s being lectured for helping, but at the same time he understands. Okay, so he could’ve had a better plan, whatever. He can admit that much at least. But it’s over, right? Izuku's inability to follow orders or whatever doesn't matter right now.

He just barely stops himself from arguing with his teacher’s reasonings, instead forcing himself to tell Aizawa that he understands. His gaze is fixed on a point on the wall beside the man, as he’s afraid he won’t be able to hide his frustration if he looks directly at him. He’s only a little ashamed. He doesn’t regret it. How could he?

The only thing he regrets is not being fast enough. Not knowing.

“English will start soon, so you can either go back to lunch or stay here.” Aizawa slides to the floor, Izuku’s notebook falling as well. “I don’t care which you choose, just don’t wake me up.”

And then he closes his eyes and is dead to the world. Izuku briefly considers asking him if he can have his knife back but snuffs out that request immediately.

Just because he kind of needs to get expelled doesn’t mean he’s going to make a fool out of himself. It’s illegal for him to have it; he’s not getting it back.

Izuku ends up staying in class instead of scoping through the vents again, and it’s not long before the rest of the students trail back in and Present Mic ambles his way through the door, voice loud enough to give Izuku another migraine.

But despite this, the last few periods of the day are slightly more bearable than the first few. Nobody is giving him sidelong glances anymore or outright avoiding him, so that’s nice. It’s when the day ends, however, that things take a turn for the worse.

Izuku is first aware of something different happening a minute or so after the last bell rings. The large number of quirks buzzing just behind the door instead of milling about in the hallways or empty classrooms is proof enough of that, but then they don’t leave. Izuku hangs back as Uraraka opens the door, only to be met with a huge crowd of students huddling close around the opening.

They all look hungry as they peer at Izuku’s classmates as if they’re animals in a zoo exhibit. The crowd is so thick that nobody can get through them without shoving, so Uraraka and the rest of Izuku's classmates stand there awkwardly.

And Izuku is already tired. He’s already had to deal with enough bullshit today as it is, so his irritation levels are spiking with each passing second. Izuku has a plan he was going to follow after school. The more in-depth files on the villains from the USJ are located at the police station on the other side of town, and Izuku needs to get ahold of them if he wants to connect those faces to gangs or other groups. He needs to see those documents, and since they haven’t been recorded virtually yet, he’ll have to find a way in there himself.

He already has a pretty good idea of what he’s going to do after getting home, but that plan revolves around having time. Time that’s currently being wasted with each passing second that he can’t get through this crowd.

“They’re scoping out the competition, duh,” Kacchan says from in front of Izuku. “‘Cause we’re the kids who survived a villain attack.”

Just great. Why today, of all days? Why does it have to be when he actually has things to do after school?

Kacchan grunts, surprisingly having heard him. “No point, though.” He turns his fiery gaze onto the students. “Move it, extras!”

Izuku smiles to himself as Iida starts to frantically chop the air and lecture the blond. “Can we please not resort to calling those we don’t even know extras?”

“It’s true,” a lilac-haired boy starts, looming over the rest of the crowd with his tall build. Izuku straightens up immediately, something about the way the student is talking that garners his attention. “We came to get a look, but you sure are modest. Are all the kids in the hero course like this one?”

Only the best ones, Izuku thinks.

Kacchan has death in his eyes, but the other boy speaks before the blond can get a chance to snap back. “Gotta say, I’m a little disillusioned if this is what you’re offering.” He rests a large hand at the nape of his neck, but it’s not out of discomfort, it’s more of a way to appear more comfortable. To scare others off. “Those of us who didn’t make the hero course are stuck in general studies and the other tracks. There’re quite a few of us, did you know that?”

Izuku did, but it’s not like he cares that much.

“Depending on the results of this sports festival, they might consider transferring us to the hero course. I understand the reverse is also possible for you.”

The meaning is heavy for the rest of the class, but Izuku knows better. This boy is just trying to intimidate them. His words hold value, sure, but it doesn’t change why he’s even sharing this to begin with. Izuku starts to feel the first tendrils of cold flame rise up in his body, the taste of anger so rare on his tongue that he almost doesn't recognize it a first.

Is this kid really trying to stir up competition after what happened two days ago? Does he even know what really went down inside the USJ?

"And scoping out the competition? For a general studies kid like me, this'll be the perfect chance to knock you off your pedestals." Pedestals. As if everyone here didn't earn their seat. As if everyone here didn't almost die during an attack that never should have happened. "Consider this a declaration of war."

War. War.

Izuku blanches, traitorous thoughts worming their way into his mind at the word. He's reminded of static eyes and hot breath near his ear, of large hands on his shoulders and burn marks on his back.

"No matter what corner of the world you're in, Izuku, there will always be fighting. There will always be people who are lost in their own illusions and false realities. You must learn that this is just how things are. You have to embrace this violence."

This boy is talking as if there isn't already a war. Class 1-A fought it in just two days ago. Izuku's been fighting that same violence for ages, not wanting to succumb to it. Why can't anyone else see that? Why are they so focused on themselves?

"This is the price you pay for personal freedom."

Another student steps forward this time, and Extract practically purrs. The feeling of this quirk is similar to Izuku's own, which is quite unsettling. But what's more unsettling are the words that come out of the blond's mouth.

"You guys should be grateful those villains attacked you, really." His voice is obnoxious; Izuku finds his hands curling into fists at the grating sound. "Your class is plastered all over the news. Everyone and their mother knows your names by now!"

The flame is a scalding fire now, and it's burning up Izuku's insides. Is he jealous? Is that what he's saying? No. He's just trying to rile them up, that's all. He must have his own reasons for acting like this, Izuku knows. He can't fault him too much.

“But I have to say, I’m surprised you all made it! Your class doesn’t look very promising. You should be proud.”

Sarcasm. A simple trick used to throw an opponent off track and get them blinded. It’s not meant to be taken seriously. It’s not meant to be making Izuku feel this fucking cold.

But even as he tells himself this, the anger grows bigger. It turns his thoughts black and his mind cruel. His palms feel slightly sticky, either from his nails pressing too deeply into his skin or from nervous sweat, he can’t tell. All Izuku can see is the image of Aizawa’s broken body in a miniature crater on the ground. He blinks and sees Thirteen’s partially destroyed suit, Tsuyu’s wide eyes as his brother’s hand reached toward her face—

Everything goes still. The quiet is absolute. Izuku realizes with a sharp intake of breath that everyone is staring at him now, Kacchan now moving to the side so Izuku is given a chance to speak. His friend knows how he feels about this sort of thing, that’s the only reason he did it.

I didn’t mean to say that aloud.

Even his classmates have turned around to look at him, most of them looking confused and shocked. He doesn’t blame them. Izuku is skilled at going unnoticed, even when he’s right in the middle of it all.

“Eh? Sorry, I couldn't hear you,” the blond says, looking over at him. The fake sweetness to his words is making Izuku sick.

Another bully. I thought I left that behind when I joined a school for heroes.

Kacchan shoots daggers at the boy with his eyes, but Izuku lightly pushes his friend with a hand, telling him it’s alright.

“I’m just saying,” Izuku says, not bothering to raise his voice above the soft tone he’s using. “We almost died. Our teacher almost died, just like that, trying to protect us from a monster created to destroy All Might. I don’t see how that can possibly be turned into something positive.”

The blond is momentarily taken aback, mouth still curled into a smile that looks just a little more hesitant now. Izuku's words are filled with poison, acid seeping out of them from the edges.

He turns his gaze onto the lilac-haired boy, who had unsuccessfully tried to blend back in with the crowds. He's not talking either, but his eyes are more than expressive enough for Izuku to tell that he's thinking about something. That he's angry. He hates them—the entire hero course.

But now that Izuku can see him fully, now that he can note the eye bags dark enough to rival Izuku's own and the set to the boy's jaw and the overall exhausted look on his face—he knows not to take what he said personally. He recognizes the glint in those lavender eyes because he sees it in himself every time he looks in the mirror in the morning.

The self-doubt. The hatred. The anxiety and fear you feel when surrounded by others, even if you know you're the one in control, even if you know you'll come out on top if put against them.

It's all too familiar, and Izuku understands.

He lets his gaze slide back over to the blond's before finishing up. He's already sick of the attention. He doesn't like the way they're gaping at him—he knows he doesn't look too hot right now.

"If you hear about a class of students getting attacked by villains and immediately start whining about them receiving public recognition, then that's your own issues speaking." Izuku shifts on his feet and lifts a shoulder in a quick shrug. "I think you should be grateful you weren't there. A copycat quirk like yours wouldn't have done anything against that creature."

A moment of stunned silence, and then: "Wait, how did you—!"

Izuku moves to push past them, but it seems like he doesn't have to. The crowd makes way for him slowly as he moves along, and he can feel their stares like a hot iron on his back. He clutches his backpack tighter and glares at the ground.

They're whispering about him now, and they're not even trying to hide it. Izuku cringes in on himself when he catches a few of the words.

"That's the kid who fought it, right?"

"What did Kan-sensei call it? The Nomu?"

“Is that the one that had to be carried out?”

“Scary. Did you see his eyes?”

Oh. It seems so much clearer now. Izuku shuts his eyes tight and prays that muscle memory will get him to the stairs. They’re scared of him because he fought the Nomu. They’re scared because he nearly killed it. They’re scared because he survived it.

Only a few students were there to witness it, but Izuku knows that rumors spread like wildfires. Mineta was probably responsible for most of that.

They’re scared of me.

He faintly hears Kacchan telling them all to fuck off, and then loud footsteps as the boy stomps after him. His body is a warm presence by his side, but when Izuku breathes it’s still a rush of cold air in and out of his lungs.

“How’d you know?” Kacchan asks lowly, looking at him from the corner of his eye.

Izuku thinks back to the other boy’s quirk, how Extract had immediately recognized their shared characteristics and energy. How it had acted like the cat that got the canary when it realized it now has a sibling from a long-lost parent. “Just call it a lucky guess.”

It wasn't too hard to put together. The boy was jealous; he was desperate and probably a little scared at being left behind. Forgotten. So it only made sense for the quirk to be a copy type, especially given by Extract's reaction. Mimicry is fear, after all. It's a defense mechanism.

But it can also be used to lure prey in.

Izuku can’t worry about that now, though. He has work to do.

It's surprisingly easy to let yourself get caught by the police.

Izuku has to suppress an eye roll at the fearful looks some of the more experienced officers give him. He's basically turning himself in, after all. It's only natural for them to get suspicious.

"Put your hands up, now!"

"Do it, Rabbit!"

"Everyone else, get back!"

Izuku is standing in the middle of the street, face perfectly expressionless. Cops and pro heroes alike are surrounding him in a wide circle, obviously not wanting to get too close. It's kind of funny how scared some of them are; the darker, crueler side of Izuku can't help but preen at the knowledge.

"Show your damn hands!"

Oh. Demanding, aren't they? Izuku raises his arms above his head, letting out a loud, dramatic sigh. "Alright, I'm doing it. No need to break your dicks over it."

"Stay where you are!"

Or what? What are they going to do? Shoot him? He's not a very high-priority criminal. The worst thing they can do is shoot him with tranquilizers or knock him unconscious. Sure, he's caused a lot of property damage and made a fool of the government loads of times, but he's never done anything to warrant something like this.

The murder charges on his file are just that: charges. There's really no evidence, those are just legal claims against him. If there was even the slightest proof of him doing said activities, Endeavor would have been coming after him from the very beginning. It seems Izuku's doing well in regards to avoiding the man, even now. With no flame hero in sight, his plan is practically golden.

A glint in the light catches his eye, and Izuku smiles beneath the mask when he sees a reporter trying to push through the line of cops and get some footage of him. He points finger guns at the camera and winks, just knowing that this stunt of his will make national headlines before the day's end.

He usually likes his name to stay local for obvious reasons, but if he can embarrass the Hero's Commission by doing something like this whilst also getting some important information out of it, he's going to do so a million times over, consequences be damned.

"Quit moving before we shoot! Last chance!"

Ooh, Izuku is just quivering in his boots. The tremble in the officer's voice really drives the fear home, too. But all jokes aside, why are they so scared of him? It's not like he hurts cops—well if you don't count the bruised egos he leaves them with. He only ever hurts criminals or people who genuinely deserve it, so he's not sure why they're so openly terrified.

It seems some might be starting some rumors about Rabbit to turn the people against me. Could it be the Commission? Or do they not care enough?

Whatever it is, that's not good. Not good at all.

One of the heroes bark at him to get on his knees, and Izuku has to bite back a dirty joke. Not yet. His sass will be put to good use in due time.

"Do it, now!"

Alright, fuck. They really don't want to drag this out. Oh well. That's fine with Izuku—the quicker the better, actually.

He does as he's told and rests his palms on the back of his head; an open invitation. For a moment, everything is still. There's a ripple in the circle, as nobody is quite willing to approach him just yet, but then Izuku flicks out an impatient hand to kickstart a reaction and multiple pro heroes are stepping forward without further prodding. They're new, he notices, having either just graduated last year or just now making their debut. That last part makes him laugh a little.

Imagine it's your first time in the public eye as a hero and your first task is to take in a wanted vigilante who's prone to surprise attacks and glitter bombs. Not to mention the fact that this entire thing is being recorded. Izuku is sure that the 'chase' that happened before this was caught on camera as well.

It's funny how something as simple as throwing a rock through a police officer's car windshield can lead to something like this. It's not like the cop was inside the car when he smashed the window, so he doesn't see the big deal. Nonetheless, it caused the reaction he needed to get here: face smushed against hot asphalt and arms held tightly behind his back as the heroes began the process of detainment.

"Take off his mask," someone says from the side, and it's like a switch flips inside the boy.

Yeah, that's not going to happen.

Izuku clicks his tongue. "Nope! Bad officer! Bad! I wouldn't do that unless you want your face blown off." The lie slips easily from his tongue. He prepared for this scenario long before he even picked up the rock, so it's not hard to make himself sound confident. "My mask is fingerprint-sensitive, which means if anyone else tries to touch it other than me, they're gonna set off a mini-explosion. I don't suppose you want to become a firecracker today, hm?"

The heroes around him fall silent, obviously debating whether or not they still want to go through with reaching for the mask, but after a moment they seem to think better of it.

"Won't that blow your own face off?" A hero with rocket launchers for arms asks, genuine confusion and curiosity lacing her tone. "Sounds like bad design to me."

Not for the first time does he wish they could see his sharp grin. "But the danger's twice the fun! And besides, life is only meaningful because it doesn't go on forever."

"You're insane," is all she says before helping the others hoist him up after putting on the heavy-duty cuffs. They're not quirk suppressants, he realizes. The cops are only aware of him having basic enhancements, so it's not much of a surprise that they're not taking all precautions when it comes to his 'simple' quirk.

A mistake that will serve to give Izuku the advantage just fifteen minutes later, when the boy is being strapped to a chair bolted into the ground, a plain rectangular table in front of him.

He's in an interrogation room, but instead of being at Tsukauchi's police station, he was taken to a much more secure location. At least, that's what the surprisingly chill drivers told him on the way over here. He wasn't even able to look out the window of the police van he rode in with how tightly they had his head secured to the wall, so he relied on the two drivers upfront to tell him where he was being taken.

It honestly didn't matter where he would end up—he knows that most police stations around here have a paper copy of the more detailed reports on the USJ. Reports that haven't been fully transferred digitally yet. Reports that Izuku needs.

He still has his mask on, which is a little disappointing on behalf of the police. His ring is on his finger, too. In fact, the only things they took were a few of his weapons and lighters, which Izuku won't miss. He emptied the important stuff from his pockets hours before attempting this stunt, knowing they would search them, so he's fine. The only reason he left anything at all was so he wouldn't look too suspicious.

"Hey, did you know that atoms never touch each other? And since we're made of atoms, we've never touched anything in our entire lives?" He leans back as far as the restraints will allow in his chair. "So, to answer your question, sir, no. I did not punch that hero."

The poor detective handling Izuku's current interrogation looks three steps away from shooting himself in the foot. He looks like a rookie, as Izuku hasn't seen him before. To be fair, this is a different part of town. He doesn't hang around these parts too much if he can help it. Not much crime around here, anyway.

This place is, again, a much more secure police station than he's used to being held at. Why they didn't take him straight to jail or prison is beyond Izuku, but it's not like the boy is complaining. He is, however, a little offended. He may not be a huge priority criminal, but he'd like to at least think that they would've taken him to someplace more protected in any other circumstance. Is he not important at all in their eyes? Damn, maybe he should commit some more heinous crimes if it means they won't underestimate him like this again.

How could they act so scared around him on that street and yet be so careless with his handling? They're all stupid.

“A few officers found this on your person during the pat-down.” The detective says, ignoring Izuku’s previous comment as he places a small bag of what looks like weed on the table. They’ve been at this for a while now, and not once has Izuku actually answered his questions seriously. “Can you tell me what this is?”

And okay, that may or may not actually be his. Izuku has to wrack his brain to try and remember the past couple of days in detail. He does drug busts all the time, so the chance of him accidentally leaving some weed in one of his pockets is actually pretty high—pun 100% intended. He does know what it is, so the question should really be how much would it have sold for? And can I get that back after we're done here?

“Now that is Northern Lights, Cannabis Indica.”

If he’s going to make references to his favorite old TV show, he’s going to do it when it will invoke the best reactions. Being in the middle of an actual interrogation seems like a good time.

The detective’s eyes bulge at the precise response, and he shoots his own look at the Ziploc bag as if to check for himself if he’s right. “Wow, okay, I’m a little concerned. You sound twelve, how do you even—you know what? Never mind. Next question.” He fixes Izuku with an inquisitive glare. “So you’re admitting that it belongs to you?”

Izuku merely shrugs. “I don’t know. Probably.”

In all honesty, Rabbit is the type of vigilante to take your drugs and do them in front of you to make sure you can’t have them. He hasn’t done it yet, though, if only because of the fear he has of Eraserhead somehow finding out and killing him for it. God knows that that man knows everything when it comes to Izuku doing something slightly illegal. He doesn’t want to take that chance.

“How do you not know, kid?” The detective is squinting at him now. “It’s either a yes or no. Is it yours or not?”

“I can’t really remember.”

He gets an eye twitch in response, and Izuku shifts his gaze to the two-way mirror right behind the man. He knows people are watching this go down. He can feel multiple quirks just a few yards away, separated by a thin wall. It makes him feel like a specimen.

The detective breathes in deeply, seeming to force himself to calm down. “That’s understandable, I guess. Marijuana is a memory loss drug. A lot of things can occur after usage that you might not remember.”

Izuku tilts his head, that desire for chaos once again burning under his skin. “Does that apply to everyone, regardless of who they are?”

“Yes, of course.” The man looks suddenly suspicious. “Why?”

“Well, I’m just saying that if that’s the case, you can’t be sure it’s not yours.”

Detective Rookie flinches, taken aback by the abrupt accusation. “That’s ridiculous. Of course it isn’t mine.”

Izuku shakes his head in mock disappointment. He nods at the baggy and straightens up, effortlessly taking control of the room with that simple action. “Marijuana is a memory loss drug, so maybe you just don’t remember that it’s yours.”

“How could you if it just erased your memory? You just told me it works on everyone; that includes yourself.”

“Kid, that’s not how it works. Stop trying to change the subject.”

Izuku narrows his eyes. “Now how would you know how it works?”

“Hey, knock it off!” Detective Rookie is flustered now, his face beet red while his hands curl into tight fists. “I’m interviewing you—”

“No! You said that I’d be conducting the interview when I walked in here, now exactly how much pot did you smoke?”

The detective jolts in his chair, staring sightlessly at the wall as he processes what just happened. He looks traumatized.

Good.

Izuku can just faintly hear the laughter coming from the other side of the mirror, and he allows himself a small giggle. After a few moments where the silence becomes a little too loud, Izuku leans forward as close as he can to whisper: “Hey, can I ask you a question?” He doesn’t wait for a response. “How does the lack of progress in this interrogation make you feel?”

The laughing grows louder behind the mirror, and then the man abruptly stands up from his chair and storms out of the room, practically throwing open the door before slamming it shut, the table rattling with the force.

And okay, that is what finally pushes Izuku over the edge. He dissolves into a fit of his own laughter, vibrating even with the restraints around his body. It's when he calms down a little bit that he's aware of another buzzing poking at the back of his skull, a very familiar type of buzzing.

Izuku stops laughing immediately once the door is pushed open, though the smug expression doesn't leave. "Ooh, nice to see ya again, Tsuki."

Detective Tsukauchi sighs, sinking into the chair the other detective was in just prior. He's carrying a large binder and a cup of coffee in his hands, even though it's almost evening. He's wearing his signature outfit, but Izuku can't help but feel that something's off. "Wish I could say the same, Rabbit."

"Wait, what are you doing here?" It's a genuine question. Izuku honestly didn't expect him to come, especially since he knows it's one of his busiest days of the week. "Did they think your quirk was actually gonna be useful or something?"

Tsukauchi glares at him, and to anyone else, it may seem like a warning, like a threat, but Izuku can see the level of alarm and concern clear as day in those eyes. The man is worried. It's as if he's silently asking Izuku what the hell he's doing, and also what the hell is wrong with him. Maybe that's why he came here so quickly; he wants to make sure Rabbit won't get into too much trouble.

Izuku swings his legs like a child—his feet barely fucking touch the floor, for god's sake—and throws his head back. The detective is taking too long to sort out his emotions and answer, so he'll continue without one. "Took you less than an hour to get here. I'm glad I'm important enough for you to drop your work and come talk to me."

"Talk?" Tsukauchi's entire demeanor changes once he realizes Izuku isn't willing to give him a clue as to what's going on. His gaze hardens significantly. "This is an interrogation, Rabbit, not a simple conversation."

"Spare me the boring lecture, Tsuki. You spew it every time we meet and every time I think I'm about to roll my eyes into a different dimension."

The detective isn't fazed. Wow. It's starting to look like he's actually upset. "Do you have any idea what your file looks like right now, son? You've been charged with a few dozen accounts of murder, assault, armed assault, larceny, attempted murder—"

"I pushed him off a building into a lake," the vigilante defends. "So technically that last one was gravity's work, not me."

He continues as if the interruption never happened. "—breaking and entering, disturbing the peace, conspiracy to commit murder, public quirk usage, vigilantism, public intoxication—"

"I wasn't even that drunk!"

"—arson, possession of illegal firearms—"

"Those were stolen."

"—hit and run—"

"He was jaywalking!"

"—not to mention the fact that the car you hit the suspect with wasn't even yours. Need I go on about the trouble you're in?"

Izuku thinks for a second, tipping his head to the side to exaggerate his actions. He's always been one for theatrics. "Don't forget to spell out the grand theft and slander. I'm rather proud of those."

Tsukauchi massages his temple. "Son, these are serious charges. You could be facing life in prison, even at your young age."

"Terrifying," he deadpans, throwing another look at the two-way mirror, this time staring directly at where he knows one of the higher-ups is sitting. "On an unrelated note, do you guys have any snacks? Maybe some unsalted peanuts? All this talk about my accomplishments is making me famished."

Tsukauchi swipes a hand down his face and peers at him with furrowed brows. He looks distressed. Oh. I'm actually freaking him out right now because he thinks I actually got caught and don't have a plan. Whoops. That's my bad.

He feels only a teeny tiny bit bad.

“I shouldn’t,” Izuku agrees, continuing with his cheerful act. “On second thought, I still don’t know why I’m here. Can you run down that list again? Maybe a couple more times to make sure everyone hears it?”

The detective doesn’t take the bait. “You’re a vigilante. That’s enough reason as it is. You also threw a rock into a police officer’s windshield today, so that right there is another case of property damage and attempt at bodily harm.”

“Okay, that last part is bullshit!” Izuku starts on another rant, stalling for more time. His distraction should be put into effect any moment now. “He told me he likes to play catch, alright? I asked him if he could catch this cool ass rock I found on the side of the road, and he said yes, so I threw it at him! What’s the big problem here?”

Tsukauchi looks like he wants to cry. “Rabbit, please. This isn’t a joke for once.”

Oh, but it is.

Before Izuku can say that, though, the intercom comes on, the speaker at the corner of the room piercing Izuku’s eardrums.

“Detective, the Chief wants to speak with you. Says it’s urgent.”

Right on time. Izuku’s distraction thankfully worked. Thank you, AINA, for that perfectly timed false alarm. I’m sorry I had to leave you at home, but at least now I know you can work from long distances.

Detective Tsukauchi closes his eyes and seems to rethink his life decisions for a moment, and when he reopens them, he looks suddenly much older than he did a second ago. And alright, maybe that guilt is increasing now.

“Let me see what I can do,” Tsukauchi whispers, low enough so the cameras and the people behind the mirror won’t hear. “You better have a good plan, son. Officials from the Commission will be here in ten minutes to take you.”

The meaning is clear. Get out of here while you can before they ruin you.

Izuku is hit with a sudden wave of gratitude. He doesn’t know why

Tsukauchi cares this much. He doesn't know why he's even bothering with telling him this, but he's grateful.

He wasn't planning on sticking around for much longer anyway, but it's still nice to be told what to expect on the off chance that his plan doesn't work.

Izuku waves goodbye to the detective—a silent acknowledgment of his statement—before returning to his carefree attitude. "Don't worry about me! You do whatever you need to do. I'll just be here, chained to the table, waiting for you to get back. Without a lawyer, might I add. Which is probably illegal."

And then he's left alone in the interrogation room, which is exactly the situation that he hoped for. Phase II of the plan should occur exactly one minute after the first fake alarm, so he's got twenty seconds left to prepare. He flexes his hands, testing the strength of the large cuffs on his wrists. They're pretty resistant—the metal is a good few inches thick. In all honesty, he probably won't be able to break out of them with just Boost helping him out.

It's a good thing I have One for All, then, huh? I wonder what All Might would say about this.

There are ten seconds left on the clock when Izuku realizes that Tsukauchi left his binder open on the table, and when he leans forward slightly to see what the pages contain, he nearly chokes.

It's the schematics and details of this very building, given by the hastily-written title on top of the first page. But more importantly, it's a diagram of the ventilation systems. No, of his method of transportation.

He spotted the vent hatch above him the moment he was marched in here, but he didn't even consider it as a way out because he wasn't sure where it led to. He might've gotten lost. Now, however, he knows where to go and which turns to take to get to the station's file room.

Izuku was planning on busting down the door and taking everyone by surprise, but it seems his plans have changed for the better. This seems much more logical, much safer.

Five seconds. Izuku has to time it right if he doesn't want the people on the other side of the mirror to spot the red sparks coming off of him, courtesy of One for All. If he breaks free from the cuffs at the exact moment the station shuts down, the power going out should distract them.

He told AINA to shut down the power systems to all nearby police stations since he wouldn't know which one they would take him to. It was just to be safe, and he's never been more glad of his past-self's thinking than he is right now. This plan was precarious at best, but at least he made some foundations for it. Maybe this isn't the best idea. Maybe he should've just waited the extra few days for the files to be copied digitally instead of throwing himself into the grasp of the police to get a chance to steal the documents.

All of these thoughts go out the window, however, once the lights shut off and the door to the interrogation room locks automatically as an emergency default.

Hah. They played themselves.

The cops start to bang on the door and try to get it open, and Izuku just smirks. He can't see very well in the dark, but he can make due. Red lightning dances across his arms as he snaps the cuffs in two, and he can only hope the security camera in the corner was taken out as well.

Izuku jumps onto the desk after tearing off his ankle restraints, making quick work of the steel-plated vent hatch. Once he's inside he can't help but snort.

People should really learn to lock their ceiling. They don't know what kind of animal can get in if they don't.

The vent space is small, but he's worked with worse. According to the papers conveniently shown in Tsukauchi's binder, he has to take two lefts and one right to get to the file room. As he crawls, he can hear shouted voices directly below him. Thundering footsteps shake the vents, and Izuku cackles quietly to himself.

"What do you mean he's gone?"

"Well, technically we don't know if he is! We still need the door open!"

"Just pop off the two-way mirror you imbeciles! You three, search the rest of the rooms! He's got to be in the building somewhere."

Oh, Izuku is in the building alright.

He drops down in his designated spot once he's sure the voices have faded a little ways away, and he quickly makes his way towards the most recently filled filing cabinets. The light from somebody's computer allows him to see just a little bit. Gotta search for the right date, gotta search for the right date, gotta search for the right—

"Aha!" Izuku pulls out a thick manila folder and slips it in his jacket. He has no time to waste looking through it right now. The boy slides the drawers closed and doesn't bother heading back through the vents. There's unfortunately no window in this room, meaning he has to find another escape. It's still incredibly dark out in the hallways—the only light being from the red emergency ones. If he can run fast enough through the main building, the chances of getting caught or recognized are low. That's his best option.

He opens the door of the files room and peeks out, searching with Extract for any nearby people. They're all one hallway down, which isn't nearly enough space between him and them, but it's all he's allowed at the moment.

Izuku powers up Boost in his legs and runs. He doesn't know exactly where the entrance is, so this is gonna be interesting. He rounds the corner and feels someone coming up on him. Without a second thought, he rams into them, shoving them into the wall as he zooms past them down the adjoining hall.

"Sorry!" He calls over his shoulder. "It's not personal!"

Okay, maybe it is a little personal. This is payback for all those times he was called Bunny instead of Rabbit.

He shoves past two more unknowing officers and speeds for the large opening coming up. This must be it. This is the lounge area of the station, the entrance should be right over—

Tsukauchi and Sansa are standing right by the door. Izuku nearly trips over his own two feet but doesn't slow down. Can't afford to. There's a bunch of cops chasing after him now, and they may not have speed as he does, but they do have a lot more in numbers. He has to put as much distance between them as possible.

For the briefest of seconds, Izuku meets their eyes in turn. Sansa looks amused by the entire situation, if not a little annoyed, but Tsukauchi looks more relieved. And is that—is that fondness?

Wow, now that Izuku is thinking about it, he must look pretty crazy right about now: running full speed towards the doors leading to the outside with random officers coming after him from behind, the hallways dark in the background except for the red emergency lights.

He probably looks like a fool.

Tsukauchi and Sansa move to the side at the last second, feigning loss of balance. Izuku bursts through the doors and immediately heads for the nearest building, ignoring the surprised screams of the civilians on the sidewalk as he does so. It's evening now, and the sun is dipping low into the sky. Kacchan is probably blowing up his phone back at the apartment.

Hah! No Eraserhead to catch me stealing government documents this time!

By the time those cops burst out of the building as well, Izuku is long gone.

The boy can barely believe it, though. That actually worked? Izuku feels giddy once the weight of the situation crashes down on him, and he allows himself to sprawl out on the roof of a dentist's office a few miles away to collect himself. He pulls out the manila folder from his jacket and looks through the contents. Yep, this is indeed all of the files on the criminals from the USJ attack.

He already knows their names and quirks, what he doesn't know is who they're affiliated with. See, most criminals at the Club don't work alone. They can't, not with the number of heroes and police these days. Even Izuku accepts help from others from time to time, and he's about as independent as you can get.

Izuku's smile sharpens to reveal pointed teeth when he pops off his mask to get some air. As he flips through the hundred or so pages, he realizes that his instincts were correct. These are people he's seen before at the Club, and he knows exactly who these criminals are friends with.

The documents provide him with a gang history and acquaintance list for each criminal, so Izuku is able to make multiple connections as to who they're friends with. He can guess how close they are to each other, too.

And close friends tell each other stuff, right? They offer you jobs and team missions. They tell you everything about their upcoming bust, even if you will have no part in it.

What this means is that there were people with the knowledge that the USJ would be getting attacked. People who didn't come forward about it, who didn't tell Izuku about it. You see, Izuku has made it clear since the very beginning that if anything were to come up regarding UA or any other school in general, he would be made aware of it or else.

The entire fucking Club knows that. It's an unspoken rule. So for someone to keep it quiet? To let their friends participate in such an immoral battle while they themselves stand back to watch from the safety of their own home? It makes Izuku angry. So, so angry.

No, furious.

The rage takes a hold of his thoughts and turns them black, filtering out the niceties and the hesitance until all that's left is darkness. The fury leaves him feeling cruel.

There's an image in his mind. A face, to be more exact. The face of someone who he's well acquainted with at the Club. He knows that this man is best friends with four of the criminals listed in these files—he must have been offered to join the cause by at least one of them. He declined, obviously, or else he would be sitting in jail alongside them, but that doesn't make it any better.

The point is that he knew and didn't speak about it. He failed to tell anyone that a high school would be getting attacked by the most dangerous villain group around.

Izuku glances at the moon that's starting to slowly rise in the sky and guesstimates what time it is. His phone is still back at the house.

The man goes to the Club at around eleven every Friday night. I remember him being there every time without fail. I can catch him now since I'm already in the right mindset.

He doesn't think he'd be able to go to sleep anyway if he had to wait to dole out this justice.

Is this right? Probably not. But does he care? Not with this rage fueling his insides. He's probably going to have a lot of regrets tomorrow, though.

There are three more hours until the opening. Izuku is going to stop by his place for a moment to feed Missy and gear back up, and then he's going to patrol to keep himself occupied.

He only hopes that the eyes that have been watching him ever since he left the police station belong to someone friendly.

Izuku very rarely wears his full costume to the Underground Club. He doesn't need to. They're like a family there.

At least, that's what he thought before the USJ attack.

It's safe to say that he wears it this time around, though. Everyone goes quiet when he opens the door with a bit more force than necessary, and he practically glides through the open space. They always do that when he walks in, but this time is different. It's like they can feel the tension in the air. They can sense the change in his energy, too.

He's no longer carefree or happy-go-lucky. He's pissed.

Their gazes stay on him the entire walk to the front of the bar, but he doesn't care. It's not like it matters. Let them watch. It'll be a nice example for them all. A sweet reminder, in fact.

Izuku spots familiar gray hair and doesn't waste any time in grabbing the person by the back of the shirt. He yanks them to their feet and ignores the choked yelp he gets in return. There are muffled gasps coming from everyone else, but instead of replying he lets his eyes fall onto the man's exposed wrist. His sleeve has ridden up, revealing a dark tattoo.

The same tattoo that his little buddies have. It's a shame said buddies are currently sitting in jail for attempted murder, however.

It's the right guy. He always makes sure of that before continuing.

"The hell are you doin', Rabbit!"

Izuku hooks the man's ankle to get him to lose his balance, which makes it all the easier to curl a hand around the criminal's throat and lift him up off the ground.

“You knew about the League’s attack.” Izuku starts, shoving him up into the nearby wall. It’s not phrased like a question.

“What are you—!”

He grips him harder, not enough to cut off the air supply, but enough to get him to feel the pressure. “The attack on the USJ. You knew about it beforehand.”

“Yeah?” The man scrabbles for purchase on the ground as he chokes, but the tips of his toes barely touch the wood flooring. “So what?”

So what? Is he joking?

Piece of Shit Criminal has just added more fuel to the fire inside Izuku. The boy is practically shaking with the effort to not release the energy inside him.

“It seems we’ve hit a misunderstanding. You know how this club works.” The dumbass criminal aims a kick at him to dislodge his hold, but Izuku easily blocks it with his free palm, hiking up a knee to hit home in the dude’s crotch. “We don’t harm kids here, you dumbfuck.”

“Ah! Which is pretty fucking ironic since there’s no way you can be an adult yourself. Why they even let you in here in the first place is a damn mystery.”

Izuku lets out a controlled breath. This is familiar to him. Painfully familiar. The man’s got a point, but it doesn’t mean he’s not an ass. He’s just an ass who’s right, that’s all. “Why didn’t you take the job? I know they offered it to you.”

The man grunts, smacking at Izuku’s arm once more to make him loosen his grip. “Because it didn’t pay enough. I knew it would go to shit. It’s UA after all, they’ve got pretty tight security. See where all the other scum went?”

Of course it’s about the money. Izuku isn’t surprised. But hearing him talk about the attack as if it was just another cash-out opportunity for him makes something in Izuku’s blood boil.

His classmates could have died. His teachers, his mentor could have died. Almost did die, in fact.

Izuku tilts his head, and it’s almost predatory-like. “As of this moment I consider you a part of that scum, so watch it. Honestly, I don’t care that you chose not to take the job. The issue here is you didn't tell any of the Club's officials about it. You didn't tell me." He leans closer, aware of how everyone else in the bar seems to hold their breath. "Everyone knows how I feel about UA."

This closeness seems to make the criminal uncomfortable. "I don't know what the fuck you want me to tell you. You've got a fetish for choking people or something? Let me down!"

Izuku tightens his grip once more, effectively shutting him up. That's his line to say. Only Izuku can make dirty jokes like that to make people flush.

As he glares at the man's face and tries to pick out some hidden emotions to use against him, Izuku's mind wanders. It would be so easy. One for All is humming inside him, but not in a good way. It feels wrong. He's the one with the upper hand right now. He's the one with the control.

It scares Izuku how much he likes it.

"Rabbit. Remember your oath."

The calm voice comes from the woman on the other side of the counter. She's the one who gives Izuku his paychecks. She's always been really nice to him. But despite his respect for her, he could still give a shit about the oath right now. The rules about not fighting in the building and not harming one of their own only apply to other members. This man gave up his right to be called a member of the Underground Club the moment he decided to let that info on the USJ slip by.

"I think it's this guy who should be remembering the oath," he murmurs, but he forces himself to calm down anyways.

The room is deathly quiet, like the moment before the next intake of breath. They're all waiting on his next move. He knows that not one of them would be able to stop him from harming this monster in his grasp, not that any of them would even try.

The man is turning purple now, and there's a panic so fresh in his gaze that Izuku feels himself start to tense up again at the familiarity of it.

He knows the man is scared shitless, but of what? Of what he'll do to him? Does he think he'll torture him or something?

The fear of suffering is worse than suffering itself. It twists in the gut like a hot knife, shrill as a cicada, fastidious as it is incessantly, obsessively overbearing. And Izuku understands. God he understands.

A little more power and that would be it. It would be so effortless. It's kind of ironic how fast a human life can be taken away, especially at the hands of another. It's when the man's struggling starts to slow down that Izuku blinks out of his cold rage, because suddenly there's an image at the back of his mind. All Might is there, staring at him with that disappointed frown of his, and so are Present Mic and Kacchan. Neither of them looks particularly happy. The one that hurts the most is Eraserhead, who's watching him in silence with clear disapproval.

They wouldn't want him to do this. This is—this is wrong, he remembers.

Izuku drops Criminal Bitch to the floor with a sigh, the burn that always accompanies him after using his enhancements feeling dull under his skin. It almost feels like shame.

"Count yourself lucky," Izuku forces out, shoving his hands into his pockets to hide how they tremble. "The next time you fail to report something like that, seeing as that's a responsibility of ours here at the Club, I won't be so lenient." He turns his glare onto everyone else in the crowd. There's not a phone or camera in sight, as expected. "Anyone else have anything they'd like to confess while I'm here?"

Crickets. Everyone is on edge, and for good reason, too. Rabbit never initiates fights, nor does he ever snap like this in front of people. This is a rare treat for them. It's just as scary as it is exhilarating.

Izuku turns and stalks toward the door, moving to pull his hood back over his face.

"Rabbit." The guy is struggling to right himself from his crumpled-up position on the ground. No one seems to be helping him; professionals do, in fact, have standards. He's rubbing at the marks on his throat that'll surely turn into bruises soon. He waits until he has Izuku's full attention before continuing, voice slow, as if truly damning him. "Go to hell."

Izuku pauses. Works his jaw.

"I'll meet you there."

When you're homeless, things change.

You no longer feel safe; you no longer have a warm bed waiting for you after a particularly hard day; you no longer know where your next meal will come from—the list can go on. That's just how it is, though, fighting to survive.

Surviving isn't the same thing as living. That distinction is important to make.

But in all honesty, leaving his father's side wasn't a huge change for Izuku. He never felt at home back there, he never felt secure. So when the time came, homeless was a term he already felt acquainted with.

When he was still living with this father, he wasn't safe. The bed in his room was never warm or comforting; it was a prison. He felt trapped there, contained. Food always served as a reward for his good behavior, not as a right. If he made progress with his training or did something that would please All for One, the quality and quantity of the food he was given would increase. This privilege would be taken away at any moment, however. Father's moods constantly changed back then, and the man never thought twice about taking his displeasure out on the son he knew wouldn't fight back.

After his escape, the fear remained inside his gut, as did the dread. He's never managed to shake those feelings off, even now, no matter how irrational they are or how utterly pathetic they make him feel.

For Izuku, the only major change being homeless brought upon him was that he had to learn how to enjoy time alone. He also had to learn how to live alone. While he was always treated like dirt by the majority of his makeshift family, his father was still there, always looming over his shoulder. The dark shadow that lurked around every corner and dared him to disobey. Izuku was never left alone for long, if only because All for One knew Izuku would do something he shouldn't the second he was given the chance. Kurogiri was always the saving grace in those times; the only one that cared and tended to Izuku's wounds when the boy could barely even stand after training. See, Izuku knew how to survive then, but he didn't know how to live.

Enjoying time alone, learning how to live alone—those are things Izuku has never been good at, things that he's never been privy to due to his father's strictness, but he's been managing so far.

He's been okay. His accomplishments speak for themselves. He's not technically homeless now, either. Hasn't been for three years, just about. The first few months after his escape was the hardest. Despite living in Japan for all his life, a place that should've been familiar to him after all that time, he remembers feeling incredibly lost and scared while standing in the middle of a crowded street after finally burning that hellhole to the ground, the city lights blinding him as he spun around in the middle of that intersection. It was his first taste of freedom after so, so long. The feeling was nothing short of euphoric. And even now, having been out of his father's clutches for a while, he can hardly believe he made it.

He didn't really expect his plan to work, so at that moment he didn't know what to do. That was the issue then: taking the next step. Trying to find some semblance of normal after his entire life was upended.

But back to the point. He has a home now, it's just not official or legal. Just because he doesn't have hot water or electricity without his generator doesn't mean anything. Again, he's been managing.

Exhaustion isn't new to him either. He can never afford to let his guard down, not as Rabbit or as Midoriya Izuku. It'd be stupid and completely illogical; he was taught better than that.

Hm. I haven't visited Ms. Hanako in a while. I should do that tomorrow.

Kacchan has been angrily blowing up his phone throughout the day, and Izuku is a little ashamed to admit that he's been ignoring the notifications. He's been on a rampage for the past twenty-four hours, hunting down the rest of the fools that knew about the USJ attack and failed to say anything. He's gotten to eight so far; which means that this one is lucky number nine. And speaking of—

"Fifteen seconds before street arrival."

AINA's voice crackles in his ear, Izuku immediately straightening up. He's standing on a walkway between two buildings, overlooking the street three stories beneath his feet. His target is currently in a car chase with a ton of police on his tail, not that that's going to stop Izuku from getting his point across. Petty Bitch is ahead of the cop cars by a couple miles, so Izuku has plenty of time to do what he needs to do before they catch up.

He hears it before he sees it: the screech of tires against asphalt as a car (most likely stolen) veers onto the street, smoke coming out of the side. It must've been damaged by one of the cops a few minutes prior. Izuku watches the scene with mild disinterest, the wind whipping at the bunny ears on his hood as he stands on the overhang. The city is dark at this time, with no lights beside the faint streetlamps around them. Izuku stands, eerily still and silent, as the car speeds closer. It looks to be going over sixty miles an hour, and the criminal is about five hundred feet away. AINA tells him how long it'll take for the car to be right below him, and he hums in affirmation, slightly disgruntled. His own calculation was off by half a second.

Over two hundred feet. Just a little longer.

One for All thrums under his skin, the slightest hint of red lightning zipping around his body and illuminating his figure in the otherwise dark street. His eyes glow scarlet, piercing into Petty Bitch's soul from even this far away. He must have noticed him by now, but the car doesn't slow down. To the criminal, it's either Rabbit or the police: the answer should be easy, really. And yet, despite Izuku's worsening reputation, the man chooses wrong.

Izuku takes in an exasperated breath, feeling the rush of air around him, and steps off the ledge.

It's kind of funny how Petty Bitch screams like a little girl once Izuku lands on the hood, steel-toed boots leaving large dents in the reinforced metal. The impact stings and runs up the boy's bones, but he's too far gone to care about a little pain. He rears back an arm and plunges his fist directly into the windshield (this is the second time he’s ruined one in the past twenty hours, his mind gleefully supplies), and grabs onto the steering wheel. Petty Bitch screeches, pulling his hands back just in time as Izuku yanks the wheel from its socket and carelessly throws it off somewhere to the side.

Steering should only be for people who deserve it, Izuku thinks mockingly, right before the criminal slams on the brakes and sends the vigilante flying back. He rolls when he hits the ground, jabbing the sharp end of his bōstaff into the asphalt to slow his momentum, the friction causing orange and yellow sparks to bite at his hand.

When he looks back up, the car door is being flung open, Loser Bitch stumbling out of it with all the grace and desperation of a dying man.

“Ooh,” Izuku calls out, “we've got a runner!”

He pulls out his grappling hook and aims it at the yellow-haired man. The wire wraps around him quickly, causing him to stumble and face-plant into the ground now that his arms are stuck to his sides. Izuku reels him in like a very large fish, smirking to himself all the while with one hand in his pockets. He’s casual about it, quiet. He doesn’t make a sound. Doesn't need to.

He knows silence is scarier.

“Wait, wait! You gotta let me go, dude, I didn’t—”

Izuku kicks him in the jaw, a resounding crack sounding throughout the air. It shuts the man up instantly, making Izuku scoff. The wire retracts from Loser Bitch's body and recedes back into the gun, which goes straight into Izuku's jacket. “I don't have much time, so you should probably listen carefully. I'm not gonna repeat myself.” Izuku grips his hair and pins him to the ground, making sure he won't run. “I know who you are, and I know what you did. You're pretty smart, so I'm sure you know why I'm here. Rumors spread fast.”

“I—I didn't do anything! I wasn't even at that damn school, you gotta believe me!”

“I do believe you. But that's the problem, isn't it? You didn't do anything.” His grip tightens in the man’s hair, and Izuku presses his face further into the concrete. The pained grunt that follows only adds fuel to Izuku’s barely contained anger. The boy yanks him up and sends him crashing into the side of the car, Petty Bitch sliding down it with a choked cry. Blood is leaking like a faucet from his nose, and Izuku tips his head to the side, still holding onto the yellow hair. “Twenty-three. That's how many were injured. Twenty of them were students, mind you.”

The guy wipes at his face frantically. “What does that have to do with me?”

“Alright, I guess I overestimated your intelligence. You might need some more incentive.” Izuku lets go of the man’s head and, in a swift motion, grabs his elbow and snaps it backward. The criminal's scream pierces the air, sharp and sudden, as his arm is inverted.

Izuku forces himself not to flinch at the sight of the mangled limb, and with a start he realizes the noise will attract attention. On top of that, there must be less than a minute before the cops round the corner. I'm running out of time.

The man's scream turns into a sob, and Izuku lets the arm fall to the ground uselessly. "It'll be fine," he says coolly. "They'll fix that up before taking you to jail. But I'm still not hearing an answer, so perhaps that wasn't enough."

To his credit, Petty Criminal quiets down instantly, his head snapping up to stare at the vigilante with wide eyes. If he didn't before, he definitely knows who he is now. "You, you are—"

Izuku hums. "Beautiful, a genius, immensely talented—"

"Dangerous," the man interrupts, and Izuku pouts.

"Do you want me to do your right arm next?" It's a tease, more of a bluff—Izuku isn't that cruel, not even remotely—but it gets the desired response.

The loser jolts. "No! I get it, I should've said something, okay? I was just scared! You have to understand. I couldn't snitch. I wanted to, but they'd kill me!"

Izuku narrows his eyes, frustration settling like fire in his stomach. At least it's a reason other than I just didn't want to get caught by the pro heroes. Doesn't make it right, but it's something. Fear can do a lot to people.

"The first police car has arrived," AINA warns. Just as she says that, Izuku can hear the distant sound of sirens. Damn. He has to wrap this up. He's already taking too long.

"Scared, huh?" Izuku crouches down, making sure he's eye level with the criminal. The street lamp behind him outlines his figure and leaves everything else shadowed. Only his eyes have light; the dark red a stark contrast to the darkness. "Imagine how those students felt."

The man opens his mouth to speak, but Izuku's fist meets his face and knocks him out cold. His head hangs limply to the side, and Izuku rubs at his knuckles. Well, that was eventful.

"AINA, you know the drill. Send a text to Tsukauchi detailing this loser's crimes. You can shut down for the night after that."

"Of course. Enjoy yourself, Izuku."

The screen on his forearm goes black, and Izuku makes a mental note to charge her when he gets back to the apartment.

As he turns and runs farther into the city, leaving the unconscious man far behind for the cops to find, Izuku is suddenly reminded of familiar words, words that have been drilled into his mind since the very beginning of his vigilantism.

Cowardice is a sin, so choke on it.

It's four hours into his patrol that he sees him. His tall silhouette is intimidating, even when he's simply standing on the roof of a building. It's the one where they usually meet on Friday nights, but to say Izuku is surprised to see him is an understatement. He still has his bandages on, so why is he even out here? It's not even a Friday! It's Saturday night!

Well, Sunday morning, now.

Izuku pushes away his hesitance and resigns to his fate. It's clear the man has been waiting for him to show up.

The moment Izuku's foot hits the edge of the roof, he's wrapped so tightly in Eraserhead's capture weapon that he can hardly breathe, much less move. With a hiss, he's yanked forward to come face-to-face with the underground hero. Izuku can tell he's furious even with the bandages covering his face and arms. Which also begs the question—how the fuck is he even using his scarf? He's not even touching it! It's like he's moving it with his fucking mind.

Eraserhead's quirk is activated, so Izuku can't rely on Boost to get him out of this one. Not that it matters much; he's way too tired to do much of anything but hang there.

"You have some explaining to do, kid." Eraserhead starts, his voice tight with anger. "With the shit you pulled Friday night, I have half a mind to drag you back to the station and throw you in jail myself."

Shit. Tsukauchi probably told him about his latest stunt. Either that or he saw it on the news. Izuku wouldn't be surprised either way. "If you're this uspet over it, why didn't you just text me or something? You could've just—" Izuku cuts himself off with a dramatic gasp and looks pointedly at the hero's bandaged arms. "Oh my god! I'm so sorry! That was so insensitive of me."

The malice radiating off of Eraserhead's body is almost suffocating as he comes closer, hair pulling free from his bun and lifting towards the sky. "This isn't a joke, Rabbit. I've had enough of your games. Whatever this is you're doing, it's going to stop. Right now."

Funny, that's exactly what Tsukauchi said.

Izuku doesn't voice that thought aloud, though. "Can you let me go?" He asks instead. It's difficult to think with all of the pressure on his limbs.

"No," the hero replies, tightening the fabric around him—a punishment for even asking. "Not until you explain to me what the hell you were thinking, letting yourself get caught like that. Do you have any idea how dangerous that was? How reckless?"

The boy rolls his eyes, glancing away. "I had everything under control. I was fine."

"Really? So you did all that for what? Fun?"

He knows about the files, he's just testing me. He is a teacher, after all. Habits never really die.

Izuku won't play into his trap though. "It gets kind of boring doing the same ol' stuff, y'know? I have to keep everyone on their toes."

"You," Eraserhead starts before stopping abruptly, patience wearing thin. He shakes his head. "Out of all the shit you've done this past year, kid, this has pissed me off the most."

"Oi! That's a bad word. You should be setting an example for the kids —ow, fuck!" Izuku glares at the man as the scarf tightens around him yet again, almost nearing the point of pain. "That's excessive force, you dick! Let me go! I'm sure some part of this is illegal!"

"Rabbit."

Izuku suddenly feels like he got full-named by a parent. There's an uncomfortable itching under his limbs now, and it doesn't help that he can't even move his hands enough to quell the irritation. He doesn't know why he's being difficult. Perhaps it's because this is the first time he's seeing Eraserhead as Rabbit since the attack, and the freshly-changed bandages on his teacher's face are bringing back his guilt tenfold. But the guilt brings with it anger, and Izuku finds himself kicking out with his legs, the only part of his body not restrained. “I’m giving you one more chance to let me go before I cut a huge chunk of this scarf off.” Izuku threatens. “I’ve done it before and will do it again.”

Eraserhead narrows his eyes and examines him, noticing the vigilante’s stiff posture and clenched fists. His gaze lingers on the boy's hood, which has dark droplets of blood smeared on one of the bunny ears. “What's going on with you?”

“I’d tell you if you’d just let me go—” Izuku falls to the ground with a yelp as the capture weapon loosens suddenly. “Okay, fine. It's like I told you, I was just having some fun. You should've seen their faces when they saw me escaping. It was very funny. 10/10, would do it again.”

The semi-honest answer doesn't seem to satisfy the man. “Funny? You think stealing government files is funny?”

“In a cosmic sort of way, yes.” Izuku shrugs. “And besides, it’s not like they lost anything. I'm gonna give them back eventually.”

“You better.” The hero sighs and lets his Erasure wear off, his hair falling onto his shoulders in waves. He looks suddenly that much more tired. “You should know how angry the Commission is now. They're having a meeting on Tuesday to decide whether or not to send more heroes after you.”

“Oh? That's not new. Heroes chase after me all the time.”

“Heroes like Endeavor, kid. He might just go after you even without direct permission, and you know what will happen once he does.”

I'll die a fiery, gruesome death, probably.

His voice was grim, and Izuku squares his shoulders, gazing at the gravel by his feet. “Gee, thanks for the vote of confidence. And please, I don’t know why you’re making such a big deal out of this. You know, some vigilantes are burning down entire cities and working with villains in their free time. I'm practically an angel compared to them. Cut me some slack."

Near-silent footsteps. Izuku forces himself not to flinch away as Eraserhead moves closer to him. The air is thick with an emotion that Izuku can't identify yet.

"I want to talk about those files you took," the hero says finally, carefully, completely ignoring his previous comment. "Some of the villains listed on there have relations to quite a few of the criminals you caught for Tsukauchi earlier today."

He knows what I'm doing. It's only been a day and he's put the pieces together.

Izuku looks up, expecting his teacher to look judgmental, but the man only looks perturbed.

It sets Izuku's nerves on fire.

"Don't lecture me," he growls, spinning on his heel to face the city below. "You'd be doing the same thing if you weren't injured. You have to be feeling the same way after what happened to you and your class."

"My class?" Aizawa steps around him to catch his gaze, and Izuku hates how the hero's voice changes slightly on the word my, as if the man had expected a different word to be used there. "What happened on Wednesday isn't your fault, kid, and going after the ones who are only partially responsible for it isn't going to change anything. I know you know that."

Izuku shrugs off the man's words. "It'll prevent something like that from happening again. And they're criminals as it is, so why I'm bringing them in is irrelevant. They'd be put in jail eventually even without my involvement."

"I wasn't talking about them."

It's the gentle way he says it that makes Izuku angry. Like he's trying to calm a rabid animal. It's easy to see what he's trying to say: it's not going to change how you feel. It's just going to make things worse.

Christ, he can't just have one day to do his job, can he? Rabbit was born to do exactly this—rid the streets of monsters. To make sure that criminals know that there are boundaries that they just can't cross without consequences. If Izuku stops now, it'll tell everyone that what those fools did is right. That they got off scot-free. Yeah. That's not going to happen. Izuku sucks in an even breath. “I'm just cleaning up the city.”

“Rabbit—”

“You almost died.” At the man’s questioning gaze, the boy continues with a fire burning inside him. “You won't be getting out of those casts for at least another week. Thirteen nearly died, as did one of your students in the flood zone. If I'm not mistaken, All Might was injured pretty heavily, too. Do you really want those criminals to be left unpunished?”

Eraserhead just continues to stare down at him, his expression one of faint disappointment.

Izuku clenches his shaking hands into fists, burning holes into the ground before him with his eyes. “Don’t look at me like that.”

“I’m not here to lecture you.”

“Then why are you here? To tell me how screwed up everything is? To finally put an end to all this and take me in? Which is it?”

The boots in Izuku’s vision move a few steps closer, and his teacher's looming figure, his mere presence, is like a hot iron down his back. “I’m here because I care, Rabbit.” His voice is a little softer now, still just as gruff, but just a tiny bit lighter. It reminds Izuku of dark rooms filled with static. This would be a lot easier if Izuku knew whether or not the hero actually meant what he’s saying. “And I want to warn you that you’ll only end up hurting yourself in your search for justice. Getting yourself caught in order to get some pointless files is one thing, but this? This is dangerous.”

Izuku forces back the heat rising in his throat. Now is not the time to cough up blood. He needs to get back soon to take another one of his pills. “You don’t think I know that?”

Eraserhead shakes his head. “No, I don’t think you do, kid. I think you’re blinded by whatever’s fueling you to do what you think is right. I think you’re going to end up losing yourself.”

Losing himself? Izuku stays silent this time, because he’s right. He’s always fucking right.

The hero continues after a few more moments, as if to let the previous words sink in. “You’re going to hurt yourself, Rabbit. And I think you know that, too.”

That’s nothing new.

Izuku scoffs a little and turns away even more. “Thank you for letting me know what I do, and how I do it. Wasn’t aware.”

His teacher sighs. “Kid—”

“No,” Izuku interrupts, voice low, loaded like a gun with a single bullet left in the chamber. “We’re not doing this. We’re not friends.”

The older hero takes a sharp breath in, and in the silence Izuku can hear the sounds of the city below them. He uses the familiarity to calm the fire burning underneath his skin.

“I’m sorry, Eraser,” Izuku says, voice tripping over the nickname, so worn and fond and useless. “It’s not a good time for either one of us. I’ll see you later.”

He doesn’t wait for the man to reply as he walks to the edge of the roof, planning to simply disappear from his watchful view. But then something sharp pierces Izuku's heart, and the boy finds himself swallowing back a watery cough just as Eraserhead speaks.

“Midoriya?”

The name hangs in the air, breaking through the walls Izuku has so carefully built around his mind. He pauses, breath caught in his throat. The air is chilly, as it always is at night. Izuku’s curls tickle his forehead from where they peek out of his hood.

So he does know. Or at least has a pretty good idea.

There’s a small part of Izuku that wants to just say yes? To turn around and admit it all, to get help, because god does he need it.

But there’s something stopping him, something that he can’t identify. And it’s telling him not yet. Maybe not ever.

He twists his head around to look at the hero, who’s still staring at him with that sad, awful look on his face. “Isn’t that one of your students? The one that fought the Nomu?”

Eraserhead doesn’t say anything, doesn’t have to.

Izuku turns back around and starts away again. “Maybe if he’d been faster you wouldn’t be in those casts.”

“Kid.”

He doesn’t turn around this time.

It’s pure chance that he ends up at a liquor store.

Eraserhead’s words are still sharp in his mind, playing on loop like a broken record, and the guilt he's been feeling ever since the attack has made way for panic. He's ashamed in himself, ashamed for being so selfish. But at the same time, he can't find it in himself to change his actions. He still has two more people he has to pay a quick visit to. He's gone this far, it'd be unfair to treat these two any differently than the others.

There's only one pair of eyes on his back this time, but it's one that he's familiar with. This one is different than the others. The quirk his follower holds is so, so familiar. Dangerous, but not specifically for Izuku.

His watcher slips away, leaving him alone, which leads Izuku here, standing outside of a building he shouldn’t even be looking at.

It’s a quiet little place on the corner of a street, maybe a little rundown, but what can you do? He’s been here twice before; it seems liquor stores are high targets for armed robbery, so Izuku finds himself at places like this a lot. This time, however, he’s here for a different reason than stopping crime.

He can’t help the way his feet carry him inside. The manager—a kind man named Yousuke who looks a little older than his years, but with eyes that are still soft and a smile that instantly puts Izuku at ease—recognizes him. Well, he recognizes Rabbit, not Izuku himself.

He gives him a knowing, sad look, and places a hand on his shoulder once Izuku gets to the front with his item. He seems to get it without even knowing him. Yousuke doesn't ask for ID. It's obvious he wouldn't get it, secret identity and all, but Izuku doesn't miss the slight disapproving downturn to his lips as he bags it for him. He doesn't ask for money, either, but Izuku slides the wadded up cash across the counter anyway.

Missy has everything she needs and wants; he wouldn't be here if that wasn't the case. He made sure of that before coming here and wasting the last little bit of his money. He hasn't been doing his jobs recently, which means he's going to have to resort to stealing from the rich again in a few days. He can treat himself just this once.

Though this doesn't quite feel like a treat. More of a need. A hunger.

Izuku leaves the store with a knot in his stomach and a nice bottle of vodka curled protectively into his chest, jumping onto the nearest roof while Yousuke watches, sad, as another one starts down a road that he's seen so, so many travel down.

When he gets home, Missy is sleeping soundly. Not a thing is out of place, and yet he knows something is wrong just by stepping inside the doorway. His answer lies in the form of a small piece of paper crumpled up on his desk. The handwriting is sloppy, but Izuku knows who it's from regardless. If the ominous words aren't proof enough, than the dried blood on the corner of the note is.

They're coming for you.

Izuku wants to douse his follower in gasoline and light them on fire, but he instead pours a little bit of the vodka into a nearby mug, not caring that there's some leftover coffee in it from who knows how long ago. It's actually better that way; he's not a fan of drinking vodka neat.

This is wrong, he knows. He's too young, and he really shouldn't, and once he starts now he knows he might not ever be able to go back, but he just can't sleep. Can't get his mind to turn off. Every time he blinks he sees All for One's grin, the manic light in his brother's eye—he can't sleep, and he's not coping, and he's not okay, and maybe. Just maybe. He can find a little relief at the bottom of his cracked Mirko mug.

It tastes like shit. It's bitter and it burns and he's choking and for one long second he's back there, suspended in air, suffocating and clawing at the large hand wrapped around his throat as he desperately tries to break free in time to stop his brother's hand from touching Tsuyu's face. Black dots corner the edges of his vision, and all he can see is the blood pooling around Aizawa's limp form, filling up the miniature crater around his head and body, Mineta's petrified face, All Might's trembling form—but then he can breathe, as the burn starts to fade, as it melts into something more bearable, a warm and heavy weight in his stomach. It works loose the knot that's been there since his meeting with Eraserhead, and he can breathe. He still sputters a bit, but by the second pour he's figured out how to take it slow and easy so that it flows over his tongue, down the back of his throat. He doesn't quite enjoy it, but he's starting to calm down. His senses are dialing down, from a thirteen all the way to a nice, calm six.

Extract doesn't bother him much when he's like this.

The world is fuzzy around the edges, fuzzy and soft in a way that's inviting. Like one of those good dreams (has he ever had good dreams? He can't remember) that make you want to roll over and fall back asleep even though your alarm is buzzing in your ear and you just know you have to get up and face the music, but just not yet.

He's still going strong by the time the second mug is done, as his enhancements make it nearly impossible to get drunk like this, but that doesn't mean he keeps going. The edge is gone, and that's all he needed. He can bear it all for a little while longer.

He falls onto his chair and rests his head on his desk, the coolness calming his headache just slightly. He needs to work. He still has things he needs to do before the sun comes up. He grabs a random journal from the pile stacked on the shelf and turns on his monitors. He has to finish this report for one of his clients or else he won't get paid. He can't afford that, not now.

"You haven't slept for over forty-six hours."

Izuku frowns at AINA's voice. He doesn't remember putting her on charge, but oh well. He's not doing very well right now. Wait, how long has he been writing? He swears he just opened his notebook and logged onto his computer. Also, when was the last time he ate? Drinking with an empty stomach isn't a very good idea. "Hush. I'm working right now."

"But studies say that you should get a minimum of six hours of sleep every __"

"Mute." He fists his hair, realizing that maybe drinking wasn't the best idea with his sickness. Every breath drags at the inside of his throat like daggers, and he pops another pill into his mouth. Spinning around in his rolling chair, he sees Missy staring at him with narrowed eyes. She jumps off the couch and treads closer, jumping onto his desk to get right in his face. It's that little action that sends Izuku spiraling even further.

Did I wake her up? Is she trying to comfort me? Fuck.

“I hate myself so much,” he whispers, surprising even himself. It sounds choked. Cracked. Aching.

It’s not quite a cry, and it’s not quite steady either. Is this what he's come to now?

The cat paws at his nose. It’s gentle and not at all forceful, and Izuku lets out a watery laugh.

It’s like the feline is trying to tell him something but doesn’t know how. There’s a look in her eye, steady and kind, and Izuku thinks faintly that he’s probably going insane if he’s getting this emotional over a cat.

That's okay, the look seems to say, I’ll love you enough for the both of us.

Chapter Notes

To say Izuku is tired is an understatement.

His entire life he's been under the impression that alcohol wakes you up. It's a stimulant, right? So why wouldn't it? But right now, as he's frantically running through UA's open gates and scrambling for the entrance, he feels like the living incarnation of death. And not the fun kind of death—the sickly, sluggish, shriveled up kind of death. He feels disgusting.

It turns out that alcohol is actually more of a depressant than a stimulant, a fact that AINA helpfully told him after he downed half the bottle of vodka the night before. So yeah. He's feeling just fantastic.

He barely manages to make it to class on time, almost slipping as he rounds the corner thirty seconds before the last bell. He throws open the door and thanks the heavens that Aizawa isn't there yet.

Being late for a second time would've been embarrassing. Izuku barely managed to take a shower and put on his school uniform this morning, so there's no way he could've handled a lecture from Iida or, god forbid, Aizawa himself. In fact, all social interaction should be kept to a minimum for the next week.

It's for the best.

His head is pounding, his body trembling as his metabolism works through his latest coffee monstrosity. Today's concoction (and hangover cure) was the most fun to make by far. Izuku put a generous scoop of coffee grounds into the machine this morning and poured two Monster energy drinks—both being different flavors—into the place where the water would normally go. He added in a bottle of Five Hour Energy and then some sugar, though the sugar could've very well been cocaine—he wouldn't have been able to tell the difference in his current state of mind.

It doesn't taste half bad, which is surprising. He's definitely going to be making it again.

"Jesus Christ," Kacchan hisses, turning around in his chair to glare at him. Huh. Izuku doesn't remember walking to his seat. "Are you even sober right now, Shitku?"

Does he really look that bad? He took a shower this morning, so he thought he would be in the clear. It appears not.

"I am..." He pauses, scrunching up his nose to find the right words. "Moderately functional."

"I'll take that as a no."

Izuku is about to reply when Aizawa walks into the room, his steps noticeably a little steadier than before. It's probably a front, though.

"As you all know," Aizawa starts, hobbling towards his podium, "the Sports Festival is in two weeks. Regular classwork will be postponed from here on out to help you prepare for it." His gaze rakes over each individual student when they all erupt into cheers, and Izuku fights back a shiver when the unnerving glare lingers on him before moving down the line. "We'll be focusing on honing our skills until then. But before that, I have another announcement."

The mood dampens immediately at the ominous tone. Everyone is anxious, but Izuku is too far gone to feel the same way. Do fish get thirsty?

"Principal Nezu has decided it'd be in our best interest to host parent-teacher conferences in light of the attack. It's to put your families at ease, so to speak. We've already received concerns from other parents outside of the hero course, so this doesn't just apply to you all." As if on cue, the overhead projector flickers on. "It'll be held a week after the festival, so mark this date and time on your calendars."

It's only when Kacchan throws a balled-up piece of paper at his cheek that Izuku zones back in, and fuck. This is—this is probably not good. It's a parent-teacher conference, meaning a parent has to be there; an actual person. Izuku can't just forge signatures this time.

Yeah, this isn't good at all. He needs to nip this in the bud. Immediately.

Izuku, against his better judgment, hangs back after morning classes are finished. He was too lost in thought to actually take any notes, much less pay attention, and he only hopes that none of his teachers noticed. But he can't be bothered with that right now; he has to come up with a plan.

The lunch bell has stopped ringing by the time Izuku convinces Kacchan to go on ahead, and he watches as his friend scares Iida and Uraraka away from him as well. He sends the pair what he hopes is a reassuring smile (but what probably comes out more like a grimace) and waits for his teacher to notice him first.

It doesn't take long.

"What is it, Midoriya?" Aizawa isn't even looking at him, he's just carefully pulling papers off of the desk with his capture weapon and shuffling them into a folder. Izuku inwardly marvels at the level of skill his teacher is showing so effortlessly. It's clear, however, that Aizawa is doing this on purpose. It's almost like he's ignoring Izuku. But why?

The boy's brain is working at a pace slower than Internet Explorer, so it's only a few long seconds into the silence that Izuku notices the elephant in the room. Oh. Fuck. Yeah, this is not the best idea. How could Izuku have forgotten what his teacher said to him just a day before?

"Midoriya."

Aizawa's tone is exasperated, shaking Izuku out of his stupor. He clenches his hands into fists at his side and puts on his metaphorical mask. "My dad is on a business trip in America, sensei. He won't be back until next month." The words taste foul on his tongue. Lying to Aizawa is always the hardest. "I don't think he'll be able to attend the conference."

The man stops for a moment, seemingly lost in thought, before resuming his task at a much slower rate. "It's an important meeting, Midoriya. Is there anyone else that can step in? Like your mother?"

Extract stirs at the last word, and Izuku does a full-body flinch. Doesn't Aizawa know that his mother isn't in the picture? He has a feeling his teacher asked that deliberately.

"No, sir."

Aizawa finally straightens up and glances at him, setting every nerve in Izuku's body on edge. "Who are you staying with?"

"A neighbor." The words are casual and practiced. At least Izuku's last remaining braincell is pulling its weight.

“Hm.”

The folder is slid neatly into Aizawa’s bag as the man continues to pack his belongings with his scarf. He’s biding his time, Izuku thinks. He's coming up with what to say.

After a few moments that Izuku spends anxiously glancing at the clock (Kacchan gets angry if he cuts his eating time short), Aizawa stops and levels him with a blank stare. “If you really don’t have anyone who can make it, I’ll have to give you the paperwork I’d normally give your parent. Make sure to get it signed as soon as possible. You’ll still be required to attend the meeting, however, parent or not.”

That’s fine. It’s not ideal, but Izuku can force himself to sit and listen to Aizawa drone on about UA and his grades for thirty minutes if he has to. It's going to be tough, but he can deal.

Izuku assures his teacher that he’ll be there and get the paperwork signed (forging his father’s signature is something of a hobby for him), but his feet hesitate at the door, not letting him leave.

Should he... say something? About last night? No, that would be stupid. Izuku tried to play it off then, as unbelievable as his acting probably was, so going back on that now—the morning after it happened—would probably make him look incredibly stupid. And childish. And indecisive. All the things that Izuku actually is.

Sensei, I...

What could he even say? Nothing, really. He doubts Aizawa would want him to say anything that’s not a direct confession anyway. If he’s not bringing it up, Izuku shouldn’t either.

The boy glances back and jerks when he notices Aizawa staring right at him, face shadowed. He can’t leave the classroom fast enough then, and it’s not long before he’s seated at his table next to Kacchan, his own bento box in front of him. It’s not often that he brings stuff from home for lunch, but yesterday he bought some cheap canned foods on sale, and he figured he might as well eat it here since he never feels like eating anytime else.

Who knew that alcohol makes you hungry as fuck?

“Do you even sleep anymore?” Kacchan hisses at him, nose wrinkled in disgust as he watches his friend stare sightlessly at the wall as he eats. Izuku doesn’t know what he’s talking about. He feels fine, and just because he looks like he'll fall over at the faintest breeze doesn't mean he will.

Izuku shrugs. "I scheduled a nap for a week from next Tuesday."

"Fucking hell, Deku." Kacchan shoves him in the side as he angrily shovels a piece of fish into his mouth. "If you don't start sleeping I'll just knock you out every day after school."

Izuku doesn't doubt the validity of that statement. "Such chivalry," he mocks, bringing another bite of food to his lips.

It's only then that Kacchan stops suddenly, eyes narrowing as he gets a good look at his friend's chopsticks. Izuku quirks a brow and frowns, silently wondering why his mood changed so quickly.

"Deku." Kacchan sounds resigned. "Is that cat food?"

The world comes to a screeching halt around him. Iida and Uraraka, who were previously in a conversation about one of their next classes, turn to stare at him.

Izuku glances at his bento box, then at Kacchan. "Huh?" He says intelligently.

Now that he pointed it out, Izuku can definitely tell that it's Missy's wet food. He must've opened the can this morning and mistaken it for one of the human foods he bought at the store yesterday.

Kacchan is howling in laughter beside him, but Izuku is too busy rethinking life.

I ate almost the whole can. Why did no one stop me. Nothing matters anymore.

As Izuku feels his soul descend to the fifth level of hell, he's suddenly hit with a terrifying question.

What did I feed Missy?

Shouta doesn't know quite when he figured it out.

There's just too many details now that support his musings for him to know exactly when it first started. Over the past year, he's fought alongside Rabbit hundreds of times. He's talked with him, joked with him, and even shared some of his own stories with the kid. He knew about Midoriya, too, through many different people. Tsukauchi, for one, and then Hizashi and All Might.

Granted, he didn't know until the entrance exam that the kid his husband talked a lot about was actually Midoriya, but still.

Shouta knew, even from the beginning, how similar Midoriya and Rabbit were. And so maybe, at the very back of his mind, he's always known about the connection between the two.

But the more he thinks about it, the more he wonders. He's sitting at the dining table in his apartment, the room dark except for the one light shining in the kitchen. Rabbit's file is spread out in front of him, certain sections of the papers and reports highlighted and circled. Midoriya's own file lays, unmarked, in the center of it all.

So, so many details, so many clues that have been left behind for him to find, whether intentionally or not. Shouta feels stupid now that it's all laid out in front of him.

He remembers a notebook falling open onto his lap, remembers the multitude of notes that glared back at him when he briefly read through its contents.

"You do this stuff for fun?"

"It's more of a hobby."

Midoriya gave him a detailed report on the USJ attack despite Shouta not asking for one. At the time he chalked it up to the boy being restless and guilty. He assumed it was a coping mechanism, as sick as it sounds, and he didn't question Midoriya further, but now he can see that there's more to it than he previously thought.

Shouta gave the book to Nezu after reading through it, and the mammal had instantly gone into his sadistic mode, paws flipping the pages as his beady eyes scanned over the scrawled words at the speed of light.

He moves to stand, but Nezu clears his throat, returning to his calm demeanor. "One more thing before you go, Aizawa. What are your thoughts on Midoriya Izuku?"

"My thoughts?" Shouta echoes gruffly, eyes narrowing.

What is he planning?

"I merely ask because I have found some discrepancies concerning Midoriya's role in the USJ attack and his report on it." Nezu holds his chin with a paw, twirling a pen almost thoughtfully. "There are bits of information in here that, logically speaking, Midoriya should not know, or even have access to. It is possible he gained second-hand accounts from his peers, however even then the level of intellect shown here is nothing short of remarkable."

Shouta feels the hairs at the back of his neck stand up. "He is very thorough in his analyses," he agrees slowly. "I assumed Midoriya must have put the pieces together during the attack."

Nezu hums, letting the pen fall back onto his desk. "It's very interesting to me how my access to some of the USJ's camera footage has been—how do I put this? Revoked, at a time like this."

And that gains Shouta's full attention. He straightens up in his chair, eyes wide. "You can't review the videos?"

"Don't get too upset, Aizawa," Nezu waves him off. "It's only one part of it, though regrettably the part I looked forward to seeing the most, as it would've helped a lot in filling in the blanks regarding Shigaraki's motives. I am, however, concerned that this happened just a day or so before Midoriya handed you this report."

And oh, the pieces are starting to fall together. It's clear what Nezu is trying to get at.

Shouta clenches his hands. "Are you suggesting that Midoriya has something to do with it?"

Are you suggesting that he's the traitor, goes unsaid, but not unheard.

Nezu smiles, but it's too pointy and cruel to ever put Shouta at ease. "Of course not. I am merely widening the range of possibilities. I am sure Midoriya is one of the brightest in your class, and his notes on the attack will be of great use to this investigation. I just cannot help but wonder how he obtained this level of information."

Something cold settles at the bottom of Shouta's stomach. He wants to throw up.

It sounds plausible, and that's what makes it worse. The idea of there being a traitor is sickening, even more so at said traitor being one of his students. Being Midoriya, more specifically.

A kid that he invited to this school. A kid that he pushed to try out for the exam.

"What are you going to do?" Shouta breathes out, jaw tight.

"At the moment, absolutely nothing," Nezu answers. "There is nothing to do without concrete evidence. I do suggest, however, that you keep a close eye on your student, Aizawa. He is very peculiar, indeed. Though I sincerely doubt he is the traitor, it seems to me there is more to this story than we would prefer there to be."

Shouta nodded then, recognizing the dismissal. And while the idea of there being a traitor seems less and less plausible with each passing day, he can't help but shiver when he's reminded of the boy.

Midoriya Izuku is dangerous, that's for sure.

There has always been something about him that constantly has Shouta on edge. As if the trouble he threatens to create is of an entirely different sort than Shouta's used to. He thinks of Rabbit, at how the vigilante fights and talks to criminals every day he goes out on patrol, as if there's a certain thrill to it that keeps him going. And the fact that Shouta can recognize this in both Rabbit and Midoriya is concerning.

If only he saw it all sooner.

Shouta watches the way Midoriya interacts with his peers. The kid is not as innocent as everyone thinks. The people that claim otherwise haven't seen what his notebooks contain or heard how he mumbles under his breath while in a daze.

Midoriya is always looking around without seeming to, eyes taking stock of his surroundings. Of course, it isn't all that unusual for young kids, especially ones who live in the heart of Japan, to be aware of their surroundings. To look around, to keep an eye out for danger.

But the boy never fully relaxes, even in the presence of pro heroes, even at UA. And now that he's thinking about it, Shouta realizes that it's almost like he's more tense in those situations.

Midoriya enjoys himself, sure. He laughs and jokes and talks with his friends like any other teenager, and yet his eyes never stop darting away. His muscles never fully relax. Every movement is always deliberate, from when he walks into class to when he eats meals at lunch to when he faces villains at inconvenient times, his expression always displeased, but not surprised. Not worried.

Never has the boy actually looked worried. Which is, well, confusing.

Shouta is willing to admit that Midoriya is something of a conundrum. The kid is on edge—nervous without actually seeming afraid of anyone. Wary. A stray dog with its hackles permanently up. Sure, you're welcome to approach. To talk. To pet. But you better be careful.

Of what, Shouta isn't sure. Will Midoriya run, or will he bite?

He tells his friends he's always cold, but Shouta knows better. He's seen when the child shifts in his clothes or adjusts his sleeves. There's cuts there, bruises and burns that no child his age should have. Shouta got a glimpse of the scarring on Midoriya's stomach that day at the police station, when the kid was out cold and the doctor gave him a quick check-over. Shouta arrived in the middle of it and immediately walked out, feeling a little queasy.

He never thought a kid could have a scar like that. He can only guess what the rest of his body looks like.

The bruises on Midoriya's arms fade away within days of the man first spotting them at school. So they're not bad, Shouta reasons. Or they're nearly healed anyway. He doesn't seem to shy away from his peers when they brush past him or hug him, but his eyes follow their every movement. He's always aware. Always ready.

Shouta might have done some light digging on Midoriya after the USJ, and he was surprised to learn that the boy's mother disappeared on him when he was just turning six. His father allegedly took him in for a couple of years before finally going for legal custody.

The only reason Shouta mentioned the boy's mother at all was to test him. Rabbit told him once before that he lives with both his parents, so he merely wanted to see Midoriya's reaction and compare his answer to previous ones.

The kid never talks about his parents. But he's never seemed overly upset when Bakugou or someone would bring up the topic of his father at lunch or during study hall. Any mention of his mother, though, and he's usually left flustered. So the hero learned very quickly to refrain himself from asking about his home life lest he wanted to make Midoriya uncomfortable.

Like today, for example.

"Who are you staying with?"

"A neighbor."

The words were too smooth, too open and falsely honest. If Shouta didn't spend years as an underground hero, he probably would have believed the lie. But he's learned to look for people's tells, and Shouta pretty quickly realized that Midoriya doesn't have any in his body language. It's his voice, and if you weren't looking for it, you wouldn't be able to tell the difference between Midoriya's lie and truth.

He's practiced in that, Shouta thinks. Deceiving.

Which means he was being deliberate. He knew exactly what he was doing and probably prepared for a question like that.

Shouta remembers his first exchange with the boy outside of school. When he escorted Midoriya home after catching him stealing some files from Tsukauchi. He remembers when the kid said that his father doesn't care what he does all day and night. The boy, instantly realizing his mistake, hurried to correct himself, arms waving in the air as if to fan the statement away. That entire conversation was peculiar. And then there's the bruises. The guarded body language.

Shouta knew, even then, what the signs were pointing to, but something didn't quite fit.

And so when he got Midoriya as a student, he wanted to press him about his parentage. But he knew that the boy wouldn't take kindly to Shouta butting into his business, so he refrained.

Everything's falling into place now, however, almost like a puzzle.

Shouta was admittedly a little out of it during the attack, but he swears he remembers some things about Midoriya's conversation with Shigaraki that just don't make sense in the slightest. On top of that, Asui apparently gave Tsukauchi a helpful recount of the two's fight since Nezu couldn't access the footage, but there were gaps in the information. Not even Midoriya himself went into too much detail about what happened.

And in a way, Shouta understands. The attack was traumatic, so it's only natural for some of the students to repress it—but it's still weird. It felt more like Midoriya was withholding the information, not that he just didn't remember or know it.

He thinks back to the knife the kid had. The knife that Tsukauchi found covered in the Nomu's blood on the ground. The one that the detective had shakily handed to him, with clear panic in his eyes, after showing him the Rabbit initials engraved on the blade. The markings were small, just above the hilt and nearly undetectable, but obviously belonging to that of the vigilante.

So they concluded then that Rabbit was at the USJ, and, unless he was one of the villains, Shouta knows that it had to have been Midoriya.

And for Midoriya to have been wielding that same knife, claiming that it belonged to one of the downed criminals? It's too good of a coincidence. The two's similar quirks. The similar build and high-pitched voices, the same bags as deep as the ocean under their eyes.

And the fighting styles.

Shouta specifically remembers how he calmed down in those minutes of fighting alongside Midoriya during the attack. Everything felt normal. Right. Aside from the fear and panic threatening to consume him at that moment, Shouta felt hopeful.

He almost had a heart attack when he saw the news last Friday night about Rabbit's escape from the police. He was waking up from a quick nap and wandering into the kitchen for some food when he heard the word Rabbit on the TV.

The fear and rage that washed over him at that moment almost knocked him off his feet, and Shouta thinks about the conversation he had with the vigilante after the stunt.

Rabbit—Midoriya?—apologized to him. Not for not being there, but for not doing his best. How could he have done his best if he wasn't there to begin with? The wording didn't sit well with Shouta. He thinks that maybe that was the straw that finally broke the camel's back.

And there's one more thing, too. On Friday morning, Shouta walked into the teacher's lounge to find All Might giggling at his phone screen. Being in a surprisingly okay mood, Shouta asked him what he was laughing about. He didn't actually expect the number one hero to answer truthfully, and he certainly didn't expect to be shown a ton of pictures of his student's cat.

A cat that has a striking resemblance to the same cat Rabbit has showed him a picture of before. The vigilante never told Shouta her name, so he didn't bother asking All Might the name of the cat on his phone to act as a comparison. But the point remained.

With everything else piling up on top of the reasons why Midoriya is probably Rabbit, the similar cats theory doesn't seem too far fetched.

Shouta glares down at the files in front of him. Why couldn't he have seen it all before? It would've saved him so many gray hairs.

"Sho?" Hizashi's voice comes from the hallway. He looks like he just woke up. "Babe, c'mon. It's late."

He doesn't fight his husband like he would've any other time, instead letting himself be dragged to their shared bedroom. His mind is still running a million miles per second.

Because the fact remains that even if Midoriya isn't actually Rabbit, his student would still have a lot of problems Shouta would need to question him about. Being a vigilante who fights crime all day and night would explain the bruises and scarring on the boy's body—so Shouta can only hope that that's the case.

If Midoriya is just Midoriya, things will become complicated, because that means he's getting his injuries from home.

That might not be too far off, though.

He's seen the way the kid's eyes gloss over, like he's seen something, like some part of him doesn't work anymore, and sometimes Shouta wonders how bright his eyes used to shine before shit started hitting the fan.

He sees the glint in the boy's gaze when he studies his classmates, who are oblivious to the whole thing. He sees the words that are on the tip of his tongue, the words that he chooses not to use. He sees how perceptive the boy is, and it scares him, because Midoriya probably knows that he knows.

Midoriya Izuku is dangerous, and Shouta is scared.

Not for what he might do to his classmates or to others—no, for what he might do to himself.

“You really think it’s him, huh?”

Shouta blinks, not realizing Hizashi was still awake. He sighs before turning over in the bed to stare at his husband. “It has to be. I’ll be surprised if it’s not.”

“It would make sense,” Hizashi concedes after a moment, yawning. “The listener is always alone at the laundromat. Always wearing the same clothes and spewing the same lie about his father. You think he lives by himself?”

And isn’t that a question? Rabbit and Midoriya have told him two differing stories regarding their life at home, so it’s hard to figure out which one is the truth. “It’s a possibility. He could’ve lied on both accounts to save his skin.”

“I can see that,” Hizashi nods thoughtfully, his long blond hair shining in the moonlight filtering in through the window.

Shouta is overcome by a sudden sense of warmth and fondness. He relaxes further into the mattress and faces Hizashi once more, voice quiet. “Can you keep an eye on him for me? I don’t think the kid has been doing well lately. You should’ve seen him the other day, ‘Zashi. I was worried.”

The voice hero’s gaze softens, and it’s not just because of his exhaustion. “‘Course I will, babe. Now please go to sleep before I throw out all the coffee. I need to take out my hearing aids.”

Shouta huffs out a laugh and tries to focus on something other than his current dilemma. The rest of his casts are coming off tomorrow, a lot earlier than he suspected. There’s a little more than a week until the festival now, and he’s already dreading that. The teachers have already started placing bets on who will win.

When Shouta finally gets his mind to shut off for a while, Hizashi is sound asleep next to him. Sighing contently, he curls up next to his husband and almost kicks one of the cats sleeping at his feet. He feels strangely calm all of a sudden, and yet he can’t help but think that there’s something missing.

Shouta is surprised that Midoriya—no, Rabbit even comes to their Friday night meeting. He honestly didn't expect him to after the way their last conversation went. And yet, despite how tense the air becomes once Rabbit hops onto a nearby air conditioner from out of nowhere, nearly scaring Shouta half to death in doing so, the hero can't help the wave of relief that runs through him.

"You got your casts off already?" Rabbit says, voice slightly mocking. Shouta has no doubt the boy already knew this, however. "Pretty sure you're not supposed to be out here patrolling just yet. Aren't you supposed to be taking it easy?"

Shouta lets one of his rare smiles slip through, face partially hidden by his capture weapon. "And when have I ever listened to doctor's orders, kid?"

Rabbit laughs, and it's a nice sound. Easy on the ears. Childish. Shouta feared the kid would ignore him, or, better yet, argue with him some more. He feels his chest loosen now that he knows he hasn't shattered their already fragile relationship. They're still okay. He can still watch over him and make sure he's safe.

Shouta doesn't know what he would've done had Rabbit decided to strip him of that privilege.

"Patrol?" He offers, a clear peace offering. He can still see how tense Rabbit is in the way he crouches in front of the other on the AC unit, shoulders set and jaw clenched, and he wants to change that. He doesn't want him to feel that way around him ever.

"I thought you'd never ask," Rabbit replies, a newfound glint to his crimson eyes, making Shouta breathe out a sigh of relief.

Rabbit takes the lead this time. The duo go down their usual route and do whatever work they can find, just like always, though Shouta notes that they go down a few extra streets than normal. Rabbit must've added them to their patrol just recently.

Shouta may be a little reckless sometimes, but he's not stupid. He makes sure not to get into the middle of the fights they stumble across, instead serving more as backup and extra support for the teen. Erasure is more than helpful by itself, especially when you add his capture weapon to the mix.

He doesn't have to try too hard to stay away, as Rabbit doesn't seem to be giving any of the criminals a chance to get near him. It's like he's guarding him, and any other time Shouta probably would have gotten annoyed at the gesture, but now he's just happy that he's allowed to be patrolling with the kid at all.

As they make their way through the night, Shouta debates asking him about their last meeting. He just needs a confirmation, that's all. Would he just make it worse? Shouta is pretty sure he's right, so does he even need Rabbit to confirm it? He'd be risking a lot.

Would getting him to admit it even be useful? I won't be able to do anything without breaking his trust, and I doubt I'd be able to convince him to let me help him. Damnit, this is difficult.

"I could die for a smoothie right now."

Shouta curses and dodges another bullet, slamming the gang member against the wall with his scarf as he's brought out of his thoughts. Fuck. His hands are aching again and he hasn't even used them a lot. "We're in the middle of a firefight right now, kid. Do you really think that's an appropriate metaphor?"

"Hyperbole, actually."

The patrol was uneventful right up until the very end. Of course they had to run into two parties having an all-out war with each other over some stupid reason. It reminds Shouta of that gang fight he broke up with Rabbit that day.

"Come on!" The vigilante calls. "You can't tell me you're not thirsty right now! A smoothie sounds so good."

He is a little parched, but that's not the point. Shouta finds himself blowing out an amused breath as he takes down another beefy guy, knocking him unconscious with ease. "I'll buy you one after this, now focus before you get yourself killed."

At the promise of a nice drink, Rabbit seems to sober up. His steps become quicker, his blows harder and more precise all of a sudden, and Shouta can't help but marvel at how quickly the vigilante changed. It seems he holds back more than he lets on.

Shouta makes quick work of his own targets and shakes his head. "You fight like you're running out of time, kid."

And if Shouta looked, he would've seen the way Rabbit froze up at the comment, his eyes glazing over briefly. But Shouta is too busy tying up the criminals to see it, and he's left unaware as a consequence. In this moment he misses the only detail he would've needed to finally put together what was really happening, right there under his nose.

And he'll come to regret it.

When Eraserhead swings himself up onto the roof after getting the snacks, the first thing Izuku notices is the shakiness. He has two drinks in his hands, one of them being what looks like Izuku's promised smoothie, and his arms are trembling slightly with the effort of holding them steady. It's noticeable enough to make Izuku grit his teeth out of frustration. Not at Eraserhead, at himself.

He glares sourly at the hero but takes the drink when offered it. Eraserhead insisted on going into the store alone, claiming that it'd only cause trouble if they were seen together, which, to be fair, actually makes sense. Eraserhead is technically breaking the law every time he sees Rabbit and fails to turn him in, so what would happen if they were both caught shopping for snacks at ass o'clock in the morning? Nothing good, that's for sure.

This doesn't stop Izuku from pouting, though. His teacher should not be using his arms this much. He does shit like this and still has the audacity to lecture Izuku over his own unhealthy habits. What a hypocrite.

Izuku sits down near the ledge and plops onto his back, feet hanging off the side as he starts to swing them childishly. He's just about to inhale the entirety of the smoothie (a healthy one, much to Izuku's annoyance) in one go when something light drops on his chest.

It's a Slim Jim. One of the more expensive, less-greasy ones you find at the nicer convenience stores. Izuku does a double take once he finally manages to read the label in the faint light because oh. This is the exact kind that Present Mic buys him. The exact size and flavor, too.

Eraserhead is studying him. He's watching for a reaction, obviously. Is it just Izuku, or does he look almost smug? It's like he's teasing him. Like he knows exactly why Izuku would get upset over it.

That slimy bastard.

The obvious amusement on his teacher's face tells Izuku that he's all too aware of his inner turmoil, which serves to further annoy the vigilante. Oh, so he wants to be like that.

(Izuku's own theory has changed now. The chances of Present Mic being Eraserhead's secret lover has increased to 95%, and with each passing second the percentage grows exponentially higher.)

Yeah, Eraserhead definitely knows who Rabbit is. The meeting last week was a guess, a venture into the dark, but all of that unsureness seems to have been wiped away. Now he's just trying to trip him up, to get him to admit the truth himself so he won't be blamed for pushing him later on.

He's that petty, huh? The thought makes Izuku smile despite the fear worming its way into his gut.

It's kind of funny, he thinks, that tonight of all nights you can see the stars. It's a rare treat, finding the perfect spot in the city where you can catch a glimpse of them. This moment feels important somehow. Like he'll never be able to feel this again, like he'll never be able to see this again.

The week is starting to catch up with him, and Izuku suddenly feels a huge wave of exhaustion overcome him. He really does need to sleep one of these days. His week hasn't been the greatest and it's not even over yet.

Eraserhead drops down beside him and mimics his pose, back creaking as he rests on the cold concrete and starts on his own beverage.

And everything is so familiar, so domestic, that Izuku's mind can't help but wander. The boy has looked death in the face and laughed countless of times, and yet he's still here. He's survived for this long, despite everything the universe has thrown his way. So of course the only time his life is truly in danger is when Izuku can't do a damn thing about it.

He can't stop it this time. Can't do anything but wait.

Izuku has never been good at waiting.

Eraserhead has avoided death plenty of times as well, Izuku knows. The bandages on his face are proof of that. The hero thankfully has more tomorrows, though, and Izuku thinks about the ones he won't be a part of.

"Do you want a family?" He asks, because he needs something to hold onto. He needs to know his teacher will make it count. The doctor's words are still hanging at the back of his mind, impossible to forget and even more so to repeat. Saying it aloud would make it final, make it real, and he doesn't think he can do that just yet.

There's a beat of silence.

"Yeah," Eraserhead says, his voice strained. "I do."

"I think you'd be a great dad, Mothman."

Eraserhead glances at him briefly and looks back up at the sky. He doesn't talk for a long moment, but Izuku doesn't mind. They're both searching the stars for different answers.

And if Izuku was more careful, more alert, he would've seen the flash of pain in Eraserhead's eyes when he looked at him out of the corner of his vision. Would've seen the mild frustration that laid in their dark depths.

But for now, Izuku just lets himself be there while he can.

“I hate school. I hate the homework, the people, the quirks, and I hate this fucking essay. How the hell am I supposed to complete this in one day?”

There’s slight static from above. “I was under the impression Cementoss gave you a week to complete this assignment, Izuku. Is it not your own fault you started it with only a few hours before the deadline?”

Izuku gasps dramatically, feeling betrayed, and glares up at the ceiling. “Blasphemy! I’ll have you know I’ve been busy this entire time. This isn’t my fault.”

Not this time, at least.

“According to Eraserhead,” AINA’s voice changes to that of a familiar hero’s, “fighting crime is not an acceptable excuse for neglecting your responsibilities and schoolwork.”

Dammit. Izuku doesn’t know why he even bothers arguing with her. She’s an AI, so of course she’ll win. The boy pinches his nose in displeasure. “What did I say about quoting the hobo man at home? I don’t wanna hear his voice here. It’s bad enough I have to deal with seeing his stupid face every day at school.”

“I’m sure he feels the same way about you, Izuku.”

And okay, wow, that’s uncalled for.

“I don’t remember programming you to be so sassy,” he mutters, turning back to his work. He chooses to ignore AINA’s sarcastic reply and flips open his notebook. He still has some time to kill before he has to go out and finish some of his jobs.

There’s less than a week before the Sports Festival, and he’s been trying to save up whatever money he can to buy some last minute necessities.

See, Izuku doesn't have much time left. And he's not just talking about his sickness, he's talking about the eyes that have been watching him around for quite a few days now. His first stalker was kind enough to tip him off about what's going to happen in the form of a very ominous note, and the boy isn't about to waste his newfound advantage.

They're coming for him. And it's not unusual, really, as Izuku has to deal with vengeful criminals and villains on the daily, but this time is different. This is serious if it made Izuku's old friend come out of hiding and warn him about it.

He has to leave, and the sooner the better. There's no telling if anyone else knows he lives here, and he doesn't want to wait and find out the hard way.

All he needs to disappear is a fake ID and passport, along with some cash. He won't be able to take Missy with him, as that would put her in danger, so Izuku's best bet is leaving her with Kacchan. It'll just be for a little while, of course. Izuku isn't planning on leaving forever. A month or so should be enough time for everything to calm down, and only then will he come back and resume his work.

But where should he even go? America? His father wouldn't dare go over there to search for him, so it's the best choice for Izuku. He knows a ton of languages, so he'll be fine pretty much anywhere, but America seems like the right choice.

That doesn't mean he wants to leave his home, though, even if it's only temporary.

Izuku flips through his notebook, eyes briefly skimming the pages. He doesn't know what he's doing anymore. The essay is long-forgotten, not that he would care either way. His grades started out perfect, but this past week has really taken its toll on him. So what if he's slipping? He'll be expelled soon enough.

If he doesn't leave by then.

He turns another page and stops. All Might's signature stares back at him, and the sloppy handwriting and little face next to the name has Izuku suddenly feeling queasy. Oh. Throughout all of this, he hasn't even thought of All Might much.

Guilt hits him like a speeding train, and Izuku thinks he would have preferred a real one.

What will he do about One for All when he leaves? Give it back to All Might? Is that even possible? His mentor has never mentioned anything like that, but then again why would he? That's not really something Izuku would need to know. But still. If it's not possible, should he give it away? And to who? Kacchan is his first choice. But whether or not his friend will accept it is another issue.

One for All doesn't need Kacchan to accept it, though. As bad as it is, Izuku can force it on him if he needs to. That seems like an ideal plan in this situation, as terrible and dangerous as it is.

The only question now is when exactly he's going to leave. Should he wait another few weeks or leave right after the Sports Festival? If he's just going to up and disappear, he might as well go all out. He needs to send one last fuck you to his father, and what better way to do that than to absolutely own the Festival? All for One will most definitely be watching it now that he knows his son is at UA, so there's no point in trying to hide.

Izuku wouldn't even be thinking about participating if he wasn't going to leave anyway. That's the only thing that's changed.

And besides, if he wins it'll be a slap to All for One's face. A reminder of what he lost, of what he doesn't have anymore. Izuku will leave after that. He can keep them all guessing.

He's petty like that.

Izuku finds himself scribbling in the last few pages of his notebook. Despite all of the evidence pointing to why he should run, he's still going to feel guilty about it. He doesn't want to leave school, he doesn't want to leave behind Missy and Kacchan and his new friends. He doesn't want to stop training with All Might and chatting with Present Mic in English class. And, as much as he hates to admit it, he doesn't want to stop seeing Eraserhead's stupid face every other day on patrol.

That's all been the usual for him as of late, and maybe that's the issue. He's gotten too comfortable, too happy. It's only right for the world to knock him down a few pegs. It just sucks that the USJ had to be the thing that did it.

Izuku writes down notes and seemingly meaningless thoughts on the worn-down, coffee-stained pages. He writes about his plan, about the pros and cons of each choice he could make once he leaves, about the finances and supplies he'll need to make this work.

And then he goes further.

He writes about his doubts, about why he really doesn't want to do this but also why he really kind of has to. It's frustrating, it's dumb, and it's still not painful enough.

He has so many questions and so little answers to them. And even when he seems to decide on something and manages to cross one of the questions off the list in his mind, ten more seem to take its place.

The pen snaps with the force he's holding it with, and in a moment of heightened irritation, he chucks it across the room.

Izuku hates oversharing in this hellish notebook, because for one, it's not a diary, and two, there's always a possibility someone could read it.

But what's his alternative? Talking to someone? Another human? With words? Yeah, he doesn't fucking think so. He'll stick with his irrational anger and terrible coping mechanisms, thanks.

By the time he makes it out of the house and finishes up some of his jobs, his followers are back. They're still watching him. It's the same eyes and same quirks as the first day. The person who left him that note isn't among them, though, but he's not surprised. That guy was helping him, not harming. He's a would-be friend. An ex-acquaintance. It wouldn't make sense for him to associate with Izuku's other, less passive followers.

He manages to lose them on his patrol that night, but they don't stop there. The next night, it happens again.

He gets up and goes to retrieve his discarded weapons in the alley he's in, feet treading silently across the concrete floor. He just took down a few thugs trying to shake down a poor teen, so he's not really expecting it when Extract starts to thrum in his veins.

There's a prickle at the back of his neck, making Izuku freeze for a moment before he continues to pick up his daggers.

He is being watched. Again.

The green-haired boy lets his breathing slow and his eyes slip shut, feeling the vibrations on the ground and the displacement of air from behind him.

One, two, three, four.

Four sets of eyes.

Izuku stretches. He turns around and lifts his forearm, letting AINA scan the perimeter. He'll review her recording later to see what they can find.

The power the intruders are emitting isn't dangerous, no. They seem more curious than anything, almost as if they're amused.

His fingers twitch, wanting to throw one of the blades he holds between his fingers. He could take them all and no one would even know. It would be that simple for just four of them.

But he manages to refrain himself, and the same thing happens for the next few days. Izuku patrols, they watch him for a while, and then they leave. The cycle repeats, and it's always with the same four.

It's not until the fifth day that something changes.

He's walking the streets of the city, finally feeling confident enough to not have to jump rooftops just to avoid getting caught, when suddenly he feels cold; the space around him feels acutely quiet. It feels wrong.

The stillness is absolute. A ringing silence presses upon him, and he goes into high alert immediately, feeling his heart start to beat faster as he sets his stolen can of coffee down on the curb.

He feels bad about leaving it, but what can you do in a situation like this? So maybe Izuku shouldn't be walking so freely in a public place like this when he's a wanted vigilante, but that's beside the point.

There's no moon tonight, no light. But Izuku can see well in the dark. Yes, they're there. The four that were watching, as well as an additional five.

Three teams of three. Basic.

Izuku mentally catalogues where he is right now with respects to his stalkers, scenarios and battle plans running through his mind. Perhaps he should move out and set up a barrier with those roadblocks across the street? And maybe set some traps?

No time. Too late.

The intruders break through the first perimeter and are steadily approaching. They stop just beyond the second one, their quirks a quiet hum at the back of Izuku's brain.

Are they waiting for a signal?

They're too close for his comfort. They usually never go for this bold of an approach. It seems like they don't even care if he notices them this time. Izuku turns quietly and goes back the direction he came. Going home isn't even an option now, as he'd just be setting a deathtrap for himself.

Izuku stuffs his hands into his inner pockets, fiddling with his gadgets, and starts to whistle a low tune.

AINA recognizes it at once, her voice cheery in his earpiece. "Security measures have been activated. All cameras within a one mile radius will stay deactivated for fifteen minutes, starting now."

Izuku chances a sly glance at the roof of a building across the street, and he spots two figures watching him. Words are exchanged and unseen weapons gripped. They're ready, waiting. But for what?

He takes another turn down a random road, his thoughts racing, outrage mounting.

He can't rush them yet. They have him surrounded at every angle, and besides, Izuku isn't very familiar with this part of the city. He's at a disadvantage.

Which means he has to make them come to him. He'll have to pick them off and separate them as they approach. But he'll have to be quick with it. If all nine come at him at once? He's dead meat.

His anger picks up with the wind, and his eyes narrow into dangerous slits. Seriously? And I was having a good day, too. They just can't get enough of me.

He can eliminate them all in under a minute if he truly wanted to, or at least take down more than half before making his escape. Not all of the guns he owns are full of tranqs, after all.

What are they thinking? They're only a few blocks away from Endeavor's agency, and everyone knows that the number two hero sends out his sidekicks to patrol these parts at night. Izuku himself has never been caught by one, but he doesn't want to jinx it now.

Many would rather welcome death than be caught by one of Endeavor's patrols.

Abruptly, Izuku feels the energy in the air crackle. He tenses and stops walking, his breath suspended, a sense of danger sweeping over him.

They're moving towards him with inexplicable speed.

There's silence, save for the slight whirring of the wind, then the scuffle of shoes. Close.

It's only when Izuku glances at a window's reflection across the street that he notices the masks his pursuers are donning.

The first figure appears on the ledge above him and jumps. His legs haven't even hit the ground yet before Izuku is moving with lightning speed and smashing the man into the wall, the blood staining the brick crimson from where his head knocked into it. Izuku grabs the criminal's outstretched wrist and steals the knife from between his fingers.

Something wet glints off the blade, and Izuku blinks. Is that poison?

The vigilante grips it hard and drives it into the pressure point just below the criminal's shoulder, jabbing it again with his elbow to make sure it goes even deeper.

If Izuku's guess is right, the substance coating the knife is just going to put him to sleep. If not, well, he's sure one of his buddies has an antidote on them.

The green-haired boy ducks as a ball of golden fire comes from behind him, singing his hair and costume.

He shoots forward in the same motion and grabs the newcomer's head, cracking it on his knee. The mask splits in two from the sheer force of it, revealing a charred face underneath. Result of his own fire quirk, maybe.

He has to stop himself from wincing in sympathy at the sight of the man's burn marks, and he only just has time to cross his arms and call upon Deflect when another blast of heat washes over him, sending him back a few feet.

He surges forward, thankful he has his Rabbit costume on to take the brunt of some of the flames. Izuku relishes in the surprise on the figure's face and pivots, his body alight with power as he kicks the man square in the chest. There's a whirlwind of air and then the guy is sent flying, crashing through the window of a McDonald's.

Okay, that was a bit much.

Izuku is suddenly hyper aware of the screams coming from the couple of scared citizens rounding the corner. With all of this commotion, he figures he has a max of two minutes before heroes arrive on the scene.

His third attacker appears behind him, bringing him out of his thoughts. This one is wearing no mask this time, and Izuku glimpses a pair of sightless eyes, making him shudder.

The vigilante reaches out with his left hand to grab the man's hair and yank him close, but instead Izuku is met with a fist to the throat. Something sharp slices his stomach and he stumbles back, already feeling the warmth spreading across his hoodie and staining it red.

Fuck. Focus, you idiot.

The man keeps at the attacks, not pausing as he barrages Izuku with a flurry of movements almost too quick for him to keep up with.

Izuku lets the dance continue for a few more moments before spotting his opening. He weaves, dodging another slice to his stomach as he uses the criminal's thigh as a stepping stone and wraps his legs around the figure's neck, bringing him to the ground.

Izuku rolls as he falls, quickly pulling out his capture tape and winding it around his attacker's torso. With a grunt, he yanks on the tape and throws the figure up and over the nearest lamplight, effectively hanging him like a piñata.

He doesn't have time to check if he's going to try and escape before the next three arrive, this time attacking in tandem.

Izuku hisses as he jumps up a wall and grabs onto the roof's ledge, more blood leaking out of the cut on his stomach as he pulls himself up. He stares at the trio below him, all poised and ready to charge at a moment's notice.

"I have somewhere to be." Izuku makes sure his voice sounds exasperated and not pained. "Could y'all, like, not do this today?"

There's no reply, only the sound of the wind roaring between them. Izuku faintly hears sirens and rolls his eyes. Damn, yet another fight being cut short.

He lifts an arm and twitches his fingers, making sure to turn his focus into the man's neck. The hooded criminal to the far left starts to gasp, his hands reaching up to slap away the unforeseen force that drags him forward by the throat. Izuku isn't even using Pull to its highest potential, he's just trying to catch them off guard.

It's not like they don't know who he is. He recognized the mask on the fire-user's face. These people are mercenaries, though obviously not very good ones. They also most definitely already know about the oddities of his singular enhancement quirk, so he's not even going to sugarcoat things.

The others take this as a sign to continue and rush toward Izuku, their blades flashing in the faint light.

Izuku releases his control on the first guy and throws out one of his grenades, pushing the criminals back and effectively giving him enough time to forge his own attack.

There's a rush of air and Izuku feels a searing pain in his side where the closest figure touched him, his costume sizzling away as invisible acid eats away at him. A contact quirk, most likely. He needs to limit the guy's hand movements, then. Biting back a cry, the teenager twists and grabs the man by the throat, using his other arm to snatch his elbow and snap it back. The grip he has on the other's neck is so harsh he's nearly crushing his wind pipes with the sheer pressure he's causing.

Izuku turns and throws him at the other two on the roof, sending them flying off the side. He jumps off the building at their momentary distraction and charges up One for All into his legs as he falls after them.

He crashes into the criminals before they can even touch the ground and uses their bodies like a spring board. The impact releases an explosive-like force, and the ground shudders beneath him.

And fuck, that's going to leave a mark. His poor feet are crying right now.

Izuku darts into an alleyway separating two buildings and jumps between the walls to propel himself up even higher. If he looks back down now he would notice the large crater his attack just caused, along with the limp figures inside of it.

Three more left.

Izuku lands a few paces in front of the group. These last ones seem to have been waiting for him. They merely watched as their teammates attacked him without preamble, not moving an inch.

The one in the middle, most likely the leader, is the one who speaks first. His words are a low rumble. “As expected of the famous vigilante.”

Without breaking the rhythm of his walk, Izuku addresses him with a happy up-tilt to his words. “Tell me who sent you and I might just let you walk out of here without getting your search histories exposed.”

He’s way too tired to be dealing with this shit. He also needs to buy some groceries while he’s out, and the fact that they’re interrupting him right now is pissing him off. Missy needs food.

The leader doesn’t answer and instead brings his hands together to produce a piece of parchment out of thin air.

Izuku shifts to hide his nervousness (he just spawned in paper from nowhere, so who’s to say he can’t do that with a rocket launcher or gun?), and the action sends spikes of pain throughout his body. “You want an autograph? Listen, I love my fans, but this is a little much—all you had to do was ask!”

Bitch Man holds out his hand but doesn’t move forward; a clear invitation. The paper hovers over his palm, just floating there.

Okay, shit. Yeah, they definitely did their research.

Izuku hesitates a few moments longer before doing the same with his own arm, letting Pull activate at his fingertips. The paper drifts from the man’s palm and into his own.

“What is this?” He asks, though he has a feeling he already knows. He wouldn’t be so blatantly showing off his quirks if he didn’t already have an idea who they are.

“A message.”

Izuku winces, the only noticeable crack in his carefully-put-up facade.

He doesn't like the way the word message sounds on the man's tongue. It doesn't sound like the truth. Warning would be a better term.

He doesn't read the note in his hands yet. He'll do that when he has more privacy. He shoves the paper in his pocket and glares at the group, eyeing them suspiciously as their other members join them from the ground.

Now this is the part where Izuku becomes apprehensive. A nine-on-one fight isn't very good odds, not when he's already sore and tired from his incessant patrolling. And besides, the ruckus they're causing has to have already alerted nearby law enforcement.

"Mind introducing yourselves?" He asks, popping out a hip. The urge to run and find a random hero out on patrol who can help him is suddenly much stronger. "It's a little rude that you all know who I am but I still don't know who you are."

The figure on the far right startles. "You really have no clue who we are?"

That's what I just fucking said. Can they keep up?

"Funny. You'd think the confused look and blank stare would have answered that for you," he sniffs, tipping his head. "He put you guys up to this?"

None of them answer his question, though a few shift on their feet. They look uneasy at the idea of saying his name aloud.

Izuku needs them to hurry up, as he's currently bleeding from the stomach. This is not how he expected his night to go.

"Careful," the leader says suddenly, slowly. "Once he sees how you get out, he knows how to get in."

And just what the fuck does that mean? What kind of dumbfuckery is this dude trying to pull?

Does they know he's planning on leaving? Is that what this is about?

Before he can snap at Bitch Man to elaborate, there's movement out of the corner of his vision, making them all tense up. That's all the warning Izuku needs to get going.

He makes to move towards the next building, only for a rain of weapons to come flying at him from all sides with deadly precision. He twists in midair when he jumps, Boost burning under his skin. He may be faster than most pros, but there's no way he can dodge all of the projectiles aiming straight for him.

A knife lodges into his thigh and he yelps, nearly missing the edge of the next roof entirely. He yanks it out and blindly throws it behind him, not checking to see if it landed its mark before taking off running.

"Damn you," he hisses through clenched teeth. This is just a shitshow now. And why are heroes injuring criminals like this? He's just been stabbed for merely existing.

Bullets ring out, and then there are shouts as multiple heroes appear from seemingly nowhere and begin to finish Izuku's job. They don't look like they belong to Endeavor's agency, surprisingly. They must've been called by one of the civilians.

Izuku extends his senses and nearly runs into a clothesline once he realizes that the heroes aren't following him. So they're going after that group instead, huh? Is he not important enough? He tries to push away that offended part of himself, which isn't hard, as in the next second a fresh wave of pain overtakes him.

Oh, yeah. He's bleeding in two places now.

The vigilante listens to the fight unfold as he moves further away, sprinting as fast as he can with his injuries. The group wasn't too hard to deal with, but they were troublesome. Concerning.

In fact, Izuku probably could've done some good damage to them before eventually getting captured by the heroes. No. These villains aren't very well-trained. They don't seem to know how to use their quirks, which is why most of them relied on weapons and hand-to-hand combat.

Izuku knows there's something more meaningful behind the attack, and he knows there must be a reason why his father is toying with him. The attackers are obviously a part of the League, or at least in a temporary contract with them, as none of them seemed the least bit surprised at his multitude of quirks.

They know who he is, and thus what he is. Which isn't good at all.

It's only when he's halfway across the city that he slows to a stop and pulls out the dreaded paper. His hands shake on their own volition, and he smooths out the wrinkles in it from when he stuffed it in his pocket.

What stares back at him is one ominous sentence, the handwriting neat and straight and all too familiar: Just a few more bodies before we meet again, my little hero.

Izuku feels his heart stop. It's as if All for One is right there next to him, speaking into his ear with that deep, foreboding tone of his. Extract stirs and the boy feels sick. The sarcasm in the inked words is so obvious it's almost palpable.

"Izuku, you need to pay atten—"

His foot slips off the edge of the five-story-building, and then Izuku is sent plummeting to the ground. He doesn't even have a chance to cry out before he lands in the inside of a large dumpster, the air leaving his lungs in one gasp.

He lays there, panting, with AINA screaming something in his ear, and blinks away the white dots covering his vision. Yeah, he's definitely lost quite a bit of blood. He needs to patch his wounds up and get back to his house. He can go shopping tomorrow after school. That sounds like a good plan.

Fuck. Now he smells like garbage.

"What are you doing?"

Izuku does not scream, thank you very much. He was too distracted by the alarming amount of blood coming out of his body to actually listen for anyone around him, so this is totally on him.

"Your mom," he says immediately, praying that whoever this is won't kill him. To be fair, the chances of two maniacs being in the same alleyway are pretty low. He should be fine.

He opens his mouth again, this time to question why the Probably-A-Murderer is in an alleyway at this time of night, when his body suddenly goes lax, his quirks becoming silent. He feels cold, as if the flowing water in his mind has finally frozen over, and his lips part slightly on their own accord.

And that's when his mind goes fuzzy.

Hitoshi shouldn't be out at this time of night. He really shouldn't.

His foster parents will be upset if they catch him. Hell, they probably already know about this latest adventure of his, but it's not like Hitoshi cares. He knows they won't do anything about it.

They're way too nice, in all respects. Nothing like his other four sets of foster parents. These ones are different, he thinks. Nicer.

Almost too nice, in his opinion. He's been waiting for the hammer to fall, for the shoe to finally drop, but all he's gotten in response to his irritation and difficulty is love and support, and it makes him upset.

He doesn't know what to expect from them, and that's the issue. They don't get angry at him when he does something wrong and they don't hit him like his other foster parents did. They just kind of let it happen, and it's annoying.

This feeling of not knowing, this change, is what led to him sneaking out of the house for the third time in as many weeks—if you can even call it sneaking; he just walked out the front door—and strolling the deserted streets.

All he needed was to clear his head, that's all. He planned on a simple walk around the city, but that plan changed the moment he caught sight of some of his old classmates. The very ones who hated his guts for most of the year for no particular reason.

So of course the only logical thing to do was duck inside this alley to avoid being seen by them. Call it cowardice if you want, but for Hitoshi it's survival.

Which leads to now, with Hitoshi hiding in the darker shadows of the alley, leaning behind a fairly large dumpster. It's less than ideal, but it works. His old classmates pass by without a clue to what happened.

Hitoshi is just about to leave and check if the coast is clear when it happens. There's a rush of air, and then a body falls from above and crashes inside the dumpster he was just leaning on, causing a plume of dirt and grime to billow up in the air.

It's so sudden and out of the ordinary that Hitoshi is frozen, paralyzed with fear, because what the fuck is even that? Where did it even come from?

There's a groan, and then a head pops into view as the figure sits up. Oh, so it's a human.

"What are you doing?" Hitoshi asks, because at this point this might as well happen. His life is already so goddamn weird, what else can life throw at him? Or, more appropriately, drop on him?

The boy startles so hard that Hitoshi would actually feel bad if he wasn't still pissed off from everything else going on. There's a girly screech, and then another pained groan.

"Your mom," he replies seriously, and Hitoshi doesn't waste any time in forming the connection he needs. His quirk is a calming pressure in his skull, a warm blanket covering him up during a cold thunderstorm, and it easily takes control of the other.

Got you.

For a few long seconds, Hitoshi just sits there, because now that he has this person under his hold he doesn't quite know what to do. Is he a villain? No, that can't be right. He sounds like he's the same age as Hitoshi. Maybe just a petty criminal? But that also wouldn't explain why he just dropped from the sky and landed in a dumpster. Is that what criminals do? Wait for unsuspecting civilians to wander into their designated alleys for a chance to freak them the fuck out? Hitoshi wouldn't know.

"Come out of there," he orders, more for his own sake than for the boy's. It's hard to talk to someone when they're on a pile of garbage.

It takes a few moments, but eventually the boy is staggering to his feet inside the dumpster and crawling out of it.

The light of a nearby streetlamp frames the figure's body, illuminating his features, and it's only then that Hitoshi recognizes him. It's the ears that give it away, he thinks, that and the glowing red eyes that seem to stare straight through him rather than at him.

Oh. So this isn't what petty criminals do, this is what vigilantes do.

Hitoshi is so shocked that the connection snaps at his loss of focus, and he stumbles back a few steps as the boy—no, as Rabbit seems to recollect himself.

I'm so dead. I just brainwashed one of the most wanted criminals in Japan and now I'm going to die. This is it. I shouldn't have snuck out, I shouldn't have snuck out, I shouldn't have—

"Holy shit!" Rabbit's awed voice puts a halt to his frantic musings, and Hitoshi's eyes bug out of his head as the boy continues on enthusiastically. "What was that? I couldn't even move! It's like my entire body was numb!" He moves closer to him, eyes flashing. "Hey, hey, can you do that again? Please? That felt so cool!"

Hitoshi's entire brain short circuits as he tries to process the request. "Huh?"

"I couldn't feel a thing! That's your quirk, right?" Rabbit takes another step, and then he's right in front of Hitoshi, looking up at him with sparkly eyes. "I need you to do that again. Please."

This is getting dangerously close to this is kinda fucked up territory, and Hitoshi doesn't know if he likes it or not. Never has he had someone beg him to use his quirk on them. Hell, he's never had someone so much as talk to him after having experienced his quirk firsthand. They all usually avoid him or end up becoming one of his bullies, so what's so different now?

Rabbit is still talking, he realizes with a jolt. The vigilante is shooting off question after question, asking about his quirk and how it activates and what exactly it does and if it has any drawbacks—he even asks things that Hitoshi isn't sure he himself knows the answers to.

He stares at the most wanted vigilante in Japan, the vigilante who's currently standing a little over half a foot shorter than Hitoshi with his hoodie ears coming down to frame his face as he rambles, and the first thing Hitoshi thinks is oh, cute. Because he always knew Rabbit was small, but he never thought he was this small.

This boy in front of him is responsible for so many crimes and acts of treason, and yet Hitoshi is just sitting there, listening to him go into a rant about how mental quirks are underrated and deserve to be talked about just as much as flashy quirks are. He's going so fast that Hitoshi can barely keep up, so he settles on blankly staring at him.

Is this really the same Rabbit that saved him from that orphanage a few years ago? That Rabbit was stoic and calm—seemingly uncomfortable without showing it, but this Rabbit is totally different.

Hitoshi doesn't remember him being this talkative, but then again he only caught a glimpse of him that day before he disappeared. He probably doesn't even remember him.

Hitoshi snaps out of his memories when he sees Rabbit grimace slightly, mid-sentence, and his eyes follow the other boy's hand as it travels down to grip at his stomach, and—

"What the fuck," Hitoshi starts, pointing at the growing stain on the vigilante's hoodie. "You're bleeding?"

Rabbit looks down and then back up at him with a half-hearted shrug. "I do that sometimes."

That doesn't make Hitoshi feel better in the slightest. "Are—are you dying? Do you need me to call someone?"

By someone he means 911, because there's just no way that wound doesn't need medical attention. Has Rabbit been bleeding this entire time?

"Oh, I'm good!" The vigilante chirps, plopping down on the disgusting, dirty concrete. "But now that I'm here, I might as well take care of it. You can leave if you want, by the way."

Hitoshi doesn't budge, too shocked to really make a choice in such little time, but in the next second he finds himself wishing that he left right then, because now Rabbit is taking out a small box from the inside of his jacket and lifting up his shirt, exposing a nasty-looking slice on his stomach.

"What are you doing?" Hitoshi screeches, turning away from the sight of Rabbit pressing a dark cloth against the wound to stop it from bleeding. He then procures a needle and thread, and Hitoshi feels his heart drop to his stomach.

"I already answered that," Rabbit points out, deftly beginning to stitch up the cut. He does it with such ease that it's obvious this isn't his first time. "And please keep it down, they could be looking for me."

Who the fuck is they, Hitoshi wants to ask, but he stops himself at the last moment. This can't be real. This has to be a fever dream of some sort. Why is this happening to him, of all people?

Rabbit bites off the excess thread with his teeth and moves on to a deep, knife-shaped hole in his thigh.

“You really need to go to the hospital,” he breathes out, feeling queasy at the sight of so much blood. “That’s not... that’s not healthy. At all.”

“I’m sorry, is this our stab wound? Stay out of it, please.”

Christ, what is this boy made of?

Hitoshi pauses as he catches sight of a burn on Rabbit’s shoulder. The material of his costume has been scorched away, revealing raw, pink flesh beneath it. Yep, Hitoshi is going to throw up very soon.

“Is that from Endeavor?” He asks, trying to put himself back together and save some of his dignity. It’s no secret that the number two hero was sent after the vigilante following his latest public scandal.

Rabbit hums absentmindedly. “No, surprisingly, but I blame him anyway. AINA, flashlight please.” The device on his forearm lights up at the command, illuminating his work, but before Hitoshi can open up that can of beans the vigilante is speaking again. “It’s a wonder he doesn’t burn himself with the amount of flaming garbage that comes out of his mouth. I kind of want it to happen just once, y’know, so he knows how his victims feel.”

Hitoshi is slightly concerned by that comment.

“And he’s still so pale; you’d think he’d tan quickly with a quirk like that,” Rabbit mutters, finishing off one of his last stitches.

The line is so random that Hitoshi can’t even begin to imagine what it’s like in the boy’s mind. “It’d be hard for anyone to tan while living in All Might’s shadow.”

For a second, Hitoshi fears that he just said the wrong thing, but then Rabbit doubles over in laughter, the needle falling to the ground in his excitement. Hitoshi doesn’t even smile, though. Was it that funny? I wasn’t even making a joke.

By the time Rabbit comes back to himself, it seems he’s done with his stitching. Hitoshi is standing there awkwardly, still confused, when the boy struggles to his feet and immediately stumbles forward.

Hitoshi steadies him quickly with an outstretched arm, which is a surprise in itself. He wouldn’t have done that for anyone else.

“Thanks!” Rabbit’s hand lingers on Hitoshi’s arm, and the lilac-haired boy becomes stuck on the contact. “Hey, uh, don’t mention this to anyone?”

Oh, that’s right. He’s a wanted criminal. Hitoshi has just been in the presence of a wanted criminal for around five minutes.

“Sure. I don’t care enough.”

“Sweet!” He sounds like he’s smiling underneath the mask. “I hope I’ll see you around then.”

And then he leaves, a slight limp to his bouncy steps. As he watches him go, still dazed, Hitoshi can’t stop feeling the warm, comforting feeling that settles over skin. Rabbit is a vigilante, so he shouldn’t be trusted. And yet he saved Hitoshi once upon a time from a bad place. He’s done a lot of good for this world, so what’s really bad about him?

Hitoshi may not know the boy very well, but he does know that he’ll always feel like he owes him for what he did those few years back. He briefly wonders if Rabbit even remembers it, if he remembers Hitoshi himself—the young preteen, maybe around his own age, that stared at him with wide eyes as the orphanage was torn to the ground from the inside.

Rabbit exposed the foster system’s darkest secrets. Their abusive tendencies towards their wards were revealed to the public as well, which shut them down for good.

For that, Hitoshi will always owe him something.

The fact also remains that Rabbit trusted him. He knew about Hitoshi’s power and still talked to him, aware of what could’ve happened. Hitoshi could have easily used his quirk again and turned him in, and he didn’t.

Rabbit knew this and still stayed with him. He still talked with him.

Hitoshi doesn’t know if that makes him kind or just foolish.

Izuku feels so fucking stupid. He went out yesterday night and had to deal with private mercenaries coming after him, which made him forget the one goddamn thing he went out for besides his jobs: Missy's food.

So now he has a hungry cat at home waiting for him to come back with her expensive wet food. The wet food that doesn't taste half bad, in his own opinion.

The boy is paranoid as he strolls down the sidewalk. No one is following him this time, but that just makes him even more concerned. This feels like the calm before the storm.

His heart is still pumping from his conversation with that boy yesterday. He definitely wasn't expecting to run into one of his schoolmates—the same schoolmate that he got pissed at the day back after the USJ incident. He's a lot more... chill than he previously thought. He's definitely good friend material.

"Potential target located. Estimated time before contact: twenty-five seconds."

Izuku looks up from the floor and studies the older man walking his way. Hell, he doesn't even need AINA to tell him he's rich; the watch on his wrist and the nice phone he has pressed to his ear gives it away. He even walks like he's loaded.

He probably wouldn't blink an eye at a few missing bills in his pocket.

"Who is he?" He asks lowly, mouth barely moving. He keeps his head low, hands in his pockets as AINA identifies the businessman and explains his wealth. Yep. He's definitely someone who won't care about some stolen chump change.

Damn, Izuku is glad he recently added facial recognition as one of AINA's features. It's helpful in determining the best approach with his endeavors.

It happens quickly, as it always does. Rich Boy is busy on his phone arguing with whoever is on the other side of the line, which gives Izuku the perfect advantage. He pretends to stumble when he gets close, and their shoulders knock together roughly. Izuku's hand dips into the other's pocket with the excuse of trying to steady himself, and he continues walking with a muttered sorry when the man barks at him to watch where he's going.

He doesn't speed up, as that's the biggest rule when borrowing: don't act suspicious. He fiddles with the wad of cash he managed to score, a wry grin slipping onto his face. It disappears a moment later, however.

A few months ago Izuku wouldn't have thought twice about stealing, but this time around he can't help but feel a little guilty. He doesn't like doing this, of course, but sometimes he has to. Besides, it's not like he's taking it from someone who really needs it, right? So why does he feel so bad?

It's more of an instinct now more than anything. He doesn't think he could stop even if he wanted to.

Izuku ends up buying Missy's cat food with some of the stolen money. This doesn't help ease the guilt weighing him down, though.

He glances at himself in one of the passing windows and loathes. In his dreams, he has already killed him, but the look on his reflection's face stays with him as he starts to walk the long route back to his building; a look like an accusation. Like a promise he's failed to keep.

He doesn't make it far.

It's chilly all of a sudden. There's danger in the air, but it's not nearly as bad as the feeling he got before the mercenaries attacked him.

"Hey, freak show!"

God. Fucking. Dammit. This again? He walks faster, clutching the box of cat food even tighter in his arms. He's never been much of a runner, but he's afraid that if he stops now he won't be able to keep himself from socking them in the face.

This isn't the same group of kids that picked on him the first time around. No, Izuku hasn't seen them or Tsubasa around for a while. He hates to admit that he's getting a little concerned.

"Come on, don't ignore us, Deku!"

His name is said in a sing-song voice, and the boy shivers despite himself. He's a vigilante, he's a hero-in-training, and he shouldn't be letting this get to him.

It's a miracle how they even recognize him after so long. Izuku can barely recognize them himself. They must be from elementary school.

The group of three boys and a girl catch up to him with ease and crowd him up against a wall. Izuku is silent throughout the whole ordeal, mind carefully blank. The cat food is snatched from his hands and thrown into the road. Words are hissed at him, all harsh indifference and crowing laughter.

“Useless.”

“Freak.”

“Stalker.”

His eye twitches at the last one, but he doesn’t say a word. He knows that one is partially true. His analyses do tend to freak people out.

“Oh, come on. Where’s your little bitch at? He's not here to help you now, is he?”

He’s jerked forward and shoved into the wall again. His nails dig into his palms, leaving behind pink little crescents. Don’t, a voice at the back of his mind says. It sounds soft, reassuring. Don’t act just yet.

It could be himself saying these words, or it could be something entirely different. All he knows is that he’s not really given a choice but to obey.

“Aw, look at him. Still can’t defend himself even after all these years. Pathetic.”

Izuku sighs. He is so, so tired and sore. His sloppy Walmart-grade stitches from before are being pulled taut with this shoving around. Izuku could fight back and run, but he’d just risk injuring himself further. He can’t do that. Not when the Sports Festival is in the morning.

He can't afford that right now either. His medical supplies are already dangerously low.

He feels like he’s floating right about now, his mind going back and forth between reality and fiction. He desperately wishes he could mimic the feeling he got when he was brainwashed. There was no pain, no more burning sensations from Extract, no more anything. He was blissfully unaware of the things happening around him.

It was the short reprieve he's been needing for a long time.

"Midoriya?"

Izuku doesn't flinch like the other teens do. He felt his teacher coming a while back due to his quirk.

It's kind of funny, though, Izuku thinks, that today is close to the day he first met Present Mic. Just short of a year ago with Izuku in the same situation. The only difference is that this time around Izuku is the one with the cat food.

The hero makes quick work of scaring the four students off, warning them about being out past curfew as he does so, and Izuku kind of wishes he'd be scolded for that as well so he can use it as an excuse to avoid the upcoming conversation. But alas, the world just likes making him the star of the circus, huh?

"I missed ya at the laundromat, kiddo, is everything alright?"

Izuku frowns as he feels the box of cat food being pressed back into his hands. Present Mic must've retrieved it from the road. "Oh, yeah, thank you!" He forgot that it's laundry day. "Didn't need to do it this week, so I just came out here to pick up some stuff. Sorry about that."

"Not a problem, listener!" The hero tilts his head, and the motion prompts Izuku to finally focus on him. He's in casual clothing, his hair pulled back into an intricate braid with small flowers pushed between the twists. It's a soft look, and Izuku knows it probably would've put him at ease any other time.

But this isn't any other time.

"Say, are you hungry by any chance?" His teacher seems to be studying him just as closely as Izuku is him. "There's a nice bakery one street over that's open all hours of the night!"

A bakery. With food.

Izuku doesn't remember agreeing, and yet he finds himself following Present Mic anyway, the voice hero whistling a tune all the way there.

Hizashi often strikes people as simple.

And in a way, he is. He's a DJ, a radio host, a teacher, and also a pro hero. This may seem like a lot, but it's really not when you consider the fact that he acts the same way in all of those settings. He always makes sure to act upbeat and only slightly annoying to everyone around him.

That's his persona. That's who he is. He likes music, he likes punching villains, and he likes screaming. That's about it. That's about as much as he allows people to see, at least.

So yeah, he's pretty simple. But where people go wrong is thinking that simple means the same thing as stupid.

If he's being honest with himself, running into Midoriya wasn't much of a coincidence. He waited at the laundromat for three hours for the boy to show, and each passing minute only increased his worry. Midoriya hasn't been acting right these past couple of weeks anyway, so sue him for doing a quick patrol around the places Shouta told him the boy frequents.

He just wants to make sure he's okay.

None of the teachers have missed the sluggish way Midoriya's been moving lately. He looks tired. The kind of tired that sleep can't fix, to be more specific. He looks like he's on the verge of passing out any second—as if one good breeze will have him falling on his ass.

He looks almost like Shouta did after the death of—Hizashi stops that train of thought right there. It'll do no good to get worked up, not when he has a kid to subtly check over.

The first thing he notices is how thin he is. For all of his muscles, Midoriya is very small. Worryingly so. Hizashi frowns, glad that he convinced the little listener to come with him to eat something, even if it's small.

Shouta is waiting for him back at the apartment, his patrol having finished up early on the other side of the city. One of the only times he doesn't have to stay up ‘til ungodly hours in the morning and Hizashi isn’t there. He knows his husband won't mind once he tells him the situation, however. And also if he gets him one of those blueberry muffins he loves.

The second thing he notices is that Midoriya’s favoring his left side. It's not exactly obvious—the boy hides it well—but Hizashi has been a hero for around fourteen years now. He doesn't miss the way Midoriya winces when he accidentally moves too quickly or strains himself. Shouta has complained a lot about Rabbit hiding injuries from him, so Hizashi thinks that it's not too far off to assume that's what’s happening here.

He can’t say anything about that, however. If Midoriya wanted to share that piece of information, he would’ve.

The bakery is quiet at this time of night. It may be open 24/7, but that doesn’t mean it’s always filled. That’s part of the reason Hizashi loves it so much; there’s less chance of him being recognized.

The hero got himself a banana chocolate chip muffin and Shouta a blueberry one. Midoriya ended up getting a vanilla cake pop—the cheapest thing on the menu, Hizashi noticed—and, at the voice hero’s insistence, a plain chocolate chip muffin.

It’s not a lot, but it’s something to start with. The fact that Midoriya has even humored him this far is astounding. He can see how out of it the kid is right now. At first, Hizashi thought it to be the work of drugs, but upon second glance he’s confident it’s just because of exhaustion.

This isn’t okay. Not only is this not healthy for the teen whatsoever, the Sports Festival is also tomorrow. The boy should be resting. How does he expect to compete in this state?

Hizashi needs to press, just a little bit, if he wants any hope of finding out what’s wrong. He doesn’t like being serious. Shouta usually handles that for him when he can, and yet he’s been finding himself in serious situations more often than not nowadays. He doesn’t know what to think of it.

“Can I ask ya something, listener?” he asks, his voice steadier than he feels. Midoriya looks up, a silent invitation, and Hizashi continues. ”You know that’s harassment, right? The bullying?”

Midoriya doesn't move, and he only utters out a quiet, "Not really," as he looks out the window, palm resting against his face. He hasn't touched his muffin yet. The cake pop doesn't really count—that only needed one bite to finish it. It's hardly enough to fill anyone up.

Hizashi tuts disapprovingly and the teen turns, his green eyes looking tired and resigned. It looks so wrong on his usually bright and bubbly face that Hizashi wonders if that was a lie, too, all this time. "You don't deserve that."

Midoriya hums, distracted, seeming to search the empty streets and roofs outside. He must be looking for something. Either that or he's keeping watch. "Doesn't stop it from happening," he says quietly.

And just what is he supposed to say to that? What the hell does that even mean?

Hizashi feels his heart jolt against his ribcage. His mouth moves before his mind can catch up. "Are you in trouble, Midoriya?"

With your father? He wants to add, stopping himself in the nick of time. Shouta has expressed his own concerns about the boy's home life more than once, but there really is no proof. It's all just speculation. Hizashi can't outright say it or else he'll risk pushing Midoriya away.

The boy blinks, eyebrows scrunching together. He hesitates for a moment before shaking his head. "I'm sorry I've been worrying you, sensei, but I'm completely fine! It's not like this stuff happens all the time. And besides, I know how to deal with it."

And, oh, Hizashi has so many things he wants to say about that last part, but unfortunately for him, his phone starts to ring. He internally curses himself for not silencing it earlier, and he barely even registers Nemuri's name on the caller ID before he declines it. He'll apologize to her later.

"Ah, I better head home now," Midoriya says suddenly, throwing a glance at the clock in the corner of the room. "It's getting a little late."

That's an understatement. It's nearly midnight.

His student gets up and thanks him again for the food. He bows stiffly at his teacher and makes for the door—and it's that motion that snaps Hizashi out of his thinking.

He stands up as well, grabbing his jacket and yanking it hastily over his shoulders. “I’ll walk you home, kiddo! It’s dangerous out.”

Let me help you, is what he means to say.

“No!” The abruptness in Midoriya’s tone catches Hizashi off guard, and he watches the flush rise in his student’s cheeks. “Sorry. I just—I’ll be fine. No one is usually out at this hour, anyway. I don’t want you to waste your time.”

Hizashi makes sure to mask his desperation as he follows the boy out the door, out into the cool air. “You’re not wastin’ my time, listener! As a pro hero and as your teacher, it’s my job to make sure you’re safe, yeah?”

“And I really appreciate that,” Midoriya says, his bottle-green eyes beginning to shine in the light. “But I’m just a few blocks away. Please.”

Please. Hizashi’s mind screeches to a halt at the last word. He’s begging me to leave it be.

“Listener, are you sure you’ll be—?”

Midoriya’s hand shakes as he cuts him off. “I like walking alone, so please don’t follow me.”

Don’t follow me. It’s as much a plea as it is a suggestion. This boy is begging him. Why? Why is he doing this? And why is Hizashi just letting him go—

Midoriya glances back at him with a reassuring smile on his lips—but it’s fake, it’s all fake. There’s a panic deep in his eyes, so raw and unadulterated that Hizashi can barely hear over the ringing in his ears as Midoriya calls out a good night. He blinks, and then the boy’s gone. Just like that.

And the man listens. Even with his nerves screaming at him to fucking go and see and save his student from whatever monster is plaguing his living dreams, he doesn’t follow.

He thinks with a start that this is the feeling Shouta told him he got after confronting the boy that night.

Hizashi stares at the space Midoriya occupied, and he waits for something that’ll likely never come.

For once in his life, Izuku isn't late, though it's a close thing.

His encounter with Present Mic last night left him shaky and unable to calm down, so sleep is now nothing more than a distant memory. He hasn't slept in how many days now? The fact that he isn't even sure speaks volumes.

He should probably make more of an effort to sleep considering you need to be well-rested if you want a stab wound to heal. Even so, he can't find it in himself to care too much about that. The bucket of chicken he's clutching to his chest is a really good motivator; he doesn't feel tired at all.

Now, this might be because he has ascended past the point of mere exhaustion, but the point still stands.

KFC is a life-savor.

"Oi, let me have some."

Izuku glares at his friend and bares his teeth. "You touch this fucking bucket and I'll snap your fingers."

Kacchan backs off with an eye roll, leaving Izuku to cradle his food protectively and hiss at the lingering students. No one touches his food without his direct permission and lives to see another day.

"Is everyone good and ready?" Iida shouts, standing in front of the door leading out of 1-A's prep room. "The event's about to begin!"

Oh, I'm good alright.

The students are all milling about, anxiety fresh in the air. Izuku isn't nervous, though. He can't be. He's going to be leaving tomorrow, and there's nothing anyone can do to stop him. He just hopes Kacchan will understand why he has to do this once he wakes up with Missy and all of her belongings in his room.

This is the only way Izuku can protect everyone. If he leaves, All for One will focus on finding him—not on hurting his friends and the ones he cares for.

“Midoriya.”

Izuku whips around, about to throw hands with whoever has decided it’s a good idea to ask him for some chicken, only to stop short when his primal gaze meets mismatched eyes. He blinks, not liking the way he has to look up to stare his classmate in the face. “Todoroki! What’s wrong?”

Todoroki has never sought him out like this. In fact, Izuku hasn’t even heard him speak outside of answering questions in class or battle training. This is new.

“Objectively speaking,” the teen begins flatly, his eyes never leaving Izuku’s. “I’m stronger than you. More capable.”

Well shit. He’s right about the more capable part, but that doesn’t mean he should say it.

Izuku slowly reaches into his bucket and brings a chicken wing up to his mouth, patiently waiting for his classmate to continue as he bites into it. It tastes even better now that he’s doing it to annoy someone.

“All Might’s got his eye on you, doesn’t he? Now, I’m not about to pry into why that is,” his expression darkens, “but I will beat you.”

Izuku blinks. Once. Twice. He takes another slow bite and chews thoughtfully. “Oh.”

“Ooh! A declaration of war from the strongest in the class?” Kaminari teases, his words reminding Izuku that yes, Todoroki is saying this in front of the whole class. Lovely.

Kirishima seems to notice the tense air, as he steps forward to put a hand on Todoroki’s shoulder. “Hey, man, why pick a fight now? We’re about to go on—”

“I really don’t care,” Todoroki says coldly, shrugging off the touch. “I’m not pretending to be anyone’s friend here.”

The sentence makes Izuku pause, lips tugging downwards. The signs have been there all this time, and yet Izuku hasn't paid them much mind in favor of getting through his own issues. I'm sorry. I should've invited you over to our table that day when I had the chance. You probably wouldn't have accepted, but I know it would've stuck with you.

Because despite the cold words and standoffish demeanor, Izuku can see straight through Todoroki. His classmate is just like him, and Izuku has a feeling he knows why.

He looks down, staring into his box of fried chicken. And then, after a moment of contemplation, he holds it out to the boy. Kacchan's glare is hot on his back, but Izuku ignores it. He's planning on giving him the rest of the food anyway as an apology, so there's no reason for him to be jealous.

Not that his friend will know what the apology is for until later.

Izuku keeps his arm outstretched, not caring that most of the boys (plus Mina and Uraraka) have come over to take a wing. Todoroki stays still, though, completely unfazed.

"You're clearly stronger," Izuku agrees, because it's true. He may have more quirks than the dual-haired boy, but it's not like he's going to use them. He doubts all of his quirks together can measure up to the force of fire and ice anyway. "I only barely measure up to the others in skill, objectively speaking."

The skill he lets them see. He can't exactly fight his classmates the same way he fights dangerous criminals. That would require a nice blade and bōstaff, two things Izuku doesn't have permission to have; one of which is banned on campus.

Nobody has to know he has another knife in his left shoe. It's just a precaution.

"Don't be so negative, Midoriya. There's no need to be like that!" Kirishima tries, sweat dropping.

Izuku is thankful that someone is coming to his defense, even if he doesn't deserve it. "Everyone else is aiming for the top," he says quietly, lilac hair flashing in his mind briefly. "Even the kids from the other courses. And I promise you, I'm not planning on falling behind."

One last try. One big finale. That's what this is going to be.

A crumpled copy of a smile flashes across his face. “I’m going for it too.”

Izuku doesn’t miss Kacchan’s suspicious look, and he doesn’t turn around to face him once he walks away either, as he knows that out of everyone on this planet, his friend is the one that’ll know something’s wrong. All he needs is one look to figure him out, and Izuku can’t let him have that.

Not yet. Not ever, probably.

And as they walk out of the prep room and down the hallway, ready to present themselves to the world and all the bloodthirsty media reporters, Izuku can’t help but think back to the conversation he had with All Might.

Izuku’s going to keep his promise. He’s going to tell the world I am here.

And maybe piss off one of the most feared villains of all time along the way. Leading someone on a worldwide wild goose chase sounds fun.

"It’s UA’s sports festival! The one time each year when our fledgling heroes compete in a ruthless grand battle!" Present Mic's cheerful voice calms the beginnings of panic in Izuku's chest. He must be the announcer for the festival. "First up, you know who I’m talkin’ about. The miraculous rising stars who brushed off a villain attack with their steely willpower! The first years of the hero course! It’s Class A!"

The resounding cheers in response make Izuku wince. There are a ton of people in the stands, a lot more than Izuku can ever remember being in UA's past sports festivals. They must be excited to see how the school is doing after the attack.

Iida holds his chin with a hand. “We’re expected to put on the best performance we can in front of so many spectators. I suppose this is merely one more necessary skill if we hope to become heroes."

Something that Izuku will probably never get used to. Good thing he won't have to worry about that for long.

Present Mic goes on to announce the other classes, ranging all the way from General Studies to the Business courses, and Izuku feels himself frown. They’re just here to make us look good. It’s unfair that the school makes the kids who don’t even want to be here attend. This is still a show, I guess. They need good ratings.

Midnight cracks her whip from her place on the stage, and Izuku stuffs his face with another wing, barely paying attention. "Now for the athlete's oath!"

Someone from the back row of the students grumbles: "I still don't understand how an R-Rated hero is allowed to teach high school students."

Multiple people snort, and the aforementioned hero immediately gets frustrated. "Shut it! Your student representative is from Class A, Midoriya Izuku!"

Izuku hums absentmindedly, digging for one of the hidden biscuits, only to choke on air as he fully processes what his teacher had just said. Huh?

He stands there, dumbfounded, until Kacchan elbows him in the side and makes him stumble forward.

"Midoriya? Must be because he placed first in the entrance exam," Sero says.

A student from Class B cranes his head to get a glimpse of their representative. "He broke the record, right?"

Izuku chokes even harder, nearly dropping his bucket altogether as the cameras zero in on him, easily picking him out of the crowd and displaying him on the big screen. What the fuck kind of bullshit is this! Aizawa didn't fucking tell me! Can I even say no?

Iida herds him up a few steps before giving him one last push towards Midnight, who stands to the side to give him room.

Oh. He still has the bucket of chicken in his hands. He offers it to Midnight nervously, blank-faced, and nearly faints when his teacher doubles over in laughter. She just gestures to the microphone, and Izuku's eyes flick up to the screen. And holy shit. He looks like a trash gremlin. His eye bags are as dark as his humor, his hair a green bush. There's chicken grease on his lips and around his mouth, and he hastily wipes at it. Damn, so much for a representative, huh?

The crowd's cheering dies down for a moment as they take a good look at him, and he swears, he swears he hears a familiar female reporter in the distance say it's him, lock up all the microphones in horror.

"Um." His voice cracks on its own accord, and he wishes the ground would just open up beneath him and swallow him whole. He doesn't have any confidence as Izuku on the best of days, and today isn't even close to being one of those. It doesn't look like he can back out now, though, so it's time to put on an act. He clears his throat and tries to at least look put together. He doesn't want to embarrass his teachers too much.

Speaking of which, Present Mic has been too quiet. Izuku wonders if he had to mute himself for some reason. Probably because he's laughing too hard.

"Kid." Midnight has finally stopped cackling and is now staring at him expectantly. "The oath."

"Oh, right!" One of the cameras zooms in on his bucket of chicken, and Izuku flushes. He hopes people don't think it's a sponsor. Actually, now that he's thinking about it, he kind of wants to be sponsored by them. He might get a lifetime supply of KFC out of it. He shakes himself out of his thoughts, suddenly hyperaware of the silence in the stadium. He feels like he's going to puke, and for once it won't be blood coming out. "Hi. How's, uh, how's everyone doing?"

"Just rockin', listener!"

That's the only reply he gets. Izuku is this close to naming Present Mic his favorite hero now instead of All Might. "That's good! So I—I know we all want to do our best today. This is a good opportunity for many of us, right? The past few weeks have been painful, but the only thing we can do is move forward now. The future needs us, not the past, y'know? So, uh, let's all give everything we have." He shifts on his feet, eyes glued to the ground. "Plus Ultra?"

He throws up a fist to mimic All Might's signature pose, only for his arm to accidentally jostle his bucket and cause it to tip, a wing falling with a moist thump onto the stage. The noise echoes faintly through the microphone, and Izuku gets the urge to cha-cha real smooth off a fucking cliff.

A few moments of silence, and then someone from the stands gives a loud whoop! Others hesitantly follow suit, and soon all that's heard is clapping and vaguely weirded-out cheering. Izuku shamefully picks up his fallen wing, practically running off the stage.

Kacchan is busy laughing like a madman, and Izuku throws the dirty wing at his cheek in retaliation because it's not funny, dammit!

"Deku! That was so good!" Uraraka bounces around him, eyes bright. "Very inspirational!"

His cheeks burn and he turns away, mumbling his thanks. There's no way that actually turned out good, right? She must be trying to make him feel better.

Midnight strikes a flirtatious pose. "Now! Without any delay, let's get the first event started. These are the qualifiers!" She brings out a remote from who knows where and points it at the big screen, an animated wheel lighting up. "It's in this stage that so many are sent home crying every year!"

She sounds way too excited about that.

"And the fateful event this year is this!" She clicks a button and the words Obstacle Course Race pop up in bold.

An ordinary race? Something easy to root out all of the outliers, Izuku thinks. Everyone has a pretty equal chance to show off personal skills this way, especially since they might be able to sabotage other students too. Damn. He'll have to set his chicken aside for this.

Izuku feels a small grin tug at his lips as Midnight explains the four-kilometer race. It's going to wrap around the outside of the stadium itself, and apparently anything is free game as long as you don't go off the course. Which is perfect. No limits as far as the eye can see.

"Racers, to your positions!"

A flash of light catches his attention as everyone moves. Izuku looks up and stares at the camera flying overhead in the form of a drone. The reminder that this is all being televised has him steeling his nerves. His father is most definitely going to be watching now, and he wants him to see everything.

"Start!"

The students are off like a rocket. Izuku's legs only burn slightly when he pushes off with Boost. He won't use One for All just yet; he's too sore from his fight with the mercenaries. He bandaged his torso and leg three times this morning in case his stitches decide to come loose during all this, so there's that. He should be fine if he takes it relatively easy.

Even if every step feels like pins and needles.

The gate leading out of the stadium is narrow. This must be the first filter. Izuku stays behind the crowd of students, not wanting to get immediately pushed and shoved for not going fast enough. He has to get in front soon, however, or else he'll miss his chance. He clenches his teeth, knowing this is going to hurt, and jumps a couple of yards into the air, using one of the closest students as a trampoline as he shoots forward and bounces off the walls of the entrance. To others, it kind of looks like he's the ball in a pinball machine.

Todoroki has created an icy pathway to slow others down, so Izuku aims his landing to be on the far side of the track to avoid it.

"Eraser!" Present Mic shouts. "Are you ready for our live coverage and commentary!"

"Not voluntarily."

Izuku snorts, only for his attention to snap back into the game at the sound of Kacchan's explosions nearby. "I ain't letting you get ahead of me that easily, half-n-half!"

Hm. Kacchan and Todoroki. Those are going to be Izuku's two main rivals. That's who he needs to look out for. Iida is also on that list, and with a quick glance around Izuku spots him near the front of the large crowd. His quirk gives him a big advantage for this, so Izuku needs to think of something quick if he wants to be on the same level as—

A rush of air, and Izuku just manages to swerve out of the way in time as a robot pops up from the ground. Another one enters his vision up ahead, and he doesn't break stride as he twists in the air, sending it flying towards the group of students with a swift kick to the main body. That should slow them down at least a little.

But it seems that the more distance Izuku manages to cover, the more the robots start to appear. These ones are sleeker than the ones at the entrance exam were. They must be the extras that nobody destroyed. They wouldn't have been able to salvage any from my battle center.

Present Mic's voice follows the students easily. There must be speakers on the drones flying about. "Every obstacle course needs obstacles! Starting with the first barrier: Robo Inferno!"

As he fully rounds the corner, Izuku and the rest of the students are met with more than a dozen robots, except unlike the other ones, these robots are easily fifty feet high and much larger than the previous ones.

They look like zero-pointers.

Fuck. Izuku only fought one during the exam, and it took a lot out of him just to get up there and manually shut it down. How is he expected to fight multiple at once?

Todoroki is the first to react. He slams his foot to the ground and sends ice up the legs of a few of them, easily freezing them up enough for him to pass under them unscathed. Other students try to follow suit, but Izuku can already see the cracks forming on the thin layer of ice as the robots start to break apart.

They're going to collapse.

Izuku's arms fly up to protect his face as the machines start coming down, large chunks of them breaking off as they go.

"1-A's Todoroki bursting through and sabotaging the others in one move! This guy's cold!"

Hah. That's punny.

Once the dust and debris start to clear up, Izuku realizes just how far ahead the ice-user is. He needs to catch up now, and fast. He can either bulldoze through the remaining zero-pointers and injure himself more than he already is, or he can find another way. It seems he has no choice but to try and find openings. Fighting them all would only waste time.

Find the safest route, even if it's not the fastest. The smaller robots go for the legs, so stay low to the ground. They'll typically avoid face attacks so as not to grievously injure.

As Izuku darts in and out of the fray, taking down robots here and there, he spots Kacchan using his explosions to propel himself up and over the zero-pointers. A few of the other students are too, namely Tokoyami and Sero. They're trying to be quick as well. They must've realized how much of a waste fighting them would be.

Izuku could follow their example and climb up the building-size robots like he did the last time, but that'd take just as much time as him fighting his way through. He might as well stay on the ground.

If only I wasn't fucking injured. I could use One for All to leap high above them otherwise. I would be up ahead with Kacchan and the rest of them.

Something catches his eye, and Izuku slows down just a little to yank a decent-sized slab of metal off the ground. It looks like the shoulder plate to one of the two-pointers. It'd make for a good shield in place of Deflect.

He grips the exposed wires hanging out the side and quickly ties it to his back. It's heavy, but it's not unbearable. He's carried more even without Boost there to help him.

"The current leaders of the pack are overwhelmingly from Class A!"

Gee. Where's the surprise.

A new voice comes from the speakers, and Izuku immediately perks up. Eraserhead doesn't speak often, so when he does, it has to be something important. Maybe something Izuku can use as a hint.

"They know there's no time to hesitate. They've been exposed to the outside world, up close and personal. They've had that fear planted in them." Oh. Unwanted memories plague Izuku's thoughts, and the boy pushes them away in favor of taking down another robot. "They've endured it. Overcome it. They've grown from that experience and have forgotten how to hesitate."

Because hesitating gets you killed. Izuku's known that from the very beginning, and yet he still hesitated back there. Back when his teacher was slammed into the concrete, back when his brother reached for his classmate's face.

Feeling slightly upset now, Izuku lets One for All hum through his veins the tiniest bit. He kicks the head clean off one of the robots, watching as the piece of metal flies into the air and captures the attention of the closest zero-pointer. The motion distracts it for just a moment, and Izuku dashes forward in a blur of red lightning. He breaks through the line of robots and out into the open air just as a loud boom echoes throughout the area.

"Piece of cake!" Yaoyorozu shouts, and Izuku laughs to himself. She made a fucking cannon.

Wicked.

“So the first barrier was a piece of cake? How about the second?” The voice hero is loving every second of this, Izuku is sure. “Fall and you’re out! You gotta crawl if you wanna make it! This is the Canyon of Doom!”

Izuku is running for the next obstacle before Present Mic even finishes. It’s just a series of giant tightropes pulled taut above a gaping ravine, that’s all. He’s run along wires thinner than this during his patrols. The boy is suddenly thankful he made Eraserhead teach him how to do exactly this.

“Focus on the balls of your feet. One after the after,” the hero demonstrates one last time for Izuku, who’s standing off to the side and watching the man run along an electrical wire. “If you let your heel slip to the side, it’s downhill from there. Just focus on the flow of it and you won’t lose balance.”

“You lose balance one more time and I can promise you won’t be getting any more smoothies from me.”

It’s safe to say that Izuku does not, in fact, lose his balance again that night.

He wouldn’t be running across these ropes with such ease right now if it weren’t for him, not that Izuku would ever admit it to the teacher’s face.

Tsuyu is the next of the students to go, and she hops along it just like a regular frog would, using her tongue to help pull herself along. The next to challenge the Canyon of Doom is a support course student decked out in a chaotic mashup of gear and tech. Izuku tries not to get distracted because holy hell, he really wants to talk to her now. She must've made all of that herself if she was allowed to bring them, and is that a fucking jetpack?

Izuku is jealous.

“Meanwhile! The leaders of the pack move on undaunted!”

That’s not a surprise either. All Todoroki had to do was use his ice to skate across, and Kacchan only had to use a few well-timed explosions to fly over it. Their quirks are versatile, and they both certainly know how to use them.

No one knows how many spots they’ll accept for the second round. It’s always different every year depending on what the first round is. It can't be any less than forty, right? They still have two whole rounds to get through after this race.

"Our leader has reached the final barrier! That is to say—this minefield!" Present Mic cackles gleefully. "A quick glance is enough to reveal the mines' locations, so keep both eyes open and watch your step!"

Oh hell yeah. The course was lacking a little bit of spice.

Izuku needs to move quicker if he wants to keep his place. He's in the top ten, he's pretty sure. His basic enhancements are enough for him to keep up with the others, but at this rate he'll be overtaken in no time. His muscles burn as he pumps his legs faster, nearly finished with the second obstacle. He still has to practice more on his tightroping skills; he's not nearly as good or fast at it as Eraserhead is.

If I use One for All again this early I'll tire myself out. I'm already hurting from just this little bit of speed.

A minefield is interesting. It's something that not even Izuku could have expected from UA. This newest obstacle puts the leader at a disadvantage whilst also reeling in those views. It's flashy, but it's also smart.

He rounds the last corner, the last tightrope having been cleared, and he sees Kacchan blasting his way to Todoroki's side in the middle of the minefield. "Hah! This shit can't slow me down!"

I can hear him all the way from here. Present Mic has some competition.

Kacchan takes the lead, and Izuku is sure the media is loving this right now. They always love a good ol' turn around.

"The rest are catching up!" Present Mic reports dramatically. "But with these two grappling for first, can they hold on to their lead?"

Izuku narrows his eyes, watching everyone else brush past him and hobble onto the minefield. He stopped a little bit ago, right where the gates widen up at the beginning of the final obstacle. He can hop around using Boost and scan for safe spots at the same time, which is the safest option—one that will probably work. But the thing is it's going to hurt. The field is large, and it's still quite a long ways until the finish line. It will take him a while to complete it.

And if he uses One for All he would just be making his dilemma obvious. Not only is the whole world watching, but his teachers are probably watching him, too. He's not dumb. They're searching for a slip up.

Besides. There's just a ton of bombs that haven't been stepped on yet, and it would be just a waste if they were left there to collect dust. Izuku fights back a near-feral grin and slides the robot's arm plate off his back. Anti-personnel mines should only be fourteen to fifteen centimeters down. He can just dig them up using the shield

This is probably his worst idea yet, which is why he's feeling absolutely giddy at the mere prospect of it.

This is gonna be so fucking funny on the big screen.

A few students pass him with wide eyed looks, and this time he can't hold back his smile. He takes a step back, admiring his handiwork, and quickly assesses the situation. He's lost his place now, but that's not a big deal. He'll gain it back really quick.

He holds the makeshift shield in front of his body and promptly bellyflops onto the pile of bombs he just dug up.

"Midoriya, what are you—?"

A large explosion is Jirou's answer, and then Izuku is flying through the air, screaming. The wind whips at his face and hair as he gains height and momentum, the slight heat from the bombs licking up his legs.

Taking a page from your book, Kacchan.

"A giant explosion from behind? What caused such a blast? An accident, or was it intentional?"

A drone flies alongside him, and Izuku sees his face briefly on the TV hanging on the outside of the stadium. He's suddenly taken back to that time he jumped out of a helicopter, when the cameras caught the moment Rabbit nearly died on the job. Not his finest moment for sure, but Izuku still looks back on it with extreme fondness. The only difference this time around is that Izuku isn't being tempted with death.

"And Class A's Midoriya rides the wave in hot pursuit—or something!"

Or something is right. Izuku still doesn't have a clue what's going on here, he just kinda thought of an idea and rolled with it. But now it's working and the students down below are looking up at him in shock. His screaming has now turned into maniacal laughter, and he passes Todoroki and Kacchan with relative ease. And god, he lives for the look of surprise on their faces. That's the highlight of his day, hell, his week.

But his momentum is dying down, and he can tell he'll hit the ground soon. If that happens, the other two boys will just surpass him, and Izuku won't have a chance at passing them again unless he uses One for All.

There's the pop of explosions, and Izuku turns back to stare smugly at his two classmates. "Deku! Get the hell back here!"

Todoroki curses and uses his ice to speed himself up, not caring about how it'll help the others now.

"Our former leaders have called a ceasefire to chase down Midoriya! When a common enemy appears, people stop fighting!" A brief pause. "Well, actually, they're still fighting, just not each other!"

"What are you even saying?"

Izuku giggles once again at Aizawa's words, only for his mild amusement to disappear once he realizes his shield is moving away from him, leaving him flying forward by himself, completely vulnerable. I'm stalling. I need to do something.

He tightens his grip on the exposed wires of the slab of metal and tumbles forward in air, now facing the two pursuers. They're right there, just a breath away.

Don't let go. You're getting first place in at least one of these things or else it's all pointless. That's the point of this, right? To make a statement?

Izuku flips, holding the shield high over his head. There's a patch of bombs in front of them a few yards away. He can just see the churned dirt in his haze. It's going to blow up right in his pursuers' faces if he does this right.

Not my problem.

Izuku slams the shield down, right in between the other two, and then he's blasted forward yet again, the shield long forgotten as it gets thrown high in the air. He's sent soaring forward, this time at a much quicker rate. He's not very high like last time, but he's in the lead, and that's all he wants.

"And Midoriya blows off the competition with no time to lose! Your class is something else, Eraserhead, what're you teaching those kids?"

The boy can't hear his teacher's reply in the midst of his sudden panic. He's hurtling through the tunnel toward the finish line, but he's heading straight for the ground as well. Fuck. He has no time to brace.

This is going to hurt.

He clenches his jaw as he hits the floor hard, his stitches pulling painfully at the impact. He rolls sloppily right out into the open, coming to a stop a few yards after the opening.

He lays there for a moment, trying to catch his breath, and feels the eyes of everyone in the stadium on him.

"The one who made it back to the stadium first is none other than Midoriya Izuku!"

The resulting claps and shouts make Izuku lift his head. They're cheering for him.

He's never been praised like this. Sure, as Rabbit he's always had the occasional civilian thank him for saving them or for getting their cat out of a tree, but this? All of this for plain old Izuku?

It's a change. He's not sure what he thinks about it.

Is All Might proud? The thought is traitorous, and Izuku hates how he finds himself instinctively searching the crowds for his mentor's face. Did I do okay?

He hasn't used One for All too much yet, even though he knows All Might probably wants him to. Is he upset over that?

A shadow passes over him, and Izuku blinks up at his friend, Kacchan's face one of irritation. "You made a mistake, Shitku."

Izuku lets a breathy chuckle escape him. "Did I?"

The blond rolls his eyes but yanks him up with a hand. Izuku grunts his thanks, and Kacchan fixes him with a predatory look. "I'm gonna destroy you."

“I’d like to see you try.”

Uraraka and Iida are the next to come up to him, both of them panting and sweaty.

“Deku! that was awesome!” Uraraka pumps a fist in the air, cheeks flushed. “First place, though! Man, I’m jealous!”

Izuku turns away, just as he did after the oath, rubbing the back of his neck. He’ll never get used to this attention. “Ah, it was really close!”

Too close, almost. Everything was pure luck. He honestly didn’t expect his strategies to work that well.

Iida goes on to talk about how he needs to improve with his quirk if he couldn’t even win a race with his speed, and Uraraka chimes in here and there. And sitting there, listening to both his friends happily converse, Izuku finds that he’s actually glad he ended up deciding to participate after all.

He wouldn’t miss this for the world.

“So it’s finally over,” Midnight starts, taking her spot back on the stage. “Let’s check the results!”

The very second Izuku sees Kacchan listed as number three and not number two, he cuts a glance over at the explosive teen, who glares right back at him. “Don’t fucking say it.”

Izuku mimes zipping up his lips, throwing the key away. He’ll just have to tease his friend about this later.

“The top 42 from this qualifying round will move on! Now, on to the second event! I already know what it is, of course.” The R-Rated hero smiles devilishly, winking at one of the reporters positioned off to the side. “Dying in suspense? Next up is a teen favorite: paintball!”

The words flash on the screen, and everyone blinks in unison, equally as confused. Paintball? Izuku thinks. Like what me and Kacchan play at the mall sometimes?

“Participants can, on their own, form teams of two to four members each, though you can choose to work alone if you wish! The rules are fundamentally the same as those of an ordinary paintball game—shoot at other players to disqualify them—but with one exception.” The board changes, listing the top forty-two students again. “Each of you has been assigned a point value based on your ranking in the last event!"

"We'll earn points like in the entrance exam? Sounds simple," Satou begins.

Kaminari frowns. "Wait! If we choose to work in a team, will all our points be combined at the end?"

"I'm about to explain it, so just shut up already!" A crack of her whip has everyone quieting down. "Anyway, yes! Which is why it's important that you choose your members wisely. Your individual point values start at five, at the bottom! So the student who took 42nd place is worth five points, 41st is worth ten, get it? To get a student out, you need to hit them five times. This means that if your target is worth five points, each shot will be worth one. If they're worth ten, each shot is worth two, and so on!"

So if you get shot you lose a fraction of your points and give it to your attacker. There's no way to get your points back either, it seems. You only add to your team's total when you shoot someone—you won't be adding to your own individual value. You're stuck with what you have in the beginning.

There also isn't any bonus-life stuff either. You only have five tries, if you think about it.

That must've been Eraserhead's doing. There are no do-overs in real life, as he would say.

Midnight clicks a button on the remote, a quick list of the rules and objectives flashing on screen. "Now, I recommend forming teams. Not only is it good to have people watching your back, it's also good in the long run, too. If you get eliminated, there's a possibility you can still move on if your remaining team members score high enough to go through the next round! But if all members get out, your team is disqualified regardless of how many points you earned!"

Buckets are passed around filled with gear and equipment, and Izuku feels a bit of excitement course through him. Paintball is his favorite game. He's pretty good at it, too, but he's never been allowed to use his quirks inside the arenas he and Kacchan would use. This is something new to him.

He picks out a pair of red goggles and keens at the sight of a green-themed paintball gun. Perfect.

“Sounds easy, right? There’s a catch.” Midnight’s voice takes on a more sadistic edge. “Our first place participant won’t abide by our five-point scale. He is instead worth ten million points!”

Damn, that sucks. Izuku feels bad for that poor sou—oh. That’s me. I’m the poor soul.

The boy feels as if he suddenly got dunked in ice water. Everyone is looking at him hungrily, eager for a chance at redemption, and he smiles at them nervously.

Ten million? Are you joking? Fucking hell. You know what? Fuck this school. Izuku hates it.

This means that each hit on Izuku is worth two million points, enough to guarantee a team a spot on the leaderboard, most likely. It’s practically a test revolving around Midoriya himself—a test to see who the lucky ones to hit him are, because that part is inevitable. He’s going to be the main target for everyone. If he gets hit once, he can still keep his number one position with eight million points, but that won’t be good enough. He’d prefer it if he didn’t get hit at all. What he needs to do is take out the next greatest thing: Todoroki. He’ll have the second highest amount of points.

“The higher-ranked students are the ones to aim for. This survival game is a chance for a comeback. It’s anyone’s game!”

Yep, Izuku is definitely going to be targeted. He’s going to be in danger. This entire thing is dangerous. This round is going to be so fast-paced it’ll be sheer chaos.

“As you must have heard a countless times since enrolling at UA,” Midnight’s expression darkens, “this is Plus Ultra.”

Good thing Izuku has always felt more comfortable in chaos.

They’re given fifteen minutes to decide on their game plan, but to Izuku the time flies by quickly. He doesn’t know exactly how it happens, but in the end he somehow ends up with a team of his own.

Most of the students avoided him like the plague near the beginning, and just when he was about to call it quits and go solo, Uraraka called out his name. She really is a god among mankind. A savior.

She has an amazing quirk as it is, and this situation will only exemplify that. The middle of the arena has opened up to reveal a large building of some sort, almost like a warehouse—a warehouse that gives Izuku not-so-fond memories, but a warehouse nonetheless. It's large, and its many rooms make for a realistic battle experience. Uraraka can use her quirk to make objects lying around float and distract the other teams into misfiring.

Hatsume Mei ended up seeking Izuku out personally, wanting to show off her babies to any potential heroes watching. Her inventions are even more spectacular up close, and Izuku was more than happy to team up with her if only to get a chance to use her jet pack at some point. He needs to ask her how she managed to make it without having access to dangerous parts. Perhaps Power Loader gave her them? If that's the case, would it be possible for Izuku to have access to their supplies for non-school related purposes?

Izuku was the one to seek out Tokoyami. Dark Shadow is almost like another being in itself, so technically their team has five members. The entity can make enemies think the team is somewhere where they aren't, and they'll mess up. Dark Shadow is also that powerhouse that the team so desperately needed, as Izuku doesn't think using One for All this round will be beneficial in the long run.

He just knows the third and final round will be brutal. If he even makes it that far.

"Formed your teams? Made your plans? Too bad if you haven't, 'cause here we go!" How the voice hero still manages to sound so upbeat is beyond Izuku. "The countdown to this brutal battle royale!"

They're all decked out in their gear, now, and if Izuku's being honest, everyone looks badass. He shifts his paintball gun from one hand to the next, getting familiar with the weight.

The paintball guns are lighter than real guns but heavier than guns that hold tranquilizers. It's a comfortable feeling. Familiar.

Now this is something he's good at.

“Start!”

The students are given a one minute grace period to actually make their way inside the building and find their own pathways. It’s kind of like a maze with the winding hallways every which way you go and the empty rooms off to the side with even more hallways branching off inside it. But, according to the schematics they were given, it all opens up into a large clearing in the middle.

The kill zone.

Altogether, Izuku’s team has 10,000,325 points. They’re automatically in first place by a landslide—it’s just keeping the points that’s the issue.

They rush inside, sticking to the outskirts of the building. It'll do them no good to head straight for the middle where a bloodbath will no doubt start soon.

“Remember the plan!” He says quietly, staring at each of his teammates in turn to make sure they understand. “We spread out for the first half of the game and focus on picking them off one by one! Just don’t let them see you.”

Izuku’s always been a fairly decent shot. He’s always a sniper when he plays this game with Kacchan. He’s got a good eye, apparently.

In Izuku’s opinion, however, he’s just good at seeing things.

They all split up in different directions, and he immediately heads up to the rafters. He needs a good view of everyone passing by. Staying on the ground will just make shooting him easier.

Fifteen seconds until the grace is over, a lone student jogs underneath him, unsuspecting. Izuku almost feels bad.

No one ever thinks to look up.

“You may now shoot, listeners!”

Five quick paintballs to the chest and the student is out for the count. Izuku doesn’t know how many points he just earned, as he didn’t pay attention to the screen on the student’s chest that shows how many lives and points they had left, but what he does know is that if he didn’t just get the first kill he’s going to be upset.

Izuku doesn't wait around to see the student's reaction, he's already off and running. The guns aren't exactly quiet; his position could've been revealed.

He grabs onto a nearby ladder and hoists himself up onto the highest level, and he crouches there for a while, just waiting. He can be very patient when he wants to be.

Extract is doing him a favor. He can feel them coming in his direction before he can even see them, so no one can really sneak up on him. Is this considered cheating? He isn't sure.

After two more kills Izuku decides he should start to head for the middle. He can already hear battles going on and quirks being used. It's nearing the halfway mark, so his teammates should be there soon.

This kill zone is exactly how it sounds: an area in the building where enemy fire comes at you from all sides. There looks to be five teams in the middle right now, all of them trying to block oncoming paintballs whilst also shooting out some of their own. It seems everyone had at least some common sense, as almost every team has some sort of member with a quirk good for shielding.

They haven't spotted him yet, as he's too high above them. He won't be able to get a good shot on any of them, though, not while they're moving around so quickly.

Izuku drops down onto a middle level, landing as quietly as he can—only to realize his dumb, dumb mistake a moment too late.

A large crate is thrown his way by Satou, and Izuku is forced to drop the rest of the way down to avoid being smacked in the face. He is so, so dumb. Jirou could hear him.

Tetsutetsu's team is coming straight for him now, same with Hagakure's. Izuku jumps behind a wall and shoots his classmate twice before trying to make his escape. He powers up One for All, willing to deal with the consequences of using it for his legs if it means he can jump out of here quickly, when something cold and wet takes over his feet.

He's—he's sinking! It must be because of someone from Tetsutetsu's team.

Shit, shit, shit, he's gotta get out of the kill zone! He fires off more warning shots in his attackers' directions, hoping to get them to back off, only to hear the sound of jet propellers. He looks up just in time to see Uraraka drop from above and tap him on the shoulder, making him immediately start to float upward. She pulls him out of the sludge with the jetpack as added force while Hastume comes out of nowhere and distracts the other teams.

Izuku kicks free from the last bit of sludge, shivering involuntarily, and he ducks just in time to avoid a stray paintball.

“Jirou!”

Oh. So not so stray after all.

“On it!” Jirou replies to Hagakure, and Izuku curses as she extends her ear jacks to try and pull him back down for a better shot.

There’s a blur of black, and Dark Shadow flies forward to smack the earphones away. It would be more funny to Izuku had he not just escaped metaphorical doom.

Uraraka flies him up quickly to a nearby safety spot, Hatsume and Tokoyami warding off paintballs the entire way. They all drop down to catch their breath, and Tokoyami nods approving at his quirk. “Well done, Dark Shadow. Be sure to cover our blind spots.”

“Gotcha,” the creature replies

Izuku is suddenly struck with a newfound appreciation for his classmate. He’s just the defense the team needed.

“Well, barely five minutes have passed, but the battlefield’s already crazy! With everyone scrambling for points, it’s not just the ten million out there! Those other high tankers are worth a shot as well.”

Yes. If Present Mic keeps pushing everyone toward the other high-ranking students, it’ll give Izuku and the team an opening. This is more like a one-sided massacre, after all. Everyone in the killzone was aiming at them. They need some form of reprieve.

They do not, however, get that reprieve, as in the next second Shoji is being thrown onto their level by Tsuyu’s tongue, and Izuku chokes upon seeing the multiple guns Shoji holds in his multiple hands. Is that even legal?

He must’ve snagged them from other fallen students.

Extract hums lowly in his mind, and Izuku leaps onto a neighboring platform just in time as Tsuyu's tongue reaches for his weapon. No, Tsuyu must've snagged the guns from existing players. Izuku shoots, but she latches onto a guardrail and hauls herself back. She fires her own shots, but instead of hitting Izuku, it goes right past his shoulder and hits Uraraka instead. Fucking hell.

"Good job dodging, Midoriya!" Tsuyu croaks.

Izuku doesn't get a chance to reply to her as he suddenly feels them. His heart leaps in his throat. "Scatter!"

Kacchan and Todoroki are charging for him at the same time. Kacchan blasts at him, a dark cloud of smoke obscuring Izuku's vision. A paintball cuts through the haze and hits him in the shoulder, another going right past his ear. The slight pain spurs him into action, and he fires his own shots into the smoke blindly before taking off running—only for ice to encase his feet and freeze him in place.

Oh. Oh, no.

Izuku can feel Todoroki behind him, and his team isn't that far off. He twists, being forced to watch with wide eyes as his classmate aims his gun and pulls the trigger. On instinct, Izuku's arms come up in a cross, and he's just about to use Deflect when he realizes just what the hell he's doing.

Two paintballs hit him, one after the other, until he calls upon One for All and smashes the ice into smithereens, freeing himself. Izuku dashes away, red lightning biting at his skin. He's not quite quick enough, though, as another paintball comes flying from the other side of the building and hits him right in the cheek. He forces himself not to break stride and keeps going until he finds himself in an empty closet space. He shuts the door and allows himself a moment to just breathe.

Who got that last shot in? He—he has to find out. Because now he's down to only two million points, putting his team at somewhere around fourth or fifth place depending on who exactly shot him those four times. He can't be sure yet.

His group scattered like he told them to, though that might not have been the best idea, given by the quick loss of their points. Of course they'd both come after me at the same time.

The boy clutches his side, sudden panic hitting him at the thought that oh fuck, I might've torn something! But after a quick check he realizes his stitches haven't come undone yet, though they're loosening, and he can feel the needles of pain coming back. His medicine must be wearing off.

Izuku shakes his head at his own stupidity and lays there for a moment, just listening. He's in a quiet space, so no one can see or hear him, but he can see and hear them.

Someone is attacking Kacchan's team. His friend must've been taken off guard while fighting off Jirou and Hagakure's shared team.

"Too simple, really," Izuku hears.

And is that—? Oh. That's the boy from before. The one that Izuku wholeheartedly despises. The one who, now that Izuku can get a good look at the screen on his chest, must have gotten that last shot in. That's the only way he could have more than 2,000,000 points.

The blond says more stuff to taunt Kacchan, but Izuku doesn't allow himself to pay attention just yet. He's fingering the trigger on his gun as he forces himself up. He has the perfect angle here, hidden in this little room with little peepholes all around it. He can shoot the blond —Monoma, his friends called him, and eliminate him. His teammates are nowhere to be seen.

When Izuku does let himself pay attention, he regrets it immediately.

"Did you really need to shoot for first place? You're already a celebrity, aren't you?" Monoma's mere voice grates on Izuku's ears. "The victim of that sludge incident! I'll have to ask you sometime. How does it feel to get attacked by villains on an annual basis?"

And there it is again. Those words.

Celebrity. Sludge villain. Attack.

Izuku feels something dark enter his bloodstream, and the grip on his gun tightens. His eyes flicker to Kacchan, who seems to have snapped as well.

No one talks to my friend like that and gets away with it you fucking coward.

But just as Monoma shifts that centimeter over, just as Izuku is about to pelt him with a whole lot more than five paintballs, Present Mic's voice rings out in the large warehouse and Monoma disappears from his vision.

“Both the doggedly pursued first place team and its determined pursuers from Class A are nothing to sneeze at! Let’s take a look at the current spread. How are our teams doing after seven minutes of play?”

A hologram pops up in the middle of the small space Izuku is hiding in, so it seems that Nezu must be watching him as well.

A brief, shocked pause before Present Mic speaks again. “Oh? Now wait just a second! Team Midoriya has lost their place as number one and have dropped down to number four! What’s going on?”

Todoroki’s team is first, as they shot Izuku twice to get an extra four million points, followed by Bakugou and Monoma. The latter is only third right now by the skin of his teeth.

That’s not right. Izuku is decidedly going to kill him.

It’s all too clear what happened during the first round. Class B threw the qualifiers and planned for the long game. Even before now, Izuku has had the impression they’re stronger than they show, but this is a whole new level. They want to end Class A’s supremacy by completely humiliating them.

By the time the game is more than half over, Izuku has found his way into very large vents. He’s been planning on staying in there and sniping the occasional fool that happened to go under him, but then, right at the last three minutes mark, the hatch beneath him gives way and drops him right in the middle of room he does not want to be in.

The air turns cold behind him. Extract warned him a while ago that they were here, but to be fair Izuku didn’t expect to get dropped from the vents.

Fucking Nezu. Fuck off you funky stoat.

Izuku turns around to face his classmate, who has his gun hanging limply at his side, and nods in greeting. “Todoroki.”

“Midoriya,” is all the warning he gets before the ambush happens. But this time, Izuku is ready for it.

The two shots that come his way from behind are easily dodged, and Izuku picks up a heavy crate sitting nearby and kicks it at them. The wood splinters and makes the weights inside of it go flying.

Yaoyorozu and Iida are pushed back, but Kaminari doesn't waste time and immediately sends out a wave of electricity, shocking Izuku. He breaks it off too early, however, as if he's afraid of hurting Izuku too much, and the green-haired boy uses this worry to his advantage. He shoots forward in a blur of red, quickly snatching the guns from both Yaoyorozu and Kaminari before either of them can react, and snaps them in half with a grunt.

The entire team is holding back, that much is for sure.

They're trying to protect Todoroki while also trying not to harm him. This leaves him more exposed than he would've been, which makes it easy for Izuku to see his chance. Todoroki can't use much of his ice without hurting Iida or his other teammates either, so he's left standing off to the side while the others try and detain Izuku.

Yeah. That's not going to slide.

Izuku jumps on the wall and soars sideways through the air, skillfully ignoring the throbbing heat in his stomach, and he aims.

Bingo.

Todoroki's eyes widen. The paintball heads right for him, and Izuku knows right from that look that his classmate is on his last shot. He doesn't even have to look at his screen to know. Todoroki will get eliminated if this one hits, and if he gets eliminated, his teammates will be on the chopping block. They'll get picked off until there's no one left, and then the four million they got earlier will be worth nothing.

Ice is a no-go. For him to make an ice barrier thick enough to stop the paintball at this close of a range, he'd have to risk harming one of his teammates. Todoroki won't do that, Izuku is sure. He may not always be a team player, but he's not stupid.

And so, for the first time, Izuku sees a spark of flame erupt from the boy's left side. It happens quick; a flash of orange and yellow in front of him, and then the shell of the paintball melts as it makes contact with the wall of fury and heat before it can even touch the boy.

It's beautiful, in a way, if not entirely dangerous.

But that beautiful fire also means Izuku can't touch or shoot Todoroki anymore, so he has no choice but to retreat. Iida tries to rush him, seemingly not wanting to use his own paintball gun, but Izuku pushes himself faster, cold lightning licking at his flesh.

One more shot and Izuku is out, too. He can't get hit anymore or he'll screw everything up.

When he meets back up with his teammates near the middle of the building, hiding up in the rafters, he can barely look them in the eye. "Sorry guys, they trapped me. It was like an ambush."

A well-coordinated ambush at that.

But the other students don't seem to mind. They're still in fourth, after all, so they're most likely going to head to the next round. Uraraka and Hatsume ended up getting a lot of people out with their combined efforts, and so did Tokoyami with Dark Shadow as his blanket of darkness.

The middle down below is nothing short of a war zone. People are using their quirks to trip others up and defend their own remaining points. Paintballs of all different colors are flying, and some people have taken to just throwing the actual guns at their targets to distract them while a teammate with better aim shoots at them. It's a bloodbath, and many are heading for the exit as they get eliminated in the blink of an eye. There's not many left at this point.

Bakugou and a few other teams are duking it out, just trading hits and not doing much damage to the other. The sounds of explosions take the precedence over every other sound. Todoroki is nowhere to be seen.

Less than thirty seconds left. He's okay. He could hide here, he could hide and stay at fourth place. But it's not enough.

It'll never be enough for Izuku.

He calms his breathing. There's a multitude of quirks all around him, and it's slightly overwhelming. He's been holding back Extract, trying to push it away because of how annoying it is in his head, but now he needs it.

For the first time in a very long time, Izuku calls upon Extract willingly, and he searches.

It doesn't take long to find him. He can feel him, hiding behind his own large obstacle on the ground level. He was planning on waiting it out, too. Yeah, Izuku isn't going to let that happen. He doesn't deserve to get away with being in third.

Monoma has been plaguing Izuku's thoughts since the first day back after the USJ. In some ways he reminds Izuku of Kacchan, in some ways not. Kacchan has conviction in his eyes and the strength to rise up to a challenge whenever faced with one. Monoma is like a wasp, one that stings and stings and stings without a reason, if only to quiet his own insecurities.

Izuku finds it hard to truly be afraid of Kacchan, at least not anymore. His words hurt sometimes, but that kind of pain is a temporary thing. He knows that his friend cares, even if he doesn't show it. Those words don't leave scars like Monoma's does. Because sometimes, Izuku can't help but feel that Monoma is right.

Their class is special now. Bonded together through a traumatic experience. Some of them only came upon their spot in 1-A because of sheer luck, including Izuku. He can see where Monoma is coming from, and he knows that it's just the boy's strategy to mess with people's emotions, but he can't help but feed into that anger he's feeling inside him.

And now he's been given the chance to act on that anger without any real repercussions. It's almost too good to be true.

He won't lose to Monoma. He can't. He'll take him out personally just to spite him and make sure he knows that 1-A is worthy of their titles as heroes in training. They're not just a bunch of cocky assholes.

He'll show him.

He steps out of his hiding spot, ignoring his teammate's frantic calls behind him. He steps onto the ledge, and far down below he hears one of the students ask their teammate why do I hear Megalovania?

He knows he's being petty, but that word might as well be his middle name. He locks onto the copy cat Extract is so very fond of, and right then it's almost like a switch has been flipped. Everything around him becomes clearer, as if in high definition. His chest feels tight, and he feels as if he breathes he might just release that pressure inside him and let the coil spring loose. The faintest bit of red seeps into his eyes, and the boy grips the gun a bit tighter.

A vengeful Izuku is a scary thing.

He steps off the platform and drops headfirst into the middle of the war, a sharp smile on his face as he shifts the gun just a little and pulls the trigger.

Found you.

He catches Monoma's gaze halfway across the battleground and sees the look of realization on his face as the boy remembers he's the last of his team. A new wave of paintballs come toward Izuku, everyone eager to be the one to get the remaining two million.

Izuku's own five paintballs hit Monoma in the center of his forehead with deadly precision, one right after the after, and the force is enough to have the blond stumbling back.

And maybe Izuku will pay for that later, as no teenager should have that level of accuracy with a gun, but he can't do anything about it now.

The buzzer sounds, and then the balls that were aimed at Izuku collide with him all at once. He bites back a cry at the onslaught. Some of them hit his leg and back, but others hit his stomach, right near his wound—

For a moment there, he nearly blacks out from the sharp wave of pain that overtakes his body as he hits the ground, and when he comes to, Uraraka is the first face he sees. She helps him to his feet using her quirk. "Deku, we did it! We got third place! And that move you just did was so cool and—hey, are you okay?"

Izuku laughs nervously as they walk their way out of the warehouse, his hand trying to discreetly cover his stomach. He can barely even walk straight. This can't be happening to him right now. "I'm just fine! I'm happy we made it to the finals!"

It's a good thing Present Mic is quick with the results, as Izuku needs to leave right now.

"Team Todoroki got first place, Team Bakugou got second, and Team Monoma got—oh? What happened there? What a turn of events, listeners! In third place we have Team Midoriya, and for fourth place Team Shinsou comes out of nowhere with the unexpected elimination of Monoma!"

The rankings aren't even all the way out of the voice hero's mouth before Izuku starts to speed walk to the bathroom, waving off the concerns of Uraraka and Iida. His stitches have definitely loosened, and he can feel something vaguely wet coating the insides of his bandages. Damn it all, he has to fix this before it becomes obvious. There's an hour break before the final test, so he's got time.

By the time Izuku makes it into a stall inside the stadium, he's already out of breath. Fuck.

He shouldn't have gone after Monoma like that. Why did he do that? It was a stupid idea, really. Childish, too. Does he always have to fuck things up in his life like this?

Izuku rolls his ring up and down his finger out of habit, needing something to do with his free hand as he lifts up his shirt to inspect the damage. He feels like he's going to throw up, and his head is pounding. There's no way his wounds are getting infected, is there? He cleaned them up that night, albeit quickly, so he should be fine.

He should be better than fine. He's been through worse. He doesn't know why this has to happen now of all times. Literally any other time would've been ideal.

He's royally screwed, isn't he? He fucked up. Izuku fixes up the stitches as best he can without proper materials and presses toilet paper over the wound to wipe up the small dribbles of blood that escaped the incisions. He places the sticky bandages back on top, over the added layer toilet paper, his jaw starting to hurt with how hard he's clenching it.

There's no alcohol to numb the pain this time.

It only takes him another few minutes to finish up, and thanks to Extract, Izuku is only half surprised when he comes out of the bathroom and finds Todoroki waiting for him at the mouth of the hallway, face partially shadowed.

He says his name in that low way of his, and to be frank, Izuku could just walk away. His classmate can't exactly make him stay. He could just walk right past him and ignore the other boy so he can deal with his own problems, but he doesn't.

Izuku stops, and he listens.

Todoroki Shouto is something of a conundrum.

The son of the number two hero is cold, indifferent, yet determined in everything he does. Every move seems to have a reason behind it, every look comprised of a plethora of emotions that are so tightly contained that not even Izuku can identify them all.

But upon closer inspection, with Todoroki leaning against the wall just a few yards away from him with this look in his eye, Izuku thinks that that's not quite right. His emotions aren't contained, they're suppressed. As if he doesn't understand how he's supposed to deal with them, so he just sweeps them under the rug and covers them up with a sort of angry facade that pushes everyone away.

It's familiar, but only at first glance. Kacchan's intimidation is different: it's a fiery heat, a string of curse words and insults, and it's not always honest. Kacchan doesn't always mean the words he says; it's more of a barrier, a better, legal way to express himself since homicide is frowned upon.

Todoroki's intimidation, however, is colder. It's ironic considering Todoroki should be the one with the fiery spirit, but now Izuku's starting to think he's finally beginning to understand why he is the way he is—it's because he simply doesn't know how else to exist. He doesn't know how to be soft.

All he knows is heat and scorching fire, brutal fists and angry expressions. So perhaps the cold is where he finds himself more at home.

Which leads to the problem at hand.

Izuku slows to a stop and stares at the boy. His classmate is standing half in the shade, his right side shadowed and his left side illuminated in a golden glow, bringing attention to the nasty burn right over his eye.

I wonder if it still hurts you after all those years.

Izuku's own scars itch at the thought.

"You want to talk?" He asks, trying to sound neutral. The last thing he needs is to piss his classmate off. "The dining hall will be packed if we don't hurry."

Not that he cares much about that. He just wants to get back to his bucket of chicken. And maybe look up some more cat videos for motivation while he's at it.

Todoroki is still standing there. Glaring. Izuku holds his gaze without blinking, genuinely concerned. I bet he wins most staring contests.

It doesn't take much longer for the boy to speak: "You surprised me. So much so that I broke my own pledge."

Oh. So this is about what happened during paintball. Izuku doesn't think he likes where this conversation is going anymore. A small part of him had hoped this wouldn't be another confrontation.

It would've been to Todoroki's advantage to use his left side during the entirety of the second round, and yet he didn't use it until he deemed it necessary.

"Iida, Kaminari, Yaoyorozu." He brings his hand out of his pocket and studies it as he speaks. "None of them felt it. In that last instant, I was the only one feeling that pressure."

The only pressure Izuku remembers feeling in that situation was the pressure of KFC's possible lawsuit hanging over his head, but he doesn't voice this thought aloud.

Todoroki looks back up. "You didn't use your power, and I still felt that shift. It reminded me of someone."

"Oh?" Izuku tries to mask the sudden panic that stabs at his gut. There's no way his classmate knows about his fath—

"Are you All Might's secret love child or something?"

And—wait, what?

It's Izuku's turn to stare, blank-faced and confused as he processes the question. Is he who's secret what?

Todoroki just blinks at him, as serious as ever, and Izuku can't help it, he laughs. He doubles over, one hand on his knee and the other clutching his stomach. The movement has pain racing up his spine, but he can't bring himself to stop. The fact that one of his classmates is asking him if he's All Might's son, out of all the heroes out there, speaks volumes on All for One's parenting.

Oh my god, he'd be so pissed if he heard this! Yes!

"Yes?" Todoroki echoes, making Izuku sober up instantly.

"Wait, no! That's not it." Izuku flushes suddenly, the meaning of the words finally settling in. "I didn't mean to say that aloud."

A moment of pause, and then: "Ah, I see. You're supposed to keep your relationship a secret."

"What?"

"I knew there was something you were hiding."

"Hold on—!"

He cuts off Izuku's attempt at fixing the mistake, eyes narrowing. "You know, my father is Endeavor. The second strongest hero. And since you're related to the number one, I have all the more reason to crush you."

If Izuku is being honest, that last part doesn't sound so bad. Todoroki has a jawline so sharp you could probably cut bricks with it.

"Yeah, he's gone all out to make a name for himself as a hero, but he's always seen the living legend as a roadblock and an eyesore." The boy looks to the side, seemingly annoyed at the mere mention of his father and All Might. "My father could never beat him on his own, so he came up with another plan."

Izuku speaks before he can stop himself, memories of the files he got a glimpse of in the number two hero's safe that day coming back to him. "A quirk marriage?"

Todoroki's eyes narrow, looking surprised and slightly suspicious. "Yes. With his wealth and fame, my father made my mother's family agree to the marriage. All to get his hands on her quirk." His words darken. "I'm nothing more than a tool for that human garbage. He raised me as a hero just to fulfill his own ambitions."

And in a sick, twisted way, it makes sense. Endeavor has very powerful flames, and he's susceptible to overheating if he uses too much of it at a time. With the added power of ice, that weakness would be nearly nonexistent for a fire quirk. It's a good balance.

"As I remember it, Mom was always crying. She told me she couldn't stand to see my left side right before she threw scalding water on my face."

Is that why she's in a hospital? Because your father blamed her and put her there to make things easier for himself?

"In short, not using my left side against you was my revenge on him. By never using my rotten father's quirk—no, by rising to the top without it, I'll have denied him everything."

And isn't that familiar? Extract twitches, as if sensing Izuku's thoughts, and the boy clenches his teeth to fight back the irritation bubbling up inside him. Not at Todoroki, never at Todoroki; at the world.

Same situation, different quirk. It makes Izuku's blood boil.

His classmate stuffs his hand back in his pocket and turns away. "You don't have to worry about me revealing your secret. Either way, I'll rise above you with just my right side. Sorry for wasting your time."

"You didn't waste it," Izuku mumbles, but the boy doesn't stop walking.

He watches him go, mind racing. There's nothing for Izuku to say, so he stays quiet.

He's doing this to make a point. It's petty, but not to him. That kind of thinking is what gets you killed. He frowns. But am I one to talk? Am I being a hypocrite?

Whatever. Izuku can't do much about it now. The break is an hour long, so he has plenty of time to annoy people and cause chaos.

He heads for the lunchroom, glaring at Kacchan once he rounds the corner. "You know, you didn't have to stalk us like that. It's weird."

"Your stupid notebooks are worse," Kacchan counters, falling into step beside him. "And maybe I should tell All Might congratulations. It's a boy."

Izuku turns an unimpressed look on him, cheeks burning. “Really. That’s what you got out of that conversation?”

“Yep, and I’m never letting you forget it. ‘Sides, he’s better than your real one, isn’t he?”

Izuku trips him and flees.

Lunch ends much quicker than Izuku would’ve liked.

“Before we get to the final event, I’ve got good news for all those out of the running!” Present Mic announces. “This is still a sports festival, so we’ve prepared a recreational activity for all participants! We even shipped in cheerleaders from America to get you pumped up! Once that’s over, we’re on to the final event.”

Izuku wipes his greasy hands on Kacchan’s shirt, cackling at the kick he gets in reply.

“Between the sixteen members of the four winning teams, we’ll have a formal tournament! A series of one-on-one battles!”

Oh. Oh fuck yeah.

Kirishima seems to brighten up as well. “A tournament, huh? So we’ll be up in that ring I see on TV every year!”

“The format’s always different, but most involve some kind of head-to-head competition.”

Last year was sword fighting. Izuku thinks that that one was the most entertaining of all the years.

“The matchups will be decided by drawing lots. Once that’s settled, we’ll move on to the festivities and then the tournament itself!”

Midnight explains, flashing another signature smile at the cameras. "It's up to each of you sixteen finalists whether or not you participate in the fun. I expect some of you would rather take a breather and save your strength. Now, let's start with the first-place team."

Before the hero can continue, however, Ojiro steps forward. "Um, excuse me. I'd like to drop out."

Izuku raises a brow as the boy continues on despite the protests of his classmates and the crowds.

"The paintball battle," he begins, his face looking like he tasted something sour. "I have no memories of anything that happened up until the tail end. It's probably his quirk that did it."

He gestures with his tail, and Izuku's eyes slide over to the boy in question. Lilac hair. Tired features. Yes, that's who Ojiro teamed up with, isn't it?

He can brainwash people. He did it to me before, but I still have memories of it and how I felt during it. Does he have multiple aspects to his quirk, or is Izuku a special case?

Perhaps it's different for everyone. He'll have to look more into that in the future.

By the time his brain is done spewing ideas, Ojiro and a boy from Class B have both asked to drop out, both for the same reason.

"These guys! So manly!" Kirishima says, close to tears.

"We have a strange turn of events," Present Mic says, sounding giddy at the drama. "What will the coordinator decide?"

Midnight tilts her head up, studying the boys through sharp eyes. "How naïve and green." A pause, and then she cracks her whip with a predatory smile. "I like it!"

Izuku snorts, unsurprised.

"Shouda and Ojiro have officially withdrawn! Now, for the replacements..."

In the end, Tetsutetsu and Shiozaki replace them, which makes everything all the more interesting. Tetsutetsu is exactly like Kirishima, though instead of just hardening up his skin, he can turn into steel.

“And here are the matchups!”

When Izuku gets a good look at the board and sees who’s fighting who, he can’t help but let out a disappointed breath.

Fuck. If he wins his first match his second is going to be against Todoroki. But before that...

“Midoriya Izuku. That’s you, yeah?”

Izuku’s eyes widen when he turns to face the much taller boy behind him. Curse his damned height. Everyone always seems to make Izuku feel like a child. That must be a shared quirk, he thinks.

He can see the boy better now in the light. The alleyway was dark that night, but Izuku still recognizes him. The eyes are what catches his attention first. They’re the same as they were when Izuku first saw him after class that day: tired, half-lidded, done-with-everything eyes with orchid hues that Izuku can stare at forever and not get tired of.

Shinsou Hitoshi. A name to match the face. Izuku likes it.

He opens his mouth, a joke on the tip of his tongue, but then Extract ripples in his mind like a wave in the ocean, and Ojiro is placing his tail over Izuku’s face from behind. “That guy. Don’t answer him.”

Shinsou just smiles and strolls away. Izuku is slightly disappointed.

And when Ojiro pulls him aside and explains everything, Izuku thinks he’s starting to understand the purple-haired boy just that much more.

They’re given a short reprieve before the tournament.

Some prefer to psych themselves up while others try to relax. Everyone is dealing with it differently, Izuku realizes, and before he knows it, the time comes.

“Thanks, Cementoss!” Present Mic says to his workmate, marveling at the new arena that had been made. “Hey, guys! Are you ready?”

Only the crowd responds, the students opting to stay quiet out of nerves.

“You’ve been through hell to get here! But now it’s time for the one-on-one tournament! You’ve only got yourself to rely on! Even if you’re not a hero, this saying holds true! You know it! Spirit, technique, strength, wisdom, and knowledge. Use ‘em all and show us your best!”

Okay. He can do this. Izuku paces the hallway leading up to the platform. He’s up first with Shinsou, and honestly this entire match should be easy. So why is he nervous? During the previous two rounds there were other students there to move the attention away from him. But now is different. Now it’s just him and his opponent in front of millions of eyes.

“Hey!”

Izuku isn’t surprised at his mentor’s greeting. He felt him coming a few hallways ago.

“It took a while, but you’re finally getting the hang of One for All!”

The boy gives a weak smile, rubbing his arms together to get rid of his chills. His mentor is in his small form, a soft smile on his face. Izuku can’t bear to look him in the eye for some reason, so he stares at a point on the wall just past him. “Not really. I still haven’t used it much yet.”

“Even still, my boy. You’ve gotten this far without it, so imagine what you’re capable of doing with twenty percent of it.”

Izuku shakes his head. “I’ve just gotten lucky with everything, that’s all.”

For all of his reflexes and training, Izuku isn’t quick enough to dodge the whack to the head his self-deprecation earns him. Another chop follows right after the first, this time to his throat.

Izuku wheezes and shoots him a betrayed look as he tries to force air back into his lungs.

“That’s because you’re always trying your hardest, my dear prince of nonsense! You’ll never be a hero looking so mopey!” All Might transforms while Izuku's busy pouting, and he pats at his ward's head as if that'll fix what he did. "Now, listen. Especially when you're feeling worried or scared, that's when you gotta smile! You've come this far, so show some pride, even if it's fake! Never forget that I'm expecting big things from you!"

Izuku doesn't think he'll ever forget that part. Guilt crawls up his throat and eats away at his insides, but he does as his mentor says and forces himself not to look so gloomy.

He feels kind of floaty as he walks onto the field at the call of the first match. He walks up the steps, heart thumping in his ears. Shinsou is looking right at him, unperturbed. It reminds Izuku faintly of Aizawa.

He steels himself. Remember why you're doing this.

"The first match!" Present Mic starts. "The powerhouse who dominated the first round and apparently really likes chicken, it's Midoriya Izuku from the hero course! Versus the scary-looking—ow!—versus the not-scary-looking General Studies student who's done nothing to stand out so far, Shinsou Hitoshi!"

Shinsou merely blinks at the intro, and Izuku mirrors his expression. He's played this game with Aizawa plenty of times. The reminder that he's never won even one of those battles with his teacher doesn't help his nerves at all.

"The rules are simple! Win by knocking your opponent out of the ring, immobilizing them, or getting them to say they give up! And fight dirty if you must! Ethics have no meaning here! We've got our good ol' Recovery Girl on standby!"

He has to refrain from getting injured. He doesn't need the healer checking him over and finding something she shouldn't.

Izuku tunes the rest of the rules out. Killing is a no-no, obviously. That's why Cementoss is there. His quirk is the best suited for this.

(And if Izuku were Rabbit in this moment, he'd snap his fingers and whisper in faux disappointment there goes my plans, but he's not, so he stays quiet.)

"I give up, huh? Get it, Midoriya?" Oh. His opponent is talking to him. Izuku doesn't like the way his last name sounds on Shinsou's tongue. His first name would suffice. "This battle's going to test your strength of will. If you've got any kind of vision for your future, there's no sense in worrying about how you get there."

That's a dumb way to look at it, but go off.

"Now let's get this thing started!"

Izuku waits for the go-ahead. That's all he needs to do.

"Like that monkey babbling about his stupid pride."

And that's... harsh. Is that what he really thinks, or is he just trying to get a rise out of Izuku?

Either way, Izuku remains neutral. He's been trained to withstand this kind of pressure. He's been bullied for most of his life, so he knows how to handle comments like these. But this time is a bit different since it's not directed at him but instead at one of his classmates.

Still, he stays silent. Despite what everyone thinks, Izuku knows when to shut the hell up. Because back then it was either be quiet or be punished.

Habits never really die, and they're even easier to slip back into. Ojiro doesn't need someone to defend him, he can do that just fine himself. He wouldn't have dropped out if that weren't the case.

"Ready?"

"What kind of dumbass throws away a chance like this?"

"Start!"

Izuku sees it: the shift in Shinsou's stance as he prepares himself. Not to fight, no, but to watch. To react.

He expected Izuku to rush him, that much is obvious. Instead, Izuku stands in his place for a couple of seconds before taking a few steps forward and stopping again. Testing him.

Shinsou remains still.

He's not a fighter. Not physically, at least. There are no muscles underneath that gym uniform of his despite the tall build he has. He'll still be trouble to grapple with since Izuku isn't planning on using any quirks. That's just how weight and gravity works.

"Not going to say anything?" There's a break in his facade. He's worried. A small crease forms between his thin brows, and Izuku pieces the fragments together.

He's always phrasing his sentences like a question. Ojiro was right, it seems. He can brainwash you if you reply to him, but it has to be an answer of some kind.

He'll win this one for Ojiro for helping him out. Izuku probably would've been out by now without that information.

Present Mic is getting bored. "Can't you show any emotions, listeners! Is this a staring contest or a battle?"

The crowd shows their agreement by cheering.

"Must be nice to have everything handed to you, Midoriya Izuku." Shinsou is spitting out his words now. "Thanks to my quirk's nature, I couldn't enter the golden gates. You wouldn't get that. You're naturally blessed."

Blessed. Am I?

Petulant anger makes its way in, but he just grits his teeth. His opponent doesn't know anything about him, so he can't get angry at him. It's not Shinsou's fault.

Izuku reminds himself of how the boy found him in that dumpster. He managed to get him under control then. He could've turned him in, and yet he didn't, so he can't be that bad.

In a way, he's just like Izuku.

Fuck. I need to stop relating to my schoolmates.

"Are all of you hero course students so arrogant that you won't even speak to someone from a lower department? If all the attack on the USJ did was boost everyone's egos, I don't see how it could've been so bad."

And there it is. The snapping point.

Izuku's eyes burn, the familiar tingle of One for All begging to be released, but he holds it back.

"Come on, are you both asleep? The crowds are gonna start booing soon!"

Izuku bares his teeth in what might generously be called a smile—it's too sharp and haunting and vicious, and yet it's all too familiar for a few people watching somewhere far away on the other side of the screen.

His hands stay at his side as he stalks toward his opponent. Shinsou's panicking now, spouting out more insults that Izuku would've dropkicked anyone else over a long time ago, and Izuku decides quickly that he'll save Present Mic the stress.

He dashes forward the last couple yards and grabs Shinsou by the shoulder with one hand, driving his forearm into his gut and shoving him back toward the line.

"Why won't you spit something out, dammit!" A blur of motion, and a large fist cracks against the side Izuku's face. The boy's head snaps back and makes him stumble a couple yards away.

Izuku pauses, and the world seems to hold its breath. It was a good punch, all things considering, but it must've hurt Shinsou a lot more than it did Izuku with how sloppy his form was. It only pushed Izuku this much away because Shinsou put his entire body weight into it.

He blinks and slowly wipes a speck of blood that's dribbling from his bottom lip. The punch split it open, and now that he's thinking about it he can feel his cheek and mouth throbbing. When he glances back up, Shinsou's expression is full of terror.

But he's not scared of him, no. He's scared of what he stands for.

If you're gonna hit me, hit me harder, Izuku thinks darkly, standing ramrod straight. You should've knocked me out the first time.

He goes for him again using the same technique. Shinsou is already close to the line, so it won't take much. Izuku has pulled fridges before; this isn't hard for him. Not physically, at least.

"Trying to push me out? Not gonna happen!" Shinsou sticks his leg out to trip him, but Izuku simply uses it as a stepping stone to jump up and drive his knee into his opponent's chin. Shinsou grunts and grabs for Izuku's throat. "You get out!"

And when he'll look back on this moment much, much later, Izuku will realize that that was an accident, that Shinsou was aiming to grab at his face instead and just block his vision, but the damage is already done.

On reflex, Izuku snatches the wrist holding his neck and fists Shinsou's shirt, spinning around on his heel as he throws the taller boy right over his shoulder.

A move that's been drilled into him for a long, long time.

Shinsou's back slams into the concrete with a painful thud, and Izuku backs off.

"Shinsou is out of the ring!" Midnight calls out. "Midoriya moves on to the second round!"

Izuku calms his breathing, wiping his lip again. A quick fight, and yet he's still left reeling. He supposes he shouldn't be too surprised. He is a little injured.

Shinsou is still on the ground, eyes closed. He looks disappointed and upset. Almost... angry.

Izuku walks closer, his shadow falling over the other and making him open his eyes. He extends a hand, trying to find the right words to say. "I know what it's like to be hated for your quirk," he settles on, voice quiet. He really does regret ending the match so soon, but what else could he have done?

Shinsou's face contorts into one of surprise. The rage follows soon after. "Don't spew me that bullshit," he snaps, ignoring the hand entirely. "Your quirk is like a dream compared to others. You don't get to say that."

Perturbed but still not surprised, Izuku silently retracts the offer as Shinsou gets up.

"Goodness gracious! That was anticlimactic! Well, put your hands together for our fierce competitors!"

"Shinsou," he calls out, the cheers of the crowds making it so only he can hear him. "Why do you want to be a hero?"

His schoolmate throws an irritated glance over his shoulder and doesn't hesitate. "We don't get to choose the things we naturally admire."

Izuku looks down, the words reverberating in his skull, and suddenly he's not there. He's in a dark room filled with static. He's watching through someone else's eyes, but the boy in the corner of the room is still him, just younger. A TV flickers on, illuminating a gaunt face and shallow features. All Might is on the screen, hands on his hips as he answers questions about his latest villain fight.

The younger Izuku has his elbows on his knees, one hand holding the number one hero's plushie and another tightly gripping a knife. The plushie falls to the floor with a muted thump. A drop of blood sides off the knife and hits it in the cheek, and the memory falls away.

A wannabe-hero raised as a villain. It doesn't get any more ironic than that.

No, Izuku agrees, Shinsou's words still tearing at his insides. No, we don't.

He understands. He does.

Izuku is just about to walk away when voices from above make him snap his head up.

"You were awesome out there, Shinsou!"

"Almost!"

"Had us on the edge of our seats!"

"You're the shining star of us general studies guys!"

Shinsou glances up, looking hesitant and also a bit surprised at the sudden positive feedback. Hell, even the pros are saying good things about him one section over.

"Hear that, Shinsou?" One of his classmates call. "You're awesome!"

The boy in question bows his head, letting the praise wash over him. He stops by the hallway entrance, and Izuku waits. "They'll consider transfers to the hero course depending on the results here. Remember that." He shakes his head. "Maybe I failed this time, but... I'm not giving up. I'll show them what it takes to make the hero course, and I'll become a greater hero than all of you, got it?"

Izuku's lips quirk up. "Got it. You know, we've got an open seat in 1-A —"

The fuzziness takes over, and then everything is like a movie scene. It's just like that time in the alley. No Extract to bother him, no phantom pains of wounds healed long ago—it feels good.

“It’d be easy to mess everything up for you now, so just promise me you won’t lose in a sorry way out there.”

The word escapes him without permission. “Right.” And just like that he’s snapped out of his trance, and it takes everything in him not to go after him again.

Shinsou Hitoshi is peculiar, indeed.

After convincing Recovery Girl that he is fine and does not need to be checked over, much less healed, Izuku finds his way to the stands.

Uraraka and Iida have saved him a seat, so he sits down next to them and promptly ignores Kacchan’s glare.

He’s definitely suspicious now. Oh well.

The match with Sero and Todoroki has just begun. Even from this far away, Izuku can tell there’s something wrong with his classmate even before he creates the biggest glacier Izuku has ever seen. It’s overkill, if anything, and Sero easily accepts his defeat and earns a chorus of weak good try’s from the audience.

Todoroki ends up having to defrost his opponent with his left hand, and to Izuku, something about him just seems sad.

Class B’s Shiozaki Ibara goes against Kaminari, and it’s almost laughable how quick this one goes as well. It’s literally over in an instant, thanks to the girl’s vines.

Izuku frantically pulls out his pocket notebook and scribbles down some notes. She can detach each vine like a piece of regular hair, but will she go bald if she goes overboard? She could build walls with her quirk if she wanted to, but binding enemies seems to be her go-to. Kaminari would’ve had a better chance if he just maneuvered around, but instead he panicked and short circuited himself.

Shiozaki is similar to Kamui Wood. Izuku winces at the reminder of the Wood Hero.

You could rip the vines apart with brutal strength, but your hands will most likely be targeted first. Hm.

“Your match just ended and you’re already thinking strategy-wise?”

Izuku flushes at Uraraka’s question. “Hah, well, not really? It’s just a hobby.”

It used to be, at least.

When Hatsume tricks Iida into helping her showcase her babies to the support company section for a grand total of fifteen minutes, Izuku feels like his skin has cleared. He laughs and writes down all of the details he notices, making a mental reminder to talk to her later about her gear.

Uraraka leaves to prepare for her own match, and she’s obviously nervous. For a second, Izuku considers following, but in the end he decides against it. It’d be a little insulting to offer help when she didn’t ask for it. He knows she has no qualms about getting what she wants, as she was the one to seek him out during the paintball battle, so she obviously doesn’t want his help. Izuku knows she has a plan of her own.

He just hopes it’ll be enough.

Mina wins against Aoyama by damaging his belt and knocking him out with an uppercut to the chin. Tokoyami defeats Youyorozu simply by not giving her enough time to use the objects she’d created. The battle between Tetsutetsu and Kirishima is eventful, however. Both boys are evenly tied, so an arm wrestling match was called in order to settle who would actually move on.

What everyone seems to be waiting for, though, is Kacchan versus Uraraka.

Izuku already knows this won’t end well.

The zero-gravity hero charges first, obviously remembering what Izuku said to her weeks ago about Kacchan always leading with the right hook. His blond friend won’t dodge her advances, however, he’ll confront her.

They're both going all out, and it's a harsh battle to watch for some.

At one point, Uraraka throws her jacket and sends it floating to distract him right after a heavy explosion, but smoke screens just don't work against Kacchan's near impossible reaction times.

She has to touch him to win, that's all. With every attack, Uraraka becomes slower. She goes straight for Kacchan, over and over. Izuku watches, humming a tune to himself.

She's intelligent and strong, but against Kacchan's raw power and explosives, that won't be enough to get her to victory.

Determination can only get you so far.

Izuku is beyond happy when Aizawa tells off the people in the stands for being ignorant and sexist. Kacchan isn't letting his guard down precisely because he knows Uraraka is a worthy opponent, not because he just wants an excuse to hit her.

Her last ditch attempt at a win consisted of an asteroid shower from above, and for a brief pause Izuku actually thought she might catch Kacchan off guard, but then his friend had simply blasted all the debris away and stood ready for more.

Her plan, as amazing as it was, had gone up in smoke. She'd exceeded her weight capacity with that last move, rendering her immobile.

"Uraraka is unable to continue. Bakugou moves on to the second round."

Izuku immediately heads for the nurse's office to go see his friend, and he leaves feeling a little sad. Uraraka is upset, that much is obvious, and he can't really blame her. Her fight had been entertaining and rough, so to lose after all that work? It's discouraging.

Uraraka Ochaco is not soft at all. If only she could realize that.

Izuku's own match is coming up, and he won't lie and say he's not nervous. He's on his way to the prep room when he feels it. A familiar energy, a dark pull at his mind that warns him of someone up ahead.

The boy recognizes who it is but doesn't turn around, instead eagerly heading on. Would All Might scold him for picking a fight and not avoiding one? Yes. Does he have to know? No.

“There you are.”

And oh, Endeavor is much taller than Izuku remembers. He has to tilt his head all the way back just to stare him in the face. At least All Might and all his other teachers slouch down a little to help him out—Endeavor does no such thing. He stands tall, face set in a permanent scowl.

Izuku masks his own expression. “Endeavor! I thought this area was reserved for students.”

He is skillfully ignored. “Midoriya Izuku. I’ve heard from some very reliable sources a few things about you. You were at the USJ.”

Incredible deduction. It’s not like all of 1-A was there.

“That quirk of yours is amazing. In terms of power, it seems on par with All Might’s quirk.”

Izuku blinks, slightly put off. Someone gave him access to the recordings, it seems, or had at least given him the spark-notes version. It couldn’t have been Nezu; it must’ve been the police. He’s the number two hero, so it wouldn’t have been hard to convince them to give him what he wants.

“Oh,” Izuku says, faking uninterest, walking away.

“My boy Shouto has a duty to surpass All Might.” At the mention of his classmate, Izuku pauses. “His match against you will prove a valuable test. So give it your all. Put up a good fight against him.”

Izuku frowns. That sounds more like an order than a request. Who the fuck does he think he is?

“That’s all I have to say. Sorry for my bluntness.”

That doesn’t sound like a genuine apology, and it obviously wasn’t meant to be one with how Endeavor turns away from him, prepared to walk off.

Oh fuck no. Izuku can’t just leave it at this. “I’m not All Might,” he says evenly.

A brief, scornful pause, and then: “That’s obvious—”

“Of course it is.” Izuku tilts his head to stare at him, back still facing him. ”And Todoroki is not you. If you keep up that line of thinking, Endeavor, you might get hurt.”

There's an angry grunt, and the sound of flames growing higher and hotter has Izuku smirking to himself. Oh, Extract wants this quirk.

“Nothing, sir.”

Honestly, Izuku regrets not walking the other direction. This is tiresome. He really should start charging people for wasting his time.

He strolls away with his hands in his pockets. “Oh, and I have one question, Endeavor.” The hero scoffs in response, and Izuku straightens up. He keeps his face as devoid of emotion as humanly possible, but his eyes are a different story. Mirth just barely edges into his voice as he asks, the epitome of innocence, “How long did it take you to fix up your office?”

By the time the number two hero registers the comment, Izuku has started walking again. That’s for grooming your son to fight my mentor.

“You little—”

Izuku is already on the field, jogging up the steps of the platform so he doesn’t keep everyone waiting.

Todoroki eyes him. “You ready?”

Present Mic saves Izuku from having to reply. “Both of these competitors have won top marks in this festival so far! But there’s only room for one of these greats in the ring! It’s Midoriya versus Todoroki!”

It’s easy to guess what will happen first. The boy is going to come at Izuku with his ice. He’ll have to be ready immediately.

“Start!”

Todoroki immediately releases a large attack, similar to that of his match against Sero. Izuku isn’t surprised by this in the slightest. He has his ring on, but twenty percent won’t do much against a large chunk of ice like that. He’ll have to endure it.

Izuku drops to one knee and throws up his arms just as the ice encircles him. No one will be able to see him like this, and for that he’s grateful. He can use some of his quirks if he does it right.

Yeah, he's only a little bit of a hypocrite.

The ice encases him in a sort of prison almost, and Izuku blinks as he sees his own breath in the air.

He's not stuck, thanks to Deflect stopping the ice from the front. He drops his defense and begins to chip away at the ice, kicking it with Boost as his armor. He blasts through it after a final hit, and small chunks of ice go flying.

"I expected as much," Todoroki mutters.

"Woah! He managed to break through it!"

Another wave of ice comes toward him, this one much smaller, however. Izuku sees it coming and darts to the side, just barely staying inside the boundary lines as he manages to skirt the attack.

Todoroki's fights always end in a flash. Izuku doesn't know much else about him, so he'll have to learn while fighting. That's fine, though. Izuku's good at that.

His classmate has a wall of ice behind him as a counter strategy in case Izuku uses his quirk. The boy won't be getting blown away anytime soon unless Izuku gets closer, so there's no point to using high percentages of One for All anyway.

Todoroki drives his foot into the ground and sends a thick sheet of frost covering the cement, obviously trying to encase Izuku's legs and work his way up. Izuku jumps over it just in time, legs burning, and he easily maintains his balance on the slippery slope. He crouches there, slightly elevated, and watches.

"So you're trying to stretch the match out?" Todoroki bites. "Not happening. I'll end this quickly."

Everyone has a limit.

The fourth attack heads straight for him, and Izuku narrows his eyes. He leaps off of his little ledge and kicks the ice straight back toward Todoroki. The dual-quirked user throws up another wall in front of him just in time to keep from getting impaled by his own ice.

Izuku doesn't let him rest. He shoots forward and punches at the wall, but when the ice is smashed away there's no Todoroki in sight.

Extract stabs at his mind and Izuku moves away just in time as Todoroki comes crashing down from above, ice at the ready in his palm. Ah, he tried to immobilize Izuku.

“And Midoriya is now on the offensive!”

He barely has time to collect himself as yet another wave of ice comes toward him. Todoroki doesn’t hesitate at all, it seems. Izuku shouldn’t be surprised—he was trained by Endeavor himself.

Izuku balls up a fist and smashes it, red lightning zipping across his skin. There’s a huge rush of air from the movement and people shout in excitement. Present Mic says something, but Izuku is too busy catching his breath to focus on anything else. His stomach wound is screaming at him.

Finish this, dammit. No more stalling.

“Now that’s a lot stronger than your earlier attacks.”

He must be confused as to why Izuku didn’t use that much power earlier as well. Good. Keep him guessing.

Todoroki has excellent judgment, execution, and mobility. He is, in all senses, strong.

Izuku rubs at his arm. It’s buzzing uncomfortably from the punch, even though it’s not broken. Even with the ring, fifteen percent hurts.

Izuku could argue the same for him. Ice sticks to Todoroki’s cheek and arm, and if Izuku looks close enough he can see that he’s shivering. He’s getting cold.

The crowd is going wild by now, most of the people still in awe about Todoroki and his sheer prowess. The boy is undeniably already stronger than most pros out there. As expected from the son of the number two hero.

The boy glances off to the side. “Sorry for all this. I appreciate it, though, Midoriya. Thanks to you, he doesn’t look too happy.”

Izuku follows his gaze, scowling when he spots the bitch in question standing off to the side.

“Let’s end this.”

The next attack is even stronger than before, but it’s repetitive. Izuku knows how to break through them now.

“Todoroki continues his relentless assault! Could this next move win it all?”

Izuku rushes toward it head on. “I’ve fought worse than you with less sleep, Todoroki. Who says I’m done?”

Twenty percent. The max I can do with my ring on and without breaking myself. It’ll have to be enough.

He rears his arm and leg back, hitting first with his foot and twisting midair to smash it again with his fist in a magnificent display. The pressure has Todoroki stumbling back, but another wall is put up to prevent him from passing the line.

“You’re shivering, Todoroki,” Izuku breathes out, waiting. Watching. Todoroki is trembling now, his tremors worse than before. “Quirks are just physical abilities. You have a limit to how much cold you can bear. But then again, you could always use your left side to thaw yourself out, right?”

He faintly hopes Endeavor is listening. He also hopes the man can hear the big fuck you Izuku is giving him right now without the boy actually saying it.

“You’re not your father, Todoroki. You’re just not!”

Hypocrite, a dark voice at the back of his mind hisses at him, but he pushes it away. That’s—that’s different. This isn’t about him right now. If he can help someone in a similar situation, he’ll do it.

Izuku is getting way too tired for this. He needs to provoke him. “You want to be number one, right? So give me everything you have.”

“What are you planning?” Todoroki looks suddenly angry, like a wild, cornered animal. “Everything I have? Did my bastard of a father pay you off or something?” For the first time, he’s the one who runs forward. “You’re pissing me off!”

Honestly, that’s kind of insulting. Endeavor would have to pay Izuku a lot to get him to do anything for him.

Izuku waits until the last second and weaves to the side, ducking and slamming a powered fist into his opponent's stomach. Ice races up his own arm, and Izuku is forced back a few steps as Todoroki goes flying.

"What a hit! Things are really heating up!"

The fire and ice user slams to the ground while Izuku straightens up, trying to get the ice off of his skin.

A few people in the crowds are in awe. "He landed a hit on Todoroki!" One of them gasps, more like a question than a statement.

Izuku doesn't give him a chance to get up fully. He rushes for him again, and a much weaker ice attack is sent straight at him. Izuku easily kicks through it and tackles Todoroki, bringing him to the ground. Put him in a lock. The only way for him to get me off is to burn me.

He tries to wrap his legs around the bigger teen's throat, but an elbow jabs him in the stomach—right where it hurts the worst.

For the first time this festival, Izuku cries out.

He feels something rip slightly, and his grip loosens just enough for Todoroki to chuck him to the side. Izuku doesn't right himself immediately this time. He stays on his hands and knees for a moment, riding through the waves of pain, the inside of his cheek nearly splitting open with how hard he's biting it to keep quiet.

And then he's up, the pain fading away into something more bearable. He's angry now. He's not supposed to get injured. His adrenaline is pumping now, and Izuku is hit with a sudden need to just help this boy.

"Todoroki!" He bellows, a red hue to his gaze now. His entire body is buzzing. He needs to release this energy. "It's your power! Your power, not his!"

"Shut up."

Todoroki entire right side is covered in ice now. If Izuku didn't know better, he'd think it to be frostbite. He's so obviously hurting himself, and he's not doing a thing to stop it. He could so easily activate his left side and put an end to that suffering, but he doesn't.

Fine. If that's how it's going to be, Izuku will just hit him where it hurts.

His voice drops so the boy has to strain to listen. “You want to be a hero so badly? You’re only using half of your power. What kind of hero limits himself like that?”

“Shut up!”

There’s a small spark, a tiny tendril peeking from out of Todoroki’s eye. He’s close.

Push him there. Don’t let him fall down the same hole as you.

Izuku steels his resolve and takes a sledgehammer to his classmate’s metaphorical ice wall. “It’s your power! You can do what you want with it! It’s yours, not his! You are not a slave to your blood!”

It’s like something snaps. Todoroki pauses, eyes going wide and unseeing as he remembers words no one else can hear. And then the light returns, and the next thing Izuku knows is fire.

Hot, scorching fire. Flames explode out of Todoroki’s left side and lick up his body. The heat burns from even this much distance away, but Izuku doesn’t mind it. The pain reminds him that he’s alive and that he’s here, and that’s all he can ask for.

People shine, just as stars do. And Todoroki is burning.

Izuku kind of wants to burn, too.

Todoroki huffs. “I thought you wanted to win? Dammit. Why are you trying to inspire me when you’re not even taking this seriously?”

Izuku completely ignores him. So he’s a hypocrite, whatever. He can live with that.

“Shouto!”

Of course someone has to ruin the moment.

“So you’ve finally accepted it! Yes! Excellent!” Endeavor stomps closer to the edge of the arena, his own red flames spinning wildly above and around him. “It all starts now for you! With my blood pumping through your veins, you will surpass me! You will fulfill my ambitions!"

Izuku snaps around to glare at him, patience running thin. "God, be quiet! I bet you don't even have a pass to be here!"

Todoroki laughs suddenly, bringing Izuku's attention back to the beauty of his fire.

"A sudden pep talk from Mr. Endeavor, huh? What a doting parent." Present Mic says, just a tad bit of sarcasm bleeding through.

"What're you smiling about?" Todoroki is staring at him now, something Izuku's never seen before dancing in his eyes. "You must be crazy."

That's not far off actually.

Todoroki matches his grin. "I'm not responsible for what happens to you now."

And then a huge block of ice, almost as big as the glacier used against Sero, comes hurtling toward Izuku, and his opponent's fire extends even further.

For a fraction of a second that seems to stretch forever, red lightning dances across Izuku's body, his skin glittering and his shadow darkening. The scent of ozone mixes in with the flames, and his eyes reflect brilliant orange and yellow hues.

The crowd waits with bated breath, because holy shit. This is a sharp contrast to the boy they saw drop his chicken wing on stage during the athlete's oath.

When Izuku pushes from the ground and shoots toward the other boy, he can barely track his own trajectory. It happens so fast that to others it seems Midoriya just disappears from his spot. He clears the glacier entirely, reappearing in midair as he dives for Todoroki.

His legs burn and his gym uniform sizzles with the twenty percent power. He's gotta get close.

"Midnight!" Cementoss shouts. "He won't be able to take it!" The cement ripples forward, probably to make a wall to minimize the damage, but Izuku is already past it. It's too late for anyone to stop him.

Rabbits are always just a step ahead.

He pulls back a fist, his other hand holding his stomach to brace himself.

Between the shouts of the audience and the commentary coming from the booth, Izuku hears his classmate's soft breath as he nears, just a few yards away now.

Aim for the chest.

"Midoriya. Thank you."

The cold air expands. Lightning and fire collide in a brilliant explosion of heat and power, and flames climb up Izuku's body as he's blown backwards, the world turning a blinding white. The aftershock seems to shake the earth, and his arm raises at the last second, Pull on his fingertips.

He's yanked forward a little, but he doesn't stop. His quirk merely slows him down, which is what he needs. He crashes into a stray pillar of ice, the air being knocked out of him, and he waits with stars in his eyes until the smoke clears.

It's okay. He doesn't mind losing to Todoroki. It's fine. He helped him —

"Todoroki is out of bounds. Midoriya advances to the third round!"

What.

Izuku pushes himself up, biting back another cry.

Todoroki is sprawled in the grass on the far side of the arena, Izuku's punch having hit him directly in the chest. Huh. Izuku must have gotten close enough to break the wall behind him after all. But the only reason Izuku isn't out of bounds is because he used Pull on the stadium, hoping he'd be slowed enough not to cross the boundary line.

It seems it worked.

Midnight pulls him out of the crater with a strong arm, her keen eyes scanning him over for injuries. "You don't look too hurt, but I'd recommend seeing Recovery Girl anyway."

Izuku wipes off the debris and spare flecks of ice on his uniform, giving her a small smile. “I’m fine, sensei! If she heals me I might get tired before my next match. I’ll make sure to see her after all this is over!”

He doesn’t wait to hear the R-Rated hero’s reply, he just turns tail and runs—well, hobbles—right back into the stadium, flushing at the influx of cheers following him.

By the time Izuku is certain Recovery Girl won’t hunt him down and he can finally stop hiding, two matches have passed. His stitches are fine, it turns out. They’re a little worse for wear, and they definitely won’t be able to take any more elbows, but they’re okay.

He just has to be careful.

Izuku’s next match with Iida comes all too soon and ends just as quickly. He could barely stand on his own two feet, and Izuku feels kind of bad. He really should’ve dropped out, seeing as using Pull against Todoroki at the very end felt kind of like cheating.

The fight consisted of a lot of ducking and weaving until Izuku managed to spot an opening and take out Iida’s engines with a well-placed kick. The falter was enough for Izuku to throw the boy right over the line. Iida had him in a hold too, so Izuku was sent stumbling right after him. The only reason he won is because Iida hit the ground first.

And for once, Izuku doesn’t sport any injuries directly caused by his opponent after a fight.

The rest of the matches go by just as he predicted it, so when the fated battle finally arrives, Izuku kind of wants to die. He feels more at rest with this fight, though, weirdly enough. He’s glad that it’s Kacchan he has to go up against. He knows how he's feeling. He can let his guard down around him and not worry about screwing up.

Izuku skipped the prep room in favor of acquiring a nice energy drink (it turns out that vending machines are easy to steal from), so he downs the can of Monster and walks up the steps to the arena, meeting Kacchan’s knowing glare.

“At last, we’ve arrived! The best of the best among UA’s first years will be decided! It’s the final match. Midoriya vs. Bakugou!”

Kacchan's eyes narrow. "I finally get a chance to blow your ass up on TV and you aren't even at your full health. You better make up for that. Go all-out."

Izuku knows what he really means behind those words, and he sighs. He's not forcing him to use his quirks this time, as he's learned his lesson, but he's still technically asking.

"Begin!"

Kacchan always starts first. Izuku tries to counter with an attack of his own, but his friend just blasts through the punch and grabs him by the arm, throwing him to the side. Izuku has a grip on his shirt, though, and now they're both grappling with just their own strength.

Kacchan seems to come to a realization during their struggle. "You dumbass," he hisses. "You were hurt this entire time."

Izuku receives a blast to the face at Kacchan's revelation. He jumps back, dodging another mini explosion before darting forward.

There's no time for the blond to react as Midoriya twists with the leftover momentum, spinning on his heel to bring his foot up.

There's a sickening snap as Kacchan goes flying through the air, the force of the kick sending him skidding across the concrete. His uniform tears to reveal raw skin, but that hardly stops him. He keeps going at him, again and again and again.

Kacchan rushes for him, Izuku meeting him head on as he tries to redirect most of the hits.

Now this is the fight the crowd wants to see. Little to no talking, just raw skill and strength. It's brutal and fast-paced; a certified attention-grabber.

It still hurts like fuck, though. Izuku is going to pass out if this goes on any longer. It might be very soon, actually.

Fortunately, the fight takes a turn.

Izuku tries to dodge, but Kacchan's faster. The explosion makes him see stars, and the boy's sent sprawling through the air.

He gasps, chasing the air that's forced out of his lungs. Izuku scrambles to his knees, only to have his face meet the concrete when Kacchan lands a kick to his jaw.

Izuku's on his back now, and he can barely hear the crowd's yelling over the ringing in his ears.

Something wet is trickling down his cheek, but Izuku doesn't have time to see what it is before Kacchan's on top of him.

He manages to block the first punch, but the second and third are much harder, and his fists are blasted out of the way.

He whines as the heat races up his arms and irritates the slight burns from his fight with Todoroki. A fist collides with his nose with a snap, and blood begins to pour from his nostrils.

"This is not looking good for Midoriya!" Present Mic yells, sounding shocked. "What a brutal fight!"

The pro hero is right. Kacchan isn't even using his quirk now, just pummeling Izuku like they do every time they spar. But then he pauses, just for a moment, just for a breath.

"Come on, nerd. Don't make yourself look like a fool."

Izuku has to think fast or his chances of winning will be swept out from under him.

Kacchan raises his fist yet again, eyes blazing and mouth set in a determined scowl, when Izuku sees his chance.

He jerks his knee between Kacchan's legs and the blond's grip on him falters. Izuku catches his fist and twists it, using his other hand to grab Kacchan's shoulder as he flips them.

Now Izuku is on top, and Present Mic is screaming something about a slug fest, but Izuku doesn't pay him any mind.

He doesn't aim for the throat. He isn't that cruel, at least, not while he's being filmed live.

Izuku can't move away in time when Kacchan raises a palm to blast him in the face, making them both scramble to their feet. Another explosion, and Izuku probably would have gone flying had his opponent not curled his fingers around Izuku's shirt and tried to throw him over his shoulder using the momentum.

He's ready for this, however, and when he's directly above Kacchan he lets One for All manifest in his arm and promptly smashes his fist into his face.

The explosive teen's head snaps back, his grip loosening on Izuku's shirt. Izuku rolls when he hits the ground, not giving the other boy a chance to recover before he kicks him in the back.

Kacchan whirls, fists hissing with the threat of fire, and then they're back to fighting close hand, both too exhausted to go back to chasing each other.

They dodge and throw punches and kicks at each other like they always do when they spar. The explosions are so frequent that the smoke can't dissipate fast enough, and soon a thick layer of gray and white obscure the pair from view.

Izuku can feel him at all times. He has a pretty good idea of where he is and where he's going inside the bubble of smoke. All he has to do is let his friend stay on the offensive. If he gets him annoyed he'll eventually tire himself out.

The boy rushes at him, Izuku aiming to land a hit on his cheek. Kacchan just jumps to the side and blasts his hand out of the way, and suddenly the ground beneath Izuku sways.

His powers taste about as promising as the copper between his teeth—and when did that happen, he wonders. Extract twitches, and he's thrown under an icy wave.

He can hear his father's harsh words. He sees his cold grin and feels his sizzling hands on his throat. Izuku is rooted to the spot.

Todoroki's fire must've brought back memories, memories that he's repressed a long time ago. But now they're resurfacing through his quirk, and quite honestly Kacchan isn't making the situation any better with the popping of his explosions.

Izuku shouldn't be here. He should've just left the country a while ago. He thinks back to the battle training, back to how Bakugou pushed him despite knowing Izuku's reasons for holding back.

He's always been by Izuku, at least when it counted the most, and yet he'll never truly understand. He can't even begin to comprehend the terror that keeps his friend up at night.

Blinding, reasonless, stupid. Kacchan's crude lack of understanding makes swallowing his pride akin to swallowing a star: impossible.

Izuku reaches to fiddle with his ring, for any form of comfort, of independence, of freedom.

But—

It's not there.

Kacchan must've blown it off when he blasted his hand away. That would explain the wetness in his throat.

Izuku should respond, say anything to get Kacchan to back off for a second and let him reevaluate, but he's too busy trying to breathe. The memories are still fresh in his mind. A dark shadow moves through the haze, a hand reaching for his face, and Izuku still can't fucking see correctly.

His arms move up on their own, his instincts taking over and turning his thoughts black, and then his hands are wrapping around sweaty skin.

Izuku's quirks cheer, white-hot pain flashing through him for the briefest of moments, and Kacchan screams. Any other time and Izuku would be screaming, too.

His hands retracts from Kacchan's skin just as the explosion shoots from the blond's palms and illuminates the space around them.

The shockwave is enough to make the entire arena shudder as dust and debris wash over them. Izuku flies through the air, only half aware of what's happening, and time seems to slow to give him time to process.

Force. In his blind panic, Izuku used a no-no quirk on his friend. Fuck.

And then his back hits the wall and everything is weird from there. He knows he's out of bounds, that's for sure. He was too tired and distracted to use Pull this time to save his ass, but that doesn't matter right now.

He needs to know if Kacchan is okay. He's never used that quirk on him before, he's never used that quirk on anyone since back then.

Oh, god, what if he—?

He falls to the ground, his entire body feeling numb. He doesn't feel anything as he stumbles toward his friend. Red sparks are still coming off of him, his eyes slightly wild as he comes down from the high Force left him in. He doesn't know how it happens, but when he comes back to himself his ring is back on his finger and he's guiding Kacchan to Recovery Girl's office, supporting him with a shoulder.

He's okay. It's okay. They're okay.

Losing to Kacchan isn't bad compared to losing Kacchan himself.

"Was that all-out enough for you?" Izuku jokes, swallowing back the delayed river of blood.

Kacchan gives a weak laugh, surprising him. "Yeah, nerd."

It's enough.

Shouta sees it the moment it happens. Can feel it in the way the air changes around him.

There's a brief second of reprieve accompanied by a bone-chilling silence. There are no flashes of light through the dark cloud of smoke, no screams of rage or teasing insults.

It's music to Shouta's ears, so of course it doesn't last very long.

A blast of red and black cuts through the smoke, clearing all of the haze from the air and revealing Midoriya and Bakugou yet again to the crowds and hundreds of cameras.

It happens quick, and Shouta feels a weight drop in his stomach at the sight of both of the boys' faces. Midoriya's hands retract from Bakugou's body, and the explosion that follows has Hizashi falling out of his chair and nearly making everyone within the vicinity go deaf with his half-excited-half-panicked scream of holy shit!

Shouta barely registers Nezu's quiet language, please; he's too busy trying to make sense of what just happened.

This explosion isn't like the one during Midoriya's fight with Todoroki. That one was a culmination of desperation and raw power as it destroyed everything in its way—this one seems to be more frantic. Almost accidental, dare he say.

Midoriya stumbles to his feet, leaving an imprint of his body in the arena's wall as he rushes to his friend's smoking form on the other side of the platform.

And with this horrific scene now ingrained in his mind forever, Shouta suddenly understands it. The dynamic.

There are things that need to be proven, a ranking that must be cemented.

Bakugou needs to know that he has the power to break Midoriya and always come out ahead; Midoriya that he has the power to take and take, keep on taking everything that Bakugou gives without breaking.

They are both stubborn, unyielding in their own ways; at a constant stalemate in a competition to see who is more perfect in his role.

Always provoking the other, always testing the limits. This time seems to simply be a culmination of that.

Shouta leans back in the comfort of his sleeping bag a little while after the fight, watching with half-lidded eyes as All Might hands out the medals and gives his speech. It's too long for Shouta to pay attention to, so he focuses back on Midoriya.

Perhaps one day the two boys will mellow and learn to accept their friendship without hate. But for now they will continue to feed on each other's insecurities, unapologetic and entirely desperate.

It's selfish, in a way, and Shouta realizes that this is perhaps the only time he'll see Midoriya fight solely for himself.

He shakes his head and downs the rest of his cold coffee. His children are nothing but problems.

"And that concludes our contest! The first year winner of UA's sports festival is Bakugou Katsuki of Class A!"

And if Shouta smiles when Midoriya leans over to his friend and mouths something that looks suspiciously like 198 points, Kacchan when the blond gets too cocky over his win, well, nobody has to know.

Izuku doesn't patrol after school, but he does walk the length of the city.

It's quiet out, which almost never happens in Japan. The streets are bustling with workers and students heading home, and yet everything is almost muted somehow. People talking, cars honking, doors slamming—it's all a low buzz that acts as a backdrop to his thoughts.

He feels floaty, like he's still under Shinsou's quirk, like none of this is quite real, like this joy inside him will be over soon.

And it will be. He knows that much. He has his belongings packed, his bags ready to go. He's going to finish up the last bit of stuff he needs to take care of and then, early in the morning, drop Missy off at Kacchan's house.

Is it cowardice? Leaving without a trace or a note explaining at least why? Of course.

But Izuku's always been a bit of a coward. Perhaps that's why he became Rabbit in the first place; he wanted a way to come out of his shell, a way to express the thoughts he'd never dare to as just Izuku.

Just for a month or so. I'll come back. It won't be forever. He repeats these words like a mantra, like a decree. It doesn't have to be forever.

Izuku managed to evade Recovery Girl for a short while after the awards ceremony. She's quicker than she looks, as she ended up dragging him back to her makeshift nurse's office within just a few minutes of him trying to escape. All she had to fix was his face and the minor cuts on his arms and legs.

What she doesn't know is that she also healed part of his stomach during it, and Izuku isn't about to be the one to tell her that now. He's exhausted now, but he feels better.

Better than he has in a long time.

This is happiness, right? That weird limbo between pain and peace. It feels bitter on his tongue, but he guesses that just comes with the territory.

The sun has long since disappeared by the time Izuku makes it to the beach. The beach. The one he accepted One for All at. The one where he spent ten months of his life training with the number one hero. It's crazy to look back on it now, right before he's about to leave it all behind, and think about how far he's come. He's built up a relationship with All Might—his idol, his enemy, his murderer by birthright, and he doesn't regret it. He remembers what the hero told him during the ceremony, how he leaned in for a tight hug after putting the second place medal over Izuku's head, his quiet I'm so proud of you right by his ear that was almost too much for Izuku to handle, his throat having closed up in response. He's also made friends in the short time since school has started, something he never thought would happen again. He's made enemies, sure, but that shows that he's lived.

He's still here. Even if it's just for a few more short moments.

The dark waves lap at the shore, stopping and receding right before they can touch Izuku's shoes. The salty air makes him scrunch his nose, but it's not until the moon is high in the sky that he leaves.

Missy needs to be fed. He bought her a nice dinner for tonight. A last celebration, if you will.

He turns and walks back toward his part of the city, tapping twice on the screen on his forearm. He put his AI in his locker for the majority of the festival, not wanting to get outed, and he put her back on after leaving school. Kacchan went home to rest, the happenings of the last fight having taken a toll on him. Izuku said goodbye to Uraraka at the front gate, but Iida was nowhere to be seen. A family emergency, Uraraka told him. The boy left during Izuku's fight with Kacchan.

There's something weird there, but it's not like Izuku can do anything about it now.

"Hey, AINA, what did I miss from today's archives?"

There’s no reply, and he frowns to himself as he glances at the blank screen. Hm. He could’ve sworn he charged her this morning. Oh well. It’s not a big deal to him at the moment.

He’s still high off of the giddiness he got while on that stage. Second place, huh? All for One can suck a dick. His precious little successor doesn’t need his help anymore.

Izuku is so pleased at this thought that he doesn’t think anything of the extra pairs of eyes on him. He doesn’t think anything of the tight feelings starting to coil in his stomach. His body aches a little from the activities of the day, but he’s still happy.

He’s comfortable, and Izuku should’ve known it wouldn’t last long. He walks home with a little bounce to his step, a bandage on his cheek as a reminder of his fight with Todoroki, and he walks faster at the thought of greeting Missy and getting to play with her one last time.

Just over six hours until he has to leave for the airport. His fake ID and passport are in his packed suitcase, ready to go.

He doesn't want to leave, god he doesn't want to, but in this very moment it feels like he has no other choice.

Fate, however, seems to have a different plan.

His hand reaches for the door, a sing-song greeting for Missy on the tip of his tongue, and he twists the knob.

And then, for the third time that day, the world around him explodes.

Chapter Notes

Izuku has always joked about dying. He's skirted death so many times that he's taken to calling himself immortal. He won't be for long, of course, but he'll cross that bridge when he gets there.

Literally.

This must be some sort of punishment for making too many jokes. Izuku would like to apologize to whatever deity up above he's offended this time. He might not mean the apology, but there's not much else he can do to make up for it at the moment. Give him a break, dammit, he's not having a very good day.

The explosion has Izuku flying back, his back hitting the hallway wall with so much force that he ends up smashing right through it as if it's nothing more than wet paper. He hits the ground hard and chokes, inhaling a lungful of dust and ash when he tries to force the oxygen back into his lungs.

It's like a chain reaction. There's multiple clicks in the distance, and then Izuku sees stars as the building is wracked with more explosions. Bombs, his mind helpfully inputs. They're fucking bombs.

Oh, he's on fire now. That's fun.

Heat races up his arms and legs, singeing some of his hair as it reaches his neck and head. The flames make quick work of his uniform, and a scream tears its way out of his throat when another bomb goes off right next to him, this time sending him face-first into the neighboring wall.

Izuku slides down, eyes wide and unseeing. He can't—he can't breathe anymore. It's too hot in here. Way too hot. Now if he were in a better state of mind he'd make a joke about how smoking hot he is, but this isn't the time.

He tastes copper on his tongue, and then there's something wet staining the only remaining parts of his school shirt. It has to be blood seeing as he has a fucking piece of metal lodged into his side, the exposed end of it cutting straight through his bicep and exposing the muscle.

Fantastic. The day he finally gets healed and this shit happens.

Extract takes a sledgehammer to his skull, and Izuku screams. He doesn't know what the hell is happening, he doesn't know what to do, what he even can do.

There are people approaching from outside the building. A lot of them. He can feel them all thanks to his piece-of-shit traitorous quirk. There must be twenty of them out there. They were all waiting for him, which means they had this all planned out from the start.

This is why they stopped following him so abruptly the other night. You give someone the illusion of freedom, and then take what you want from them anyway; it's the oldest trick in the book, and Izuku thought he countered this. He had plans to leave the entire fucking country in just a few hours time—but he was still too late. He should've known freedom wouldn't come so easily.

This is his mistake, and now he's paying for it. No, everyone will pay for it. Missy will pay for—

His heart leaps into his throat. Missy.

White-hot pain rushes through his body immediately after he tries to move. He can barely breathe, so maybe moving isn't the best idea. The pipe in his side is limiting him, and it's not like he can just pull it. If it struck something important, that might be the only thing keeping him from bleeding out.

"Mi—!" Ash flies into his mouth and he chokes. His chest feels like it's cracking, and the blood that fills up his mouth becomes the only thing protecting him from swallowing more debris. He tries again, but this time he can't even get the first syllable out.

No. He can't lose her. He can't—he can't handle it. This is his own fault. He should've never taken her in. Should've never put her in harm's way like this. And it's so unfair that Izuku feels his eyes start to burn, and it's not just because of the fire raging around him.

Another explosion rocks the earth, and then the floor gives way beneath him. He drops like a rock, One for All humming through his veins instinctually, as if to help. His power can do nothing, though, and when he lands the world slips away from him for a brief couple seconds. When he comes to, he's on his side, the pipe now lodged further inside him with a huge slab of concrete crushing his lower half to the ground. He's a couple floors down now, and when he gathers up enough strength to tilt his head and look up, he sees that the uppermost floors have all caved in from the middle, revealing a large hole that allows him to look straight through.

Missy, please. He chokes back something sharp in his throat, face tightening. Please, god.

Izuku, despite his many jokes, has never been very religious. That's not something his father ever focused on. And yet, at this moment, he finds himself praying to whoever can hear him. He doesn't want her to die. It'd be too cruel. It's not her fault he's a walking time bomb.

As he reaches out with his mind, trying desperately to find something that might help, he realizes with delayed relief that the people around him are disappearing. They're flickering out, like stars too old to sustain themselves. They're... leaving? He must be wrong. Has to be. Is it a warp gate? Perhaps it's Kurogiri, but then why doesn't he feel him?

No. This isn't like All for One at all. His father wouldn't leave him to die like this. He's too prideful. He'd want to kill Izuku himself, or at the very least take him back and break him. But the attackers' quirks are dying out, so that means they're gone. Which doesn't make sense in the slightest.

The ringing in his ears is faint now, and all he can hear is the fire blazing around him. His mind feels hazy. Every breath is a stab between his ribs, and red and orange embers float past his vision almost delicately.

He tries to call out again, but a cackling board falls next to him and sends up a cloud of black smoke and ash, clouding his vision.

Is he dying? If there's anything he's learned from all those bootlegged movies, it's that death usually comes in a flash of light; it's supposed to be a comforting presence against the darkness, not whatever this is. He didn't think it would be like this.

And as the cloud clears up, he sees a figure standing precariously near the edge of the top floor, looking down. The fire illuminates the figure's build, casting a dark shadow across its face and body. White eyes find his, and another spike is sent through Izuku's heart once he feels that familiar intensity and bloodcurdling power.

Ah. His follower is back yet again.

Jagged tendrils billow out behind his keeper, and Izuku swears he sees something limp being held in one of those shadowed hands, but then the figure disappears before he can make any sense of it.

His shock lasts half a moment. Then it hits him at once. All of his attackers are gone now. He can't feel them anymore. He's safe.

Safe from them, at least. From everything else? The odds aren't looking to be in his favor. But then again, when are they ever?

The building is starting to collapse around him, and the weight of the situation is slowly starting to dawn on him. Oh, how quickly things can start falling apart.

Missy couldn't have survived for this long.

The mere thought hurts him worse than any of the numerous wounds he's sporting right now. Something so fundamental to his very being has just been torn away, and the lack of it is like boiling water down his spine. His quirks are slipping away from him, his grip on reality being held by a single thread. Is this how it feels to be blinded?

He forces himself onto his back, spine twisting painfully since his legs are pinned down, and his eyes settle on the blackened ceiling above. Everything is fuzzy. He can barely hear correctly. He feels like a radio with a connection that keeps breaking up, and the result is this staticky feeling worming its way into his mind. His hand curls briefly around his throat, if only to make sure he's not already dead, and when it comes away it's sticky and warm.

And then he's pulled underwater, and Izuku can't swim, so he does the next best thing. He drowns.

Not literally—although maybe, he thinks, just maybe, that might be for the best. Water floods his lungs, mixing with the ash, and the worst part is it actually doesn't.

But it does. He feels the insatiable burn, and bubbles race one another to break the surface when the remaining air is forced from his lungs. Izuku does not break the surface.

He can't.

I'm so sorry, he thinks, but it doesn't sound like himself. I'm sorry for not being enough, Tsukauchi. I'm sorry. I'm sorry.

Izuku drowns in an ocean of smoke and debris, and not for the first time does he wish things would end quicker.

His eyes have long since fluttered shut by the time the cracked device on his arm lights up, the signal finally coming back on, but only for a moment.

A moment is more than enough.

Emergency Protocol 'Last Resort' Initiated.

Password: 'dadzawa'.

Shouta is in the middle of tying up the latest Petty Criminal of the Week when he gets the call.

It's currently a little past twelve in the morning. Patrol today doesn't end until one, his shift having been shortened due to the Sports Festival—which is why he's confused as to why someone's calling him on his personal cell when his patrol hasn't ended yet.

All of his friends and coworkers know not to bother him while he's working unless it's an emergency.

He fishes out his phone after handing the criminal over to the nearest police officer. "What is it? This better be—"

"Aizawa. Where are you right now?"

The hero immediately tenses up, jerking the phone away from his ear to stare at the caller ID, as if to make sure he's hearing this right. Detective Tsukauchi rarely sounds this urgent.

"I'm a few blocks away from the courthouse," he replies, already taking to the rooftops. "Where do you need me?"

“I need you to head towards City Hall. It’s an emergency. I’ve already sent two units there under suspicion of villainous activity.”

His voice gives way to panic, and Shouta jumps to the neighboring building, mapping out the route in his head. “Do you have anywhere more specific?”

The detective laughs something dark. “Trust me, you won’t be able to miss it.”

Oh. This can’t be good.

“Tsukauchi, what’s happening?” There’s a beat of silence, and Shouta feels his throat tighten up unexpectedly. “Tsukauchi!”

He sounds reluctant. “I got a text a few minutes ago. An abandoned building is on fire and nearly under collapse. We think it must’ve been a bomb of some sort. Multiple ones.”

A bomb. Which means this was probably planned, not accidental. Suspicion of villainous activity sounds way more plausible all of a sudden.

“Is there anyone in it? Any surrounding buildings at risk?”

“There’s just one person inside, and it’s not close enough to the neighboring complexes to be an immediate danger,” Tsukauchi says, and Shouta feels himself start to relax, only to grimace when the detective continues with a pained voice. “I got a text from the kid’s AI. That’s the only reason I was notified of this so quickly.”

It’s almost funny how he immediately knows who he’s talking about. “Rabbit’s already on the scene? He should be resting right now, not—”

“Shouta, he’s the one in the building.”

Shouta’s heart seems to freeze in his chest, eyes bugging out while he nearly propels himself straight off the edge of the roof he’s on. It’s only by the grace of his capture weapon that he manages to right himself and make it to the next ledge, because fuck, Tsukauchi’s never called him by his first name before.

Fear, so cold and sharp and blinding, runs through his veins and leaves him trembling. “What?”

“We’re on a time limit. It was his AI who contacted me, not him, so he’s most likely unconscious. You need to get there before the building collapses on top of him. I already called your agency's hospital; they have a bed waiting just in case."

Just in case. Just in case the boy is already dead. Just in case Shouta doesn't get there fast enough. Fuck. Pull yourself together.

"Got it. Anything else I need to know? I'll make sure to—" He cuts himself off with a noiseless gasp, mouth gaping open.

He's still about a mile away from City Hall, but Shouta can see it. The building itself is fairly huge, and even from this far away the orange and red flames that are spreading to the lower floors are still very prominent. It's a blazing inferno—a beacon of light against the dark sky. Shouta recognizes it as the apartment complex that closed down years ago around the time he graduated from UA. One of his mother's friends used to live there.

Shouta tries to push away the emotions threatening to boil over. Why is his student in an abandoned building at this time of night? And, more importantly, how did he get caught up in this supposed bombing?

A smaller, nastier voice at the back of Shouta's mind tells him that he does know, that he knows exactly how and why this situation is occurring. With everything he knows, it's not hard to take a guess. But that's something he can stress over later—he has a kid to save.

The hero is a blur of dark fabric when he shoots closer to the scene, Tsukauchi having already hung up. His heart is pounding out of his chest, his breaths shaky and uneven. The building right next to the one on fire only goes up to half its height, so Shouta will have to use his scarf to slingshot himself up to the top floor. It's easier to work his way down that way.

It's probable that the bomb was triggered at the very top, so Rabbit—no, Midoriya must be there. His student. His kid.

He has to go faster. He has to make sure he won't fail this time—

Shouta trips over something soft, and he lands on uneven ground, knees digging into harsh gravel. He curses at his clumsiness and moves to get up, as he can't afford to waste any more precious seconds, when he suddenly sees it.

A body, limp and unmoving, is crumpled up near the edge. Its torn clothing is stained crimson, and Shouta nearly gags at the overwhelming stench of death that surrounds him on all sides. He throws a quick glance around, something heavy dropping into his stomach once he takes in the other dead figures spread out on the rooftop. The space is eerily silent with nothing but the cackle of flames in the distance.

He forces himself to his feet, leaving the bodies behind. He recognizes some of them by their pale, frozen looks as he passes, and a shudder runs through him.

Those haunted faces don't belong to just villains. There are heroes among them, Shouta can tell.

The closer he gets to the fire, the less the bodies appear. He can see more limp figures littered on the buildings surrounding the scene, leading Shouta to believe that someone (or some*thing)* must have stopped them from getting too close. The growing puddles of blood next to the bodies are fresh.

Horror settles under his skin, and he doesn't hesitate in sending his capture weapon wrapping around the railing of one of the upper balconies. Midoriya, what have you gotten yourself into, kid?

He yanks himself up the rest of the way, not sparing the heroes and police far down below a second glance. He doesn't have time to lay into them for being so fucking useless.

He crashes through a window, and okay, maybe there could've been a better way for him to enter, but he doesn't have much time to work with at the moment, so you can kindly screw off.

Shouta ducks his face into his scarf to avoid inhaling most of the smoke, and his eyes burn from the heat and intensity in the air. He has to make this quick, or else he'll have to be rescued, too. He stumbles around blindly, waving his hands to try and see past the dust and debris.

"Midoriya!" He shouts, praying he can be heard over the roaring of the flames. "Kid! Are you in here!"

He coughs, an acrid taste filling his mouth, and the distraction is almost enough to send him plummeting straight through the gaping hole in the middle of the floor. Shouta steadies himself and peers down the opening, calling out for the boy again. This part of the wood must've caved in due to too much pressure, resulting in a sort of avalanche that stopped near the base level.

He could be buried under all that.

Shouta shakes himself and scans the different floors, or at least what he can see of them. The fire is close enough to bite at his back now, and Shouta moves closer to the edge. He has to be here, he has to be okay, he has to be alive—

His capture weapon shoots up and wraps around one of the strongest points in the ceiling the moment he catches a glimpse of dark green, and Shouta uses it to slide down to one of the lower levels.

He can't exactly drop like a rock unless he wants to risk sending the building into even more chaos. It could collapse any second—he has to go. They have to go.

Shouta feels suddenly light-headed when he comes to a stop right beside the mess of smoldering green hair. He lurches forward, boots splashing in the blood that sits in a puddle on the ground. Blood that should not be pooling out of his kid's body, he thinks. That's something he does know.

The spike is what gets his attention first, that and the large slab of concrete that pins Midoriya's legs to the floor. And his face...

There's soot and ash all over his student, combined with a multitude of gashes and cuts. His eyes are shut, and there's no sign of life other than the faintest rise and fall of his chest, though that could just be a trick of the hero's mind.

"Kid!" Shouta taps his cheek, doing it again with more force when he gets no response. His fingers find his way to the boy's neck, and he could probably collapse in relief once he feels the strong, steady pulse beneath the skin. Not dead yet.

It takes a good ten seconds for Shouta to move the concrete, his steel-enforced capture weapon doing most of the heavy-lifting. He's actually kind of glad Midoriya isn't awake right now to feel this, as he knows that would've hurt like a bitch.

But now for the hard part.

He crouches down and carefully slips an arm under the kid's back, the other under his knees. The spike shifts when Shouta lifts him up, and he winces in sympathy. Please don't wake up now. Wait a little longer.

In a more ideal circumstance, Shouta would be able to leave Midoriya where he is until on-site medical professionals could deal with the pipe lodged in him, but there's not much of a choice here. He can't take the piece out himself, obviously, so this is how it must be for now.

But even with the fairly large piece of shrapnel inside him, Midoriya doesn't weigh that much at all. For someone so powerful who maintains decent muscles, Shouta expected the kid to weigh more. And as he rushes them to the nearest balcony, planning to go out the same style he went in, Shouta can't help but wonder when the last time the boy ate a proper meal was.

A darker part of him would almost rather stay ignorant.

There's a high-pitched groan, and then the boards above them are breaking apart. Shouta can do nothing but tighten his grip on Midoriya as he jumps, the wind whipping at his face and cheek. The building is still roaring and cackling, and there's more crashes from inside, signaling more avalanches.

They land roughly on a neighboring building, this one free of any bodies, and Shouta forces himself to control his nerves. They made it out, but with Midoriya's condition there's no telling what's going to happen next.

Take him to your hospital. You know what you're doing. Calm down.

It's a good thing he got his student out, as the heroes seem to have called in more backup to help control and put out the fire. None of them, however, look the least bit concerned that there might have been someone in the building. They would've left him to die.

Shouta forces himself to run faster, glancing every now and then at Midoriya's face to see if there's any changes. His student doesn't stir, and he can't decide if that's good or bad.

He still hasn't managed to wrap his head around the situation, as just fifteen minutes ago he was doing his patrol like any other day, and now he's carrying a dying kid to the hospital, a ton of revelations coming to light.

"Christ, kid," he mutters, readjusting his grip when Midoriya's head falls into the crook of his neck. "You've got some explaining to do once we get out of this one."

It's a blessing that his agency's hospital is just around the corner, which is probably why Tsukauchi said he would already have everything prepared.

Shouta drops down to the sidewalk, ignoring the screams that come from the few civilians out at this time, instead kicking open the glass doors to the walk-in center. It's not the ER or hero section, but it'll have to do.

"Sir, visiting hours are—oh, shit!" A boy with cotton-candy hair begins, only to break off upon seeing what Shouta has in his arms. His hand slams something on the side of his desk, and the door to the back room immediately slides open.

Everything is a blur after that.

A team of doctors meet him halfway, all ones that Shouta is familiar with and could probably pick out by name, and then he's following close behind them after he places Midoriya on the rolling gurney.

"The pipe is deep—it could have hit close to his heart," he hears one of them say, and those words are all it takes to send Shouta down a spiral. "He needs it removed, now. Intake assessment first, as quickly as possible, then prep him for surgery."

Surgery. Surgery.

Someone ushers him back when he attempts to follow them, and he finds himself standing in the middle of the pristine, too-clean hallway with blood staining his dark clothes and hands, dripping rhythmically onto the floor. Antiseptic burns his nose, and he's brought out of his momentary daze when a nurse comes by with wet wipes to help him clean off.

Shouta can only nod in thanks when she leaves, semi-dry hands fumbling for the phone in his pocket. The first person he calls is Recovery Girl, but he's pleasantly surprised when Chiyo informs him that she's already on her way. Nezu apparently told her to pack her supplies and bring it over.

He makes a note to thank the principal for his creepy, all-knowing ways.

Shouta sits down in a chair directly adjacent to the wing they took Midoriya in, and then he calls Hizashi.

God knows he can't do this alone.

But after all that's said and done, when his husband has promised to be there in less than twenty minutes with an emergency overnight bag for him, Shouta has nothing else to do to pass the time.

So he thinks about every little thing that's led up to this event, and he waits.

When Izuku wakes up, it takes him a while to even notice it.

It's a funny thing, living after dying. Living after being so sure that the last thing he'd ever see would be the fiery embers of his father's hatred. But in the end he didn't die at all, though that's not how it feels.

He only realizes he's alive when his eyes blink open and focus on the people crowded around him. They're all in white and blue and black scrubs, and it takes Izuku a good ten seconds to process why that could be.

Oh. They're doctors. He counts the ones he can see and comes up with six. Or maybe it's seven. He doesn't know.

Another few seconds go by. They must've realized he's awake by now, since he can see their mouths moving but not emitting any sound. This is bad. He doesn't have a plan. He doesn't know what's happening, and he also doesn't know what the fuck is going to happen.

But that's not his problem. He's not going to stick around long enough to find out.

The memories hit him all at once, steeling his resolve, and then he moves.

Well, tries to. Izuku's entire body is numb, and he can't even move his own mouth to form words. He manages to tilt his head, and that's when he notices that he's been stripped down to his underwear, and that the pipe is still in his fucking side.

Are they trying to get it out? Is that what this is? A surgery? His stomach drops, and the world around him sharpens when a light shines in his eyes. They must've already taken his blood. They can see all of his scars, all of his wounds.

Which means they know. They know about Rabbit, they know about everything.

A fresh wave of panic hits him, and he starts struggling again. This time, he manages to move his arms and legs a little, lashing out with the faintest hint of One for All cackling across his skin. He can't come up with any more than that, though. It hurts to try.

"Hey, kid!"

"Son, stop moving."

A hand grabs his wrist and gently pins it to the table, and Izuku hates how hard it is just to break free from the doctor's grasp.

"Why isn't he still under? He shouldn't be awake!"

"He said he has a high metabolism, so keep pumping—!"

They're talking as if he's not there, and really, maybe he isn't. Not mentally, at least. He can still taste the ash in his mouth, still see the figure looming over the edge from high above. Still remember the anguish of not being able to find—

Liquid fire is injected into his bloodstream.

It hurts, god it hurts. It spreads from his arms to his neck and down to his toes. It's hot, it's hot, get it out of him, please, he's sorry, he said he was sorry, stop it, he won't ever do it again, he promises. Just get it out.

He tries not to break his promises. His father knows this. They should know this, and yet they're all just standing there while his entire body erupts into flames, the scorching heat peeling back his skin and taking knives to his flesh.

Wait. Please. Please. Please. Not this again. I was good.

Izuku thinks faintly, at the very back of his boiling mind, that if he goes unconscious one more time today, the void he ends up floating in will just stop taking him in altogether. He doesn't like that ocean of nothingness, no. He's not a fan after being exposed to it all his life. A better alternative to that would be not waking up at all.

Death can't resent him forever. She can't keep giving him a taste of hell only to yank him back up when he learns to get comfortable in it.

He's getting too tired.

Toshinori is smart. He knows this. The world knows this. He wouldn't be the number one hero if he wasn't.

Being smart, however, is not the same as being intelligent. Because as of this moment, with Toshinori sitting on a small plastic chair in a hospital he's never been to before, staring at his sound-asleep successor as he tries to fight off his latest infection, the man has never felt more dumb in his life. And coming from a man who's tried to Detroit Smash an entire typhoon away, that's saying something.

A student who gets the correct answer on a test can be described as smart, but a student that solves the problem from a different perspective or by using other means and resources to do so can be described as intelligent.

At least, that's what Gran always used to say.

One isn't better than the other, of course, but the fact still remains that Toshinori doesn't fall into the intelligent category, or else he would've fucking seen the signs.

"Rabbit," he mutters, testing the name out on his tongue, wincing as he hears it echo in his ears.

He still doesn't quite believe it. The words that Nezu cheerfully threw at him over the phone don't make sense to him. They can't be true, can't be possible.

Midoriya Izuku, his boy, his successor, just can't be the snarky vigilante that's been terrorizing Japan for upwards of a few years now. There's no way.

But even as he thinks this, Toshinori knows it's true. Not only is there solid proof in the form of whatever device was on the kid's forearm, but Aizawa himself even confirmed it. And as scary and questionable as his coworker can be sometimes, Toshinori still trusts his judgement wholeheartedly.

How the younger man figured it out in the first place is a mystery, though not one Toshinori is willing to ask him about.

But if he's being honest with himself, he doesn't care that Midoriya is a vigilante. He doesn't care that his successor has been breaking the law for so long that the no vigilantism clause has become more of a suggestion than anything set in stone. What really concerns Toshinori is everything else.

Midoriya is, for one, homeless. He doesn't live with his father like he told Toshinori, and nor does he just forget to eat sometimes in lieu of his busyness. The kid probably didn't even have any food to eat in the first place.

What this all means is that Midoriya lied to him. Straight to his face. On multiple occasions.

It hurts more than Toshinori is willing to admit.

The pieces have fallen into place. The more he thinks about it, the more obvious it becomes. The bags under the boy's eyes, the way he would limp or favor one side during training, even though Toshinori knew for a damn fact it wasn't because of their sparring matches. How light Midoriya is despite having pretty decent-sized muscles, and then there's the obvious skill he showed in hand-to-hand combat even on the first day they tried it together—it's all pointing to the idea that he's Rabbit, a homeless vigilante who has somehow managed to survive this long with the whole world against him whilst also going to a school for heroes.

It's so absurd to think about that Toshinori can't help but laugh, though it holds none of the usual warmth that always seems to come out when he's around the boy. He drops his head forward and rests a large palm on Midoriya's bandaged hand, wondering for the nth time since Nezu called him how things could've escalated this far. If Toshinori had known half of what he knows now, he wouldn't have let the boy out of his sight, and thus none of this would've happened.

He wonders what his mentor would think about all this, and he finds himself praying he hasn't disappointed her yet again. He wouldn't be able to take it.

"Why didn't you tell me?" He rumbles, more to himself than anything. He knows Midoriya probably can't hear him with the state he's in right now. "I would've helped you, my boy."

And it's the truth. Toshinori would've been upset, sure, but he never would have pushed him away. He'd never dream of it. Hell, harboring a wanted criminal and becoming an enemy to the government honestly wouldn't have been a big price to pay in exchange for Midoriya's safety and happiness.

He would've gone that far in a heartbeat, but now it seems that option has gone down the drain. And the uncertainty of what will happen next is almost unbearable.

"I wouldn't take it personally," Aizawa says, and Toshinori does not jump out of his skin and squawk at the sudden presence of his coworker in the decidedly not-empty-room, thank you very much. He flushes, wanting to ask just how long he's been leaning against that wall for, but the man continues before he can get a chance. "He's lied to just about everyone. For good reason, too."

Toshinori frowns, turning his attention back to the injured boy, gaze lingering on his wrapped chest and stomach—a result of hours of surgery and multiple healing heroes. "I fail to see how there can be any reason good enough to excuse this."

He gets a grunt, and then Aizawa is walking closer to peer at his student as well. "I hate to say it, but for once I agree with you."

Does he, though? Toshinori knows that the other hero doesn't express his emotions as clearly as most people do, but he still can't help but be baffled at how Aizawa is holding such a blank face at a time like this. He doesn't look like someone who carried a near-dead teenager out of a collapsing building just hours before.

Toshinori could be wrong, though, as he's obviously not nearly as good at reading people as he thought he was.

He rests his hand back on Midoriya's, pointedly ignoring Aizawa's unimpressed stare at the action. He knows the boy can't feel or even accept the comfort Toshinori is trying to give him, but it can't hurt to try. And besides, he's doing this for himself, too. He needs to feel that his protégé is really here and alive, not just some figment of his imagination.

He clears his throat. “And what of his cat? Have we learned anything new?”

“They still haven’t found the person who dropped her off, but the vet made sure to save some of the blood found in her fur. They think it might belong to whoever did it.” Aizawa dips his face into his capture scarf and shoves his hands into his pockets. “I personally don’t think it’ll lead anywhere, but it’s not like there’s anything else they can go off of.”

Toshinori nods, satisfied with the answer. Missy was the second thing he asked about upon arriving at the hospital. He knows how much the cat means to Midoriya, so finding her and ensuring her health was at the top of his priority. Now, you can imagine everyone’s surprise after learning that a cat fitting Missy’s description was dropped off at a nearby Veterinarian’s office just an hour after Aizawa found Midoriya.

The secretary couldn’t catch a glimpse of who did it, having been too worried about the soot-covered feline in front of her. The cat wasn’t injured too badly, it seems. She had just a few scrapes and cuts from the initial explosion, so it didn’t take very long to heal her, but for now she's being kept at the Vet’s office until someone can pick her up.

Toshinori never thought he would be this relieved over an animal’s well-being before, and yet here he is. He’s begun to realize a lot of things about himself since Midoriya came along.

“The meeting at UA starts in an hour,” Aizawa states, eyes closed with his head thunking back against the wall, voice as monotone as always —though now Toshinori can detect something deeper in those words. He just can’t put his finger on it. “If you want to make it on time you should leave now. I’m sure you of all people want to be there to make sure nothing bad happens.”

Toshinori’s brows furrow, confusion lining his features. “You’re not going?”

Aizawa just snorts. “Someone has to watch the kid, All Might. You heard what he did during surgery, now imagine how much more panicked he’ll be once he wakes up, especially now that he’s restrained.”

Toshinori was so consumed in his thoughts earlier that he completely forgot about the thick black straps pinning the injured boy to the table. There's four of them—one that goes over his chest, one that rests over his hips, one for his knees, and another for his ankles. Toshinori was appalled when he busted through the doors and saw them, but no amount of demanding saw to the restraints being removed.

"It's cruel," he spits out, that earlier anger coming back tenfold. "Young Midoriya is not an animal that needs to be restrained. He's just going to struggle harder this time."

Aizawa lifts a shoulder in a shrug. "They've deemed him a flight risk, and with such a powerful quirk it's only protocol to strap him down to prevent him from hurting himself or others. But that doesn't make it right."

No. No it does not. The only thing Toshinori can say is at least the doctors compromised with them: if Midoriya shows signs of being less volatile and more compliant the next time he wakes up, the straps will be allowed to be removed. It sounds simple enough, but it's hard to predict what Midoriya will do next at this point. No doubt the boy is as lost and panicky as everyone else. He might lash out again.

The hero stands from the uncomfortable chair, his joints popping as he goes. His hand retracts, but he hesitates on moving further, not wanting to leave his successor but also not wanting to miss the very important meeting at UA that'll determine Midoriya's fate.

And it's not that he doesn't trust Aizawa to watch over him carefully, it's just that it's hard to trust anyone right now after all the information they've learned.

The underground hero must sense his gaze on him, as dark eyes flutter open and glitter in the hospital lights. "He'll be fine, All Might. You act like I'm going to kill him the moment he wakes up." He tilts his head in consideration, a wry grin appearing on his face. "Actually, with all the shit he's been hiding from us, that might save us all some trouble."

Toshinori balks, forcing himself to simply wave goodbye and take his leave after one last glance at his successor. He can only hope that last part was a joke, as it's hard to tell with Aizawa sometimes.

But it's too late to worry about that now. He has a meeting to attend.

Shouta waits in Midoriya's room for thirty minutes, just playing cat games on his phone and grading papers with the occasional call from Nemuri or Hizashi, before Chiyo texts him to come to her office. He immediately gets up and makes for the room three doors down the hallway, already knowing what this is about.

The surgery was a success overall, besides the whole waking up in the middle of it part, so Shouta isn't too worried about the damages that particular wound will leave Midoriya. His other injuries were taken care of after, so he's fine there as well. The boy just needs a few more healing sessions and he should be set to leave.

But that's not the major problem at hand. The problem is that Midoriya obviously has a ton of other issues that no one is really paying attention to. Issues that look to have been going on for awhile now, and yet haven't been talked about before now.

Chiyo said she'd do an extensive check-up over Midoriya, and when Shouta found out about it he'd asked if he could be there for the results. As the boy's homeroom teacher, Shouta thinks he has a right to know what the hell's wrong with him.

Which leads to now, with Chiyo shuffling papers and binders around to try and clean up her makeshift workspace. She sets a few more things aside before collapsing in a chair, clutching what looks to be the results of the tests in her hand.

Shouta gives her a few moments to recover, watching as she sits up a little straighter and smooths out the papers.

"You might as well sit down, this is going to be awhile."

Her voice is grim, and Shouta sinks into the plastic chair opposite of her. He can already tell this isn't going to be good.

"Midoriya has multiple health issues—all of which are being supplemented by his quirk. Some completely, others partially.” At Shouta’s blank look, she continues. “When I say this, I mean that the only reason he appears healthy is because his quirk is ensuring that he is. However, as you can imagine, there are many problems that have arose because of this.” She takes in a deep breath, rubbing her forehead tiredly, air passing between her teeth.

Shouta is struck with sudden gratitude for the woman. She hasn’t gotten a break from using her quirk in days. Nezu called her here in the middle of the night without warning, and Shouta has yet to hear a single complaint from her. In fact, she seems more calm than anyone else would be in this situation.

"It is very subtle,” she notes, catching Shouta’s eye as if to make sure he understands. “I doubt many others would have noticed it if they weren’t specifically looking for it, but the boy also has a very high metabolism due to his enhancements, so he heals at a slightly faster rate than normal humans, though not quite fast enough to be considered a true regenerative aspect. At least, not one that he’d have to register for.”

He frowns, hunching forward in his chair. “So he can heal himself? To what extent?”

Chiyo shakes her head. “To say heal is to assume he gets fully recovered, which he doesn’t. You’ve seen the scarring on him, Shouta. His x-rays indicate multiple past fractures and breaks, most of which are from blunt force trauma, not necessarily continuous pressure. A majority of those breaks, it seems, healed incorrectly.”

Shouta crosses his arms, taking in her words like water. “Incorrectly,” he echoes drily. “I should’ve figured saying as he doesn’t like hospitals. I’m sure he thought he could tend to his injuries by himself.”

“That’s the way it looks as of right now. But the problem is his healing isn’t exactly some grand quirk—it is merely a result of a boosted metabolism, which means that although his body has its own way of stitching itself up, it doesn’t exhibit proper care or treatment needed to help him fully recover. Infections and diseases, for one thing, are still things he’s highly susceptible to. A high metabolism won’t exempt him from those threats.”

The hero looks troubled, and Shouta catches on quickly. “He’s healing in all the wrong ways,” he finishes. “So his quirk is basically putting a bandage on a gunshot wound and calling it a fix."

"Unfortunately so. It works in the moment, and as long as the bandage is changed every so often normal functions will remain, but in the long run things will only prove to get worse."

It's not used to make sure he's safe, Shouta realizes with a start. It's used to make sure he wins the battle in that moment.

He curses, the weight of her words falling onto his shoulders like a boulder. "How do you fix it?" He asks, and he winces at his own desperation. "All of the stuff you said you found, I mean."

"We'd have to undo the healing that's already taken place, starting with re-breaking certain bones so I am able to fix them properly. Only then will his quirk factors be of use to him."

Fuck.

They sit like that in silence for a moment, Chiyo looking over the papers and Shouta running his hands through his hair—a nervous tic he thought he'd gotten rid off after high school, but it appears not.

He swallows past the lump in his throat. "What else is wrong with him? It can't be just that."

"I'll start with the health issues his quirk does not fully supplement, or the ones that are too severe for it to correct. The most basic one would be bad quirk control. His enhancements are maintaining Midoriya's body in such a way that it causes an imbalance in his nervous system, making the control over his own strength very difficult. It seems he also has vast reserves of power which only amplifies this difficulty."

Shouta grinds his teeth in mild frustration. There were so many signs pointing to the truth, and yet he still missed them all. It was only a few weeks ago that he managed to put some of the pieces together, which is completely unacceptable. Too late. Far too late. I could've prevented this if I had just looked a little deeper.

"That's not the worst of it, I'm afraid." Her voice brings Shouta out of his thoughts. "He also has some trauma on his growth plates which has me concerned. This is directly involved with his own bodily health. His malnutrition and lack of sleep is making his body frail, thus making his cells work twice as hard for only a fraction of the usual outcome."

For a second, Shouta thinks he's misheard her. "Malnutrition?"

"Don't act so surprised!" Chiyo exclaims, giving the younger hero a sharp look. "The boy looks dead on his feet, Shouta, and I know you've noticed how small he is. His sugar levels are way below average, and it looks like he hasn't had a proper meal in months. It's an easy enough fix, though, and if addressed soon won't be a problem in the future."

She looks up at Shouta, giving him a moment to grasp what she's saying and to interject or ask questions if he chooses to. He stays silent, his mind drifting to the meeting he knows his husband is at right now. He knows one of them had to be there, so he's not complaining, but at the same time he can't help but wish Hizashi could be here beside him.

"One thing I need you to note," Chiyo says slowly, her serious gaze grabbing hold of Shouta's and not letting go, "is that this malnutrition doesn't seem to be a new thing. His body is used to this, almost. The trauma on his growth plates, as I mentioned, extends back several years." She shakes her head. "Which might be why he's so small, you know. Everything else about his body points to the idea that he should have grown a little by now, but he hasn't. He's almost unnaturally short for a boy his age. And, taking into account his muscle mass and BMI, underweight. Do you catch my drift?"

It extends back years. Meaning this has to have been going on for longer than Midoriya has been homeless. He wasn't eating correctly when he was with his guardian, and nor was he being treated right.

Neglect?

Yes. Shouta understands what she's saying very well.

Chiyo turns her eyes to the paper once again. "The last is his body's dependency on his quirk for maintaining his health. His enhancements are making up for a deficit in nearly every necessary thing, from calcium to Vitamins A, D, and C. It's extensive. Like I said before, this also goes into his eating and sleeping habits. He might not actually feel like he's hungry or tired, so it may be more difficult to notice how destructive he's being to himself. That's also an easy enough fix, but I do expect some trouble."

"I'll take care of it," Shouta interrupts, nodding. I can make him eat and sleep, at least.

“And I’ll hold you to that,” she threatens, pointing her cane at him. “This could work out better than expected, but even so, there’s always a chance things could go downhill straight after this. What I can do is give you basic dietary and nutritional supplements to help his body start maintaining itself once he’s discharged.”

“Okay,” Shouta breathes, looking out the window briefly before letting his eyes close. “That’s not too bad.”

“It will take a while, and it will be difficult. The poor boy’s entire body will be thrown out of whack, and no doubt he will become sick, frail, and weak during the time his body takes to adjust. His hormones will be imbalanced for a while, but at the end of it he will ultimately be healthier. And not to mention perhaps have better quirk control.”

Chiyo had held Shouta’s gaze during her explanation and now sits waiting for him to respond, though she’s not rushing him at all. They both know it’s a lot to take in.

The silence stretches on and her eyes gain a dark light of understanding. “It wouldn’t be the worst a hero has lived with, though, and it won’t be the worst to come. He’s just going to need a lot of support.”

Support, huh? Midoriya’s parents are out of the question. That doesn’t leave many other choices.

Chiyo stands, folding the paper and moving back to her desk. “You’re not obligated to do anything, Shouta. He’s alive and functioning well enough at the level he is at—for now, at least.”

She opens a drawer, and Shouta follows her movements with his eyes.

“If there is one thing we know as heroes, it is that life is suffering. We live as tools for a greater good, nothing more, nothing less. But, if you do intend to be there for him,” she pauses, turning to Shouta with a paper labeled Dietary Plans in hand, gaze heavy as it lands on him. “You must commit to it. You make your choice and that’s that; don’t give false hope and don’t build something you plan on destroying. It’s far crueler than continuing to stand by as you have been doing.”

She passes him the document, eyes softening. Shouta doesn’t know quite when it got so suffocating in here. His throat feels tight all of a sudden.

“He’s a good kid, and he’ll be an even greater hero,” she says, like it’s an undisputed fact, “he just needs someone to guide him back to the light.”

He clutches the paper tighter and watches the woman leave with his mind reeling.

It won’t be until later that he realizes he never asked her about the boy’s blood results.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Visiting the children in nearby orphanages used to be one of Hizashi's favorite things to do when he had time off.

Between being a teacher, a radio show host, and a pro hero, he doesn't get much time to himself. But even with the insane hours he works and the patrols he occasionally takes during the weekends, he always makes sure to have a little time left over for the little ones in the orphanages.

Hizashi loves children. He's always had a soft spot for them, and he likes to think he's a pretty likable figure among them. Children seem to like his upbeat personality and voice, and they don't cower away or cry when they see him, which is honestly more than he ever hoped for when he first graduated high school. Even most adults don't care for his loud voice, so it certainly came as a surprise to him when he made his hero debut.

Kids are just so sweet and kind and lovable that god, once upon a time Hizashi had wanted to adopt one.

He still does, in all honestly (he doesn't think that part of himself will ever fully go away), but that naïve wish of his has long since been stamped out. Hizashi remembers how he would have dreams of raising a kid with Shouta; wonderful dreams that would fill him with longing and a touch of sadness, because Shouta made it very clear that he didn't want any children.

It's too dangerous, Hizashi remembers his husband saying to him one night after he finally built up the courage to tell him about his dreams. About his thoughts on the future—on their future.

And it is dangerous, really. Hizashi isn't stupid. He knows that with their line of work, having a baby—whether or not it's biologically theirs—would create a weakness; it would paint a huge red target on the listener's back. Most villains won't hesitate to hurt a child if it means getting back at the heroes who've wronged them. It's only logical, as Shouta would say.

But even with that knowledge weighing heavy at the back of his mind, Hizashi never stopped visiting the orphanages. He never stopped wanting. He would bring it up every now and then just to see his husband's reaction, because Hizashi knows Shouta wasn't entirely truthful that night. He knows his best friend like he knows the back of his own hand, like he knows the alphabet—forwards, backwards, in his sleep, and in another language. Shouta wants a child, too, and it's rather obvious. At least to the ones close to him.

Shouta, contrary to popular belief, doesn't hate children. He wouldn't be a teacher otherwise, that's for sure. He truly cares for his students, more so than most teachers in his position. That's something else that Hizashi and Shouta share: this want—no, need to have someone to bring into their relatively small and tight-knit family. This need to have someone to raise as their own.

Bonding with the kids at the homes served as a repeating source of comfort for Hizashi since the gap of years between Oboro's death and his marriage with Shouta—that stretch of time where the tide of grief was strong and any glimmers of happiness were revered like gold dust, and Hizashi and Shouta would cling to each other in hopes of riding out the never-ending waves of pain.

But the little tradition of going to visit the kids stopped shortly after meeting Midoriya for the second time. Hizashi remembers it with striking clarity, how he walked into that laundromat half-asleep, a clothes basket tucked under his arm with his mind flashing back to the celebrity interview he just finished up a few hours before, and promptly stumbled upon the same kid he'd witnessed being bullied not too long before.

We're just playing a game, one of the little gremlins said, obviously lying their ass off in hopes of not getting lectured. A game is only a game when all participants are enjoying themselves, and it's obvious Midoriya wasn't enjoying himself at all.

But back to the point.

Hizashi doesn't know why he stopped visiting the children as often as he used to. It just sort of happened. Maybe he just lost his drive, his passion. After so long of just waiting and wishing, he burnt himself out.

He wanted to cut things off before he hurt himself even more with the idea of what could never be.

Or perhaps, some faraway part of him whispers, as if afraid of being even remotely correct, that drive was directed somewhere else.

It's been fifteen minutes since the meeting started and Hizashi hasn't talked much at all. He's opted to sit back in his worn rolling chair and spin around as he listens to Midoriya's other teachers ask varying questions, uncharacteristically quiet.

This is a lot to take in for everyone here. Learning that one of the most wanted vigilantes in Japan is actually a teenage boy is one thing, but learning that said vigilante attends a school full of pro heroes and wasn't caught is another. Hizashi chances a glance around, hiding a small smirk at how utterly baffled his coworkers look. Is it really this surprising? Midoriya has shown to be far more skilled than any other average first-year, so connecting him with Rabbit (someone who has already been rumored to be very young) can't be that much of a stretch.

Principal Nezu obviously doesn't think so. The albino stoat looks absolutely delighted at these turn of events, being the sadist he is. Hizashi wouldn't be surprised if the mammal already knew about Midoriya's situation before all of this went down. His boss is scary like that. Too smart for his own good, that's for sure.

The teachers have already been given the rundown of what happened —well, at least the version of it that'll protect Shouta and Tsukauchi from getting charged for aiding a criminal. The story Nezu fed the others is technically the truth, it's just lacking a bit of details: Rabbit got seriously injured after a series of explosions, and Shouta had coincidentally found him in that building during his patrol and taken him to the hospital. Upon unmasking the vigilante and finding out his identity, he alerted Nezu to the situation, leading them all to where they are now.

Hizashi knows the real story, obviously, so he doesn't really have to be here. But this meeting is important, so of course Hizashi's going to make sure he's present. What happens here is going to decide the little listener's future.

He's spacing out again, isn't he? That's not really the best thing to do at the moment. He has to pay attention to what's being said. Despite his efforts, though, his mind chooses to focus on how he royally fucked up.

Hizashi should've known. He's been around Midoriya for quite some time now. He knew something was wrong; hell, the listener practically begged him to not walk him home that time, which is so screwed up that Hizashi immediately went home to share his worries with Shouta. All those times he met up with Midoriya at the laundromat, all those lies about his father being on a business trip—it's all playing on loop now, almost like a steady stream in his head. He thinks about how he'd joke around with Midoriya in English sometimes instead of doing his actual teacher work, and he thinks about how happy the boy seemed in those moments. Carefree, giddy, and even somewhat confident as he spoke in a foreign tongue with ease.

And then he tries to imagine that same boy caught up in the middle of a targeted villain attack, unable to do anything but wait in a burning building for help that he didn't even know would arrive or not.

It's not a pleasant thought.

"What's going to happen next?" Kan asks, arms folded over his chest. Why he's here is beyond Hizashi, but whatever. The only other heroes present are Midoriya's direct teachers, and honestly it should've stayed like that. This is a need-to-know basis; only the most trusted should be hearing this. "The kid's a criminal, right? After he's cleared, he'll be headed straight to jail. Maybe even prison."

Hizashi shifts, and he spots All Might jerk in his seat, as if about to cut in, but Nezu beats him to it.

"In ordinary circumstances, yes. Midoriya would indeed be handed over to the police for a full investigation and interrogation, but the fact of the matter is that this case is far from ordinary. Midoriya is, first and foremost, a child." He holds up a paw to stop Kan from interrupting. "He may be a vigilante, but that doesn't mean he is a criminal. Nor is he a villain."

Damn right, Hizashi thinks sourly. Can't we just kick Vlad outta this meeting? This would go by much faster.

"Reporting Midoriya to the police would be, ah, c*ounterproductive,* if you will."

All of the occupants in the room shudder at the principal's words, and Kan wrinkles his nose. "So, what? We just let this go and pretend this never happened?"

Huh. It's almost like he wants the listener to go to prison.

"Why not?" Nemuri counters, ever the saving grace. Her voice is sultry, and she leans back in the chair to put her hands at the back of her head. "It oughta keep things a little more interesting around here, don't you think?"

"I assure you that this won't be swept completely under the rug," Nezu soothes, not breaking away from Kan's accusing stare. "We will handle this matter accordingly, as being a vigilante is, as you pointed out, illegal. Regardless of what his intentions were, Midoriya is still very much in the wrong. As a consequence, Rabbit will no longer be active after this meeting, at least for the time being."

Snipe clears his throat, cutting across Kan's outraged echo of for the time being? "His intentions? And what're those?"

Hizashi perks up, ready to jump in and defend the boy if need be, but it seems Nezu has it covered.

"As of this moment, his motives for being a vigilante are unclear, though I do suspect we will get some satisfactory answers soon. I'm sure Midoriya will eventually agree to an interrogation by one of our trusted detectives, and only then can we—"

"An interrogation?" All Might interrupts, speaking for the first time since Nezu's explanation to the others. "I don't think that will be necessary! I mean, Young Midoriya is definitely in quite the rough spot, no denying that! But isn't an interrogation too harsh?"

"He's a criminal," Kan reminds again, being ultimately ignored by the others in the room.

Ishiyama hums, considering All Might's words. "It does seem a little cruel. The boy's entire building went up in flames, right? He's no doubt traumatized."

Yamada watches everyone's reactions when Nezu dutifully answers the cement hero's question.

"As I'm sure many of you have already guessed, Midoriya has been homeless for quite a few years now." The temperature in the room seems to drop a couple thousand degrees, and the albino stoat continues, as if unaware of the rising tension. "Rabbit lived in that abandoned building during most of his time as a vigilante, so it most definitely became a sort of safe space for him."

"And now that's all gone," Ectoplasm finishes for him, shaking his head.

If only he went to someone. We were all right here for him. Did he not realize that?

Nezu looks pained at the response. "Unfortunately so. I was quite upset myself when I first received the news. This is all quite devastating for the poor boy." He moves around a stack of papers in front of him, seeming to search for something. "I looked through his records not too long ago to see what I could find that could possibly be of use for this situation, and it appears that the only guardian he has listed on all of his legal paperwork does not, in fact, exist. I haven't been able to get ahold of him. After doing some more research, I've concluded that Midoriya doesn't appear to have any family left at all—at least, not any that he considers as such."

Hizashi's throat constricts at the admission, and he sees the other teachers in the room straighten up, obviously not expecting that. All Might looks to be having a series of important and earth-shattering revelations.

"I'm afraid that even as head of UA, I will not be able to do much for Midoriya legally speaking if things do not work out as well as we all wish. Unless I can find a suitable placement for the boy, I will be forced to release him to the proper authorities, who will then put him in the system."

Shit. Just as Hizashi thought. This isn't good. This isn't good at all.

All Might is the first to react, his voice pleading. "Foster care, sir? Isn't there another way? If he's put in the system he might be forced to drop out of UA! And then how can we even hope to protect him from —?"

"I'm all too aware of this possibility," Principal Nezu says calmly, pressing his paws together as he lets his gaze travel to each and every hero present at the table. "Which is why foster care will remain as a last resort only. As of right now, I have one other option that will ensure of Midoriya's enrollment here. However, I will need a definite answer from one of you before this meeting is to conclude."

Oh. Oh. Hizashi knows where this is going.

He watches with his mouth slightly agape as the mammal slides out another packet of papers from the stack, and even from the opposite side of the table Hizashi can clearly see what the papers are for.

“While we can keep the true identity of Rabbit a secret from the world, both for his and our safety, we cannot hide the truth about Midoriya’s living situation. Which is why I’m suggesting that one of you eventually take over legal guardianship of the boy after UA gains custody of him.”

The sudden silence is almost deafening. Hizashi had expected something like this to happen, but to actually hear it aloud? It doesn’t feel real. Like this is all some sort of sick joke.

Nezu smiles. “In essence, yes. Though I also ask that you work to keep Midoriya in check, as I’m sure these recent events will give way to less than pleasant reactions. He is, again, a vigilante who is currently being hunted by a group of very persistent people, so it is imperative that we do everything we can to help him. Even if he doesn’t see it that way, and even if it’s not exactly legal.”

At the mention of the attackers, Hizashi shivers. Shouta texted him briefly about the bodies he’d stumbled across while trying to save the kid—the heroes and villains alike scattered like dead flies on the bloodstained rooftops. That doesn’t feel real either, though Hizashi knows it must’ve been horrifying to see.

The voice hero must’ve spaced out again, because when he shakes himself out of those unpleasant thoughts, All Might is lifting his chin determinedly.

“I can take him in!” He says, and all of the jaws in the room collectively drop in unison.

Now, Hizashi knows that All Might favors Midoriya out of all the other students. It doesn’t take a genius to realize that. But this is still unexpected. He’s the number one hero, and he’s offering to house a whole kid like it’s nothing.

Nezu ponders this for a moment, resting his chin on a paw. “I have no doubt that you would do right by him, All Might, but I do not think that would be the best course of action at this time.” He continues before the the blond can defend himself. “You’re a very well-known figure, so if the media ever got a hold of that information, it would be the end of everything. Publicity is exactly what we don't want here."

"But I would be better—!"

Hizashi tunes out the rest of the counter argument, channeling his inner Shouta. This is getting to be pointless. While All Might definitely has passion for the cause, it's just unrealistic. Midoriya would arguably be in more danger with him as a caretaker. But at the same time, no one else here seems willing to open up their home to him. The listener will be forced to go into foster care if Nezu doesn't allow All Might to take him in.

There's a voice in Hizashi's head now. One that he repressed a long time ago, right after Shouta told him those words: It's too dangerous.

That voice is back now, and it's telling him that maybe, maybe that old dream wasn't as farfetched as it seemed. That maybe some things were just meant to be waited for.

Because this just feels right.

When Hizashi raises his hand and drags his gaze up from the table he's been drilling holes into with his eyes, he realizes Nezu is staring at him. Has been for a good few seconds. The mammal was waiting for his response. He had expected for him to say something.

Great.

Yamada Hizashi is simple, after all, and he knows it. But this doesn't mean he regrets it when he clears his throat and offers to house the wayward vigilante with his husband.

He'd never regret doing something like that.

The next time Izuku wakes, it's much quicker than before. It's almost sudden how it happens.

His eyes snap open, and he blinks into awareness. The smell that all hospitals share hits his nose, and his heart skips a beat. He's still here. He's still in danger.

Why wouldn't you be? His mind hisses at him. It's not like you magically got out of here by yourself while unconscious.

And that rude voice is right. His memory of the surgery is coming back slowly, but what he does know for certain is that he can't stay here.

His body is still numb, but not nearly as much as it was last time. He flexes his fingers just to prove this point, readying himself.

This is a different room than before, he can tell just by the ceiling. That's difference number one. The second difference is that there aren't any doctors hovering over him, poised and ready to strike.

Which means Izuku has been taken somewhere else. A secondary location.

No one survives the secondary location, he thinks, panic now gripping him in icy claws.

Yeah, he has to leave. Preferably now.

When he jerks up this time, it's not hands that hold him back, but rather large straps that go across his chest and hips, and the pain that shoots through his torso at the action has him crying out. He kicks his legs, only to realize that they're strapped down, too. So are his arms.

Oh, god.

One for All won't come to him. His quirks feel fuzzy, and even as he begs his mind to fucking cooperate and just do what it's supposed to do, to do what it always does even when he doesn't want it, Izuku finds himself stuck. He thrashes, breaths coming out in ragged gasps now.

Did they take them? His quirks? No, that's not possible. This can't be his father's doing. This—this has to be something else. If they were gone, Izuku would be left feeling empty. He'd know it, even while being this numb. Instead of that, though, the boy feels distant.

They're all there, he can feel it. But they still won't come to him.

Which means he's trapped.

The straps are thick. Even with his wild thrashing, they won't budge. Fuck, these must be All Might level restraints. Izuku may not be huge and burly, but he's still pretty strong without his enhancements. So for them to not even move an inch when Izuku is trying his best to dislodge them? It's scary.

Izuku throws his head back, hitting the hard pillow beneath him with a thump. He repeats the motion multiple times and squeezes his eyes shut, trying to conjure up everything he can, because fuck he can barely breathe. His throat feels tight, and the black straps dig into his bandaged skin every time he bucks up, chest heaving.

He needs to get out now, or else he'll forget how he even got in.

"Hey!"

Stars dance behind his eyelids, and he shakes his head fervently to get them away, not wanting to listen to whatever voice is teasing him. His head hits the pillow again, this time eliciting a dull burn at the base of his spine. Good. If he can just focus on that, maybe he can gain back the control on his quirks—

"Midoriya!"

—and get out of here. He's gone too far to stop now. He still needs to leave this country. He needs to find Missy and say goodbye to Kacchan and Ms. Hanako—

Large hands grasp his shoulders, shaking him violently, and it's like he's being thrust face-first out of cold water. His eyes fly open, meeting shining black ones, and his thrashing comes to an abrupt halt. Something feels off.

"Kid, I need you to calm down."

And that. That sounds like...?

Another shake of his shoulders, this time much gentler, and Izuku blinks up at Eraserhead's piercing gaze. Why is he here? Does he know about—?

"Hey," Aizawa says sharply, tearing the boy's attention back to him instantly. "Whatever you're thinking about, stop it. You're alright."

You're alright. He says it curtly, as if it's nothing more than the truth, and Izuku wants to believe him. He truly, truly wants to believe him. But his hands are still shaking and his limbs are still twitching under the restraints binding him to the bed, and it's harder than it should be to just trust. It's alright, he said, so it has to be true. Aizawa's never lied to him, at least not about things like this.

But that was before. Now is different.

Despite every bone in Izuku's body screaming at him to keep struggling, to keep fighting until he can find an opening, he forces his breathing to slow down until it's back to its normal rate, and he finds himself staring back up at the pristine white ceiling. He has to relax. If he doesn't, he might make them angry.

Who's them? His brain asks, and for once Izuku doesn't answer.

A finger pokes him in the forehead, and the boy realizes with a start that Aizawa is back to leaning over him, face pulled into a tight frown as he searches his expression. "Are you back?"

Izuku never really left, but instead of voicing this he just nods, still confused. There are so many questions on his tongue but not nearly enough energy to voice them.

Aizawa is here. That means he's okay, right? Or that he's in serious trouble. Both are entirely possible.

"Your cat is safe," the man says suddenly, backing away a few steps to give him space. Izuku's head snaps up, mind short circuiting, and Aizawa continues smoothly. "Someone dropped her off at a nearby vet's office around the same time I found you."

Izuku could almost cry at the revelation, but he's long since lost that mental capability, so he doesn't. He never cries, and he certainly isn't going to start now in front of his teacher. If what he's saying is true, Missy is alive. She's not dead because of Izuku's own poor, selfish decisions. She's not buried somewhere in a pile of ash—

I found you.

What does that mean? Is he the one who brought Izuku here? His memories are still hazy, and he can't remember a damn thing after passing out. God, how long has he been asleep? A day? Maybe more?

It's still dark outside, so it's hard to guess.

“Where—?” His voice comes out scratchy and raw. Izuku clears his throat. Tries again. “Where am I?”

Aizawa is still examining him, those keen dark eyes never leaving his face. “You’re at my agency’s hospital, kid. I found you at the scene of the fire and brought you here because of your injuries. You should understand that I didn’t have a choice.”

It’s said slow, as if he’s trying not to set Izuku off with the words, but if anything that makes him more upset. He doesn’t blame Aizawa for that. It’s just protocol. But what he wants to know is why the hero was there in the first place. His building is far from his patrol routes.

Izuku’s face twists with confusion as he frowns, the movement causing the raw skin on his jaw to pull taut. The prickling it rewards him with serves as a nice distraction. A nice focal point.

But then the hero is moving, stooping low to mess with what sounds like clamps on the underside of the bed. A moment later, the restraints loosen significantly, and the weight on Izuku’s chest is lifted. He doesn’t waste time in shrugging off the straps, that frantic need for freedom coming back in parts. He sits up a little too aggressively to take off the ones on his legs, having to choke down a hiss at the stab of pain in his torso.

“Easy,” Aizawa warns, ignoring the boy’s frantic thank you’s as he removes the tight strap going across his ankles. “You’re still recovering from your infection.”

Oh, Izuku guesses that makes sense. His head feels like it’s on fire right now. The IV taped to his elbow and the heart monitor set up on the side should’ve clued him in that he wasn’t healed all the way.

The hero sinks into the chair next to the bed, rubbing a hand down his face and looking way too tired to be dealing with the absolute bullshit being thrown at him right now.

This is when Izuku finally gets a good look at him. He’s not dressed in his hero clothes like he would usually be, but rather he’s wearing a normal maroon shirt with black sweatpants, and his hair is pulled back into a loose bun. A much larger yellow sweater is draped over the chair, and he assumes it must belong to the man as well. The change of appearance gives Izuku whiplash, and the boy feels guilt bloom in his chest.

He looks like he hasn’t slept. Has he been there all this time? At least enough time to need a change of clothes?

After a few moments of silence, Aizawa lets out a short sigh, crossing his arms. “I know.”

I know. Aizawa figured out Rabbit’s true identity a few weeks prior to this, so that’s obviously not what he’s referring to. Now, Izuku might have been more lost had there been more to hide.

His breath is shaky as he whispers a quiet oh.

Aizawa stares at him, eyes trailing from his head to his bandaged torso and then back again. The seconds tick by oh so slowly, and Izuku grips the sheets so tightly beneath him that his knuckles turn white long before the man speaks.

“I’m not sure if you remember, but you woke up during the surgery. They had to put you under again, and during that time they were forced to take off anything they deemed a danger to their work. That includes this.”

He leans down a little and picks up the small bag sitting near his feet, setting it on the edge of the bed. Izuku doesn’t have to look to know what’s inside, and yet Aizawa reaches into it and pulls out the ring anyway.

Izuku isn’t surprised in the slightest. He felt the absence of it immediately after waking up. His senses are dulled now because of whatever drug they have him on. And boy whatever drug that is must be expensive as hell, because Izuku has never felt so numb in his life.

There’s no blood sitting at the back of his throat. There’s no buzzing in his mind and no quirk-related pains stabbing him in the temples. All Izuku knows is that this medicine probably costs more than his entire life, and that’s understandable.

The effects are temporary, obviously, but still. If Izuku had access to this, he wouldn’t need those pills anymore. The only downside is that he’d be technically high all the time, which, now that he thinks about it, doesn’t sound so bad. He’s tempted, actually.

It can’t be that hard to steal whatever this is in his veins and—

“Midoriya.”

He winces, not liking the sound of his name in that voice at all.

There's a flicker of something in Aizawa's eyes. Something stern, but —but almost protective. Izuku looks down at his hands, suddenly very interested in the fabric he's messing with to the point where it's almost tearing.

Aizawa leans to press the ring into Izuku's palm and sets the bag back down on the floor. The boy can catch a glimpse of the shattered remains of AINA in there, and also of one of his Rabbit knives.

Dammit. Missy was spared, thankfully, but of course AINA had to go.

"How long?"

Izuku purses his lips. "How long have I been Rabbit?"

The man jolts a little. "No, kid, that doesn't matter right now. How long have you been homeless?"

Izuku stays silent, unsure of what to say. He has a feeling that no answer of his will satisfy Aizawa. He has that familiar urge to lie, almost ashamed at his own vulnerability and the realization he has that he's just one major fuck up. Everything in his life has just been upended in the past however many hours, and he doesn't know what to do, dammit. He doesn't know what's going to happen, and he also doesn't know why Aizawa is being so fucking gentle about this.

Why isn't he more upset? Why isn't he more angry?

His teacher repeats himself, slower this time, and Izuku winces as his fingers tear the first hole through the poor hospital sheet. He forces himself to stop fiddling with it, instead bringing up a palm to wipe at his bandaged cheek.

He already knows almost everything. There's no point in lying now.

"Just a few years, sir."

The honorific slips out on instinct, surprising both of them. He hasn't called Aizawa that as Rabbit in a long time. But then again, he's not really Rabbit right now, huh? He's not quite just Midoriya, either.

He's some god-awful, in-between thing, isn't he?

"Just a few—?" Aizawa cuts himself off abruptly. Izuku watches his teacher swipe a hand down his face for the second time in as many minutes and let out a huff of barely contained frustration. "Midoriya."

The boy grits his teeth at the name, at the disbelieving way the man says it. Is he disappointed? Or is he finally pissed? Izuku would prefer the last one.

“Where have you been staying? Have you been on the streets?”

Yesn’t, is his first response, but Izuku quickly thinks against that. Now isn’t the time to joke. He has to focus. He has to be in control right now. Aizawa knows he’s Rabbit, that much isn’t new, but now he knows that he’s homeless. He has to be ready to run. There’s no telling who Aizawa’s told.

But don’t you trust him?

Aizawa shifts in the chair, face twitching in what Izuku thinks briefly is impatience. Oh. He’s left him waiting for too long.

“That is—was my home. I know it looks bad now, but I managed with it.” Izuku smiles weakly, aiming for a laugh, a huff, anything that’ll wipe that look off his teacher’s face. “So technically, I’m not homeless. That was my home.”

Well, if he wasn’t before he definitely is now. But that’s beside the point.

Aizawa shoots him an unamused look before letting out another sigh. Izuku is starting to think that that’s his name given how often people do that around him nowadays. Wouldn’t that be funny? Instead of calling him by a name people would just sigh really loudly in his direction and he’d respond like normal.

“Do you know who did this? Who set the trap?”

“Trap?” Izuku lifts a shoulder, deflection on his mind. “I wouldn’t call it a trap, really. Barbecue gone wrong, more like. Karma for all those times I set fire to those poor villain bases, maybe.”

“Kid, please.”

The sheer exhaustion in Aizawa’s voice is what breaks the last of Izuku’s resistance. He mumbles an apology and forces the next words out of his mouth, even as they scrape and tear at his throat. “I’ve, uh, had eyes following me home ever since the USJ. It might’ve been them, I think? I’m not too sure.”

There’s a sudden, heavy silence, and when Izuku looks up, Aizawa is staring down at him with angry disbelief. And Izuku swears, he swears he sees a glimmer of hurt in those dark eyes, but he's still feeling pretty numb all over, and his brain feels more like static now, so honestly he could've just as easily imagined it.

"You noticed people tailing you for weeks before this, and you didn't think to come to someone about it? You didn't think to come to me?"

There's something about the way Aizawa's voice turns on the word me that has Izuku's gut churning painfully.

"You should have told me about your homelessness months ago. This should have been on your forms. You—" Aizawa's hand cuts through the air, and he takes a second to regain his composure. "You should have told me the first night we met when I caught you and brought you to Tsukauchi."

Izuku can't bring himself to meet his teacher's burning gaze, afraid of what he might find there. He settles on staring at the man's hands, at the way they tremble slightly when he moves them, at the way the hospital lighting makes the callouses on his palms look shiny. His words aren't quite an accusation, but Izuku knows he's expecting an explanation anyway.

"I thought if I told the truth, I'd be put in the system," he starts carefully, voice just above a whisper. "They'd take me away from everyone I know, and I wouldn't be close to—"

He pauses suddenly, but Aizawa seems to catch on rather quickly. "To UA. You didn't want to be away from UA or else you'd lose your chance at attending."

In all honesty, he's not wrong, though he's not completely right, either. UA is a school for heroes. All Might went there, and so did most of the other top ten heroes. It's a prestigious school that's guarded closely by its alumni, so to Izuku it's just as much a deterrent as it is a magnet.

It's an oxymoron in itself, just as hero society is, and All for One hates it.

Even though Izuku had no plans on going to this school—had no plans on being anything but Rabbit, to be frank—he still stayed closed to it. For comfort, maybe. To know that he always had that option.

No matter how fucked up or irrational it was, UA meant safety to Izuku long before he even started attending it.

“So you just dropped off the grid, under the pretense of living with one of your parents?” Aizawa prompts, realizing he wouldn’t get another answer from him for that topic.

“I retracted my real father’s legal authority over me,” Izuku says softly. “So technically, I’m a runaway orphan. Nobody ever knew when they checked my files because I made sure to cover it up. Besides, it’s not like he was looking for me.”

It’s not like All for One cared enough to come out of the shadows and bring him back. He likes to bide his time.

Aizawa blinks. “You tampered with government records to make sure you’d stay out of the system?” A pause, and then— “That’s why you were reluctant at first to participate in the Sports Festival. You didn’t want to be recognized.”

Close, but not quite. Izuku can’t do shit about his father knowing he attends UA. But what he can do is call him out on live TV and lead him on a wild goose chase across the globe. Which reminds Izuku that he can’t be here right now. He should be halfway across the world at this point, initiating said goose chase

He nods awkwardly, letting his mop of uneven and partially burnt green hair obscure Aizawa from view. For a moment, there is pure silence, the only sound being the dull ambiance from outside the door. He wonders what will happen now. If he’ll be dropped into the foster care system, or expelled from school, or dropped from the hero course.

Tartarus is another likely option.

Panic leeches from these thoughts, and he finds himself holding his breath whilst waiting for a response, eyes stinging.

“Why am I here?”

Aizawa swings his gaze around to stare at him. The gesture sends tingles of fear down Izuku's back. “Because you’re injured. The doctors here had to heal you, or else those wounds of yours would’ve landed you in a coffin.”

“No. Why am I here.”

Here, as in not in Tartarus. Not placed in cuffs. Not being sent to an orphanage, at the very least.

The underground hero keeps quiet for a moment before ultimately deciding to answer. He leans back in the chair, eyes narrowing. “Midoriya, I probably should have expelled you right after the USJ. Your actions during that incident gave me more than enough reason to do so. But you’re my student—a damn good one at that. You may be a problem student, but you have a lot of potential. It would be a failure on my part to let you slip through the cracks when you have the makings of an amazing hero in you.”

That heavy weight drops back into his stomach, and for a moment Izuku feels like he’s back there, trapped under a slab of concrete while his only home filled up with black smoke, his lungs screaming for cleaner air. He tugs himself out of that intrusive memory and covers his face with a hand, something warm settling over his skin. A part of him wishes he had gotten expelled then, as that would’ve saved him all this trouble, but another part, a nastier part, says that this was inevitable.

It would’ve happened with or without his expulsion, and the only difference is that maybe in those circumstances Aizawa wouldn’t have gotten to him in time.

Izuku lets out a shuddering breath. “Sensei, I—”

“I’m not finished,” Aizawa says, though his voice is softer than before. “What I did fail to do, however, is see how much trouble you’re in. As your teacher and a pro hero, it is my job to help and protect you, and I failed in doing that.”

“What?” His eyes widen as he faces him again, shock running down his back like cold water. “This isn’t your fault! It—It’s mine! There’s no way you could’ve—”

“Regardless of what you think, Midoriya, I should’ve done more to figure out your situation. I had a feeling you weren’t telling me the whole truth.” A crease forms between his brows, and he gestures with his hand at the entire room. “And look where we are now.”

Oh.

Izuku doesn’t know how to respond to that, so he doesn’t. He stays quiet, and Aizawa follows suit.

He stays quiet as the clock ticks on unfalteringly, he stays quiet as Aizawa pulls out some papers to work on to pass the time, and he even stays quiet as a nurse comes in and tells him about the extensive list of his injuries and issues.

The only thing he asks during this is if he's allowed to see Missy, which was a hard no before he even finished the sentence. He's not recovered enough, apparently.

Izuku scans his hospital room for the hundredth time while waiting for the sleep medicine he was given to kick in. His fever, courtesy of the infection, is going down, so at least that's happening.

His body is itching to leave this place, his mind wishing it could just turn off and pack up, and dammit Aizawa is still sitting there and watching him, unmoving.

Izuku has a ton of questions he wants to ask about how exactly he was saved, but he figures that's too fresh of a wound to mess with. So, he asks the only other important question.

"What's going to happen now?"

And why are you still here? Is what he really wants to ask. Why do you care so much?

"I don't know," Aizawa admits eventually, not looking up from his papers, "but I can assure you I'm not leaving you alone in it, whatever it is. I told you I would work towards your trust, right? I'm not taking that back now."

And Izuku does remember that. All those months ago, back when they met those first few times together as Rabbit and Eraserhead. Damn, those must have occurred a year ago now, huh? It's hard to think about.

Time seems to fly the fastest when you're dying.

The vending machine isn't working.

Shouta stares at the last jelly pack that sits teasingly in one of the middle rows, and he mourns for his lost change. It was an unworthy sacrifice, one that he blames the hospital staff for.

There should've been a sign, fucking hell. Use at your own risk would've been enough. Or maybe even out of order, because that's what it fucking is. Shouta is now convinced that the universe is out to get him, because why else would it choose him of all people to screw with right now. He's already had a shitty past few hours, so not getting his jelly pack is like the icing on the cake.

Good thing the hospital cafeteria is open. He might've gone insane otherwise.

Shouta ends up buying himself a hot coffee with just a spoonful of French vanilla creamer and a dash of cinnamon. It's been his go-to energy booster for years now, and it never fails to reward him with horrified looks from the people serving it to him.

It's even funnier sometimes when they see him down the cup in one go, not even flinching as the scalding liquid goes down his throat. It's truly a life-changing experience.

This time, however, Shouta takes his time with the coffee. Not just because it's a fairly decent walk to get back to Midoriya's floor and room, but because he needs something to anchor himself. The heat between his hands is a saving grace in the cold hospital, and it helps dispel most of his nerves and worries, at least for the time being.

He's done enough panicking in the last few hours; waiting outside during the surgery was hell all in itself, but then he had to actually talk to the kid after he woke up, which proved to be a lot harder than it sounds.

Midoriya has always been, to put it simply, a handful*,* but nowadays Shouta finds himself wanting to slam his head into a wall because of him more often than usual. He just doesn't know what to do anymore. The bombshells have just kept coming, one after another, and now he feels like it's only a matter of time before yet another one comes at them. He knows he'll have no time to prepare for whatever it'll be this time around.

The first surprise came with Rabbit's age, when the vigilante told him how old he was all those months ago during one of their outings. The second was his true identity, and the third, much to Shouta's rising horror and guilt, his homelessness.

He'd say that things couldn't possibly get worse from here, but honestly he doesn't want to jinx it.

The smell of antiseptic and soft chemicals clogs his nostrils, and Shouta wishes briefly that he could take a walk outside. He represses that thought, not wanting to risk straying too far from the boy. He's already left him alone for too long, even if he was sleeping when Shouta left him.

The hero's been catching up with some of his older friends at the hospital. Well, friends is kind of an overstatement. They're more like trusted acquaintances.

You see, Shouta doesn't have his own agency. He's an underground hero, so it'd be counterproductive to have a public building in the middle of the city where anyone and everyone can see you. He is, however, a part of an agency. Underground heroes are deprived of a lot of the backup and support the more well-known heroes get, so they all have to band together to stay afloat in their jobs and survive. They share information with each other sometimes and even help on solo missions.

The agency Shouta is a part of is partnered with this hospital, which is why he knows practically everyone here. When he gets injured during his patrols and Chiyo isn't available, this is usually where he goes. The staff here knows how to keep things on the down-low, so he's not worried about Midoriya's impromptu visit getting out to the public.

No one ever hears about underground hero agencies because the heroes working in them actually do their fucking jobs.

Besides that. Shouta may not actively enjoy or seek out any social interaction beyond what's required of him to do, but he does make sure to keep good relationships with his coworkers. Connections are good to have, as connections give you information, and information gives you power.

There's nothing more dangerous than an enemy who knows all of your secrets—even the secrets you never knew you had to begin with. And the thing about that is that Shouta always knows more than he lets on.

That's just how being an underground hero works. What you lack in raw power you make up for in intelligence and carefully-honed skill.

Despite his silent promise to himself, Shouta's coffee is already almost done by the time he's halfway across the first floor. The kid is on the tenth floor, so he's headed for the elevators.

He's only slightly surprised when he catches a glimpse of long yellow hair making its way toward him from one of the nearby entrances. It's been a few hours since the conference at UA was supposed to start, so it's about time his husband arrived back.

"Honey!" Hizashi sing-songs, smiling with all his teeth.

And oh, Shouta does not like the look on his face. It's kind of scary, seeing as the only time Hizashi calls him that in that tone of voice is when the blond's done something stupid.

Shouta turns to him with a raise of the brow. "What did you do?"

The voice hero squawks at the non-greeting. "Why do you always assume I did something!" He relents immediately at the unimpressed look Shouta gives him. "Okay, I may have screwed up this time, but that doesn't count!"

"Get on with it, Hizashi."

"Okay, well nice to see you, too! So you know the meeting I just got back from? The one where we were supposed to figure out what to do with the listener's living situation?"

Shouta frowns at the odd choice of wording. "Supposed? You mean it didn't get done?"

"No, well, it did, it's just..."

And then the realization sinks in. Shouta stares at his husband, who has that familiar guilty-but-not-regretful look on his face, and wishes more than anything that the coffee in his hand would turn to vodka. "You offered to take him in, didn't you?"

Hizashi laughs nervously. "Okay, I don't know how you possibly guessed it that quickly, but yes! I did! And I just wanted to prefix this by saying that I'm sorry I didn't ask you first, but nobody else was eligible or willing to do it, so I figured that it'd be the most logical thing for us to do, y'know, since the listener would be much more comfortable around someone he knows and not a complete stranger. We also happen to have a spare bedroom at home that we can finally put to good use—"

Ignoring the way his heart speeds up, Shouta holds up a hand to get his husband to slow down. He needs more coffee to even comprehend the slew of words spilling from his mouth. "'Zashi, you know we can't have a kid in our apartment."

The blond takes a deep breath and starts up again, continuing his verbal PowerPoint presentation. "You're already close to him, right? Nezu wants someone to keep the listener in check—which is dumb as hell, by the way, but you're still the best choice for that! Not to mention we're pro heroes, so we could get guardianship over him in the snap of a finger later on!"

Shouta scoffs as he continues walking back towards the kid's room, entering the elevator with his husband quickly following. "It's not as simple as that and you know it."

"But where else is the listener supposed to go? He's going to be sent into the foster care system, Sho, and then he won't be able to attend UA." Hizashi's voice takes on a more pleading edge. "Is that really the best decision for him? You said yourself that he has more potential than most!"

Shouta shakes his head. "Nezu could grant him a scholarship." Lord knows how the kid was affording the school's fees anyway. "It would pay for all out-of-area costs."

A hand grabs his arm, and Shouta looks at his husband in mild surprise, not expecting the sudden sadness to be etched into the man's features.

Hizashi has that familiar gleam in his eye. "The closest foster care that can take him is three cities over, and it would be a five-hour walk roundtrip from there to UA. It wouldn't be fair to force that on him."

And Shouta understands. He does. But the exhaustion is making him weary, and his patience is already thin. "He hid this from everyone, Hizashi. We're not forcing this on him."

The blond glares at him and crosses his arms. And oh boy, this is part of the reason why Shouta naps during his classes; he can never catch a break. See, the people who know that Hizashi and Shouta are together assume that Shouta is the more stubborn of the two, but only close friends know that that's not true. Shouta would much sooner back down in an argument if it meant the other person would shut the hell up and let him sleep instead of wasting his breath. Hizashi normally isn't like that, but to be this stubborn? It's obvious that this is something he's not going to budge on.

“He’s homeless, Shouta! The only place he had is now uninhabitable, and I doubt he’d even stay in that foster care if we made him go. He’ll run the moment he gets a chance!”

Shouta starts walking again when the elevator doors open on Midoriya’s floor, sighing when Hizashi jumps in front of him and starts to walk backward to maintain eye contact.

"We live close to UA,” the voice hero says after a brief, quiet moment. “We’re familiar to him and we’re also pro heroes, not to mention his teachers. We have plenty of room, a good income, and plenty of experience with children in general. Tell me this isn’t meant to be.”

A few more twists and turns before they make it to his room. They better wrap this up soon in case Midoriya is awake. He doesn’t want the boy to accidentally hear them talking about him. That wouldn’t be very ideal.

Shouta hates the way he feels hope at Hizashi’s word, but then something else dawns upon him. It’s obvious that Hizashi has been thinking about this for a while. His reasons are too well-thought-out and detailed for it to have been on the fly. Shouta knows why he’s so adamant about this all of a sudden. It’s kind of obvious now.

The blond comes to an abrupt halt in front of him, and Shouta sighs for the umpteenth time that day, deciding to just be blunt. “Midoriya is not a baby, Hizashi. I know you still want a child, but we’ve already talked about this. It can’t happen with our line of work.”

Furstration and surprise flits across Hizashi’s face, and Shouta instantly realizes his mistake. “I didn’t offer for us to take him in just because I want a kid, Shouta. I offered because he needs us. And besides, even if that was the case, that’s exactly my point! I know we can’t have a little one, but you just said he’s not a baby, so actually it’d be better for us to have a kid who’s older, right? Someone who’s not completely helpless?”

Damn Shouta’s husband and his ability to twist words. This is unfair, especially because he’s right.

“It would be difficult,” he settles on, walking forward again. The nurses and doctors walking past them don’t pay their conversation any mind, which is expected. They know better than to do that here. “He’s a vigilante, Hizashi, and he’s also a teenager with a magnet for trouble and arson. He’s not exactly fond of me right now, either.”

“That’s because you’re unapproachable,” Hizashi says, waving him off. “But come on, Sho, please? He needs somewhere he can call home. He needs someplace stable, and I know we can give him that and much more. He’ll be much happier with us than anyone else!”

He doesn’t need to try and win Shouta over on that. It doesn’t take a genius to realize Midoriya was unhappy with his previous situation. He survived the passing days, sure, but it doesn’t mean he truly lived them. At the beginning, Shouta thought it likely that abuse was the case, which would explain the bruises on Midoriya’s skin and his overall skittish attitude, but now, though, he sees that he was wrong.

The boy was simply cast aside and left to fend for himself—based on the little information Shouta dug up. “What about All Might? I would’ve thought he’d be dying to take the kid in,” he says, though they both know it’s a weak argument. The number one hero is an okay teacher at best, so Shouta doubts he’d be able to care for a teenager. That just doesn’t seem like something he could do.

“He tried. Nezu wouldn’t let him because of his popularity. The media would have a feeding frenzy if they found out the Symbol of Peace suddenly had a kid under his care.” Hizashi leans into him while they walk, shooting him puppy eyes (not that that ever works on him; Shouta is more of a cat person). “Which leaves us as the only option, Sho. There’s no one else.”

He knows that. And he also knows that there really is no choice—not for Shouta, at least. He doesn’t want the boy to suffer any more than he already has, and he certainly doesn’t want to push him away into foster care, destroying any last remnants of their carefully built trust once and for all.

The answer is clear. Always has been. It was a yes before the conversation even started. It was a yes before he realized there was even a question at all.

Shouta told the kid he’d stay by his side, and he never goes back on his word.

They pass by the floor-to-ceiling windows, and Shouta thinks absentmindedly that the hospital must be this empty because of how early it is in the day. Golden light is quickly rising over the tops of city buildings, and it won’t be long until the sun fully makes itself known. The moment is a peaceful one. The first warm rays of the day wash over the couple as they round the last corner, and the intake before Shouta speaks feels like an important one. “Fine. I assume he’s going to be put under the legal custody of the school until we can get everything figured out—?”

Shouta is ready for it when his husband leaps at him before he can even finish his sentence, the blond giggling with barely contained giddiness. Hizashi hugs him tightly, speaking rapidly and excitedly near his ear, and Shouta only half-heartedly pushes him away. The windows still pose a threat for them due to any possible stray reporters or civilians with a phone. Present Mic is still a little recognizable while off-duty, and the last thing they need is a rumor floating around about the voice hero’s love life.

“Hell yeah!” Hizashi screams, knocking back into his husband as the glass rattles beside them. It’s instinct by now when Shouta activates his quirk. “This is going to be great, Sho, trust me! I have so many ideas for his room. He loves heroes, right? I still have that collection of old merch at the office that I’ve been thinking about giving him for a while, and I think he’d just love it if—”

Shouta listens to his husband ramble on, not even caring about the fact that he hadn’t answered the question. It’s obvious that UA will probably have legal custody over the boy for now, and seeing as Nezu wants to keep this quiet, it won’t even make the news. No one will find out about this unless they dig for it specifically, and it’s not like they can dig for something that they don’t even know exists.

But if the kid’s going to live with Hizashi and Shouta, they’re probably going to be the printed caretakers on the legal paperwork.

He honestly doesn’t know how to feel about that. He also doesn’t know how Midoriya is going to feel about that. They’ll have to ask him about this, of course—they can’t just kidnap him. But what if he says no (something Shouta expects will happen)? What’ll happen then?

Hizashi is still talking excitedly about room ideas and how Midoriya’s cat—Missy, he remembers—will get along great with the others. He throws in teasing love you’s every other sentence, which makes Shouta bury his face deeper into his capture weapon. The voice hero sounds… livelier than he has in a long time. He’s always been upbeat, of course, but this time is different.

This time sounds less forced. More genuine.

Shouta thinks absentmindedly that maybe this isn’t the worst outcome. That maybe this will be good for them, for everyone.

Especially for Midoriya himself.

Whether or not he'll accept that help is another story.

Hizashi is slumped over Shouta's back and dragging his feet by the time they near Midoriya's door. It's closed, which in itself isn't that weird. Shouta shut it to give him privacy when he went to get that coffee. It's been an hour since then, a little more time than he would've liked to leave the kid alone, even when he's sleeping. It's not that he doesn't trust him, it's just—actually, yeah. He wouldn't put it past the boy to do something rash at this point.

The door being closed isn't weird, but what is weird is the sense of wrongness that Shouta suddenly feels pressing against his temples. The air around them feels still, the space too silent. It's dead quiet.

He speeds up, and Hizashi must sense his increased urgency, because he cuts his own rambling off with a concerned frown. "What's wrong?"

Shouta doesn't answer immediately. He raps on the door twice, waiting only a second for an answer that doesn't come before pulling the handle.

It doesn't budge. The door is locked.

What the hell? He pulls a little harder.

These doors don't lock automatically upon closing for safety reasons, and Shouta would know that because this is his agency's private hospital. They can only lock manually from the inside. Which means Midoriya is definitely up—or something else entirely has happened, something that Shouta doesn't even want to entertain the thought of.

What if they found out? What if the kid's been kidnapped? Right from under their noses?

There's an emergency keypad on the side, and Shouta frantically punches in the four-digit code he'd memorized before grabbing at the handle.

"Calm down, Sho," Hizashi tries, laying a hand on his shoulder. "It's not like he ran off or something—"

Oh. He just had to say that, huh?

Shouta stands at the doorway for a moment, eyes fixed on the bare hospital bed while his heart starts to squeeze almost painfully. And then he's crossing the room in three strides and checking inside the closet and bathroom.

They're both empty.

Movement catches his eye, and Shouta feels the air leave his lungs when Hizashi points at the window. The window that definitely had a lock on it before, the window that was closed when Shouta left the room—the same window that's now not closed and is instead cracked open enough to allow a small breeze through.

Or a small person.

Shouta suddenly remembers in vivid detail how Midoriya had looked out the window while waiting for the medicine to kick in, that decisive look on his face. He remembers how the boy would frequently cast frustrated looks at him when he thought he wasn't looking. It's all too clear now what he was doing.

He was waiting for Shouta to leave, if only for a moment, in order to make his escape. He must've known he wouldn't have stood a chance with Shouta sitting there.

It's such an obvious course of action that the hero kind of wants to slap himself. He should've never left the kid alone. He'd known, at the back of his mind at least, that Midoriya wouldn't stay for long. Not if he had a choice.

And honestly? Shouta isn't really surprised. He would've done the same thing in his position. But that doesn't stop the sheer panic that jolts through him, though.

"Oh shit."

Izuku is alone when he stirs.

The first thing he notices upon waking up is that his quirks feel like they're slightly more present now, which has him frantically blinking the sleep from his eyes and forcing himself to sit up. His arms and chest ache at the movement, but he pushes the feeling aside as he cautiously calls on Extract, checking his surroundings. He can't sense anyone close to him at the moment. The only quirks he feels are the doctors and nurses bustling about some ways behind his door.

At this knowledge, Izuku lets himself relax for a moment. There are no straps holding him down this time, so he doesn't have to worry about that. There's also no Aizawa to chastise him for what he's planning to do. They all must've left him alone, thinking he'd be asleep for at least a little while longer.

That was mistake number one.

The IV is still in the crook of his elbow, but the wires monitoring his heart are gone. That's good, in all senses, as he would've had to end up pulling those out and risk setting off alarms, which is exactly what he doesn't want. The boy surveys the room through keen eyes, noting the entrances and exits. There's the door leading out to the hallway, and since that's where any doctors will come in through, that's the main threat. He can't go out that way.

There's a vent in the top corner, but even if Izuku could gather up the strength to jump up there with Boost or One for All, he doesn't think he'd be able to fit. The laundry hatch looks too small as well—a bummer, really. Izuku's been dying to go down one of those so he can check it off his bucket list.

He knows the attached bathroom doesn't have any exits, so he's not left with many other choices. He'll have to go for the door, but that's not what—

Actually. On second thought.

Soft sunlight hits Izuku's face as clouds shift in the sky outside, and the boy's gaze slides over to the window on his left. The window that doesn't have a lock on it, more specifically.

And that was mistake number two.

Izuku feels his nerves start to dance around inside him (though it's probably because of the high-quality drugs they've got him on), and he turns to the whiteboard hanging on the wall. It says his next checkup will happen in less than an hour, according to the analog clock right above it. An hour is plenty of time, he thinks.

His mind swarms with ideas, and he finds himself gathering up the sheets beneath him. There should be extra linen in the closet next to the bathroom. If he does this right and doesn't fuck it up, this should work out smoothly after all. And with minimal agitation to his healing body.

Izuku rips out the IV, already missing whatever drug they were pumping into him, and swings his legs off the side of the bed. The moment his foot touches ground he stumbles, dropping like a rock. His face meets polished, too-clean tiles, and he hisses.

"Fuck."

His legs were practically crushed, he suddenly remembers. That would make sense now, as they're still tingling with numbness and the aftereffects he's come to associate with Recovery Girl's quirk. He's gotta make this quick, but he also can't go too fast without screwing up the healing that's already taken place.

Fuck, indeed.

It takes longer than Izuku would like to admit. Making a rope sturdy enough to hold your weight out of blankets and hospital bedsheets is harder than it sounds, especially when your hands won't stop trembling.

He bites down on the inside of his cheek, telling himself not to stop until he's triple-checked that none of the knots will come undone. As tempting as becoming a pancake on the sidewalk sounds, he'd rather not traumatize the poor civilians who'd have to bear witness to it.

Izuku locks his room's door and then pries open the window, freezing immediately after doing so. After ten seconds of no alarms or yelling, he deems it safe enough to poke his head out and look down.

Hm. Why am I doing this again?

Ten stories, huh? That doesn't seem very high until you're about to climb down it using a handmade rope.

Is this really worth it? Is he really about to do this? The answer is yes, to both.

He ties one end of the rope to the metal bedpost, casting a last glance back to check the time—only for that familiar yellow fabric to catch his eye. He turns slowly, thinking, and the sight of the large sweater draped over the guest chair reminds him again of how exposed he is.

The thin hospital gown he's in only does so much, and he shivers seemingly at the reminder that it's cold in here.

This is the excuse he uses to justify himself slipping the sweater on when, after five minutes of precarious lowering and cursing mixed in with heavy breathing, he's running through the relatively quiet city. He'd ended up making it halfway down the side of the building before reaching a fire escape. He can't risk scaring anyone on the lower floors, after all. It's a miracle no one spotted him.

The yellow sweater is a lot larger than he first thought. He'd assumed it to be Aizawa's or even one of the doctors, but now it's obvious whose it is. It's big enough to be a dress on him.

It's All Might's. He recognizes it now in fully clarity. The number one hero had worn it during one of their picnics. But for it to have been in his hospital room, that means the hero must've visited him when he was asleep the first time.

Why didn't Aizawa tell me he knows?

The idea of his mentor seeing him in such a vulnerable state, especially now that he knows who his successor really is and what he's done, sends shame running up his spine, but he doesn't slow down. Can't afford to. Izuku is running because he can. Because he must.

Because he wants to see how far he can go before he has to stop.

Izuku is a master at hiding. Just as he is a master at running.

It used to be a game between him and his father; a simple hide-n-seek, if you will. Though it never felt very fun to Izuku.

No. It never felt fun at all.

The thing about regular hide-n-seek is that once the hider is found, the game is over. The participants switch roles and the game is restarted. It's an endless cycle of mystery and fun, and in all senses Izuku should have enjoyed it.

But it's hard to enjoy a game when you get punished for losing. Izuku was always the hider when they played, and he really, really didn't want to be found by the seeker.

Well, at least it was good training, no matter how scared it made him feel.

That's just how it was then. That was All for One's definition of fun.

Izuku learned very quickly on how to not get found. And he also learned how to run when he did.

Which leads him to now.

There are moments of impossibility in this world, moments that once made will echo for all of eternity even if no one is there to witness them.

Every moment in history is but a cascading chain of coincidences that, when looked back upon with the perspective of time, would make sense.

Izuku read that in a library book once maybe a year or so ago, and he's reminded of it once again as he stands in front of his crumbling home. Well, what was his home.

Small flecks of ash flutter from the upper levels and settle on his skin, some of them landing on his head and some by his feet. It's almost funny, he thinks, how it would all almost look like snow from a distance—just a peaceful, cascading snowfall to passersby who wouldn't know any better. Except whereas snow is cold and a promise of something new, these ashes are warm and a symbol of Izuku's loss.

He can still smell the burning wood and smoke. He can still feel the stifling heat and air so thick that for a single moment he wonders if he could cut right through it.

And then he's somewhere else, drenched and shivering from the pouring rain of a storm as lightning shakes the earth. Transported to a different time, if only in his mind, Izuku stands in front of his father's first facility and watches through younger eyes as flames scour his old home.

The sky turns a bloody red, waging a war against itself and clouds of inky black. It reminds Izuku of the copper that now sits permanently at the back of his throat.

And this was the first fire Izuku ever started. It's only fitting that All for One finally got him back in the best way. That's the one thing Izuku will admit he got from his father: his pettiness.

Everything feels like it's been turned upside-down, but in that it also feels like everything's been flipped in reverse.

He blinks back into the present, the phantom pain of his previous injuries coming back to him in a dull burn. He stares up at his not-home, teeth biting at the insides of his cheeks. While his building was never something pretty to look at, it never looked like this.

With scorched walls and remnants of black smoke permanently stained near the areas closest to the blown-out windows, his place looks destroyed.

It looks like someone painted their anger out onto his canvas of a building, and the result of it is nothing short of a fiery hell.

Déjà vu has a whole different meaning now.

This has to be his father's work. No one else cares about him this much to rig his entire house. No one else could've gotten past his security measures so easily. No one except the very man who taught him how to go unfound.

Izuku gets the sudden urge to scream, the realization like a slap to a fresh sunburn.

He's so fucking dumb. How could he have been so stupid to think he could actually get something he doesn't deserve? He's been living off borrowed time his whole life, but what does he have to show for it? Nothing.

Just a ripped costume and bloody teeth.

It's the sound that terrifies him now, or the lack thereof. True silence is impossible—the beating of the heart, the rustle of clothing, and the silent whisper of breath will always make themselves present in silence.

But now it's deathly quiet. Like the millisecond before the next intake of air. It makes Izuku stumble closer, a shaky hand coming up to touch the broken back entrance he always used when coming home.

This silence wouldn't be so bad if not for the memories it's ripping from Izuku's mind.

He walks forward, tripping a little. His legs are almost fully numb. Stumbling blindly through the city wasn't a very good idea, it turns out, especially since he's only wearing his hospital gown, All Might's large (and way too comforting) sweater, some compression socks a nurse gave him before he fell asleep, and a cat beanie he snagged from one of the vendors on the streets.

His hair probably looks terrible, as he hasn't taken a shower since before the Festival. It's best to cover it since he doesn't want attention. Not that it would make much of a difference. He already looks like he just escaped from an insane asylum with his gown on; he can't really hide much else.

Izuku can still feel the soot on his cheeks where the bandages don't cover, and his legs are still shaking even when being wrapped up.

He walks into what used to be the lobby, heading slowly for the stairs. He glances at himself in a passing window and immediately turns away. He looks rough, and he wishes more than anything that he could just forget about the scars littering his skin and mind, but nothing ever works his way, right? The haunted look in his eye stays with him as he works his way up the many flights of stairs, and he can't help but feel like he failed. Like he did something wrong.

What hasn't he done wrong?

It's chilly all of a sudden. It's almost like the world is mocking him, as just a few hours ago he was splintering and burning and too hot, please, I'm choking, I'm dying, but now he's shivering and chattering and thankful he ended up taking his mentor's sweater after all.

If Izuku makes it, All Might won't be getting it back.

He steps into his home with the acrid tang of burnt wood filling his nose. If he's being honest, he shouldn't be here. He wouldn't have come back in any other circumstance, but now everything feels different.

Everything has taken such a drastic turn in just the past twenty hours. This is not what he meant when he said he needed change.

He walks carefully, each step more unsteady than the last. His socks catch on the cracks in the wood, and he stumbles every few feet. The air seems to have settled in here, making the silence stretch on.

The heroes have left everything untouched. Not a thing is out of place since the explosions occurred, and there's no other footprints he can see imprinted in the layer of dust and ash on the floor. Did they not care enough? Did they not care about what could be in here?

Typical for adults, he thinks. No one even knew a kid was in the burning building. Izuku still doesn't know how exactly Aizawa found him, or if that story is even completely right at all.

And that thought has Izuku wincing. He doesn't mean to be so distrustful. He doesn't mean to be like this, but it's—it's hard.

He doesn't know anything anymore.

Izuku's couch is destroyed and barely recognizable. It's flung against the wall with half of the cushions missing, and the rest of the room doesn't look much better. The gaping hole in the middle of the floor makes something heavy drop into his stomach, and it takes all of Izuku's remaining strength to stop his knees from buckling.

He is so, so tired.

The first thing he did after escaping was find Missy. Aizawa didn't tell him where she was located for good reason, but Izuku knows this area like the back of his own hand. He knows there's only four vet clinics around here, and he got it right on the second try. He'd walked in, asked if a tuxedo cat by the name of Missy was recently brought in, and then left after confirming her health. He wouldn't have been able to steal her back even if he'd wanted to, so he didn't attempt it.

The nurse at the front desk most definitely called the cops on him after he ran, as he does look pretty interesting right now. He probably shouldn't have done something so risky right after escaping a hospital, but whatever.

It's done now.

Izuku kicks at the piles of debris on the floor, searching. He needs to salvage whatever he can. His weapons, his bombs, his everything—it's in here. And most of it is probably destroyed.

Not to mention his phone. His AI quickly became his new method of communication after he made her, but that doesn't mean he stopped using his old one. There's still a lot of important information on there, information about his clients and jobs, and he knows for a fact he had it on him when the explosions went off, so he should've still had it when he was brought to the hospital. Aizawa never mentioned it, though, which is weird. Maybe it fell out and is still in here.

Izuku could be wrong. But speaking of which—

"AINA?" He calls out, voice scratchy. She's damaged beyond repair on his portable device, but a part of her still lives inside these walls. He might be able to take some pieces of her and add onto it later, and maybe he can eventually revive her. The device he deems her heart was taped to the wall in his kitchen before this, and it connected to speakers and sensors throughout the house, but he doesn't see it anywhere now. It must've been blown up.

He prays otherwise, but even as he coughs out her name two more times, the air stays still, and no reply comes back to him. Izuku feels that last bit of hope dwindle inside him.

Fuck. And to think he designed her to always be there for him no matter what.

He picks up a few knives on the ground, holding them tightly in his grip. These will be worth something on the market, he knows that for sure. If he can sell a few of them he should be able to gain back some money. Maybe enough to get him out of this country. His emergency money and passports were in a bag near his desk, so they're all gone now, too; burnt to a crisp.

The only reason the bag wasn't in its designated hiding spot in his bedroom is because he took it out the night before for his, ahem, trip.

A mistake that's dearly hurting him.

All of that money? Gone. Just like that. He was saving up little by little with each job he completed, just in case of an emergency, and now it's all fucking turned to ash. That cash was his life savings, goddammit.

He's angry. Angrier than he has any right to be, probably. He doesn't even have enough energy to properly think about why he's angry, but all he knows is that he's pissed in a way that makes his throat tighten up and his eyes burn despite there not being any tears in his system or smoke left in the building.

I should've never stayed for this long. I should've left the country when he first offered it to me. I should've listened.

It only makes it worse when he takes another few steps, heading for his bedroom, only to trip on another piece of concrete on the scorched wood.

He hits the ground hard, the knives in his grip clattering to the floor, and the cry that tears out of his throat is of the raw sort. It scrapes against his insides, and he finds himself gritting his teeth and pressing his forehead on the dirty floor to just ground himself from everything.

But then Izuku's hand meets fabric, and his eyes fly back open. It's dark in here, but he can still kind of see it. He'd know what it is even without sight anyway.

He made it, after all.

Izuku's Rabbit costume doesn't even look like his anymore. Most of it has been shredded and burned away, and the dark green fabric is black now with the soot all over it. He sits back on his legs and holds up the tattered remains to the faint sunlight filtering in through the cracked windows.

His hoodie stares back at him, only one ear recognizable with how destroyed the other one is. The red and black of his mask is still vibrant, though, and he's glad. He paid a lot of money for the thick latex material.

But his voice changer? He doesn't even have to check the inside of his mask to know that it's completely destroyed.

Double fuck. He remembers saving up for months to buy the parts for that, and he remembers spending even longer trying to perfect it and tweak it to his liking.

God. He really is screwed.

Izuku is taking too long. His body aches in a way that it never has before, and it's not just because of his healing wounds and exhaustion. He's floating now, the faint pain echoing through his bones the only anchor he has to this world.

He should be out of here by now. He should take whatever he can salvage and escape. He knows All Might would take care of Missy for him, and since Izuku knows his mentor's number by heart he could just call him and set up a place to give One for All back after everything dies down.

Is that even possible? He thinks so. He hopes so.

It's not that he wants to give up the quirk, no. He has to. That's how it has to be. He's too much of a liability, and he doesn't want to keep lying to the man. If he disappears, he won't have to lie. He'll just be gone.

Maybe he should move to Mexico. He could sell chicken or baked goods on the side of the road or something and make a living out of that. Mexico has some of the greatest heroes, and everyone knows they're pretty lax about vigilantes there, so he should be fine. He could go in and make a new start. A new beginning.

But the more he thinks about it, the tighter he clutches his hoodie and mask and the whiter his knuckles get from gripping the fabric too hard.

He can't find the will to move just yet, so he sits there. And waits. After what feels like hours but what could've only been five minutes, he feels a familiar loud hero taking the stairs three at a time from the bottom of the building, and he finds that he's not surprised at all when he hears the scuffling of feet behind him, obviously on purpose, and then the creaking of wood.

Eraserhead always makes sure to let him know of his presence when sneaking up on him.

Izuku can feel his quirk now that he's located him, and it's easier now to sense the burning gaze on his back. So much for running.

The man steps inside the room, and the quiet echo of his boots on the uneven floor sounds like a judge tapping their gavel on a desk. Izuku must have a life sentence impending at this point, he knows.

He's known that from the very beginning.

"Your door is broken," Aizawa says from behind, voice as monotone as always. He sounds... resigned. As if expecting this exact conversation.

Did he let me escape?

Izuku covers his face with the mask, hiding and deflecting simultaneously whilst also showing more of himself than he ever has before. "Oh. I didn't notice."

A beat of silence. Izuku knows Aizawa must be thinking back to a few hours prior, when the heroes only had the fire somewhat contained and he had to bust in here and save the boy himself. He hopes Aizawa's not looking at this place now and judging. It was prettier than this, he wants to say. Just like I told you. It was nice.

He keeps quiet, though, running a crooked thumb over the seam on the remaining bunny ear.

Aizawa moves closer, his warm presence a stark contrast to the ice settling over Izuku's skin. "You know, if you had just asked me I would've taken you back here eventually. You didn't need to orchestrate a jailbreak."

Izuku stands on shaky legs, still holding his belongings, and skillfully ignores the way his vision sways. He decides not to tell his teacher that he didn't plan on getting caught this quickly, if at all.

"So you admit the hospital is a jail?"

His jab earns him a raise of the brow, making Izuku frown to himself. Damn, he really doesn't like how this medicine is turning him into Kacchan; he doesn't have a good filter right now. At least not one that is of any use to him.

Izuku shouldn't be talking this freely. It's weird now, he thinks, how he doesn't know how to act around his teacher. If he's not Rabbit, should he be his normal timid self? Or is that too fake, seeing as the hero's already seen that abrasive other side of him.

Aizawa's hand rests lightly on his shoulder, and Izuku doesn't fight it when the man nudges him away from the gaping hole in the ground and towards the safer areas by the wall. Huh. Izuku almost forgot it was there entirely. He could've fallen straight through.

He doesn't miss how his teacher places himself between him and the cave-in. The thought makes Izuku want to laugh and cry at the same time.

"What's got you desperate enough to scale down ten stories and run all the way here?" Aizawa asks, voice not rising above his normal tone. It's not that Izuku expected him to yell, it's that he just didn't quite expect this.

He lifts one shoulder in a half-hearted shrug. "I don't know," he says softly, and it's not a lie. He holds up his Rabbit costume, as if to prove his point. "I wanted to see if I could salvage anything, but..." Izuku trails off and wipes at his nose, sighing once he sees the dirt now smeared on All Might's sweater.

"You have important things here?"

Had would be more appropriate, but Izuku nods anyway. He's still staring at the remains of his costume, clutching it tightly between his fingers. He bends down to pick up another piece of it, but when he straightens up the fabric turns to ash in his hand and flutters down the hole a few feet away.

Oh. Figures.

There's a faint spike in his mind, and he turns to see Present Mic standing hesitantly at the doorway now, having finally climbed those awful stairs. Izuku watches the way his eyes take in the destroyed apartment before him, an unidentifiable emotion flitting across his features. But when the voice hero's gaze lands on him, Izuku is met with a warm smile. He's in civilian clothes just like Aizawa is, and golden light shines on his face as he enters. His prominent eye bags make Izuku wonder yet again if either of the men have gotten any sleep lately.

He wonders just how much of that insomnia is because of him.

"Heya, kiddo," Yamada greets, easily stepping over the larger piles of ash and debris to get over to him. He doesn't even blink at the large missing spot in the floor, seemingly unfazed. "You gave us quite the scare there back at the hospital!"

Why are you here? Izuku wants to ask abruptly. He'd expected the man to somehow make an appearance alongside Aizawa, of course, so that part isn't what's surprising him. It's rather the fact that he looks so worried that has Izuku reeling.

Because Yamada doesn't have to care.

He doesn't have any obligations toward Izuku. Sure, he may be his English teacher, but that doesn't mean he's responsible for him. He's not involved with Rabbit either. So for him to be here right now with such a comforting smile and warm tone? It doesn't make sense, and Izuku doesn't think he'll ever truly figure out why either of the men care so much.

He's never liked not knowing things.

Aizawa reaches for his shoulder again, but this time Izuku does lash out, panic hitting him like a sucker punch right in the gut. A shaking, bandaged hand tries to swat away the contact, but the movement only has Izuku's brain swimming and the world swaying beneath his feet. He realizes belatedly that Aizawa must've been talking to him before, and he sees the man going to steady him when he stumbles.

He swipes at him again, weaker this time, and the hero easily catches his wrist midair and holds it there, grip just tight enough so Izuku can't pull free. When Aizawa speaks, his voice is firm, but there's a gentle undertone to it that Izuku doesn't catch at first. "We need to get you back to the hospital, Midoriya. You're still not fully healed."

Izuku frowns and casts a look at the short hallway leading to his bedroom. "No. No, I need to get something." He tugs at the hold, shaking his head even as his vision swims. "Sensei, I need to leave."

"You don't."

He says it like it's a fact. Like it should be obvious, and maybe it is, but damn it all Izuku isn't in the mood for this. He's getting drowsier with each passing second. He shouldn't have waited so long to leave, but this would all admittedly be so much easier if Aizawa would just stop caring.

Izuku reaches up with his other hand, dropping the bunny ear to the floor, and tries to weakly pry off the fingers holding his wrist in place. Sometimes he forgets how strong his teacher is. “I need to. You don’t understand why—”

“This isn’t debatable,” Aizawa says, grip tightening as he simply pushes away Izuku’s attempts at dislodging him. “You shouldn’t have been able to wake up so quickly from a dose like that anyway, but we can address that later. For now, what you need to do is stop struggling before you hurt yourself.”

He can’t stop. That’s the thing. Even if Izuku’s already come to terms with the fact that he won’t be able to evade two pro heroes in the state he’s in right now, he still needs his things. Like his notebook. The leather-bound, fire-proof one.

The one with all his notes on All for One and the League. The one that he keeps hidden in his bedroom despite not ever going in that room. It’s that important.

And the guns under the floorboard. He isn’t sure if they got damaged, but it’s better to make sure. Some of them he doesn’t even own; a few of them are ones he’s borrowing from some acquaintances at the Club.

But how is he going to tell that to Aizawa, who’s already trying to carefully tug him out of the room? This is probably the weakest Izuku has been in his life. He’s already used up his remaining strength by going down the side of the hospital and then running all the way here, so he can’t fight him. Those flights of stairs took a toll on his legs, so he can’t run either.

Yamada holds up his hands, making Aizawa pause in his tracks but still keep his hold on Izuku’s wrist. “Your health and well-being is our first priority, kiddo. We just want you to be safe. Would it make you feel better if I stayed behind and gathered up anything that didn’t get destroyed for you?”

The suddenness of the question has Izuku’s head snapping up, emerald eyes meeting kind green ones. Now that he’s actually looking at the voice hero, Izuku notices that there are faint red hues outlining the swirls that are Yamada’s pupils. It’s interesting, as the boy never noticed that before. Perhaps it only happens when Yamada is feeling upset, or maybe it has something to do with how often he uses his quirk.

He shakes himself, as there’s a more pressing conversation going on at the moment. “Why would you—?”

“You said you have important stuff here, yeah?” Yamada asks somewhat cheerfully. “Maybe I can find what’s left while Sho takes you back to the hospital, how does that sound?”

Sho. Izuku doesn’t miss the deliberate use of Aizawa’s first name. Or, well, a shortened version of it. I am now certain my theory is correct.

And that—that would be good. Not the hospital bit, of course, but Yamada is bound to find the stuff Izuku missed or didn’t have a chance to look for. The important stuff, like his notebook that he just can’t leave behind; the files he’s gathered over the years; his expanse of weapons; and even more stuff.

Yamada must see the hopeful look on his face because he smiles again, eyes crinkling. “I’ll make sure to bring everything back to you, ‘kay?”

Izuku can only nod, surprised at his own eagerness and willingness to trust the hero with that. Well, maybe trust is a strong word. Izuku is kind of desperate to get his things back, even if he probably won’t be allowed to have any of it for long. There’s no telling if his other two safe houses have been raided too, so this might be the only place to gather up the rest of his belongings.

He opens him mouth to thank his teacher and tell him where to check in his bedroom, only to break out in a fit of coughs. Fuck, he can barely breathe. The heavy air is starting to clog his lungs.

Aizawa says something quickly to his coworker (or maybe partner?) and promptly steers Izuku out of the room despite the boy’s muffled protest, leading him down the scorched hallway. The stairs laugh at the boy as they near it, and Izuku can already feel the dread coil inside him.

It’s just going down ten flights of stairs, right? It can’t be that much more difficult than going up.

“Do you need me to carry you?” Aizawa asks, and Izuku blinks.

At first he thinks the hero is teasing him, but then he glances up to find him looking as serious as ever, not a hint of amusement on his face.

Uh, yeah, no thanks.

Izuku would rather die than be carried down by his teacher. That is mortifying. He's fine. He can handle some stairs. It can't be that bad—

His knee buckles the moment he goes down the first step, and he would've tumbled hard had Aizawa not grabbed his upper arm and jerked him back at the last moment.

Turns out that going downstairs is actually harder than going upstairs.

Izuku refrains from looking at the underground hero at all as they slowly make their way down. Aizawa is holding onto his arm tightly, which is basically the only thing keeping Izuku upright, though he'll never admit it. This is beyond embarrassing. He feels like an elderly grandma.

They're halfway down when Aizawa side-eyes him. "What's with the cat beanie?"

Yeah, okay. Now he's definitely teasing him. Izuku would like to politely ask his teacher to let go of his arm so he can just fall the rest of the way down. There's only like a sixty percent chance he'll die.

I didn't steal it from a street vendor if that's what you're asking.

It's just their luck when, on the second to last flight, the wood gives way beneath them and almost sends them both falling straight through. Oh, yeah. Izuku forgot just how unstable the building was even before the fire.

Aizawa grumbles something about vigilantes and picking the most hazardous places of living in the entire country of Japan, but the boy doesn't pay him any mind.

He's suddenly self-conscious when they make it outside. The air is getting colder, and his clothes aren't doing much for him. He's in equal parts curious and relieved when Aizawa opens up the passenger door of a car parked on the side of the road.

He wasn't aware the man even had such a nice vehicle. It looks sleek, almost government-issued, and Izuku thinks to himself briefly that he's too poor to even breathe the same air that this car drives in.

Aizawa climbs into the driver's side and stares at him. "C'mon, you're going to freeze half to death." He narrows his eyes when Izuku doesn't move. "Or you can stand there all day and let people stare at you. Your choice."

The boy flushes, hesitantly sliding inside with a slight wince, shutting the door gently. He wouldn't want to break anything of the hero's. He'd never be able to forgive himself.

"It smells like," his voice dies out, and Izuku clears his throat to try again. "It smells like cherries in here."

Yeah, that's not weird at all. This is just Izuku trying to start conversation.

Aizawa turns on the heater and gives him a sidelong glance. "Okay."

Nailed it.

He studies the inside of the car, still trembling. He still can't fully process what's happening. He's in his teacher's car. He's heading back to a hospital almost willingly just over an hour or so after escaping from it. That part is a change in itself. He'd never do something like this willingly. His identity is revealed now, and so is his homelessness. Which means there's not many options awaiting Izuku once they both get back. He wonders what'll happen.

"Put on your seatbelt," Aizawa chides suddenly, pulling out into the street. "I'm not the best at driving."

Izuku honestly didn't think he even knew how to drive. He just doesn't seem like the type to want to, nor does he seem like the type to put cherry air fresheners in his car to keep it nice. That must be Yamada's doing.

It's awkward the whole ride there, at least to Izuku. The hospital isn't that far away, but traffic is busy this morning.

He can usually take silence, since it's not usually as suffocating as the one he felt at his old home, but luck just doesn't seem to be on his side today. He doesn't like this emptiness one bit. Not even the radio is on to fill the void.

Which leaves Izuku talking to himself. In his mind.

What if I open the door right now and roll out onto the sidewalk. What's the chance of me actually being able to get up in time to escape?

But just as he's thinking he should try it, just to see, there's a click as all the doors lock around the car.

Fucking witchcraft. Aizawa must be a mindreader, or he's just known Izuku long enough to predict his upcoming rash ideas and stunts. That can't be entirely true, though, as the hero did leave him alone for an undetermined amount of time in that hospital room. If he knows him so well, he should've expected Izuku to blast out of there the moment he got a chance.

But then again he found him pretty quickly. He knew exactly where Izuku would go. So something's not right here. There's something he's missing, and it's making him irritated because he just can't figure it out. He's usually better than this. He can usually pick out small details and put them together. But at the moment he can barely figure out what two plus two is.

Which brings back up Izuku's other question. Did he let me leave, or am I just that hopeful? Am I looking into things that aren't there?

He risks a small look at his teacher, eyes going first to his face and his clenched jaw, the way his eyebrows are furrowed slightly, as if deep in thought. And then he looks at the way his hands are holding the steering wheel hard enough to make his knuckles white.

Aizawa looks... perturbed? No, annoyed would be a better word. He looks upset, and the way he's staring out at the road with a controlled kind of determination makes something heavy drop into Izuku's stomach.

Is he angry? At him? But why would he be? Well, besides the whole running away thing. Izuku doesn't know what else he could've done to piss him off, and he finds himself racking his brain for an answer.

He wants to ask if he's mad, but Izuku loses the nerve to do it the moment he opens his mouth. Asking never went well with his father. Perhaps he should redirect instead. That always had a good chance at working back then.

Izuku shifts in his seat, looking back out the window. His heart is pounding in his ears. "What's going to happen next?"

For a few moments there's nothing, and Izuku fiddles with the sleeves of All Might's sweater to stop himself from rambling to fill the silence.

But then a finger reaches over to press one of the buttons below the dashboard, and the car starts to move by itself.

And what the hell? It's a self-driving car? How did Aizawa afford this? Why would Aizawa want to even afford this?

The man takes his hands off the steering wheel, folding his arms across his chest as he turns to look at him fully. Izuku resolutely does not meet his gaze, afraid of what he might find there.

"You didn't believe a word I said to you at the hospital, did you?"

Izuku winces. "That's not—"

"You ran because you felt you had no choice. You wouldn't have done that if you trusted my word." He tips his head in consideration. "But seriously, kid, the window? They had an elevator, you know. Would've saved yourself some effort."

His words are slightly annoyed, but they make Izuku smile nonetheless, as hesitant as it is. He stares at the glove compartment and has to physically stop himself from opening it and rummaging around inside. Normally he'd be all for looting, but this is Aizawa's stuff. He might need whatever's inside for hero business later.

Izuku rubs his arms to soothe himself, staring at the small scuff marks on the dashboard. It looks like someone constantly puts their feet up here. "Where did you get the car?" He asks, just wanting him to keep talking. He can ignore the previous question for now.

If he keeps talking he might not stay mad, and Izuku can finally allow himself to relax just a little. Because the thing is, Aizawa usually lectures him when he does stupid shit like this. He's done it before multiple time as both Aizawa Shouta and Eraserhead, so there's no reason why he wouldn't now. But the hero doesn't lecture. He doesn't let any anger bleed into his voice, which can either mean he's really not angry, or that he's just a master at hiding it.

"Principal Nezu gave it to me as a gift," Aizawa explains, leaning back in his seat. "He said our old car wasn't suitable for staff at UA."

Our. He isn't hiding it anymore.

They stop talking after that, having pulled up to the hospital. There's still no lecture, though Izuku can feel one brewing. It's only a matter of time. The other shoe has to drop, for everything is just too easy.

After Aizawa checks him in at the front desk, they take the elevator this time, a fact that his teacher smugly points out as they go up to his floor.

He's given a different room this time, and Aizawa sticks right beside him the whole way there, as if afraid he'll book it again. Which, honestly, isn't too far from the truth. He probably would've tried to run into the crowds and disappear before even getting into Aizawa's damn car, but his leg is being a bitch. He can barely walk correctly.

The doctors are quick to share their disapproval at his disappearance, scolding him for potentially making his healing injuries worse, and it's only after Izuku has apologized to five different people (with Aizawa watching like a hawk by the entrance to the room) that they leave. Recovery Girl will apparently be in again in just half an hour to see him.

He shudders at the thought. No one is safe from the old lady's sharp tongue.

Izuku is a flight-risk now, unfortunately, which means he can't be left alone at all until that's lifted. Aizawa has offered to be the guard, something that both confuses and relieves Izuku.

Confuses because honestly, Aizawa shouldn't be here. He doesn't have to be here. It's his day off, Izuku knows, and he's wasting it on him. Relieves because that means no one else will be watching over him. He doesn't trust anyone else in this hospital, no matter how quiet or unassuming they act.

When Izuku asks about All Might and his whereabouts, as surely his mentor isn't planning on just leaving his sweater here forever, Aizawa just says he had to attend some meetings and won't be back for awhile.

Izuku doesn't know why he's disappointed. He should be relieved he doesn't have to face him so soon.

One more day. One more day at the hospital, and then he should be cleared to leave.

Leave where, Aizawa won't tell him. He says Yamada should be here when he tells him, which only makes the pit of dread inside Izuku grow. If it's not prison or an orphanage, what is it?

Where is he going? And why has Aizawa just... taken on this role of watching over him? Why hasn't he left by now?

Asking won't get him anywhere, so Izuku just stares at his bedsheets and plays with the ring on his finger until Recovery Girl arrives. She starts to shoo Aizawa out, but the man doesn't budge out of his seat.

"I'm on watch, Chiyo. He's a flight—"

"I may be old," the healer snaps, pointing her cane at him threateningly, "but I can still take care of my patients! Now go! He won't run again, will you, young man?"

She turns her fiery gaze upon him, and Izuku straightens up immediately. "No, ma'am!"

Not from you, he thinks. She might just clock him in the shins with her cane if he moves wrong, and he's not willing to go that far.

Aizawa snorts at Izuku's quick answer and gets up, leaving the two of them alone.

Which is scary. Recovery Girl has this knowing look in her eye, and it sets off warning bells in Izuku's head.

She starts off by checking over Izuku's body for new injuries despite the previous doctors having already done so. She plants a kiss on his forehead to kickstart the rest of the healing, and Izuku falls back into the bed, sighing as he watches the green glow fade away.

"I'm not finished with you yet, Midoriya. Normally I wouldn't discuss this in such detail with my patient when they're still recovering, but it's imperative we get this out of the way now."

Fuck. Izuku chuckles nervously, the brief thought of I'm in danger flashing across his mind. He brings his knees up to his chest and watches with wide eyes as she rolls the stool to the edge of the bed. There's a stack of papers in her hand, and he takes them with trembling fingers, suddenly glad that she made Aizawa leave.

This isn't going to be a pleasant conversation.

"I know you're already aware of most of your injuries and shortcomings, so I won't waste my breath. That," she points at the papers that are now sitting in Izuku's arms, "is what I really want to talk with you about."

Izuku swallows. "My blood results?"

She nods, not looking pleased in the slightest. “Now, I don’t expect you to be able to read those charts or be able to fully understand what’s all on there, but I can tell just by the look on your face that you know the gist of what I’m about to tell you.”

Izuku was wrong. Things can, in fact, get worse. The healer knows something is wrong. She knows.

“Your blood is, for lack of better terminology, damaged, dearie,” Recovery Girl begins, sounding solemn. “It looks almost as if it’s been tampered with, and one doesn’t need a biology degree to understand why that’s so alarming.”

She fucking knows. The one thing Izuku didn’t want to happen, and here he is. Maybe he should’ve just said fuck it and jumped out of Aizawa’s car when he had the chance after all. He’d prefer that over this conversation any day.

“It’s like there’s multiple different kinds of blood inside you, all mutated together to bind to your own. Your files stated you have type O blood, which means you’re compatible with all other types. Even still, it’s almost as if there’s something else there that’s not combining correctly. In all senses, Midoriya, you shouldn’t even be alive. It’s unnatural for sure. I’ve never seen anything like it in all my years.” She takes one of the papers off the bottom of the stack and shows the diagram to him. “Your DNA looks to have been torn apart and stitched back together multiple times, and by its own volition, too. If I didn’t know any better, I’d even say it was integrating new pieces of information into your genetic code and rebuilding around it.”

It’s almost scary how accurate that is, and that’s just her guess. Izuku never really thought of it that way before, but now that she’s said it he can picture it all too clearly.

Every new quirk he got, the more his blood had to adapt. The more of himself he had to destroy in order to change.

She’s watching him quietly, and Izuku realizes that she must be waiting for an answer. He stares at a point on the wall just past her head when he replies. “It’s, um, been like that for awhile? I’ve lived like this for a long time, so I think it’s fine? I can—I can survive it. My doctor said it was okay. When I was younger, I mean.”

He can survive with fucked up DNA. It’s not hurting him. Technically it’s the sickness that stems from the quirk that’s causing all of what’s hurting him. His body was made to withstand this kind of change with his blood.

That doesn't make it any less disturbing to others, however.

"I understand this may be normal for you, Midoriya, but that doesn't change why it's like that to begin with. And that also doesn't change the fact that I cannot even contact the singular doctor that was listed on your profile." She rubs her temple, sighing deeply. "But there's something else that I cannot pinpoint. I haven't shared this with anyone except Aizawa, but your quirk is severely imbalanced. It is the root of most of your bodily issues, though I doubt everything is solely the fault of your original quirk."

That's not untrue.

Recovery Girl's face morphs into one of faint suspicion. "You'd tell us if there were any developments with One for All, wouldn't you? Information regarding that quirk is very important, Midoriya. You mustn't hide anything from All Might or myself. You will end up back in the hospital that way."

Does she know about my multiple quirks? Does she know about how One for All is kickstarting my death and sending poison through my veins, even right now as we're talking?

"Of course I would," he says, frowning. The lie tastes about as promising as the copper between his teeth. He's been chewing too much on his bottom lip. "I wouldn't keep it from you."

She doesn't look entirely convinced, but she concedes with a nod anyway. "I do not think One for All itself is causing all of your issues, but it's still a plausible theory. I expect you to tell All Might about this possibility, understand? If One for All is causing you harm, we need to know. I'll give you a few weeks, and if you haven't done it by then, I will."

Is it causing him harm? Indirectly, yes. But who's fault is that, really? Izuku has no one to blame but himself.

"Yes, ma'am."

When Recovery Girl leaves fifteen minutes later after talking more about his blood and the potential link it has to One for All, there's something new weighing him down by the stomach.

She disappears from the room, and Izuku thinks absentmindedly that more than one door has just closed on him.

His student's home is ugly.

Hizashi won't beat around the bush. It truly is.

He knows, of course, that the building did just go through multiple bombings and an inferno raging through its insides, but still.

He stands off to the side of Midoriya's apartment, scanning the piles of debris for anything he can take back to the kid. He's honestly surprised his student is even letting him do this in the first place. He'd expected a hard no, or at the very least some hesitance, but that wasn't the case.

The kid must really be out of it.

Hizashi walks into the kitchen and peeks inside the overturned fridge, lips pressing into a thin line once he finds nothing but wet cat food and expired skim milk.

He doesn't bother carrying those items, instead turning around to check the cabinets and floor.

Nothing so far. Well, except for a few weapons taped under blackened counters and near-unrecognizable notebooks thrown to the floor near what looks like Midoriya's old desk.

The kid probably won't find anything of use in the notebooks, saying as most of the pages have been turned to ash, but Hizashi sets them into his bag anyway.

Unfortunately, the weapons won't be able to be permanently given back to him, but it's good to pick them up anyway so no villains can get their hands on them.

He makes sure to pick up whatever remnants he can find of his Rabbit costume. He knows Midoriya might want to keep whatever's left of it.

The next thing he finds is a manila envelope tucked inside a narrow crack in the wall. Hizashi probably wouldn't have noticed it if not for its attention-grabbing color. He forces himself not to look too much, even as he starts to crave some drama. There's a few pictures inside, and he puts it in the bag before he can snoop.

Hizashi isn't about to breach the kid's privacy. And besides, he needs to hurry it along. The floor is unsteady here, and he's not planning on falling through anytime soon.

Everything is fine until he gets to the last room—Midoriya's bedroom.

It's obvious he very rarely comes in here, and when he does he makes sure not to move much. There's just a few more guns and ammo (and even a flamethrower!), but that's not what has him upset. It's the dresser that makes him tip his head, because oh.

Suddenly it makes sense in the worst way.

The listener's hidden a bottle of vodka in his dresser. It's a big thing, takes two hands to hold it properly. It's next to another one of Midoriya's journals, this one looking a lot more sturdy and unharmed than the others, and is surrounded by patterned socks. There's soft pink ones that are slightly charred on the tips, and there's ones with stars on them.

Hizashi would almost coo if it were any other time.

But that traitorous bottle is demanding of his attention, and the more he looks at it, the more he's taken back.

This alcohol right here? It almost ended his career when he first became a hero. It almost killed him.

He remembers, abruptly, how his own bottle would begin to rattle in his dresser sometimes on those sleepless nights. He remembers how it would sound, more specifically, and he shudders at the reminder.

He remembers it sounding like his bones. He remembers it sounding like his death.

Life was tough for Hizashi after his second year of high school. After everything that happened, he had very little to hold onto. His third year passed by too slow yet too fast all at the same time, and after graduation, alcohol became his anchor. It helped him ground himself. It helped him stay rooted to this cruel earth.

But the thing about being your own anchor is that first you have to drown.

Shouta was his saving grace back then. He helped him out of that hole as best he could, and Hizashi will always owe him for that. They were both dealing with their own personal issues, and yet their struggles were the same.

So to see another person, another teenager going down the same road Hizashi took? It's like a hammer to his ribcage, because no. Midoriya doesn't deserve this.

No one deserves the kind of pain that makes them believe they have to do something harmful to themself in order to just stay afloat. It is a fate worse than death.

He grits his teeth and stuffs the thick, leather-bound journal in his bag, along with the fluffy socks. He grabs the vodka with slightly shaky hands and pours it out into the drain in the bathroom. It was more than half empty, and the sales sticker on the side says it was bought just over a week or so ago.

That's not good. Not good at all. He drank that much in so little time? That's beyond dangerous.

He decides to keep the empty bottle. Just in case. He doesn't think it's his place to talk to the kid about this, so maybe he can ask Shouta to do it since he knows him better.

Either way, he knows confronting him won't be pleasant. The listener will instantly be on the defensive, and he doesn't want to do that to him. That's the very last thing he wants, actually.

But that's a matter for a different time. No use stressing about it yet. He's supposed to be happy that the kid is finally out of this place.

For now, Hizashi just leaves the home with a heavy heart and a mind full of hopeful dreams.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Toshinori is usually a patient man.

As the number one hero, he kind of has to be. He wouldn't be where he is otherwise. Sure, he runs headfirst into battles sometimes on nothing more than a whim and is probably too reckless for his own good, but he's certainly not stupid.

He isn't a child, and nor is he innocent by any means. He knows that good things come to those who wait.

In this very moment, however? In this specific circumstance? Toshinori is finding it very hard to be patient now. He doesn't want to just sit here and do nothing. That's not what heroes do. That's not what a mentor is supposed to do.

Toshinori is usually a patient man, but not when his kid is involved.

"I don't understand why I can't see him," he mutters, pacing the length of the large office with a hand on his chin. He's irritated, but he has every right to be.

"Calm yourself, please," Principal Nezu says. The mammal pushes a cup of golden liquid his way. "Would you like some tea?"

Toshinori stops pacing to stare at his boss. Is he seriously asking if he wants tea? Now, of all times? He shakes his head and resumes his troubled thinking. "I'm fine, thank you. I'm more concerned as to why you're keeping me here, Nezu."

A small sigh leaves the principal. "Don't be so dramatic, Yagi. If you truly didn't want to be here, you simply would not be. I doubt even I would be able to stop you from leaving this campus."

Honestly, Toshinori doubts that. Who knows what kind of contraptions the smaller hero has in this very office? Hell, he most definitely has some form of All Might level restraints. Toshinori isn't naive enough to believe he'd win easily in a fight against the mammal, especially when you take into account Nezu's intelligence. The number one hero won't stand a chance if his boss has access to his own equipment and support weapons.

Toshinori shivers at the mere thought. But besides that.

“You still haven’t answered my question,” he says in annoyance, glaring out the window. There’s something about his boss that’s making his nerves twitch. It’s making it hard to keep his composure.

“I’m sure you’re aware that Midoriya isn’t doing very well, Yagi. Both emotionally and physically, the boy’s well-being has been compromised.” There’s the sound of small clinking; Nezu is stirring his tea. “I’m afraid that seeing you would do more harm than good. He needs time to settle in.”

Toshinori’s head snaps toward him. “Settle in? They’re taking him now?”

The mammal hums and waves at the clock on his desk. “He will be released from the hospital in less than an hour, if all things go as planned. Aizawa and Yamada will be taking him to their household then.”

Damn it all. It’s been a day since he left the boy’s side to go to that stupid meeting—a day since Nezu stopped him from returning to him. And the worst part is the mammal hasn’t even given him a straight answer as to why.

“Why can’t I see him just for a few minutes? He is my successor, Nezu! I promised to be there for him—!” Toshinori dissolves into a fit of coughs and pointedly ignores the tissue box Nezu slides across the desk. “He probably thinks I don’t want to see him. He’s going to overthink things and worry himself sick if I don’t come to see him!”

“I understand, but it’s important that you remain here for the time being. It would help Midoriya more in the long run if you gave us a little insight to this particular situation.”

No, Toshinori thinks bitterly. You just want to use me to out all of his secrets.

The hero sighs and swipes a large hand down his bony face. “What do you want to know?”

“Before that, it’s important you know that it is not my intention to harm the boy with whatever information you might give. It is rather obvious you don’t trust me at the moment.” The principal leans forward in his chair. “But I hope you can work past that, as this will prove to be a learning experience for the both of us.”

Toshinori doesn’t answer right away. Instead he stares out the window and counts the droplets of rain that slide down the glass. He watches as the faraway trees dance in the wind and smack each other with their branches. The storm is so bad that he can feel the cracks of thunder reverberating in his bones.

It’s not quite that he doesn’t trust Nezu. He does, really. As scary and sadistic as his boss is, Toshinori knows he cares. At least artificially so. He wouldn’t hurt one of his students, especially not one as important as Midoriya Izuku.

Toshinori just doesn’t want to make Midoriya hate him. He feels as though he’s already broken some of the boy’s trust, as if he’s already taken a hammer to their shared bond simply by just being here and talking about him behind his back. He doesn’t even know the full story himself, so who is he to spill the boy’s secrets—secrets that he doesn’t even fully know?

Vigilante or not, Midoriya doesn’t deserve to go through this pain, and he doesn’t deserve to have people putting his name in their mouths when they know close to nothing about him. Hell, it seems that not even Toshinori knows anything about him.

It hurts a lot, the hero will admit, that he wasn’t on the list of people the boy felt he could talk to, but he’ll just have to get over that. The most important thing right now is getting Midoriya out of the shitty situation he’s been thrown in.

He can’t help but wonder, however, what his teacher would think of all this. Gran would probably kick his ass for being so ignorant and go on another rant about how incapable Toshinori is of teaching—which, if the current situation has anything to say about it, isn’t a lie. They probably wouldn’t be dealing with all of this right now if Toshinori could’ve just been better.

But with that fact comes another thought; the other edge of what is the unfortunate truth.

What would she think of all this?

A leaf sticks to the side of the wet window, and Toshinori grits his teeth. “I told you a while ago how I met Young Midoriya. What else do you need from me? He doesn’t tell me a lot about his personal life, and it was never my place to ask."

"I've already figured out most of his personal connections and relationships, so you don't need to go into detail there. I am simply asking if there's ever been a time or event in which the boy has said something that perhaps struck you as odd." Nezu begins to type quickly on his computer, though his beady eyes never leave Toshinori's form. "Perhaps a word or phrase, or even a simple action, that made you pause for a moment. Something that might prove useful in the long run."

Toshinori, who's still stuck on the first part, has to push down the anger working up his throat at Nezu's lack of decency. Does he not care about Midoriya's privacy at all? He turns and takes a seat before the desk, his body aching at the incessant pacing.

"He's always been... unusual," Toshinori says, hating himself for even uttering these words behind his successor's back. "But that's just how he is, Nezu. I figured he had a lot of secrets, but I never pushed unless I thought they might be hurting him."

Like the lack of eating, he thinks to himself. And the bruises and burns on his skin.

The hero puts a hand over his face. "He would forget to eat sometimes, so I fed him when I could. The marks the doctors found on his body yesterday? He would tell me he got them by training at home."

"An obvious lie," Nezu chirps, causing Toshinori to wince. "It's clear now how those problems came to be. I imagine his vigilante activities became very harmful to his body after a period of time. Which leads me to our next topic."

The mammal presses a paw to the screen and enlarges it into a hologram, twisting it so Toshinori can see.

And fuck. The collage of pictures that greets him is not something he would've ever wanted to see so early in the morning. He can barely stomach the sight that sits before him.

"The bodies Aizawa found near Midoriya's building have left me with little answers and a ton of questions." Nezu zooms in on a few of the pictures, gesturing at the bloody, limp figures still stuck to the rooftops. "There's twenty-four of them, consisting of both heroes and villains. I hate to ask so bluntly, but do they mean anything to you, Yagi?”

Nezu swipes the screen, showing a list of profiles with each victims’ name and occupation attached to their face. Toshinori furrows his eyebrows, hands gripping the arms of his chair as he leans forward to get a better look. “I don’t think so, no. I might have seen a few of them in passing, but I don’t know them personally.”

“As I suspected. It seems they did not go after Midoriya because of his connections with you.”

Toshinori deflates, blowing out the breath he didn’t realized he’d been holding. “That’s—that’s good.”

That makes him feel a little bit better, at least.

“Indeed. This does, however, pose a lot of interesting questions. The attackers seem to have known about Midoriya’s alter ego prior to the bombing. According to Aizawa, Midoriya revealed they have also been trailing him for a bit of time leading up to this incident.”

Toshinori sputters, the words not quite registering at first. “They what? That’s—that’s impossible! He would’ve told me! He would’ve —!”

“So everyone else has said, too.” Nezu’s voice suddenly takes on a more sympathetic tone as he minimizes the hologram. “Despite everyone’s shock, the fact remains that Midoriya knew about his pursuers beforehand and chose not to reach out for help. He doesn’t seem to be willing to share anything regarding his personal life or vigilante persona, which is to be expected as of this moment. I doubt we will make any true progress with that for a long while yet. We are, as they say, playing a waiting game.”

A waiting game. The three words make Toshinori want to thunk his head onto the desk and never wake up. Honestly, fuck the idea of being patient. It’s a scam created by the government to get people to overlook their wrongdoings.

God. Now he’s starting to sound like the kid.

“I must admit that he’s at least making this an interesting game, Yagi. While I was counting on him to run the moment he saw the unlocked window, it still took me by quite the surprise. Scaling down a hospital is not an easy feat, I assure you.”

For a moment, Toshinori is sure he's misheard his boss, because what the actual fuck? Did he just say scaling down a hospital?

"What? He ran?" The panic that grips him almost has him spewing blood. He snaps to his feet, eyes wide. "When?"

Nezu simply waves him off, either not noticing his terror or not caring. "It's nothing to worry yourself over. Aizawa and Yamada were fortunately nearby and escorted him back before he could get very far."

The cryptic, near pleased tone of the mammal's words has Toshinori reeling. "Was he hurt? Why didn't I see this on the news? Surely someone would've been alarmed at seeing him run around the streets looking so beat up!"

And, more importantly, why wasn't I informed? He thinks bitterly, a fierce surge of protectiveness washing over him. I should've been one of the first told. I could've helped!

"This remained a private affair because I wished it so," Nezu answers with startling calmness, not offering an elaboration. "Midoriya is making it very difficult to keep this under wraps. He is, dare I say, trying to get us in a bit of legal trouble so we will be forced to let him go for now."

Toshinori sits back down with a huff, slightly less agitated at being told so late. His boss is making it sound like they're going to keep Midoriya prisoner. Toshinori knows he doesn't like doctors, so he can understand how the boy might feel like that at the hospital, but what about once he's released to stay with Aizawa and Yamada? The entire point of them watching over him is so he won't feel trapped.

But the more Toshinori thinks about it, the more he sees it.

He chews on his bottom lip, a tic that he thought his own mentor had scared out of him before graduating from UA. "You know he's not going to like being stuck in an unfamiliar house with nothing to do. He starts to get jittery when he's anxious."

His impulse control also seems to disappear, Toshinori thinks, remembering that occasion where Midoriya somehow got into a fight with a woodpecker in the five minutes he left the boy alone at the park.

"Of course," Nezu agrees. "Which is precisely why he will be closely monitored for the time being. He's already run from help once, and I have no doubts he'll attempt to do so again."

Something heavy lodges in his throat. Toshinori closes his eyes briefly and twists his neck to peer out the window again. He had figured, at the very back of his mind, that this would be the case. That Midoriya wouldn't accept this new situation so easily—not without a fight, at least.

He's known Midoriya for close to a year now. The boy has a problem with trust, that much is obvious, and he has an even bigger problem with sharing his emotions. It's only fitting that he'd have a problem with people helping him, too.

"Do you think he's trying to leave for good?" He asks, watching the wind die down for a moment before picking back up again.

Nezu runs his paws along the edge of his desk. "It appears so. That is why it was best for all of us to let Aizawa and Yamada handle his escape from the hospital. I personally believe they're the two best candidates for defusing this situation, so to speak."

Fuck. The worst part of all this is that Toshinori thinks so, too. He wouldn't be able to help Midoriya in any way that matters. He's obviously done a poor job up to now.

The mammal is right, but the guilt is still there, weighing him down and souring his insides, and he can't help but try again, one more time. "If you'd let me see him for just a moment, I swear I'll do anything! I—I left my sweater on his chair!"

There's a small quirk of the principal's lip. "The boy is keeping very good care of your sweater, though whether or not it will return to you later is still up for debate."

Damnit. Why must Nezu be so stubborn? Toshinori feels like a sad parent who's begging with the judge for visitation rights.

"The students only had yesterday and today off," Toshinori starts, trying to trip him up. "What will happen to him tomorrow when school starts again?"

"He will be on break for a week. All excused absences, mind you. As I said, Aizawa will be staying with him to keep him company until he's fully healed, as he's still very much a flight risk."

The term prisoner is suddenly starting to sound all the more appropriate, huh? This doesn't sound humane at all, but it's not like they have a better option. They can't just let Midoriya run again, can they? He'll hurt himself.

The blond hero is resigned more than anything now. "What about the internships? They start up right after next week, don't they?"

"The internships will be pushed back." Principal Nezu smiles, revealing pointed white teeth. "It's standard protocol when a student turns out to be a wanted vigilante."

Toshinori snorts despite himself, the irony of it all finally getting to him. His yellow suit feels near suffocating on his thin body. It's like they're all in a very weird limbo, like they're just waiting for something to happen.

Hopefully it's good, whatever it might be. Lord knows they won't be able to handle another bomb dropped on them.

Nezu lets the comfortable silence stretch on for a minute before sharpening his expression. "You know why I really called you here again."

It's sickly sweet, almost falsely cheerful, and Toshinori bows his head. Sweat beads at the top of his forehead near his hands. He does know. He's very much aware of the question Nezu truly wanted to ask him. And yet it still takes him a few seconds to formulate a response.

"This doesn't feel like All for One's doing. If he somehow knew—" he chokes up, but it's not because of blood this time. "If he knew I was training Young Midoriya, he would've just taken him. Especially if he knew I already passed it on. He wouldn't have failed and just left him for dead, Nezu. That's... that's not his style."

No. If he truly wanted to, All for One would've swiped the boy out from under his nose and gloated about it on live TV, probably.

But it doesn't matter. There's no proof that All for One is even still alive. He—he's dead, as far as All Might is concerned. Anything that says otherwise is just pure speculation.

Nezu sighs painfully. "Of course. My apologies, I just needed your input. But pushing that aside, there's also the matter of who ended all of those heroes and villains the other night. The scene was quite gory, as you saw. I also believe whoever it was also dropped off our dear cat."

Toshinori frowns at the word choice. "I was under the impression they killed each other? Did they not?"

"That's what the police were told, Yagi, and it's not far from the truth. Upon closer inspection, however," a swipe of the paw brings back up the pictures on the hologram, "it seems they all died of the same wounds. They're all of the same pattern and technique. It's as if they were working together against one force, rather than against each other."

Oh, this is definitely not All for One's doing, either. That isn't his style of killing.

He sucks in a breath. The idea of heroes working with villains is like taboo. No one is willing to even risk thinking something like that lest they get attacked. But it has to be possible in this case if Nezu is suggesting it.

"Working together? Then what happened to them, do you think?"

Nezu puts his paws together, the light catching on his perfectly-manicured nails. "I'm sure you've heard of what happened to Ingenium just a couple of days ago?"

The hero jolts. "You're not saying—"

"Unfortunately so." He shakes his head, displeased, but Toshinori knows better. Nezu is damn near excited at these turn of events. The principal loves puzzles, and this one has a ton of pieces that just don't quite seem to fit anywhere. It must be like a goldmine for the mammal.

Damnit, Young Midoriya. What have you gotten yourself into?

"I believe the Hero Killer has some sort of past relationship with Midoriya Izuku." Nezu lets out a small, dangerous smile. "For why else would he kill twenty-four heroes and villains to prevent them from coming after him?"

And with that bomb having been dropped, Toshinori finds himself wishing that he could actually drink alcohol without being rushed to the emergency room.

Aizawa Shouta is a stubborn man, Izuku finds. He's also a stubborn, annoying man.

So annoying, in fact, that Izuku is currently debating whether or not he should throw the paper cup filled with water he'd been given right at the hero's head.

Would it stop Aizawa from being annoying? No. Would it make Izuku feel better? Yes.

He takes a small sip of the water before placing it down on the mini table that hangs over his bed. He pushes it aside and goes back to listening to the storm raging outside. Each clap of thunder has his heart beating a little faster in his chest, and he finds himself fiddling with the sleeves of All Might's sweater almost constantly.

It's not that he's afraid of storms, it's just that they're loud. He would usually cuddle with Missy during times like this, or maybe even try to distract himself with work, but now he can't do any of those things, which is also annoying him.

Speaking of annoyances.

He glances at the hero to his right, eyes narrowing once he sees the new book Aizawa has taken to reading.

Vigilantism: Morally Wrong or Morally Required?

Okay, that's it. Izuku is this fucking close to losing his marbles. He's gotta be doing this on purpose now.

The boy barely refrains from outright hissing at his teacher, instead deciding to be the bigger person and ignore the obvious jab. His hands come up to itch at the fading burn on his neck, and he winces at the feeling of dead skin peeling off and gathering under his nails.

Disgusting.

Why can't Aizawa leave him alone? Just for a moment? Just so Izuku can hightail it out of here? The hero has been sitting in that same fucking chair for an entire day now, refusing to move whatsoever. It's like he's a damn bodyguard, except instead of guarding Izuku, he's guarding the door.

It's dumb, it's degrading, and it makes Izuku feel like shit. To make matters worse, All Might hasn't come back yet, so obviously the boy has somehow pissed off his other mentor, too.

He's just one colossal fuck-up.

Izuku shakes himself and slides off the bed, needing to just do something. He pads over to the whiteboard on the wall, his fluffy socks protecting his feet from the cold floor, and stares yet again at the time written in marker at the top right.

He's going to be released soon. That's what they said, at least. He wouldn't put it past the doctors to lie to him.

The time can't come quick enough, though. The moment the clock hits eleven, he's out of here. He's not going to waste any more precious seconds. He's already been here for far too long. He feels fine, damnit. Why can't everyone see that?

"The nurse will be here soon with your lunch," Aizawa tells him, as if Izuku didn't already know that. The schedule for food is written on the board, too, for fuck's sake. He's not blind.

"I still don't know why I can't go down there myself. I can walk to the food court and back," Izuku says sourly, turning to stare at the man. Except he ends up moving a little too fast, and the world beneath him sways. Black dots corner the edges of his vision, and for a hot second he feels like he's going to pass out. But the dizziness passes quickly enough, and he blinks back to the present. "I'm literally the healthiest person alive."

Aizawa just turns a page of his book and peers at him over his frames. That's another new thing: the fact that the hero wears glasses when reading for an extended period of time. Izuku never knew that before, and he feels kind of irritated that he somehow didn't.

"Why are you up?" His teacher asks, completely ignoring the previous comments.

Izuku bristles at the tone, at the way it sounds more like a warning than a question. "To go to the bathroom. What, you think I'm going to escape via the toilet?"

Aizawa just blinks at him, causing Izuku to flush in embarrassment. Okay, so maybe Izuku is being the annoying one.

But that doesn't matter. Aizawa shouldn't be here, and he also shouldn't be acting like he has any control over him, because he doesn't. Not at all. He's just his teacher—certainly not his parent.

The doctors that have been referring to him as Izuku's guardian don't know what they're talking about.

He practically flees to the bathroom, muttering an apology before shutting the door with haste. Just because he's pissed off doesn't mean he should take it out on Aizawa. Even if most of his irritation stems from the man.

Izuku washes his hands and splashes water over his face, pointedly ignoring his reflection in the mirror. He feels dirty, and he just knows he looks like a sewer rat now. The bathroom doesn't have an attached shower, and even if Izuku were to ask for one he doubts they'd let him use it, being a flight-risk and all. But even if they were to say yes...

Hell will freeze over by the time he agrees to let a stranger be present while he showers himself. That's not happening in a million years.

So Izuku wets some paper towels under the sink and wipes it over his arms and legs, trying to get the remaining dirt and soot off. It's not much, but it's the best he can do for now.

Despite trying to avoid looking in the mirror, his eyes can't help but latch onto the thin white scar on his jaw. The doctors told him it came from a piece of flying shrapnel that hit him during one of the explosions. Apparently, it had sliced his cheek quite deeply, meaning the scar will never fully fade.

He'll have to live with it, as ugly as it looks.

Izuku has never cared about his appearance before, but he knows this is going to be the only thing he sees whenever he looks at his face for months to come.

Lunch doesn't make him feel any better.

There's a tray on his bed's mini table by the time he comes out of the bathroom, and he tries to hide his disgust at the mere sight of the food.

They give him the same thing every time: a light vegetable broth, a cup of mandarin oranges, some water, and a mystery pudding.

That sounds pretty good, in all honesty, but Izuku wouldn't know how it tastes saying as he hasn't eaten any of it.

He's just not hungry.

The doctors have him on nutritional pills, which are supposed to make up for his lack of eating. Those pills, plus the six other types of medications they make him take every few hours, are causing him to lose his appetite. Hell, if anything he's just more thirsty.

"The soup is good for you," Aizawa says without looking up from his phone. It seems the book will be finished at another time. "If you're not going to eat much, at least eat that."

Izuku forces himself to nod, pushing down the petulant words that ache to escape him. Don't tell me what to do.

It's the same conversation being repeated for the fourth time. He missed out on the hospital's breakfast yesterday for obvious reasons, but lunch and dinner went the same way. Izuku would be brought the same food, he wouldn't touch it, Aizawa would say something to him to try and get him to eat, and Izuku would ignore him.

Breakfast this morning went slightly different, however, as he did end up drinking some apple juice that Yamada snuck in for him.

The voice hero has been in and out of the hospital in the past twenty-four hours. He arrived back just after lunch yesterday with a small bag of Izuku's things, saying that he unfortunately had to confiscate some of the weapons and more incriminating stuff (he'd have to check everything in through security, after all), but Izuku didn't mind. He was more surprised that the man brought back anything at all.

Yamada stayed with him for a few hours, just talking with him and trying to get him to feel better, before having to leave to feed the cats. He also came by quickly this morning to give Aizawa a change of clothes and some books, slipping Izuku the juice box in the process.

That drink is now the one thing holding his sanity together. He will require another one soon, though, so perhaps he should look into some of the nearby grocery stores to see if they're easy to steal from.

Izuku reaches for the bag he set between the wall and the bed, pulling out his oldest notebook. He's been playing with it a lot since Yamada brought it over, more to remind himself that it's safe, that his secrets are safe, than out of boredom.

It's still storming like a bitch outside, so Izuku busies himself with looking through his journal and memorizing each word written in it.

Just a little longer. Just a little longer and then Izuku can get out of here—

There's a faint spike in his mind, and Izuku looks to the door just a few moments before it slams open, revealing a disheveled looking Present Mic in his hero costume.

"Good morning!" He yells, even though he'd said the exact same thing a few hours before. "How's my favorite listeners doing, huh? Good?"

"Dear god," Aizawa sighs, rubbing his temple. "We're in a hospital, Mic. Could you be any louder?"

The dark side of Izuku, the side that craves chaos and lives for pissing people off, tells him to make a joke, but the boy refrains from doing so at the last moment.

"Aw, c'mon, don't be such a grump! I've got some great news!" Yamada rears back and points double finger-guns at Izuku, grin wide. "You get to leave a little early!"

For a good few seconds, there's dead silence. Yamada stays in that position, looking back and forth between the other hero and vigilante as he waits for a response.

Well, shit, Izuku thinks, shaking himself from his stupor and beginning to pack his belongings. You don't have to tell me twice.

"What?" Aizawa asks, obviously skeptical.

Yamada nods excitedly. "Yep! The doc passed me on the way here!" He hands Aizawa the release papers and goes to help Izuku with his stuff, ruffling the boy's hair. "Hopefully the storm calms down for a bit so we can leave."

Izuku probably should've paid attention to the wording, as he would've been a little more alarmed at the word we, but he's too busy trying to reach the cat beanie Aizawa placed on one of the shelves.

Curse his five-foot-two self. He had hoped One for All would've at least helped him grow a little, but it appears not.

Yamada, the tall bastard, gets the beanie for him and then starts to politely straighten up the room.

Hah. Couldn't be Izuku.

The moment the boy has his bag in one hand and his medicine in the other, he starts to speed walk out the open door. It's not hard to navigate to the elevator, as he'd memorized the layout of the hospital when Aizawa led him back yesterday. The adrenaline pumping through him is almost like a drug.

"Woah, wait a second, kiddo!" Yamada rushes in beside him, laughing. "Someone's excited, yeah?"

Aizawa follows at a much slower pace, lugging his overnight bag over his shoulder. He looks dead tired, and Izuku suddenly feels a little bit guilty at possibly being the cause of that.

He's practically vibrating in excitement, the idea of being able to finally continue his plan and leave being almost too good to be true—or Izuku really is just going through a relapse.

The automatic doors slide open, and Izuku nearly stumbles as he jogs out of the elevator. He doesn't stop even when the lady at the front desk calls out his name, obviously having been informed of his escape yesterday. He hears Aizawa pause to show her the papers, and then he's out in the fresh air.

Heavy rain drops onto his face and skin, soaking him almost immediately to the bone, but he doesn't care. This is the first taste of freedom he's had in what feels like forever.

God, he hates hospitals so fucking much. They do nothing but freak him the hell out.

He glances around, deciding to go to the left. There's a store a little ways over there that's usually pretty lenient with him when he enters. They won't kick him out or—

"Hey, hey!" Yamada's warm hand gently lands on his shoulder, stopping him in his tracks. "The car's the other way!"

Izuku wipes the rain from his eyes and looks up at the hero. His teacher's face is soft, his green gaze kind and honest, and the boy hates how it makes him feel so small. "Oh, uh, I'm fine walking, thank you. You don't have to drive me anywhere."

You've already done too much. I won't be able to repay you for just being there for me.

Yamada frowns, hand retracting from his shoulder. His glasses fog up, and Izuku notices his hair starting to droop from the constant thrum of rain. The gel must be coming off.

"Drive you anywhere?" He echoes, blinking in confusion. "Did Sho not tell you, kiddo?"

Izuku tenses as lightning cracks somewhere in the distance. "Tell me what?"

Yamada doesn't seem to get it at first, but then his face lights up in realization, and he whips around to glare at Aizawa, who's just now walking up to them with a yellow umbrella. "I can't believe it!" He gasps, shocked. "The nerve of you, Shouta! You said you'd tell him!"

The underground hero raises his hands in mock surrender, his even gaze flitting over to meet Izuku's. "I told you I'd tell him eventually, Mic. I never said when."

"Are you serious?"

Izuku listens to them both argue for a moment, incredibly confused. He thinks he knows what's going on, but he's still unsure. Now that they're both distracted, though, the boy sees his chance and decides screw it, why not? He tries to casually walk away, hoping they won't notice, but Aizawa's hand shoots out and snags him by the collar of the shirt. He easily pulls him back without so much as a pause in his sentence.

Fuck. So much for that.

The air is getting colder now, and Izuku starts to shiver. He can hardly think past the static building up in his mind.

Yamada seems to notice Izuku's change in attitude, as he stops laying into Aizawa at once and glances back at him, seeing that he has more pressing issues at the moment. He purses his lips and presents Izuku with a small smile. "Well, I guess I'm telling you, then, huh? You're coming back with us, Midoriya. To our house!"

Yeah, that's... not what Izuku thought he was going to say, that's for sure. "Eh?" He says intelligently, because what the fuck.

Is it April Fool's Day and he just wasn't informed? Should he be laughing right now?

Yamada takes the heavier bag from his grip and rests a hand on the boy's head. "How do you feel about coming to stay with me and Sho for a few weeks?"

Yeah, Izuku has decided that he doesn't get paid enough to deal with this shit.

Yamada is a better driver than Aizawa.

Izuku's pencil, courtesy of the voice hero, scrawls the sentence quickly onto the paper of his notebook. This little fact became evident about 0.2 seconds into the current drive.

Where Aizawa is jerky and either too-slow or too-fast, Yamada is smooth and obviously familiar with the speed limits around here. He actually seems like he knows how to drive.

He's also a good multitasker. It's surprising how many people can't talk correctly while driving, but Yamada does it normally.

The teacher made it very clear that this is Izuku's decision alone. They're not going to force him to do anything or choose anything permanent just yet, as that's not their intention. They just want the best for him, which is why they offered to house him in the first place.

And it's baffling. Izuku doesn't understand why. He doesn't understand why they're doing any of this. It's weird, it's warm, and it's too kind. They're not getting anything out of this, so why go through all this trouble? It doesn't make sense, damnit.

Yamada said that he unfortunately only has two choices at the moment: the orphanage, or their shared apartment. He seemed very upset when Izuku asked him about the only other option—jail, so Izuku made a note to himself not to bring that up again.

It's nice, Izuku thinks absentmindedly, that he even bothered to explain all of this to him. The hero truly doesn't want to make Izuku uncomfortable or force him into anything he doesn't want to do, which is different.

Not a lot of people ever cared this much for him. It's an almost foreign feeling.

Izuku is glad that he'd been given a choice, even though the answer was pretty obvious. Going to an orphanage means he'd have to leave all of his stuff behind, as they surely wouldn't let him keep any of his belongings. It also means he'd be putting more innocent people in danger, which is a no-go. Besides, he knows how terrible orphanages can be. The foster care system is even worse.

Even if he managed to escape, he knows that someone would be watching him, and then he'd be captured and the cycle would start over again.

Going with Yamada and Aizawa isn't much better, but at least they already know a lot about him. They know about him being Rabbit, they know about some of his personal life, they know about Midoriya Izuku.

Going to an orphanage would mean a restart, almost, and just a few days ago Izuku thought that a restart was necessary for his survival.

But maybe not. Maybe now that his secrets have been revealed he can just hang in there for a while and gather his thoughts. Maybe he can hit the pause button for a moment, if only to catch his breath. So much stuff has happened that he can barely wrap his head around it.

Would he... would he be allowed to have this?

Izuku stares up at his teachers' apartment complex through the windshield, heart thudding almost painfully against his ribs. His nerves are struck, and he's feeling more unsure now more than ever.

What made him say yes again? He doesn't remember.

Yamada turns off the ignition and gives Izuku another considering look. "Are you sure you're alright?"

The vigilante (ex-vigilante, now?) nods shakily, opening the passenger side door quickly as if to prove his point. Aizawa emerges from the backseat, having been banished there for apparently being mean to Yamada, and leads the boy up to the apartment without a word.

Izuku can't help but stick close to Aizawa as they walk. The two heroes live on the sixth floor, so that's nice, at least. Izuku likes being up high.

The green-haired boy shivers when they finally make it up, drops of rain still clinging to him. He felt bad about getting in the car while still wet, but Yamada had assured him it was fine.

Aizawa unlocks the door and pushes it open, gesturing for Izuku to go in first—the wrong move, honestly.

He stops just a few steps in, eyes wide as he takes in the apartment before him, only to yelp as Aizawa practically shoves him forward in order to close the door in time. Izuku sees why once he spots the three furry figures darting forward from various areas in the room.

Izuku has seen so many pictures of these cats that he could probably pick them out by name, and he stops himself from bending down to pet one of them. He doesn't want to scare any of them off. He's the guest here, after all.

The apartment is nice, to put it simply. It's larger than Izuku's was, with much nicer furniture and air conditioning, along with what looks like a newly remodeled kitchen. It's clean, homely, and altogether a very expensive-looking apartment.

To say Izuku is surprised is an understatement. He never thought Aizawa would bother to live somewhere like this. He'd expected a smaller apartment, at least. But then again, Yamada also lives here, so that explains it. A bold house to go with a bold hero.

"Don't mind the cats!" The blond calls from the kitchen. He's rummaging through the cabinets for something. "They're a little shy at first."

They certainly don't seem shy, Izuku thinks, looking down at the fluffy gray cat rubbing at the sweatpants the hospital gave him. He keeps quiet, though.

"You can move around, you know," Aizawa says, heading for the couch. "Leave your shoes by the door. There's an extra pair of slippers right there you can use for now."

He points to them, and Izuku nods. They're gray, and they look pretty big, but it's fine. He won't be staying for long anyway.

"Oh! Let me show you where you'll be sleeping!" Yamada springs from the kitchen and heads down the hall, beckoning Izuku to come after him. The boy does so with some hesitancy, trying not to trip over the calico cat that starts to do figure-eights around his feet. "This used to be the guest room, but it'll be yours now! I know it's a little plain, so don't be afraid to put up some posters or anything, 'kay?"

Izuku clears his throat and nods again, stepping inside the room to put down his bag. He tries not to show his awe at just how big it is compared to his old one but ultimately fails, causing Yamada to giggle.

"I'll leave you to settle in for a few minutes, and then I'll take you for a house tour! How does that sound?"

A house tour? Izuku doesn't know what that could possibly entail, but it's not like there's much else to do, so why not? "Um, yeah, that's good." He stands in the middle of the room awkwardly until Yamada shuts the door with a soft click, one of the cats meowing in protest.

Hm. It seems they kind of like him.

Izuku sits on the full-sized bed, head held in his hands now that he's alone. Things still don't feel real to him. He can't believe he's here right now, sitting in his teachers' apartment instead of being chained up in a prison somewhere.

This is better than he could have ever hoped for, but this is also the worst thing that could've ever happened to him. It's interesting how things end up, isn't it?

Izuku stares at the framed cat pictures scattered on the dresser, sighing to himself.

Just for a little while, he promises. He can stay just long enough to get himself together. Then he'll run, for good this time. He won't fail.

That's how it has to be.

Izuku doesn't know what he expected, in all honesty.

The Aizawa and Yamada household is fairly plain, if not a little chaotic. There are two bedrooms, one small office space that Yamada uses as his at-home studio, and two bathrooms, making this one of the biggest places Izuku has ever stayed at, despite it being only an apartment.

Which is weird, unusual, and maybe a little uncomfortable, though not bad.

Not bad yet.

Yamada is very enthusiastic while showing Izuku around, looking almost giddy when he opens the door to his studio and starts to explain what each piece of equipment is used for. Izuku doesn't have to pretend that he's excited, as he knows that the stuff in this office alone is probably worth more than all of his old support weapons put together. The hero promises to take him to the actual studio sometime soon, and honestly? He's ecstatic about that idea.

But his okay-ish mood quickly dampens after the tour ends, and now he's standing around, arms wrapped around his middle as he tries to think of something to do. Something that won't, preferably, make him look more out of place than he already feels.

Rarely has he ever been given the chance to just wait around and do nothing. The feeling is abnormal, and he doesn't like it one bit. His muscles twitch and ache with the need to just move and stretch. He needs something to do, or else he's going to keel over and die.

And it's not like he has a phone right now either. Usually he'd be searching for more jobs or clients online and be browsing public forums for hero and villain information, but none of those are options at the moment. He's definitely not going to ask Yamada or Aizawa for one of their phones to use, as that'd be… rude. He's a guest here. This isn't his home. Asking for something like that would be impolite and entitled.

He also can't even distract himself with unpacking because he doesn't have anything to unpack. He doesn't have any clothes or weapons or electronics—nothing. All of his old belongings are gone now. Mere piles of ash sitting on splintered wood.

Izuku is lucky that Aizawa apparently has a ton of spare clothes. The man doesn't even wear more than two outfits, so Izuku is trying not to feel too guilty right now about having to wear his stuff. Most of it is too small for the other anyway, but still.

He knows that it's either this or the couple will spend their money to buy him new clothes, which is a big fucking nope.

It's only been a couple of days since the incident and he's acting jittery. He can feel his quirks pulsing in his mind in the form of a mild headache, his powers simultaneously trying to fight off the drugs in his system and succumb to them. It's like a war going on inside his body—inside his mind, and it's not pleasant at all.

Dammit. Izuku is already contemplating jumping out of the window and it's only been a few hours since arriving here. It's just six stories, he assures himself. I've survived falling from worse heights before.

He shudders at the sudden reminder of The Helicopter Fiasco. It was fun in the moment, sure, but he'd rather not have a repeat of that.

Something headbutts his leg, jolting him out of his thoughts, and Izuku glances down to see the cats once again crowding around him, tails held high.

Huh. They don't seem to be capable of leaving him alone.

The fluffy gray one with green eyes claws up his pants and forces herself into his arms, meowing incessantly. Pickles, his mind helpfully supplies, and he tilts his head down to kiss her head on impulse. The cat surprisingly lets it happen, but not without swatting his cheek first.

Meatball headbutts his leg one last time before slinking away into the kitchen, rumbling quietly. Izuku watches the calico disappear around the corner, only to look back down and meet the very unnerving gaze of Sushi, who's sitting with his paws tucked politely under his tail a few steps in front of Izuku. And it's the eyes that catch him off guard.

They remind Izuku of Missy's eyes, of the way they seem to stare straight into his soul. As if, despite being just an animal, Sushi can understand.

Izuku crouches down and reaches out a hand, ignoring Pickles' noise of protest at being jostled. Sushi just stares, unimpressed, as the boy slowly goes to scratch behind tan ears. The light brown tabby leans into the touch, the tip of his tail swishing back and forth across the carpet, but otherwise he doesn't make a move to let Izuku know whether or not to stop.

They won't stop following him. Every few minutes they'll traipse back over to Izuku and demand for attention and pets—all except Sushi. The quiet cat in front of him is obviously much older than the other two, probably being at around Izuku's age, and is much gentler.

Yamada said this is Kayama-sensei's cat, right? He must spend a lot of time here because of how many missions Midnight takes.

Izuku doesn't mind them constantly coming over to him. He just doesn't understand why they're doing that. Cats aren't usually like that, especially when it comes to strangers. Though the boy guesses he shouldn't be too surprised; that's how he got Missy, after all.

The feline wouldn't stop following him that night either, and honestly it feels more like she chose Izuku rather than the other way around.

"They seem to like you," Aizawa says, and Izuku tenses despite himself.

He glances up to look at the teacher from his place at the mouth of the hallway, petting Pickles a little faster as his nerves start to spike. Aizawa is on the couch with his reading glasses on and a laptop balanced on his knees, the light from the screen reflecting off his frames and stopping Izuku from meeting his eyes. Which is good. Izuku doesn't want to do that anyway.

Aizawa isn't actually looking at him, which gives Izuku a free chance to just observe the man without being weird. He doesn't look irritated anymore, Izuku thinks, noting the unusual softness to his features. But that might also be just because he's concentrating on whatever he's working on. His teacher is a stealth hero, a damn good one at that, so he could very well be simply masking his emotions with a blank expression to prevent Izuku from reading him. It's not like he hasn't done that before.

Hell, it's not like Izuku hasn't done that before.

He suddenly gets the urge to tell Aizawa that he looks like a grandma with those reading glasses, but he manages to stop himself in the nick of time. That would be mean. And plus, Yamada is just a little ways away in the kitchen, rummaging around in the cabinets to try and get an early start on dinner.

Izuku knows he would most likely laugh at the jab and not get upset on behalf of his friend, but the boy also doesn't want to run the risk of that not happening.

So Izuku just nods at Aizawa's statement and continues playing with Pickles, allowing the cat to gnaw on his fingers and bat at his hand. Sushi goes into the kitchen too, probably to go see Yamada, and then it's just the three of them in the living room: Izuku, Aizawa, and Pickles.

Entertaining himself with a cat only works for so long. It's an almost mindless action, so it's not even doing much of anything to keep his brain stimulated. He's just getting increasingly bored, and with that boredom comes frustration.

He can't do anything. He really wants to go outside, but he kind of doubts Aizawa would let him out right now without tagging along. Not so soon after getting out of the hospital, at least. He's still very much in the healing process, however much he doesn't feel like it or pretends not to be.

But what control does Aizawa even have over him? Legally speaking, he has none. Just because he's his homeroom teacher doesn't mean anything. So what's stopping Izuku from just walking out the front door and doing what he wants? Nothing. It just feels like something Izuku wouldn't be allowed to do right now, even though Aizawa hasn't explicitly said anything against it.

Izuku could walk out. He honestly could. But that would probably only annoy Aizawa, or at the very least minorly inconvenience him, and he doesn't want to do that just yet.

But more than that, Izuku just doesn't want to do anything that might disappoint Yamada. The boy has seen a few of his classmates receive the eyebrows of disappointment from the voice hero on multiple occasions, and Izuku thinks he'd just about burst into tears if he had to be on the receiving end of one of those looks.

This is why he can't afford to let that bubbling frustration give way inside him and make him do something rude, so he forces himself to do one of the only things he's good at; he asks questions.

Izuku clears his throat, hoping he doesn't sound as unsure as he feels when he speaks. "Aizawa-sensei?"

The clacking of the keyboard slows down slightly. "It's just Aizawa here," the man corrects, still not looking up from his work.

Okay, Just Aizawa.

Izuku has to stop himself from saying this and instead takes the answer as a sign to continue. "When will I be able to see Missy? She's still at the vet's, right?"

"Yes. They said they're just watching over her for now to check for any lasting injuries, but she should be fine." Aizawa checks his phone briefly. "She'll be ready to be picked up tomorrow."

Tomorrow. Which means he has to wait another day to see her.

And while it's honestly not a long wait, it sure feels like it. Today has already gone by so slow that he doesn't even want to imagine what the next few days will feel like.

An idea pops into his head. A dumb, small idea, but an idea nonetheless. It's more like a test, because if he's going to be here for a bit he might as well figure out the boundary lines.

Izuku keeps his gaze on Pickles, making sure he sounds neutral. "Can I be the one to pick her up? I know where the office is; I can walk there."

This time Aizawa does stop at the question. The keyboard stops clacking, and the sound of pots and pans clanging together in the kitchen stops abruptly as well, if only for a moment. Shit. Both the wrong and the right thing to ask, then.

Izuku feels Aizawa's eyes on him now but doesn't look up, instead focusing on scratching behind the cat's ears. It's not a true test if there's not first an answer to the question, and Izuku is simply waiting for Aizawa to respond now. Whether or not the response will be right is a whole 'nother matter entirely.

The pause stretches on, and then Izuku hears the laptop being shut, making his throat tighten. Okay. Maybe I should have waited.

"Mic is going to pick her up after work tomorrow," Aizawa says simply, eyes still on him. He must be searching for a reaction just as much as Izuku is.

That's a nice way of saying no, Izuku thinks. He frowns down at Pickles, curbing his own rising panic. The commotion starts back up in the kitchen, and Izuku forces himself to breathe.

"Oh." His nails bite into his palms on instinct. That seems to be something he's done a lot lately. "Can I go with him?"

Aizawa shifts on the couch. "You won't be going to school tomorrow, kid, and he's going to get her straight after."

It's the first part that makes Izuku's head snap up. "I won't be going to school?"

The black-haired man tilts his head, scratching the stubble on his jaw in a way that would make him seem unperturbed if Izuku didn't know any better. "The doctors ordered you to rest. Nezu and I came to an agreement that you'd be excused from school for a week in order to give you enough time to heal. I'll be staying with you during that time just in case you have any reactions to the medicine."

That is complete and utter bullshit, Izuku wants to scream. And what does he mean by just in case? Izuku isn't going to keel over and die tomorrow, so he doesn't need a caretaker! Well, actually there is a chance he might die at any given moment, but that's not the point!

It's stupidly obvious to Izuku that Aizawa just wants to keep an eye on him, probably to make sure he doesn't try to escape again—a valid reason, in all honesty, though it's not like Izuku will ever admit that.

A week inside this place, where he'll have nothing to do or no one but Aizawa to talk to for most of the day? A whole week? That sounds like hell. And not the fun kind.

Izuku regrets not throwing his water cup at the man. He didn't deserve it then but he definitely does now.

What will Kacchan think once he sees me not at school? I don't even have my phone to text or call him, so he might just assume I'm dead.

The explosive teen assuming something like that wouldn't be good for anybody involved.

Izuku stares at Aizawa, trying to see if he can find a crack in his expression or something that he can latch onto and use as leverage. “You’re going to miss school for a week, too?” He asks, a little confused and also affronted. “But you never miss any workdays, even when you’re sick. That would ruin your record.”

Aizawa quirks a brow. “I think I’ll survive.”

No! That’s not—that’s not right. That’s not what you’re supposed to say. You’ve always made a big deal out of not skipping out on work for pointless reasons, so why are you doing this now? For me?

It feels wrong. And Izuku knows it probably isn’t meant this way, but it feels degrading, too. It’s like Aizawa doesn’t trust him enough to leave him alone for a few hours without doing something rash—and again, he shouldn’t, but it’s the principle of it.

Great. So he has to wait until tomorrow to see his cat, and he also probably won’t be allowed out without a good reason for an extended period of time. It’s only been a few hours and he already feels like a damn prisoner despite Yamada’s earlier reassurances on the car ride over that he isn’t.

This isn’t fair. None of it is.

Izuku stands up and heads for the kitchen, letting Pickles drop to the floor. He doesn’t want to be in Aizawa’s presence, even though he knows that technically this isn’t all his fault. If the roles were reversed Izuku would probably treat himself the same way.

Yamada is stirring something in a pot, swaying to a tune that no one else can hear, and Izuku makes sure to stay far out of his way. The food smells delicious, and though he doesn’t think he’ll be able to eat any of it, that doesn’t mean he’s going to distract him. He has a pretty good idea of what he’s preparing, and his hands itch to help because he knows how to make this dish; he’s made this with Mitsuki so many times that’s it practically second nature at this point—but he stops himself from even asking.

If he wanted my help, he’d ask.

Izuku leans awkwardly against the counter, eyes roaming over the kitchen. He takes in the bowl of fruit that sits near the microwave, the toaster that looks like it’s been on fire more than once, and the very expensive-looking coffee machine that takes up nearly a quarter of the counter space in front of him. The fridge matches the other appliances, and Izuku is just able to see his reflection in the black stainless steel.

There are a ton of cabinets, but what's more important to note is the stuff that might be in the drawers, and, more specifically, the stuff he might be able to use in the future.

He watches how Yamada spins around to grab a knife from one of the drawers closest to the dishwasher—the utensils drawer, Izuku notices—and starts to dice up an onion. The bigger knives, used for cutting meats and thicker vegetables, are hanging on the wall next to him. They're pretty high up, though, probably so the cats will have a harder time reaching them, but what this also means is that Izuku will have to stand on his tiptoes to get one if he'll ever need to.

It's done subconsciously, the way he scans the area and files away any potentially important information. He can't exactly help it, and yet he doesn't stop at all when he realizes he's doing it.

The light catches on a few pictures on the fridge, and Izuku moves forward to inspect them once Yamada gets distracted by one of the cats getting too close to the pot.

Are these…?

Izuku's eyes widen slightly when he sees what exactly the pictures are. Some of them are snapshots of a slightly younger Yamada and Aizawa at what looks to be a variety of parties, arms slung around each other with differing outfits in each one. Aizawa looks like he can't be bothered, but Izuku doesn't miss the small quirk of his lips that's present in almost every photo.

A baby Pickles and Meatball are also shown together, wrapped up in a thick blanket with a card reading six weeks leaning against them. They must've been siblings.

But it's the picture on the top corner of the fridge door that has a small gasp leaving him, because oh.

He notices Yamada first—the man is wearing a crisp white suit, his hair done in an intricate braid with a flower crown hanging half off his head. Aizawa is right next to him with a similar outfit, mouth open in a laugh while the sun shines brightly behind them both, and if Izuku's eyesight is correct, it looks like he's crying?

Oh. This is from their wedding, it looks like. The date on the bottom of the picture says this was eight years ago, which would put Yamada and Aizawa both at around twenty-four in this picture.

The pieces fit together perfectly now. So they're definitely husbands. In a way, Izuku has always known. It was just something about the way they talked about each other that clued him in. He remembers how they would sometimes mention their 'partner' around him. He remembers how Yamada's eyes would light up when he talked about him on those rare occasions at the laundromat, how his face would always soften considerably. On patrols, he remembers how Aizawa would get quiet after Izuku teasingly asked for the hundredth time about his love life. The man usually wouldn't talk on the subject for long, but there was always that same glint to his eye that Yamada would have.

There was a moment at the laundromat a few months in where Yamada got a call from this partner, and Izuku had made sure to keep extra quiet so as not to disturb him. He realized pretty quickly that the person on the other end was someone important, because just hearing how Yamada talked to them was very different than how he normally acts as Present Mic. And coincidentally, the next day Izuku met up with Eraserhead and listened to the man talk about a very similar conversation that he had had with his own significant other.

At that time the boy said nothing about his suspicions, and now he's glad to see that his instincts were correct.

It's kind of obvious, actually. At first glance, Yamada and Aizawa are polar opposites; two halves of a whole. It's only right that they ended up together.

They both look so happy in this picture that Izuku has to take a step back, heart squeezing almost painfully in his chest. He probably shouldn't be seeing this, and yet when he turns around he finds that Yamada is staring at the photo too, something like fondness on his face.

"You don't seem very surprised," the hero says, tearing his eyes away and turning back to finish up the dinner behind him. He sounds just a little uncertain, and Izuku realizes that he's probably waiting to hear his response.

Izuku flushes, looking down at his feet. "That's because I kind of already knew."

“Oh?” Yamada shoos away a lingering Pickles and starts to make plates. “How?”

Oh, crap. I’m gonna come off as a total fucking weirdo.

“Um, Aizawa-sensei would talk about a partner sometimes on patrol, and you talked about one, too? And sometimes the things you’d both say would just… match up.” Izuku fiddles with the hem of the baggy black shirt he has on, hoping that that makes sense.

“Ah, gotcha. I can definitely see that.” Yamada shakes his head with a smile before twisting to point a large spoon at him. “Oh, and like Sho said, you can drop the formalities at home, kiddo. No need to call us sensei here.”

So then what are you? Izuku wants to ask, following Yamada awkwardly out into the dining area as the man puts down the plates. Are you a teacher here, or just a hero? What are you to me now?

He’s not going to call them by his hero names, and he’s apparently not supposed to call them sensei now, so what does he refer to them as? Just Aizawa and Yamada? It doesn’t sound right for some reason.

The voice hero calls Aizawa over and gestures for Izuku to sit down. He does, but only after the other two have been seated. Yamada takes the one at the head of the table, and Aizawa sits right next to him on the longer side. Izuku takes the spot as far away from the two as possible, avoiding sitting at the other end spot—that’s reserved for people of authority, and while Izuku knows that this practice is long-forgotten in most households nowadays, he can’t help but follow it.

He sits as far away from them as possible, which isn’t that far, all things considered. He’s sitting diagonal to Aizawa on the other side of the table, and when his plate is slid toward him, Izuku mutters out a quiet thanks.

Izuku watches them say a quick prayer before digging in, but he just sits there and… stares at his food. He doesn’t know what to do. He hasn’t had a home-cooked meal in a good bit of time. He hasn’t been to the Bakugou’s in weeks, and nor has he visited Ms. Hanako.

And in this unfamiliar house, everything feels just that much weirder.

He stares down at his plate. It looks good, in all honesty. Amazing, actually, but he’s just not hungry.

He didn't eat much of anything at the hospital either. It's not like it matters though, right? The medication he's taking is supposed to help with that. And besides, over the last month or so he's stopped being such a heavy eater. He thinks faintly that it might be his body's way of punishing him for accepting One for All, and he quickly pushes that thought aside for another time.

"He didn't poison it," Aizawa deadpans suddenly. Izuku glances up and finds his teacher staring at him. He's already started digging in but seems to have paused upon noticing Izuku's hesitance.

Yamada is frowning at him, too, looking concerned, and Izuku shifts uncomfortably. He realizes he's probably being impolite by not eating, but he also feels like it'll be more impolite to only eat a few bites and leave it at that. That might make it look like he thinks it's disgusting.

"I know!" He says, more to himself than anything. If he wanted to poison me, he would've used a different method. And besides, I was standing there the whole time. I would've seen it.

He wouldn't poison him anyway, though, Izuku knows, which is why he hates himself for even thinking that. For even making sure that he wouldn't.

He picks up the chopsticks in front of him—a nice, sleek black set—and picks around at the food. If he moves it around it'll look like he's eating it.

Well, that's what he thought.

"You need to get your strength back up," Aizawa orders, seeing right through his bullshit. "Eat."

"But I'm fine," he says quietly, and he is. He's lived like this for a long time. Sure, he's been forgetting to eat anything that isn't school lunch for the past month or so, but he's still fine. It's worked for him so far. "And I had breakfast this morning," he adds lamely.

Aizawa takes a bite of food and points his chopsticks at him, reminding Izuku yet again that the man chooses to have bad manners. "You didn't eat any of your breakfast at the hospital, Midoriya. I would know because I was there."

The raven-haired man makes to speak again, but Yamada beats him to it. "Even if you had something to eat then, that was over twelve hours ago, kiddo. I know you must be hungry." He stares at Izuku, who's very pointedly keeping his gaze on his plate, and straightens up. “Do you not like it? I can make something else—?”

“No!” He flushes at his outburst, dipping his head to hide his face once more. “It’s fine. It looks good, sir, really. I just don’t think I’ll be able to keep it down.” He says the last part in a whisper, embarrassed.

Everyone waits a few seconds, and then—

“If you’re really not hungry, you can wrap it up and put it in the microwave in case you change your mind in the next few hours.”

Izuku blinks up at Aizawa, surprised and also grateful at being let off so easily.

“But you’ll have to eat something soon,” he continues. Izuku quickly rises to his feet with his plate to escape the situation. “The issue is you feel sick because you haven’t eaten, and now you’re not eating because you feel sick.”

Yeah, that makes a little bit of sense, he guesses. But he can barely stomach the thought of eating at this moment. Can barely stomach the thought of taking what he doesn’t deserve. Eating at Tony’s Pizzeria was different. He would either work or pay upfront for his food, despite Ms. Hanako’s complaints. And at the Bakugou household he would help Kacchan with studying and training, so then he would at least feel like he was earning the food.

This food, however, is being given to him for free. And here he is, wasting it.

Yamada probably feels like shit now, and it’s that guilt-inducing thought that has Izuku heading further into the kitchen and to the sink after placing his food in the microwave. He starts to wash the prepping materials and pots by hand, if only to give himself something to do and think about other than the pressing issues at hand.

He hears Yamada move quickly from the table, about to stop him, but then Aizawa says something low to him and the footsteps never come.

Izuku is grateful for it. Perhaps Aizawa understands how he’s feeling right now. Izuku needs to at least do this if he’s going to be here, as dumb as it sounds.

This is just something he needs to do for himself.

By the time he's done, Aizawa and Yamada seem to have finished up dinner, and the latter comes back into the kitchen with both dirty plates. Izuku is prepared to take them, but Yamada just puts them in the empty dishwasher with a smile.

He places a hand on his shoulder as he walks past, and the boy marvels at how easily the man can just move around him as if Izuku belongs. As if he's supposed to be there.

"We usually use the dishwasher," the blond teases lightly, heading for the living room. "It's faster, y'know?"

Izuku stands there hesitantly for a moment before following him out of the kitchen. But instead of going to the couch to join them in whatever they're watching, he pauses by the hallway entrance, feeling the need to justify what he's doing. "Thank you for making dinner," he says, just loud enough for them to hear him. Even if I didn't eat it. "I'm going to, uh, go to the guest room now?"

Are you telling or are you asking?

Yamada smiles widely at him, flashing a thumbs-up. "'Course, kiddo! Get some rest, and don't forget to take your meds tonight, yeah?"

"You didn't sleep at all last night either," Aizawa adds, already back to what he's working on. "So make sure you do it now. You'll heal faster that way."

Can one respectively decline that?

Just ten seconds later, Izuku is glaring at the bed in front of him.

He knows he won't be able to sleep, but he tries for it anyway. He flops onto his back and stares up at the dark ceiling, willing himself to go to sleep. Praying.

Last night at the hospital was similar to this. Except then Izuku didn't even try to sleep. He couldn't try, for that was an unfamiliar, dangerous place. Sleeping means vulnerability, especially at night. He just couldn't do that so soon.

Aizawa must've known this, for he didn't push too much. He even stayed up with him, offering Izuku his phone for a minute to play this really cool Flappy Bird game—and oh, what Izuku would give to be playing it right now.

The bed here is too soft and the walls too plain. It doesn't feel like his room because it isn't.

Izuku would usually sleep on the floor or couch at his old apartment, which means he's used to having much harder beds than most people. This bed right here is like a cloud—no, a marshmallow compared to his old ones. It's too good to be true, too wrong to ever be for him.

So Izuku tries his hardest, but he just can't sleep. He twists and turns on the bed, growling in frustration. It isn't until the moon is high up in the sky that there's shuffling under his door, and he immediately sits up. A paw shoots out from under the crack and starts to wave around, making Izuku squint his eyes to see it better and then let out a giggle.

Izuku would have been keen on just watching it happen, that is until a slight yowl came from the other side. He immediately scrambles to his feet to open the door, quickly glancing at the door that he knows leads to Aizawa and Yamada's bedroom. Has he woken them up?

He extends his senses and finds that both of their quirks feel very subdued. Yamada is definitely asleep, but what about Aizawa? Erasure is weird when it comes to Izuku sensing it. He could very well be awake but just be relaxed enough to throw Izuku's quirk off.

The cat shoves past his legs and makes himself at home on the guest bed, which is entirely amusing to Izuku. There isn't a lot of light, but he thinks that this one is Sushi, meaning that this is the first time he's heard the cat voice himself. He lays down, huffing when Sushi goes to lay across his chest and cuddle up to him.

He stays like that, just staring up at the ceiling and gently petting Sushi while thinking about a ton of different things, until the sun's first rays are streaking through his curtains. The window (which is reinforced with a ton of locks, the boy thinks amusedly) sits right to the side of Izuku, so the light shines right on his face. At this point he can hear Aizawa and Yamada moving around, but he stays there for a bit longer, trying not to be suspicious.

What he's thinking about right now is Tsukauchi.

He wants to see him. Needs to see him. It's been way too long, honestly. There are so many things he needs to talk to the detective about. Izuku thinks that along with All Might, it's going to be hard to talk with Tsukauchi—not only because he is a literal lie detector, but because he's the one who's known him the longest. He was always there for him, both when he was Rabbit and just Midoriya Izuku.

He was the first person who kind of believed in him. Izuku knows he must be busy with work, but surely he would've been informed of Izuku's situation? At least by Aizawa?

Izuku also hates how desperate he is for some kind of reassurance from him. He's a detective, so if he says things are okay, it has to be true. That's point blank. That's who Tsukauchi is.

But what if the problem is Izuku? What if it really is his own fault that he's being ignored by his other two idols? He wouldn't be surprised. He'd be more surprised otherwise, actually.

Sushi whacks him with a paw, bringing him out of his thoughts, and Izuku sighs to himself. "Get used to it," he mutters. "I do this a lot. Trust me, I'm not proud of it."

It's a common occurrence to think these things. It's common to always worry.

For anxiety is always feeling like something's out of place, and when you can't find what it is, you start to think it's you.

Yamada is hurriedly making breakfast by the time he deems it safe to walk out into the main room, steps deadly silent on instinct. The voice hero has his costume on and his hair gelled up, still packing things up for work, but Aizawa still has his pajamas on and looks to be more relaxed on the couch. I guess he really is staying here to watch me.

The boy doesn't know what to do with that information. He doesn't like what that means.

Prisoner, a voice hisses at the back of his mind, and for once Izuku agrees.

Yamada slides him a small plate, as Aizawa is already eating by his spot on the couch, but he assures Izuku that he doesn't have to finish it if he doesn't want to. He also says, however, that there's a little more in the pan in case he wants more.

It's kind of funny how he's going to be disappointed.

Yamada ruffles Izuku's hair quickly as he passes, promising to see if he can get him some better clothes from the lost and found at UA for now until they can get him some of his own stuff. The boy just looks back down at his plate, nodding his head as he hears Yamada kiss Aizawa goodbye despite the other's protest.

And then he walks out, and they're left alone.

Which is… okay. Izuku has been alone with Aizawa loads of times. They're both comfortable in silence, as usually it's not quite as awkward as it is now, but this time it's one hundred percent Izuku's fault for making it feel like this.

He's hiding so many fucking things from this man that now that he's this close to him, literally, he feels as though he might explode. Lying to Aizawa is, again, always the hardest.

He only manages to get down two bites of breakfast before pushing it off to the side. It's better than what Aizawa thought he'd eat, obviously, as Izuku can hear his intrigued hmph from behind him. Good. Does that mean Aizawa approves? Is he doing alright?

Izuku really, really hopes so.

The day goes by agonizingly slow, just as he predicted. He keeps glancing periodically at the clock, only to get even more annoyed when it just seems like it's going backwards. He just knows that this week is going to suck.

He feels like shit, and there's also nothing to do. He's sure as hell not going to go nap, either. His mind wouldn't let him do that.

Izuku needs to text Kacchan sometime. He'll be worried sick by now, as Izuku usually tells him if he can't make it somewhere beforehand. The other issue, however, is that All Might still hasn't contacted him. To be fair he doesn't have his old phone, so none of his potential calls or texts would reach him anyway, but Izuku had assumed he would know about that. Wouldn't he know that he's staying with Aizawa and Yamada for a bit? Couldn't he just call Aizawa or someone to get to him?

Or is Izuku not worth that effort?

But still. He—he has to ask. Izuku has to know anyway. That's how he convinces himself to ask this next question, anyway.

Izuku is nervously walking around the living room now, eyes continuously latching onto the door and window. "Aizawa?" He gets a hum in affirmation. "Do you know where my phone is? I think I had it on me after I got home."

Aizawa nods from his place at the couch, not looking up from his computer yet. He's been glued to that a lot lately, it seems. "Tsukauchi has it."

And just what the fuck? The name makes Izuku reel back, eyes wide. "What? How does he have it? I haven't even seen him!"

"I sent it over at his request after the doctors gave it to me." He says it casually, as if it really is that simple. As if it's not a big deal at all.

You bastard, Izuku thinks, a little hurt. Why would you do that? Why?

Aizawa must notice the look on his face because he continues with a sigh. "I apologize for not telling you sooner, kid, but he needed it for evidence. He wanted to see if we could find footage or any information on it regarding that night, but he said he came up with nothing. He's just holding onto it for now until he can come over here himself."

Evidence. They took his phone away for evidence? Are they serious?

Petulance makes its way into his voice as he speaks, and he turns away sourly. "You could've asked me," he says quietly, hating how the words sound close to a whine. "I would've answered your questions or just given it to you."

You didn't have to steal my phone and snoop through my shit. Did Tsukauchi look through my contacts, too? Fuck.

"We didn't have much of a choice at the time, Midoriya. You were still unconscious." Aizawa grabs his laptop and gets up, ignoring Izuku's incredulous look as he heads for the dining table and sits down with one leg propped over the other. He gestures with a hand at the chair on the far side—the head spot, he notices. "And speaking of questions.

Have a seat, please."

Oh. Double fuck. Izuku should've never said anything. He suddenly feels like a deer caught in headlights, and he blinks twice at the man as if to check if he's actually asking and not ordering. Is he going to be interrogated or something? Is that what this is? Was the hero just waiting for Izuku to bring it up first?

Aizawa rolls his eyes. "Calm down. I just have three questions, kid."

Only three? That doesn't feel right.

Izuku doesn't move at first, as he's too busy trying to calm the rapid beating of his heart, but Aizawa just waits patiently until he makes his way over and slides into the chair that's not at the head of the table, palms sweating. He knows, logically, that he'll be fine, but it's just hard not to be worried. It's hard to come to terms with the fact that maybe he doesn't always have to be on edge.

He shouldn't be on edge. Not right now. Aizawa is here, and that has to be enough. He's never let him down before, right?

"The group that followed you. There were twenty-four of them." Aizawa's dark eyes roam over his face, and that's yet another thing that Izuku hates. It's hard to pretend around the man with how familiar they are to each other, so it would be easier all around if his teacher would just stop looking. "Do you know who sent them?"

Izuku pauses. Twenty-four, huh? Izuku remembers feeling around that many at the time, but he had at least thought there were a bit more. It sure felt like it then. "I didn't get a chance to see them, actually, so it's hard to tell. They, uh, they didn't enter the building. That's good, I guess, but that will just make it harder to track them later. I've gotta stop them from trying to hurt anyone else."

I have an idea who sent them, but it'll just make things worse if I say it.

"Track them?" Aizawa says with a start, something weird crossing over his expression.

Izuku's heart drops. "Yeah? I mean, not now. When I go back out as Rabbit." He stops suddenly, feeling very stupid. "Will I—will I be allowed to go back to that?"

At first, Aizawa doesn't respond. He's not looking at Izuku now, he's staring at the work in front of him with a frown. He opens his mouth, only to close it right after. And that's new. Aizawa is rarely at a loss for words. He usually answers someone immediately, or he'll just straight up ignore them. He never struggles to say something.

The boy feels that panic coming back to him full force, warring with the defiance that's threatening to take over his thoughts. Aizawa wouldn't stop him from doing that, would he? He has every legal right to, but that's not the point. He knows how much being Rabbit means to Izuku. He doesn't actually think that just because Izuku's life has been flipped upside-down that he'll stop being a vigilante, right?

But the more he's looking at the man, the more he's starting to think that that's not even what he's thinking about. Aizawa looks too perturbed for a question with such a black and white answer.

Are we even worrying over the same thing?

Aizawa looks back up at him and shakes his head. "We can discuss that later when you're feeling better. Here's my second question." The man sniffs, running a finger briefly under his nose. "That manila envelope Mic found at your place. What's in it?"

Oh, so Yamada did tell him about the things he found at the building. At least he knows the hero didn't go through anything. Or maybe he did and he just wants to keep what he found quiet for now.

"Nothing special."

Aizawa snorts at the innocent tone. "Sure."

The boy can't help but glare at him, ears burning. "It's nothing, really! It's just some stupid files and pictures! It's nothing bad!" Izuku breaks off and looks away again, his voice a whisper as he adds, "It's just incriminating stuff."

"Incriminating for yourself or for others?" Aizawa asks, raising both eyebrows.

Izuku thinks about the multitude of files in that envelope, ones that he's been collecting over a long period of time. He thinks about the photos he'd swiped from Endeavor's safe, and he thinks back to the testing documents on himself.

He would very rarely go into that envelope, which is why he put it in the crack in the wall in the first place. He's confident enough to say that Yamada wouldn't have even found it there if the explosions hadn't crumbled away part of the concrete wall and exposed it.

The information in there is important. So important that most of it is in near illegible code.

"Uh, both?"

"Christ, kid." Aizawa pinches the bridge of his nose. "Fine. I don't suppose you'll let me look at the contents in there, so here's the last question." He levels Izuku with an even stare. "It's about your father. You haven't said much about him at all. We just need to know if—"

"No."

"—he was involved in any of this." Aizawa finishes with a sigh, looking as if he expected that very reaction. "Midoriya, you're gonna have to give me something eventually. You can't keep everything a secret."

Well, he can certainly try. It's much better that way.

"I know, and I'm—I'm sorry." Izuku lifts a shoulder quickly in a half-hearted shrug. "I just can't right now. It's not a big deal."

He can't ever.

The sudden silence stretches on, and Izuku stares down at his socked feet. He hates doing this more than anything. Lying by omission is still lying, after all.

Aizawa's typing starts back up again, and Izuku shifts nervously in the chair. He glances at the clock on the wall and takes in a shaky breath. Cue the subject change. "You know, if I leave now, I'll be able to make it to the vet right around the same time Yamada will. Why can't I just —?"

"I already said no, Midoriya."

No, you didn't. You just avoided the question yesterday. You didn't tell me shit. Izuku forces himself to swallow those words and grips the sides of the wood chair, quietly seething. "But why?"

Aizawa clicks onto another tab. "Because you're not fully healed yet. You'll just hurt yourself by straining so much."

"That's bullshit."

The boy winces immediately after he says it, and Aizawa pauses in his work to peer at him, eyes narrowed. “Watch your mouth. The cats are around.”

It takes all of Izuku’s strength to stop himself from snapping back that his nose is too big for him to be able to do that, and the boy instead has to start counting off on his fingers to distract himself. “You gave Tsukauchi my phone without me even knowing, you won’t let me leave this apartment for anything, not even school, and you’re here watching me instead of being at work, which never happens.” Izuku grits his teeth and glowers at him, feeling a sudden burst of courage stem from his restlessness. “That has nothing to do with me not being healed. You just don’t trust me.”

Aizawa doesn’t hesitate for a second. “I don’t trust your ability to know what’s best for yourself,” he corrects, and Izuku bristles.

He’s not a baby, so Aizawa needs to stop acting like he is. He can take care of himself. He has been taking care of himself. For years, in fact.

Izuku turns away, not wanting to continue the conversation lest he ends up losing that last bit of self-control. Now is not the time to get pissed.

And so Izuku takes to ignoring Aizawa completely for the rest of the day. He stays in the guest room, scheming, until Yamada finally arrives back with Missy in his arms.

The feline goes ballistic when she sees Izuku, and for a good half an hour she doesn’t let him leave her side. She claims back her perch on his shoulder, hissing triumphantly at the other three cats below, and for a few short minutes there, everything is okay.

Izuku is so preoccupied with playing with Missy and ensuring that she’s unharmed that he almost forgets about his previous irritation.

Almost.

Yamada decides to order in dinner tonight, and Izuku only manages to get a few bites down of the food before asking to be excused. Confused and more than a little concerned, Yamada assures him that he never has to ask that here, and before Izuku leaves he adds that he’ll put the leftovers in the microwave again just in case.

Izuku has never left a table quicker.

He sits on the marshmallow bed, staring up the ceiling with Missy curled up on his chest. This isn't a sleeping kind of night either, it seems. He'll just have to bear it.

Good thing he has experience in that.

The next day passes by in similar fashion. Izuku makes sure to give Yamada a note for Kacchan before he leaves, asking him to please pass it on to him before the explosive teen blows up the school in his worry. Hopefully things will go well, and hopefully Kacchan won't be even more pissed once he receives the short note.

Izuku was very vague about what happened. He only explained that he's going to be staying with the hobo man for a little while and will have to tell him the details of it later. Izuku isn't expecting a nice note back, but who knows.

When the boy finishes a quick shower, using some of the extra products under the sink, he comes back out to find Aizawa sitting at the dining table with his work spread out in front of him, hands flying over his keyboard.

And this is great—no, fantastic for Izuku. This is the perfect set-up for his plans.

Remember when Izuku said he shouldn't take his frustrations out on his teacher? Yeah, fuck that. Now it's quickly going to become his favorite thing to do.

Izuku knows just what to do that'll annoy Aizawa the most. If there's one thing he knows, it's that his teacher doesn't like disturbances. Not while he sleeps, and most certainly not while he works. So the fact that he looks to be making lesson plans right now is just an added bonus, one that has Izuku's desire for chaos increasing tenfold.

The boy is sitting on the couch now, arms crossed with Missy and Meatball on his lap, currently working up his courage. After a few seconds he quietly puts the bottom of his foot on the edge of the coffee table, eyebrows furrowing. The table isn't over carpet or anything, just hardwood floor. So if he starts to push it away from him little by little with his foot, he knows the sound of it scraping against the ground will be like nails on a chalkboard to Aizawa.

He prepares his foot, scooting as close to the edge of the couch as possible so he can have the maximum pushing distance.

The first one is quick. Just a quick nudge with his foot that has the table groaning loudly and sliding across the floor.

He glances up, but Aizawa's back is still turned. He either didn't notice or just doesn't care.

Oh. He'll care soon enough.

The second one is longer, with the table legs scraping against the tile in a very uncomfortable manner. Skrrrrt.

Izuku pauses. The tapping on the keyboard had stopped briefly, but now it's back to writing. Hm. Not enough.

He does it again. Skrrrrrrt.

Aizawa looks back this time, eyebrows furrowed, and Izuku immediately averts his gaze, staring out the window innocently and biting on his inner cheek to quell his own anxieties.

He chances a glance at his teacher when the feeling of being watched fades, and he sees Aizawa taking a sip of his coffee.

Izuku hopes it's cold.

The boy waits a good minute before doing it again, just to make Aizawa think it's over. This one is by far the longest and most annoying push yet, with Izuku having to stretch his leg even further to get the desired effect.

Skrrrrrrrrt—

"I'm not letting you go out when you're still healing, so quit it."

Izuku scoffs quietly, cheeks burning at being found out so quickly. This is a test of wills, is it not? We shall see if your ability to put up with my incessant screeching outlasts my eternal desire for freedom. Years of conditioning have hardened me for this purpose.

The boy sets his jaw and waits. For this to work out in his favor, he has to be persistent. He has to space it out, as that'll annoy Aizawa much more.

Skrrt.

In the reflection on the laptop's screen, Izuku can just see Aizawa's face. He's definitely getting irritated now.

Skrrrrt.

There's an eye twitch. He's getting closer.

Skrrrrrrrt.

Izuku sees a vein pop out and counts it as a mini victory.

The next one is more sudden since Izuku had to practically kick the edge of the table to get it to go anywhere.

SKRRCH—

Aizawa huffs and turns around completely, arms folding over his chest. "Midoriya."

The disapproving eyes and stern tone finally gets to him, and Izuku starts to instinctively pet Missy and Meatball just to have something to do. "What? I was just testing out the table's durability."

His teacher just shakes his head, not deigning that with a response, and goes back to his work.

Izuku crosses off the table-screeching method in his head, deciding that it ultimately wasn't annoying enough.

On the third day, something changes.

Aizawa has to go on patrol that night, as his agency doesn't have anyone to cover his routes this time around, and Izuku hates how he starts to feel worry creep up in his throat immediately after Aizawa tells him this.

He's supposed to be angry at the man right now. Not worried. The boy had spent the entire day doing everything he could think of to piss him off, from accidentally running into him hard enough to make him spill his morning coffee to continuously turning the TV on and off with the volume as high as it could go—to everything in between.

He just wants to make Aizawa snap. Because if he does, maybe he'll just give in and let him go outside. Or, better yet, maybe he'll realize that Izuku isn't worth his time and just kick him out. Both are good choices.

It doesn't help that Izuku should also be out there, too, fighting alongside Aizawa. That's what they've been doing for a while now, so it's only fair. Well, that's what they've been doing up until the most recent incident. Now things have changed, but arguably not for the better. Izuku has no costume, no contacts or voice changer, and no weapons. Rabbit is, at least for the moment, dead to the world.

But he should still be out there. It doesn't matter about anything else. It's Izuku's job to protect the people. The public is going to realize soon enough that he's not doing that, and then things will go downhill very quickly.

He doesn't even want to think about what will happen at that point.

Aizawa leaves just after dinner, promising to be back around three, and Izuku retreats to the guest room soon after that. He feels only slightly guilty at turning down Yamada's offer to watch a few movies in the living room, simply telling the man that he was too tired. And it isn't a lie, really. Not this time.

He almost wants to sob in relief when he feels himself start to finally succumb to sleep after flopping down onto the too-soft marshmallow bed. It seems his mind has decided to take the hint and start cooperating with his body, as he's been begging his brain to let himself sleep for days now. He hasn't rested since those drugs knocked him out at the hospital, and even then that doesn't really count.

But Izuku finds himself wishing, just a few hours later, that tonight could've been another one of those sleepless nights. The moment he surrenders to the darkness and allows himself to fall asleep, the earth is ripped out from under him like a rug, and those dark thoughts come back to him in the form of a nightmare.

To Izuku, it feels like the dream goes on forever, though it couldn't have been more than an hour at most after falling asleep that he wakes back up abruptly.

He startles into consciousness, stiff and trembling, his breath frozen in his chest.

As his mind shapes his awareness, he forgets most of the details. All for One's voice, for one thing, was in the dream, and Izuku can still feel the hands on him, grabbing his arm, digging into his flesh, and the screams.

No, no, wait—I'm sorry—

Izuku's heart beats fast, too fast, and he can't make himself move. He's not breathing, he can't breathe, he can't. It's dark and his father is out there, All for One's out there, just like he always is. Always waiting beyond every corner, always hiding within every shadow.

No, I didn't mean to—please, I can't—I'll be good, I swear—

When Izuku finally moves, it's oh so slowly, with terror clawing into his heart. He pulls the covers tighter around his body and curls up into the smallest ball he can, ears ringing and body trembling. He doesn't know this room. This bed doesn't feel like his.

His eyes squeeze shut.

Fall asleep, fall asleep, fall asleep, he wills himself. C'mon, please!

It's not real, some faraway part of him cries, but Izuku doesn't know what to believe anymore.

He can't slip back into sleep, so eventually Izuku forces his limbs to move and stumbles out of the room, trying not to make too much noise as he heads for the living room. He flicks on the TV and immediately mutes it, just standing there in front of the screen. He stays like that for who knows how long, shaking and sucking in breaths as he watches the pictures flash by and voiceless people move their mouths.

The nightmare tugs at his thoughts. He doesn't even remember it fully, but it sits under his skin.

It's a bitter, bitter reminder that Izuku will never be free. He'll never be truly happy. Not with who he is. It's hard to be happy when you've got a catalogue of sins and a host of terrors eating at your soul, preventing you from enjoying even the smallest amount of sleep.

Missy and Sushi join him in the living room, their intelligent eyes just watching as Izuku paces the floor. The television was supposed to distract him, but that doesn't seem to be working. His thoughts are still going a hundred miles per hour, each one darker than the last.

All for One is out there. Just waiting. And with every second that passes by with Izuku here, at this house, the more Yamada and Aizawa are being put in danger. Yamada, who is always nice to him even though he doesn't deserve it, and Aizawa, who is on patrol right now and incredibly vulnerable.

Fuck. Why did Izuku even bother trying to sleep? Aizawa could get hurt, or they could get attacked here, or this very apartment could explode suddenly. Izuku can't—he can't afford to sleep. He has to be ready.

His eyes land on the door, and he grits his teeth.

He could run. He might not get very far with how shaken up he is right now, especially since Aizawa is already on patrol and consequently has a higher chance of finding him, but he could do it.

Izuku could run. And oh, how tempting that is. His disappearance would save Yamada and Aizawa a lot of trouble.

And yet, he hesitates. He doesn't know what the best course of action is at the moment. What would he accomplish by running now? He just panicked over a fucking nightmare, which is about as childish as it gets. He's definitely not stable enough to go out tonight.

So maybe just not yet? Eventually he'll have to run, just not yet. Is that okay? Is this where he belongs right now?

Can he allow himself this?

He's been searching for a place to truly belong all his life, it seems. His cold, abandoned building was the closest thing he had to that, but now he's lost. He doesn't know where he belongs.

Izuku sits on the couch, head in his hands, and Missy leaps up after him with Sushi following close behind.

The television is still on, and it looks like it's playing some stupid old reality show now, but the boy doesn't pay any attention to it. He wouldn't be able to focus on it anyway with how muddled his brain is.

"I didn't take you for a fan of Keeping Up With The Kardashians, listener."

Izuku jumps, his eyes wide as he whips around to stare at Yamada's form hanging by the mouth of the hallway. How long has he been standing there? Long enough to see him contemplating going out the door? Izuku was so distracted that he didn't even sense him coming, much less sense standing there. Izuku tries to calm the rapid pounding of his heart and tries to search for an excuse, but all that comes out is: "Shouldn't you be asleep?"

He snaps his mouth shut immediately after the words leave his lips, wincing at his own bluntness, but Yamada fortunately doesn't look upset. The blond is in sleep clothes, sporting a black long-sleeved shirt and a pair of Midnight-themed sweatpants, looking almost as exhausted as Izuku is. He gives the boy a soft, knowing smile. "I could say the same to you," he teases, heading for the couch with a yawn.

Izuku's eyes catch on the bright pink socks the voice hero has on, and he finds himself briefly wishing that he had a pair like that of his own. They look soft.

Yamada rounds the corner of the couch and reaches for the remote, making Izuku realize he's probably in the way now. Does the voice hero come out here often to be by himself?

"Sorry, I'm just gonna go back to the guest—"

"You're fine, kiddo," Yamada says, waving him off and gesturing for him to stay on the couch. He heads for the kitchen after unmuting the television, flicking on the lights. "Hot chocolate?"

For a good few seconds, Izuku is speechless. He doesn't quite comprehend what the man just said, so it takes a bit to actually formulate a response. But Yamada doesn't rush him. He's patient, just humming a quiet tune under his breath as he gets the packets out and waits for Izuku's response.

And it's… comforting, knowing that he doesn't have to rush to collect his thoughts. That he doesn't have to pretend to be someone he's not right now. Izuku can just be himself, as flawed as that is, and he doesn't think Yamada will judge him for it.

It's too nice, which is why Izuku doesn't move from the couch even after his own mug of delicious hot chocolate with mini bunny marshmallows in it has been finished off.

Izuku doesn't move when they finish the first episode of that dumb reality show on TV, and he also doesn't move after the second and the third. By the fourth episode, Izuku and Yamada are covered in blankets and cats, giggling and cracking jokes with each other about the meme-worthy content being shown.

It takes a while, and Izuku doesn't even know exactly how it happens, but he calms down. His breathing evens out, his mind clears of all his previous thoughts, and he relaxes.

This isn't so bad, he thinks. This is okay. And besides, Yamada got his Movie Night after all, so it's a win-win for both sides.

It's only after another episode that Izuku manages to build up some courage. "Um, you don't have to answer this if you don't want to, but I just had a question?" He looks down at the cat in his lap as an excuse to not have to face the man. "Why are you still up?"

Do you have trouble sleeping, too? Did you also wake up from a nightmare?

"Sometimes it's hard to sleep when he's on patrol," Yamada says with a sad smile, not hesitating to answer even a little bit. "He's very capable, but that doesn't mean I won't worry. There are some terrible people out there. I'm sure you know that."

Izuku does know that. Very well, in fact.

And Yamada's response? It's not quite the same reason Izuku has, but it's close. The voice hero is a protector, too. He has to always be ready, always be the first to react and observe. So does this mean that Izuku's worrying is natural? That he's not as pathetic as he thinks he is? If Present Mic is having such similar thoughts all the time, then maybe Izuku isn't so weak after all. Maybe he's not as dumb and weird as he thought himself to be.

Though he doubts that. There must be some variable he's missing here. Yamada also wouldn't get upset about a stupid nightmare, either. Izuku is not even close to the same level as his teacher is.

"And what about you, kiddo? Do you want to share?"

Izuku stiffens, his first instinct telling him to say fuck no! But it would only be fair, right? Yamada opened up to him, so now he has to return the favor. Is that how things like this go? Izuku wouldn't know. "I, uh, I just can't sleep. It's the bed. It's too, it's too soft, I think?" He laughs nervously, realizing how dumb he sounds. "I don't know. It just feels like a—"

“A marshmallow?”

The boy blinks in mild surprise at the guess. At the accuracy of it. Yamada sounds like he’s speaking from experience. “Yeah,” Izuku whispers. “A marshmallow.”

And now that Yamada has said it, everything makes so much more sense. He sees it now and briefly wonders how he never put it together before. They're both similar, in a way. Always acting, always putting on a different face for different crowds—it’s altogether too obvious.

Yamada is exhausted by it all, and so is Izuku. Perhaps this is why Yamada is more of an introvert behind closed doors, where no one else can see him or recognize him. This is closer to who he really is—Yamada Hizashi: a fun and loving man with a too-fast brain, a caring personality, and a fierce passion for doing good. He’s still loud and carefree, just not as exaggerated as his TV figure portrays him to be.

This realization, this knowledge that Izuku isn’t alone in that necessity of his to act, is like a slap to the face. A comforting slap to the face. Izuku hangs onto every word the voice hero says when he starts talking about his favorite old American movies and baking shows, and the boy doesn’t even protest when Yamada jokingly starts to shift the conversation into cutting Izuku’s hair, because apparently it looks like a real bush now with how many chunks are burnt off. Izuku doesn’t mind getting a haircut. He needed one a long, long time ago.

Yamada goes on to talk about how Izuku’s classmates are trying to get him to slip up about his and Aizawa’s absence. They’re apparently scary and persistent when they want to be, and none of them have accepted his shitty excuses so far—especially Kacchan, which makes Izuku feel warm for a different reason. His best friend may have a little backstory to what’s happening now, but of course he’s still searching. Izuku never realized just how far his friends would go for him until now.

He really doesn’t deserve them.

And so they talk well into the night about dumb things that probably don’t mean anything to the random civilian but mean the world to Izuku. The fact that Yamada is here and listening to him is more than he ever would’ve expected or hoped for, so that might be why. The voice hero could talk about fucking quantum physics and Izuku would still listen to him for hours.

It's just easy to talk with him. His quirk has always felt so bubbly and welcoming. It makes him feel safe.

But Izuku's lack of sleep is starting to take a toll on him, and by the time the clock reads 1:30, the boy can barely keep his eyes open for longer than a few seconds.

An old Disney movie is playing now, the sounds of it a simple background noise to Izuku. The rest of the cats have emerged from their various hiding places in the house and joined together with them on the couch, their warmth making him feel even more comfortable.

If the hero beside him is a protector at heart, too, does that mean Izuku can let himself go? If only for a moment? Can he let his teacher do the worrying for him? It sounds selfish, but Izuku is just so exhausted. If he can just fall asleep and stay that way this time, maybe he won't need to be selfish again. It'll be a simple recharge. A quiet reprieve.

Can he have that?

"Yamada," he starts quietly, the traitorous words slipping between his lips before he can stop them. "I'm tired."

The hero doesn't tease or poke fun at him for the admission. Instead, he just gives another small smile, eyes crinkling near the edges as he looks down at him. Huh. Izuku doesn't remember moving so close to him. "You can let yourself sleep, kiddo. No one's going to hurt you here."

And is that true? Izuku feels like it is. He wants it to be. God, does he want it to be. But even with that thought at the forefront of his mind, he still can't help but hesitate, because what if? What if he's not safe here? He wasn't even safe in the comfort of his own home, so how can he be safe here—in an apartment that's not his? In a place where the clothes on his back don't belong to him?

The harsh reality of it all is that he doesn't deserve to be safe. What has Izuku done to grant himself that privilege? Nothing. He's just going to be condemned to fighting and running his entire life, and he can't even bring himself to be angry about it anymore.

Really, he shouldn't have been surprised when the bombs went off that night. His father never would've let him leave the country on his own. It was such a dumb, childish plan on Izuku's part, and look where he's at now because of it. His sort of hopeful naivety has struck back in the worst way.

But this can be different, though, can't it? This doesn't have to be like everything else. What would happen if he allows this moment of vulnerability now? What would happen if he admits to himself that maybe he is safe here, that maybe he can relax for just a moment or two and let an adult do the worrying for once?

Would allowing this lead to a bigger moment of vulnerability later on? Or will that happen anyway?

Izuku shivers despite the fluffy blankets and cats covering him. He doesn't like this uncertainty. He doesn't like not knowing. Everything has been too easy these past couple days, too kind. Nothing feels real anymore.

But Yamada has never hurt him before. He's always been this quiet, steady support for Izuku. With every laugh and shared cat picture and greasy Slim Jim at the laundromat, Izuku would feel himself get lighter.

Truly happier.

And right now that same feeling is settling over his skin; warm and sweet and comforting. Like hot chocolate in the snow.

This is okay, he decides. He can—he can allow this just once.

Besides, what's the worst that could truly happen? He's already lost so much. What more could he lose?

Izuku's head slowly drops onto the voice hero's shoulder, eyelids threatening to flutter shut, and Yamada doesn't hesitate in shifting a little to accommodate him. When he speaks, his voice is softer than Izuku's ever heard it before: "I'll be here when you wake up, listener. Get some rest, 'kay? You can rest now."

He won't leave? The thought is more comforting than it probably should be, and Izuku finds himself shuffling closer. This is okay. He won't leave. It's okay.

Yamada raises an arm, his hand coming down to rest lightly on Izuku's head as the boy shifts further into his side. The weight is a nice contrast to the floating feeling inside his chest.

Utterly spent, Izuku is too tired to even be embarrassed, but he feels lighter and better than he has in days. He shuts his eyes and hesitantly reaches up to grab at the hero's sweater, holding onto him like a child once he sinks a little lower into the couch.

"Yamada?" He mumbles, drifting already.

The blond hums, starting to gently card his fingers through verdant curls.

"About you and Aizawa. I actually figured it out another way."

"Oh, yeah?" Yamada muses. "How's that?"

"It's the way you talk to each other when you think no one is listening."

The hand pauses briefly. "And which way is that?"

Izuku tucks his face into his side and yawns against him, an overwhelming sense of warmth and safety tugging him into sleep.

"Like you've loved each other for a long time."

The void welcomes him in, and for the first time in a long, long while, Izuku falls asleep and doesn't wake up trembling.

Hizashi wakes to the sound of keys turning in the door lock.

His eyes snap open, muscles tensing and arm instinctively curling tighter around the boy in his side—but then his husband steps through the doorway a moment later and he relaxes.

It must still be late if Shouta's just now getting home. Well, early would be a more appropriate term depending on what kind of person you are.

The television is still on and, by the looks of it, playing another Disney classic. If Hizashi's memory serves him correctly, this one is Mulan. He must have turned the volume down sometime before falling asleep, though, as he can barely hear it now. The sound is a mere white noise in the background, and the light from the screen casts a faint glow in the otherwise pitch-black room.

"You're still up?" Shouta asks quietly, shutting the door gently behind him. He looks surprised that Hizashi still has his hearing aids in—the voice hero forgot to take them out before going to sleep. Midoriya's presence pushed him out of his normal routine, it seems. Though that's not a bad thing.

Not a bad thing at all.

Shouta takes off his capture weapon and hangs it up on the wall, his mouth making a little o-shape once he sees the second, much smaller figure curled up next to his husband. He frowns and pads closer after slipping out of his boots, neon cat socks sliding over the hardwood floor. "Is he alright?"

Hizashi hums something in affirmation, making sure to keep his voice quiet so as not to wake him. "He was sitting out here a few hours after you left." He tilts his head and resumes carding his fingers through Midoriya's hair. "Turns out that watching the Kardashians yell at each other over family drama is a good way to get him to sleep."

The black-haired man lets out a fond huff and moves closer, peering down at the pair from behind the couch. He doesn't look to have any cuts or bruises on him from patrol, Hizashi notes, so he leaves it be for now. "Want me to carry him to his room? Sleeping on the couch is going to kill your back, you know."

Well, according to Hizashi's phone it's only been a couple of hours since they both fell asleep. There's not much time left before the sun comes up, so why bother going through all that?

Hizashi shakes his head. "You might wake him up, and just look at him. He looks like he needs all the sleep he can get, Sho."

Shouta does look, dark eyes settling on the face half-hidden in Hizashi's side, a few freckles just visible for them to see. He looks smaller, Hizashi decides when he looks at Midoriya as well. More peaceful.

He hasn't seen the kid look this carefree since, well, ever. Not even at school, where he's supposed to be safe and surrounded by pro-heroes. He always looks apprehensive and on edge, as if waiting for the other shoe to drop. Waiting for the blow to land. And who's dealing the blow, Hizashi isn't sure. Maybe to Midoriya, it's everyone.

No. He's not gonna move him or leave him here. He told the kid he'd stay with him, so he's going to do just that.

"I'll stay out here tonight," he whispers, readjusting the blanket so it goes back up over the listener's shoulders. "You can go to bed without me. Did you eat?"

Shouta nods and mutters something about getting a burger along the way, which isn't a surprise. He normally does that on nights where his patrol goes on a bit later than usual.

"And fine," Shouta adds, "stay out here if you want. But you better not complain about your back hurting in the morning."

He's obviously joking, but Hizashi teases him anyway. "I'd never."

Shouta leans over the back of the couch to press a quick kiss to his cheek in retaliation. "You're a softie," he grumbles, but Hizashi can hear the warmth in his voice clear as day when he pulls away.

"And you're not?" He shoots back.

Shouta grins with all his teeth, eyebrows raised. “Never.”

Hizashi has to stifle his laugh so he doesn’t accidentally wake the kid next to him, and he smiles smugly to himself when Shouta reaches down to pat Midoriya’s head once before making for the hallway.

Uh-huh. Definitely not a softie, hm?

Whatever. He can deny it all he wants. If his husband didn’t want the kid to be here, he wouldn't be. It sounds harsh, but that’s the reality of it.

Hizashi props his legs up on the coffee table, getting more comfortable. Midoriya shifts a little, pressing further into his side, and the voice hero inwardly coos. There are only a few hours left till he has to get up for work, and his back is going to hate him in the morning, but honestly it’s whatever.

He’ll bear it for the kiddo. He knows Midoriya definitely needs the rest.

When Izuku wakes up, he’s curled up on the couch, a thick blanket thrown over him and protecting him from the chill hanging in the apartment.

The first thing he hears is something sizzling in the kitchen, and his stomach gives a lurch when he smells bacon.

Is he… in the living room? How did he get here? Why isn’t he in the guest room like he’d usually be? Izuku doesn’t know off the top of his head. He just remembers not being able to go back to sleep last night after that nightmare, and having to come out here afterwards for a few minutes to clear his head. He remembers looking at the door and contemplating, and then he remembers seeing Yamada—

Oh. Oh.

He jolts up, the blanket flying off his shoulders, and it’s almost comical how fast his cheeks turn red. Did he—did he sleep on Yamada? Again?

Izuku is going to die. Maybe not right now, but later he's just going to curl up and die from embarrassment. He's so stupid. How did it even get to that? Izuku has always tried to distance himself from dumb emotions. And leaning on Yamada for the second time while he finally gets some sleep? It's pathetic!

"Mornin', kiddo!"

He does not nearly fall off the couch in his panic, thank you very much. Izuku has much more grace than that.

His head snaps up, eyes widening upon seeing Yamada sitting on the loveseat diagonal to the couch. He looks to be putting on his shoes for work, as he's already got his hero costume on and his hair gelled up. Just how long has he been sitting there? Izuku hadn't even thought to check his senses before now.

He didn't feel the need to, in all honestly. He felt safe. He still does, in fact.

"Sho's making breakfast today since I gotta go in early for a meeting," Yamada tells him. "You gonna be okay?"

Izuku would probably question what he meant by that last part if he wasn't still frozen in place. He's still staring at him as if he's seen a ghost, because does Yamada not—does he just not care? That Izuku literally slept on his arm again and probably stopped him from going to sleep himself? Fuck. Izuku is, for the fiftieth time, a damn fool.

Yamada frowns. "Is there something on my face?"

The green-haired boy opens his mouth but nothing comes out, and he only looks away when he suddenly remembers that staring is rude. He brings his knees up to his chest and shakes his head, eyes trained on the two cats curled up on the other end of the couch.

Is he not upset? He didn't seem upset that night at the laundromat, either, and that time was arguably worse since Izuku wasn't as close to Yamada then as he is now.

But that doesn't make this time right. So why is Yamada acting like it doesn't matter?

The voice hero leaves within the next fifteen minutes, promising to bring Izuku back an English book that he's assigning the class to read, and the entire time he doesn't say a word about what happened.

So does that mean it's really not a big deal?

Izuku starts to pace the house after eating some of the breakfast Aizawa made. It turns out that the man actually does know how to cook almost everything, he just chooses not to. And honestly? That's a mood.

Maybe he's overthinking things. Maybe he's making a big deal out of nothing. If Yamada truly had a problem with it he would've said something, or better yet stopped it from happening entirely. He didn't seem upset about it when Izuku woke up, but at the same time he could just be avoiding it to be polite.

Christ. Izuku hates this. He hates this uncertainty. Everything was going okay, but then Izuku just had to fuck it all up.

He has to distract himself. He has to do something, even if that something is thinking of random stuff that will make him fall further into his abyss of a mind.

Izuku huffs in frustration and scratches at the small scar on his jaw, muttering odd facts he's learned from Tsukauchi to himself. "Dumplings imply the existence of one large dumple."

Aizawa snorts from his place at the table, making Izuku blink in surprise. "That's nice, kid."

Dammit. Now he looks weird. That's not necessarily a bad thing, though, as this is just Aizawa. That man knows a lot about him, probably even more so than he even lets on, so Izuku isn't worried about acting like a fool in front of him. If it were Yamada, on the other hand, Izuku might be a little more worried and try to curb his unusualness.

But still. He's going to go insane if he just stands around for the fourth day in the row. This has to be bad for his health, he thinks, as he's a growing teenager. Shouldn't he be out robbing rich people and acting suspicious? Or maybe that's just Izuku in general, not so much other kids his age.

Maybe he should ask Aizawa again if he can go out. His question might not be well-received, but he should still try.

He stops his pacing and glances at the dining table. Sure enough, the underground hero is still sitting there, as he has been for the majority of the week. It's almost annoying how much he's there, even though it's not really his fault. He's always working, and Izuku understands that.

He slides into the opposite chair, ignoring Aizawa's suspicious glance as he picks up the textbook on the table and starts fiddling with it. Perhaps he should've figured out how to sweet-talk him before coming over here. Would Aizawa even believe him if Izuku started complimenting his hero work? Probably not.

Izuku clears his throat after a few minutes, voice coming out dry. "Aizawa, can I—?"

"No."

"What?" Izuku starts, dropping the textbook. It hits the table with a loud thump, but Izuku doesn't pay it any mind. He glares at Aizawa, who's currently staring into his laptop, typing away on the keyboard. "You don't even know what I was about to say!"

"I do know," he says. He doesn't bother looking at Izuku, not even as he speaks to him. "You were going to ask the same thing you've been asking this whole week, and the answer is still no."

Izuku creases his face, slamming his back against the dining room chair and digging his toes into the ground beneath him. Having spent the past few years living on his own, he isn't familiar with hearing the word no, so he doesn't appreciate hearing it from Aizawa.

It's not like Izuku has had to fight similar battles with his own father his whole childhood or anything. No, not at all.

The way his teacher is talking to him is insulting. It makes Izuku want to hack his ears off with an axe. Makes him want to throw an axe at him.

Aizawa and his stupid rules and fake concern for his safety makes him want to leap out the window just to prove to Aizawa he can survive the fall. He's healed, dammit! He's fine. His building being burned down doesn't suddenly make him incapable of being able to walk around the streets for an hour or two.

The man is lucky Izuku hasn't just said fuck it and tried to walk straight out the door yet. That's getting all the more tempting with each passing hour, actually. Would Aizawa fight him on it? Would he go so far as to try and physically stop him? Izuku doesn't know, which is why he kind of needs to find out.

But he hasn't found out yet. He hasn't tried to really run from the couple, and he also hasn't caused too much chaos during his stay here. No, he's done something worse: he's been good.

"That's a load of shit!" Izuku snaps, finally getting Aizawa's attention. The Erasure hero looks up from his laptop, but his expression remains dull, bored, and unimpressed.

"Watch it," he tells him flatly, pausing in his typing. "I told you not to cuss when the cats are around. They might get ideas."

Izuku crosses his arms and deepens his glare. Aizawa just stares back at him, blank-faced and calm, making Izuku slam his toes against the tile with even more resolve.

Jailor.

"Why can't I just go for a walk?" Izuku asks, cringing at his own voice, at the way it sounds like a whine.

That's part of the bullshit. That Aizawa makes him sound and feel like a child throwing a tantrum, when Izuku is actually fifteen—and an old fifteen at that. He's been taking care of himself before most kids knew how to pour milk into their cereal bowls.

He doesn't need Aizawa looking after him, which is exactly what he claims to be doing each time he tells him that dreaded word.

"Because you'll run the moment you step outside," his teacher says casually.

Well now that you said that I just fucking might.

"I won't. I just want to go out for a few minutes, I promise! I'm not gonna—"

"I said no, so drop it."

Izuku grits his teeth, stopping a few choice words from escaping his lips. Starting a fight won't get him any brownie points. "What if you go with me?"

Aizawa stares at him. Looks at him like he's stupid, and for a brief couple of seconds, Izuku wonders if Aizawa is as frustrated as he is, until he shoves the thought away. Aizawa is the jailor here. He doesn't have a right to be frustrated.

"What if Yamada goes with me?"

That would be better than having to deal with your stupid face. Yamada doesn't treat me like a toddler at least.

Aizawa lets out a breath and runs a hand down his face. For a moment Izuku thinks he's going to snap at him, and his heart-rate skyrockets at the thought, palms becoming clammy. But then the man softens his expression, or at least tries to. Izuku gives him an F+ for effort.

"Listen," the hero starts, sounding entirely done with the conversation. "It's been a rough few days for you. I get it. You're unhappy. But you know why I'm not allowed to let you out in public right now, so deal with it until I figure out a way to fix this."

Fix this. As if there's anything to fix at all. Izuku isn't a vase that needs to be taped back together, thanks, and this situation may be trashy for both parties, but it's still okay. There's no reason for anything right now to change, except maybe Izuku's own lack of freedom. But once he's better he's going to leave for good. So why is Aizawa acting like this is supposed to be something more permanent?

"I can take care of myself," Izuku scoffs. He kicks at a table leg with a foot. "If someone decides to come after me again I'll be fine. I don't need a bodyguard."

Aizawa hums and goes back to his typing. "So nearly kicking the bucket the other day and getting a pipe stuck in your side is taking care of yourself?"

The silence that follows is heavy, and Izuku snaps his jaw shut. Oh.

One for All jolts under his skin, as if pissed on his behalf. The man is right, but perhaps it was just a little harsh. At the same time, though, Izuku has always appreciated that brutal honesty of his. This time is no different.

But still, now Izuku can taste the ash in his throat from that night, can hear the ringing in his ears from when he'd desperately tried to hang onto those last threads of consciousness. He remembers the scalding heat coming closer and closer and being unable to move away to save himself.

Of course Aizawa would use that against him. He's the one who found him, after all. He found him in more ways than one.

"That's unfair," Izuku says quietly, looking away.

He gets a sigh in response. "Life is unfair."

And it's such a parent thing to say that Izuku suddenly feels that much more tempted to throw the textbook at him. No, his laptop would be a better target. Damaging that thing, or at least aiming to do so, is a definite death-wish. But even being murdered by a pro hero is better than sitting around and being bored.

"Doesn't mean you have to be," Izuku mutters.

Aizawa just goes back to ignoring him in favor of whatever's so important on his laptop, and Izuku looks out the window, quietly seething. Freedom is so close, just separated by a thin sheet of glass and one Eraserhead, whom he's only been able to escape from a couple of times.

Maybe it isn't so close after all. Just looks that way, like some sort of cruel illusion.

He gets up and goes to the kitchen when the clacking of Aizawa's keyboard becomes too much for him. With nothing better to do, Izuku starts to mess with the microwave. He's taken apart one of these before just to see what the inside looked like, so he knows he could do it again now. It wouldn't be too difficult to put it back together.

And what if he could strengthen it somehow? That sounds like the most fun he could ever have at the moment.

The toaster seems like a better idea, though. Simple yet complex. Izuku could figure out how to install a screen into it if he had the right parts on hand.

Ooh! Maybe he could work on a new AI and base it off AINA—kind of like a rebirth.

He's in the middle of writing his ideas down in his notebook, the pencil that Yamada had given him scratching away against the paper, when he feels his throat itch. He coughs, and he's only a little surprised when he pulls back to see red dots splattered on his arm.

The meds from the hospital aren't helping him where he actually needs the help. He's been getting used to them, so the symptoms of his sickness are coming back, and they're coming back hard. He needs his pills; the ones from his doctor at the Club. His remaining bottles became lost in the fire that night, so he doesn't have any left. The prescriptions from the hospital helps with his other issues, sure, but they're not doing much of anything about the hemoptysis.

And his ring isn't doing anything now either. It seems to only take the edge off since he's gotten used to it, which is exactly what All Might told him would happen, albeit for an entirely different circumstance.

Izuku feels queasy all of a sudden, a sharp wave of nausea overcoming him. If his ring is only helping to limit the power of his quirks now, what does he even need it for? He needs to practice with One for All if that's going to be the case from now on. He hasn't made any progress in trying to up the percentage he can use without the ring, which is frankly disappointing. He still doesn't have a good grip on One for All.

You're a cheater. Using a stupid suppressor to do all the work for you and mitigate all the damage. All Might didn't have to do that.

Izuku grinds his teeth, expression souring as he slides off his ring and swallows back the influx of copper at the back of his throat. He hasn't even called upon One for All lately, as he hasn't had much of a reason to, so that's the first step if he wants to improve it.

He powers up, and the red sparks that dance across his skin feel familiar and comforting. The slight heat the quirk gives off warms his body like a fluffy blanket, and he nearly sighs with relief.

If he can keep it going and just refrain from actually using it, perhaps that'll help in the long run. Lengthening his endurance is key, especially if he's going to try and focus his energy into one part of his body again. After he does that he can try messing with the percentage.

He honestly should've been doing this weeks ago, but the ring was just so easy to rely on. It was a simple and effective solution, and it seems now that the attack on him was the wake up call he needed.

"You've never told me the details of your quirk," Aizawa prompts, coming up behind him.

Izuku isn't surprised, as he'd heard his footsteps. His first thought is shouldn't you be working, but he bites his tongue. That would sound childish, and Izuku is anything but.

“It’s just a strength enhancer,” he grumbles, turning away. He has to be careful about how he words this. Aizawa is something of a walking lie detector himself. “It takes a lot of energy, so sometimes it’s hard to control. Hence this.”

He gestures vaguely with his sparking arms, and Aizawa hums, dipping his head as he takes a sip of his coffee. “You know, Hizashi had the same problem with his quirk.”

That’s the first time he’s referred to Yamada by his first name around me. He usually uses Mic, like he does at school.

He frowns. “How? I know it was difficult to control it, but he never told me much else.”

Now, what does surprise Izuku is when Aizawa actually sets down his mug and starts to answer his question in-depth. Apparently Yamada couldn’t figure out how to control the volume of his quirk, even when just speaking normally, so there were many occasions of him accidentally screaming in a classmate’s ear and causing a public disturbance.

Like Aizawa said, it’s kind of similar to Izuku’s situation with how he can’t quite get a grip on the higher, more difficult percentages without losing control. But since Aizawa has known Yamada for a portion of his life and did end up graduating alongside him, perhaps he knows how the blond fixed that issue. Perhaps he could help Izuku with his own problem seeing as the situations are so similar.

And for the next half hour, Aizawa does just that.

He stands right beside him in the kitchen and works him through the steps and exercises that Yamada did to get used to his quirk’s energy and potential. He gives Izuku plenty of analogies and ideas on how to master his control, and the boy is satisfied when, by the end of it, he can successfully charge up a little over twenty percent in his arm without the help of his ring—and without breaking anything!

Izuku is so stoked and eager to learn that he forgets about how upset he was at the man just a little bit before now.

But he’s reminded of why he really should be just a few hours later, when he’s sitting on the couch and playing with the cats, minding his own business up until Aizawa comes back from his sudden departure to his room with a tablet in hand.

He gives it to Izuku, who blinks at the words already on the screen. “Um, what is this?”

“It’s a test of measurement,” Aizawa deadpans, just reading the title off the tablet itself. “Principal Nezu wants you to take it.”

And that’s all he says before walking back to his seat at the dining table. He pulls out a few files from the stack in front of him and puts on his glasses once again, becoming oblivious to the world outside his work.

It’s an IQ test, Izuku figures. That much is obvious. The first question is a simple one that asks him to identify the patterns between the pictures, and it’s almost laughably easy.

But Izuku doesn’t answer it immediately. He doesn’t want to do this at all simply because it’s Nezu who wants him to. The principal of UA is a rat, there’s no doubt about it, and Izuku will be damned if he’ll let a damn bastard rat know his intelligence and capabilities—no matter how curious the boy is himself about what his score would be.

He’s never taken an IQ test before, but he certainly doesn’t want to do it on Nezu’s terms. He has no doubt that the rat is involved in this entire situation somehow.

But Izuku doesn’t complain or outright refuse to do the test yet. That would be a pointless argument with Aizawa at this very moment. He begins to do it with little defiance, a manic grin on his face now.

He knows just the thing that’ll piss the rat off the most.

The test itself is interesting, and honestly Izuku kind of enjoys completing it. After only an hour later Izuku is handing the tablet back over to Aizawa, shrugging at the raised brow he gets in response.

“That was fast,” he says gruffly, almost suspiciously, and Izuku just chuckles to himself as he walks back over to the couch to resume playing with the cats.

Sue him, this is the most fun he’s had in weeks.

Izuku tries very hard not to smile when Aizawa says his name in that specific tone of his just another hour later. Ah, Nezu must’ve already gotten the results and forwarded them back to the underground hero, which is why Aizawa sounds incredibly irritated.

“Yes?” Izuku says sweetly, the epitome of innocence.

“Why did you do this?”

It’s pretty fucking obvious what he’s referring to, but Izuku feels like being a little shit all of a sudden, so he just frowns, tilting his head at him. “Sorry, I don’t know what you’re talking about?”

“This.” He holds up the tablet in his hand and zooms in on the screen, showing a large table and graph that has a ton of different categories. When Izuku still doesn’t say anything, he huffs. “You failed the test, kid.”

Interesting, the boy thinks.

“I thought it was a test of measurement. You can’t fail something like that,” Izuku points out.

“You can fail it when you get every single question wrong. Even this one.” He swipes the screen a few times, coming back to the first one Izuku had answered. “This is elementary school level, Midoriya. A five-year-old could have gotten this one right.”

Izuku shakes his head in mock shame. “In my defense, I’m having an off day today. And besides, I think that was actually the hardest question out of the entire test, so it’s a little rude to imply that I’m stupid for not knowing it.”

“Oh, fucking hell,” Aizawa mutters to himself, obviously wishing he had gone to work today after all.

“Hey! That’s a bad word! The cats might get ideas.”

Aizawa folds his arms over his chest and stares down at him, lips pressed in a thin line. “Why, kid? Just why?”

Izuku flushes at the calculating look being leveled at him. Izuku’s reason is stupid but one hundred percent reasonable, so the hero has no right to be staring at him like this. “Intelligence can’t be accurately quantified. It would’ve been a waste of time.”

“Midoriya.”

“Okay!” Izuku says harshly, turning away with an annoyed expression.

“I just don’t want Principal Nezu to know what my scores are. He shouldn’t know them.”

There’s a beat of silence, and then Aizawa sighs, this time much softer. “Okay. Why don’t you want him to know?”

Is being a rat enough reason?

He doesn’t say this, though, as he doubts Aizawa would be very happy with that answer. “He already knows too much. He—he’s probably the reason I’m here right now anyway.”

Aizawa doesn’t answer right away, his thoughtful eyes still roaming over Izuku’s face, which tells the boy all he needs to know.

After a few moments, the man unfolds his arms and starts to tap away again on the tablet, handing it back to Izuku wordlessly. He must see the question on the tip of Izuku’s tongue, for he explains without being prompted. “It’s a fresh test, and before you complain, I have an offer.”

Offer? Izuku’s stomach gives a painful jolt. Offers made by adults usually give way to nothing good.

The hero waits until he has Izuku’s full attention before continuing. “If you do this test honestly this time, to the best of your ability, kid, I’ll take you out on patrol next Friday.”

Izuku blinks, the words not registering at first. He’ll take him out on patrol? As in, Rabbit and Eraserhead?

Aizawa nods sharply, as if knowing exactly what he’s thinking. “I promise. Do the test and I’ll find a way to convince Nezu to let you go out as Rabbit with me.”

Oh yes. It won’t be hard to convince the rat that, Izuku thinks. Perhaps the principal wanted this to happen. His past research on the mammal would support this claim.

“Yes!” Izuku says hurriedly, eyes wide and sparkling with a light that wasn’t there before. “I’ll do it!”

This seems to surprise Aizawa just a little bit, as the man just stands there for a few seconds before letting out a relieved breath, reaching forward to pat Izuku’s head twice before going back to his work.

Izuku is still reeling from the contact even when the hero sits back down.

Maybe a little test isn't so bad if it means he can go out as Rabbit. Next Friday is a little over a week away. It's a long wait, and Izuku honestly didn't think he would even be here for that long, but it's something.

As Izuku starts to work his way through the test yet again, this time a little slower so he can double and triple check his answers, Aizawa moves to the kitchen to get a snack. It's been hours since breakfast, and neither of them have had lunch yet.

"Hey, kid," Aizawa calls, "did you eat the last jelly pack?"

And Izuku doesn't know why exactly he does it, but he panics at the question. Both Yamada and Aizawa have stated multiple times that he can eat anything he wants here, that he doesn't have to ask permission. Izuku knows all this, so he'd eaten the last one in the box sometime just after breakfast.

He knew it was Aizawa's, but he just—he thought it would be okay. He thought they wouldn't even notice. Or at least wouldn't care that much.

Aizawa doesn't sound angry. He sounds more like he just wants an answer, but Izuku can't help it.

"No!" He blurts out, the tablet case cracking in his grip. He releases it immediately before he can accidentally break it.

His teacher gives him a blank look and slowly closes the fridge door. "Midoriya, I don't care if you did. It's not a big—"

"I didn't!" Izuku says, more defensive this time. "I swear I didn't!"

He winces even as he says it. He hates himself for lying, but what's the alternative? Telling the truth? Admitting that he did take it despite his gut having warned against doing so? Aizawa might be upset with him if he tells him that. But it doesn't look like that matters now, as Izuku can't seem to be able to fucking lie all of a sudden.

It's not like Aizawa can't see right through him.

So stupid. Why am I so pathetic? It's just—it's just a jelly pouch.

“Okay,” Aizawa says after a short pause, voice reassuring even though it’s obvious he doesn’t believe the lie. “I was just wondering.”

And Izuku understands why he asked the question, of course. The man needs to know when things run out so he knows when to go out and buy them again, but it’s just the principle of it.

But lying to Aizawa over a jelly pouch? Of all things? Great. That’s just fantastic; just another tally to add onto his long list of mistakes.

His ears burn, and he stares down hard at the tablet screen. He wants to apologize. He wants to take it back and say I was just kidding, it actually was me, haha, that was so stupid, but now it would just be awkward.

So he ignores the tense silence that he caused and goes back to working on the test, wondering how much he’d have to pay the devil to just drag him under the earth right then and make him disappear.

It’s annoying, Katsuki thinks, how people don’t like to tell him things. It’s annoying how they keep him in the dark, especially in those circumstances where he should be the first to know about said things.

But what’s even more annoying is when he’s only told the bare minimum—and not even to his damn face, either. Katsuki has been informed of plenty of important circumstances and events through text and voicemail, which is kind of sickening.

How much effort does it take to just suck it up and tell someone the truth in person? It’s not like Katsuki would kill someone for no reason.

Well. This time might be different, but still.

He has to admit that he’s never had to deal with someone writing him an update on their health in the form of a crumpled up, obviously half-assed note.

Yeah, that's right. A fucking note.

When Katsuki was given the small slip from his dumb cockatoo of a teacher on the second day back, he had a hard time restraining himself from setting it on fire immediately after reading it. He's still very much tempted to blow it up, even after having a couple of days to cool down, but he manages to hold back. He knows it's important.

But that doesn't change what it is, and consequently what it represents. His not-friend can go fucking fuck himself. A damn note, really? It's better than nothing, sure, but still. Izuku didn't even explain anything in the message. It was more of a drunken ramble than anything.

The first line was literally: to my dear Kacchan.

And what the actual hell? Izuku missed a whole day of school without warning him beforehand, making Katsuki nearly have an inner meltdown during school on Monday, and then had the audacity to write him a fun little note? As if nothing was wrong?

He's gonna kill him. Katsuki is going to strangle him the next time he sees him, which will apparently be the start of next week. He's going to destroy him.

Izuku promised to explain exactly what happened to him soon, saying that he can't say anything too specific on the note because he's not in the clear yet. Whatever that means, it isn't good. Not with who might be monitoring him now, that is, and it's pretty obvious who that someone is.

He's waiting to talk with him face-to-face because it's safer that way, and also because he apparently doesn't have a phone anymore.

That's all Izuku had put in the note, and it left Katsuki seething. He can't write back, obviously, as that might jeopardize his friend's situation, so it's frustrating. It's also frustrating when the other idiots in class ask him if Izuku's alright, because apparently everyone knows that he's the closest to the missing boy.

Which just pisses him off even further, not only because Katsuki doesn't know, but also because they have no right to pry. Their questions usually lead to him yelling I wouldn't tell you even if I did, so fuck off! at them, which always earns himself a disappointed sigh from Present Mic for not at least saying it in English.

Katsuki is suddenly reminded of the Sports Festival and how he'd had his own quirk used against him. He remembers Izuku's palm on his skin, and then the feeling that he was dying. It only lasted a few seconds, but Katsuki knows exactly what happened during the last moments of their fight. It was that forced activation quirk, he's pretty sure. His control had been taken from him in that instant, and the resulting panic because of that made his subconscious ignite every part of his body by accident.

It's honestly a wonder he didn't die then.

He didn't want to accept first place. Izuku wasn't at his full potential even from the very start of the festival. He never is with how much he holds back. But Katsuki had taken it only because he knew Izuku would whine about it.

Katsuki remembers glancing at him when All Might was putting the medal over his head. He remembers seeing something in that sad expression of his. He looked at his friend and didn't see what he would normally see. The faint flicker that was always ever present in his eyes had disappeared. The kindness in them remained, but it was different somehow.

That look on Izuku's face was hauntingly familiar, and it sent shivers up Katsuki's spine. It was a look of guilt. A look of never-ending regret and apprehension.

He was going to leave then, wasn't he? That was the universal look of fight-or-flight, and Katsuki knows Izuku is more of a runner than a fighter when he isn't sure how things will work out.

And that's the thing. His friend is slipping away from him more and more with each passing day, and he doesn't understand why. He thought UA would make him happier. He thought things would be different, as naive as it sounds. Better.

But it seems that Izuku is just getting worse. He's going backwards. All of that progress Katsuki has tried to make with him, all of that steady build up—it's being torn down right now. He can feel it just by the tone of the note. The USJ attack must've been one of the blows to start this spiral.

He can still remember how it felt to carry his unconscious friend out of the shattered entrance of the training facility, black and red blood dripping onto his boots as he carried him to the medics. He can still remember how cold the raw panic coursing through him felt when he saw Izuku's state.

And Katsuki hasn't been the world's greatest friend. He knows that; the world knows that. But wherever his friend is right now, he hopes it'll help him. He hopes it won't be the breaking point.

The note was written in a code that Katsuki had honestly forgotten about. That familiar rushed yet neat handwriting, that code that they had both used when they were little, back from before—it hurts. It's a painful reminder of how much Katsuki has failed.

The blond boy walks down the dark streets, the black clouds above promising rain and despair. School just got out, and he shouldn't be alone right now. Izuku should be right there with him, walking home with him just because he feels like it, but he's not.

This may not be the green-haired boy's fault, but the principle remains. Izuku has been keeping Katsuki from being close to him lately, even though the explosive teen just wants to make sure he's fine. It—it feels like they're nearing the end of it.

God, Katsuki doesn't want that to be true. He doesn't want to lose his best friend. He's been showing Izuku everything that's bright, and every time he would ask about his health the boy would respond with I'm fine, Kacchan, really! You should worry about yourself first!

And he is, really. Katsuki is being so stupidly selfish towards him, because he doesn't want Izuku to be okay just for the boy's well-being, he wants him to be okay for himself. Izuku has to be okay because Katsuki still needs him. He can't lose him. Not yet, and not ever.

Don't let me go. I can't handle losing you again.

His phone buzzes in his pocket, and his heart leaps in his throat. It turns out to just be a text from the hag, asking him what he wants for dinner. He stares at it for another few moments before leaving his mother on read.

It's Thursday, meaning Izuku will miss their regularly scheduled dinner completely instead of being fashionably late like all the other times. This fact is like a sledgehammer to the knees.

He gets another ping, this one being from the news outlet he follows. It's just another update on the attack the other day. The same keywords are there, and they make Katsuki scowl.

Stain. Ingenium. Paralyzed. Near-death.

Hero killer.

Katsuki looks up at the sky before arriving at his house, knowing that somewhere, wherever the damn hobo ninja is keeping him, Izuku might be looking up at it as well.

He hopes his friend isn't as lonely as he surely feels.

The fifth day starts out as the best day yet.

Izuku sasses at Aizawa every second he can spare, and the man responds back in kind every time. The friendly banter is something simple and familiar that Izuku can focus on, because if Aizawa isn't actually getting upset that means that everything's okay. They're okay. He's not as pissed at the man as before, but he's still itching to leave.

It's okay, but only for a while. Honestly, he should've known something like this would happen.

Sometimes fate does swing in his favor, but he knows that this particular event will still bite him in the ass somehow, as nothing is ever solely good for him.

And it's an accident, the way it happens. Really, Izuku wasn't supposed to find out, but alas. Some things just happen for a reason.

Izuku is messing with the papers spread out on the dining room table just to annoy Aizawa a little bit and fulfill his daily quota, and he eventually makes the man give in and hand him the tablet from the day before, being told to shoo.

A fair trade, if Izuku says so himself. That's the most freedom he's been given so far, so that isn't the problem.

The problem is that Missy must've been watching him mess with the papers and be an overall pain in the ass, as it's when Izuku is about to send an ominous message to Principal Nezu from Aizawa's email (just to see how he'll respond) that Missy starts messing with the folders on the table as well. Aizawa looks to have gone into the kitchen for something, so Izuku tuts at her—but only because she looks to be going for the laptop.

Yamada isn't here to help either, as he had to go in to work at the studio. He won't be back until late.

In a flurry of black and white, Missy swishes her tail and leaps back off the table, sending all the papers and folders fluttering to the floor.

Izuku immediately curses to himself and gets to his feet to pick it all up. Normally he wouldn't help with something like this, but Missy is his cat. She acts just like Izuku sometimes, so it's only fair he helps out. He knows people can barely handle one of him, so another?

Aizawa approaches quickly from the kitchen as Izuku crouches down and stacks the papers. "Hey, kid, don't—"

But his warning comes too late. Izuku picks up one of the documents and turns it over, only to find out that it's actually a picture—and a gory one at that. He freezes, blood turning to ice.

The photo shows a person dressed up in all gray, eyes wide and milky as they lay, without life, on the roof of a building somewhere. The camera angle clearly shows the huge slice across the figure's stomach and abdomen, and Izuku gets the sudden urge to throw up when he spots some organs and intestines halfway out of the body.

Holy… what the fuck is this?

He quickly picks up another one, heart pounding loudly in his ears. This photo shows something similar, but this time the slice goes diagonal across the chest and stops at the hip. There's another cut right around the throat, and that one looks a little deeper, which means—

This person must've drowned in their own blood.

Izuku's eyes travel lower, and he lets out a silent gasp. The paper has a caption that reads Image: 13/24.

This is only one of twenty-four? But that's how many were… that's how...

He sees Aizawa moving towards him at the last second, but he's still not fast enough to dodge the hands of the underground hero. The papers are snatched out of his grip, as if that could erase what Izuku's already seen.

No, the damage has already been done.

"What was that?" Izuku asks. He feels cold all of a sudden. Numb.

Aizawa sounds annoyed. Flustered, almost, which never happens. "That was confidential, Midoriya. You can't just touch—"

"Twenty-four," he repeats, his voice a shocked whisper when he cuts Aizawa off. "That paper said there's twenty-four of these in total. Twenty-four bodies. Are those… are those the people that attacked me?" Izuku gets more urgent at the lack of an immediate reply. He realizes that it's a far stretch, that the number 24 can mean anything, really, but he just can't see any other possible alternative. It would make sense. Too much sense. The pictures he saw showed the bodies on top of a roof—Izuku has been on enough to recognize the kind of gravel and concrete they were on.

So they were obviously on a building before they died. No, before they were…

"Were they murdered?"

Izuku can't even hear Aizawa's reply, as his mind is currently screaming at him now. Fuck. He thought they disappeared. He thought they were warped out of there, not whatever this is!

Their quirks were flickering out because they were dying, not being teleported away. They were being brutally murdered at the same time that Izuku was trying to fight for his life. The mere thought has him teetering on his feet.

"Kid." Aizawa reaches for him again, but Izuku jerks away.

"No! Why did you—?" His voice cracks, and he tells himself it's just because of his body recovering and not because of the reality being dropped around him. "Why didn't you tell me this? I—I said I was going to see where they went! And you—you just looked at me. And you… you knew…"

Did you not trust me enough for that? What did you think I was going to do?

“Hey, calm down. It wasn’t the right time. I was waiting until—”

“Until what?” Izuku asks, bordering on hysterics now. The dining room is too sharp, too real. His head feels like someone is taking a hammer to it. Like his insides are being cracked open and put on display for everyone to see. “It’s been almost a week since then! Have you known about this the entire time?”

But even as Izuku asks this, he thinks he already knows the answer. Aizawa saved him that night. There’s a high chance he would’ve seen those bodies if he went in from the top of the building.

So he must've been the first to know.

Izuku can tell just by the man’s grimace that his thinking is correct, and that’s—that’s scary. He doesn’t even know what to say right now, and the fact that Aizawa isn’t saying anything either makes him want to scream.

The boy shakes his head vigorously, as if to clear his mind, and picks up Missy and the discarded tablet almost as an afterthought. He needs out of this room and far from this hero’s presence. He can’t look at the pictures anymore, he can’t look at Aizawa right now.

He just needs a second alone so he can make sense of all this. He's not used to having these kinds of moments around others. He’s used to being alone. He’s used to breaking alone. He was allowed to act however he liked in the privacy of his own apartment. His own building.

How should he act here?

“Midoriya, hold on a minute, kid. Let me—”

Izuku ignores him and practically flees to the guest room, shutting the door with a little more force than necessary just after Sushi darts in as well. He doesn’t respond to any of the man’s calls and instead slides down the door of his room—not his room, he corrects, the guest room—before hiding his face in his knees.

His hands are shaking. Everything is shaking. He can barely breathe through the sudden tightness in his throat.

One of his palms jerks up and pulls one of his pillows toward him, and he clutches it like it’s a life jacket.

There's something bubbling up under his skin, over his skin, around him, and he thinks that it could be anger or even confusion, but he's well familiar with those, and this doesn't feel quite like that. His eyebrows furrow, his grip tightening on the pillow covering his face as he just tries to form some kind of rational thought.

Dead. Twenty-four. Gone. Just like that.

He recognizes those cuts. Those slices on the person's body. There was a pattern to it. God, he knows what this means but can't go any further into that thinking. A knife is being jabbed repeatedly into the soft part of his brain, carving out some of the most important parts, and he can't stop it.

Has this happened before? He can't remember, but he's sure it's never been as bad as this. Not even when he over-drank some of that extra strong alcohol that night.

And that thought is frightening. He doesn't even know what to do. There's nothing for him to do.

Izuku sits there, curled up in the smallest ball he can, fingers gripping the pillow so tight his knuckles are probably white. He tries to steady his breathing, as he feels like he's hyperventilating, and god he knows that's not good, but he's not even in the right state of mind to put an actual end to it. What did Kuro always say about this? About how to stop yourself from breathing too much too quickly? There was a little rhyme he taught Izuku, but he can't remember it now.

It's been years since then. And what a thought that is, huh? It's been years since he's been away from his caregiver.

His heart is still going a hundred miles an hour, and dammit Izuku can't stop the fucking trembling!

The world is too big and too small all at the same time, and the weight of the current situation has his chest constricting, now making it hard to even drag in breaths. He was breathing too much before and now he can't even suck in any air at all.

The smoke did this to him in that burning building. That, he can remember.

Blades so sharp they could cut through multiple layers of armor and then skin. The speed to slice not once, not twice, but three times before being countered.

Where has Izuku seen that before?

A paw touches his skin, and Izuku jerks, red sparks flying off his body. Missy meows in retaliation and jumps away, now sitting on the edge of his bed with Sushi and watching him.

“Stay!” He says as best as he can, though it comes out rough and garbled anyway. He stutters over the word a few more times before having to give up, and he shoves his face back into the now soaked pillow. He’s sweating bullets even though he feels so cold.

The chill in his room is like needles pricking at him from every angle. His ass is going numb from sitting so long, but he doesn’t even register it.

A few more moments pass and he can barely make sense of anything around him. The cats and the chill and the not-his room slip away, like a TV channel being turned. He feels stuck in a sort of glass box that he can’t break through. He can see the other side, he knows what’s beyond the other side—but he just can’t reach it.

And maybe the harsh truth is that he feels safer inside this glass box. He just wishes it wouldn’t make him feel as alone as this.

Because really he's never felt this inherently bad before. There have been other moments like this, he thinks, but this is different. Worse. More crushing. Something is crushing him. He would be crying right now if his mind would let him. His control is slipping, and he hates it. He hates it so much.

Instead of any more words, all Izuku sees in his mind are images. Memories he’s buried for a couple years now. More for peace of mind than anything. He’s buried them to tame his guilt.

Another stab at his brain. This one cracks at his skull. Opening it like someone would an oyster.

The shadows around him darken. They dance on his walls and make him realize just how much the room is closing in on him. There’s something there waiting for him. Someone. There’s a breath on the shell of his ear. It’s his, right? No. Maybe. He can’t tell.

His glass box is getting tighter. It’s pressing against him and going to break. He puts his hands up to stop it from going any more in and squeezes his eyes tight. The tablet he threw to his left lights up with a notification, but to him it just looks like a camera flash. A doctor’s light.

Stop.

An unfamiliar voice cuts through the fog. It sounds like it's right there, but there's no one in front of him.

One for All is a live wire inside him. His palms are burning. Itching.

Steady now.

Another breath at his other ear. The pressure of the glass box being pushed against him decreases. The box is being… pushed away. He's just sitting there, contained. In a thankfully motionless, small area. And he waits.

Air is still hard to come by, so he holds it for as long as he can before forcing himself to drag some more in after exhaling. The seconds between breaths calm the sparking of One for All. He tries to occupy himself by thinking of the cats, of Missy and Sushi—who are both somewhere in this room, he just can't make himself move to see them—and All Might and everyone else, but those thoughts are sucked away almost as quickly as they had come, like a vacuum sucking up all the debris. It's leaving him with too much, not enough.

Yet, even in all this, Izuku is quiet. There are no tears or cries or anything of the sort, just forced breathing and deep-rooted fear and cold, why am I still cold? Sweat sticks to his curls and plasters them to his forehead, and another shudder wracks through him when the voices leave him.

He's not back here yet. He doesn't think he's truly in this room or apartment or even on this planet. Not quite. This is more of fabricated reality that he's been thrown in.

And what a sensation that is, to not be anywhere but in your own mind-created violence.

After what feels like hours but what could've only been fifteen minutes, Izuku slowly starts to come back to himself. An anchor has been tied to his ankles so he wouldn't float off into the sky. But now it's weighing him down too much.

He sucks in some steady breaths as Sushi and Missy rub themselves all over him in support, and he has to stop himself from pushing them away again because dammit he doesn't want that right now. He can't handle that. The touch feels wrong. Eventually, though, his heart stops trying to jump out of his ribcage, and the world slowly comes back into focus.

The shadows aren't there, he assures himself. They're gone now.

He's still shaking, but he chalks it up to how cold it is in this room. Aizawa must've stopped calling for him a long time ago, as Izuku can't hear him anymore.

He can't decide if that's a good or bad thing.

Izuku needs to distract himself now. That seems to be the only thing he's been doing these past few days. There's nothing else to do, to be fair.

He just needs some control, that's all. The sharp pains in his chest disagree with that statement, but that's too bad.

After at least another hour and a half of just lying there and trying to connect back with reality, the boy reaches for the tablet he'd thrown off to the side, his trembling fingers unlocking it and opening the web. He doesn't feel up to messing with Nezu anymore. Maybe he should surf some of the heroes and villains' forums, just to catch up on his analyses, just to stop himself from thinking about whatever the fuck happened in the dining room.

To stop thinking of him.

He's exhausted, and he actually wants to sleep, but he can't. He knows that nothing good would come of it.

It's kind of ironic, though, that the first article Izuku sees has him shutting off the tablet and setting it back on the ground. Having already drained his storage of emotions for the day, he can do nothing but laugh drily at the words and pictures he'd just seen.

He shouldn't be surprised at all anymore. Just from the nature of the wounds on those bodies, Izuku can tell who they were given by.

'Ingenium stepping down! Hero Killer: Stain strikes again!'

That's Iida's brother, and Izuku remembers his friend (can he even call him his friend with how shitty Izuku has been lately?) leaving before the end of the Sports Festival. The timestamps match up, so this is definitely real. He knows that if he'd searched a little more or maybe just browsed through the news channels on the TV, he would've heard about it.

The fact that neither Aizawa nor Yamada told him about this is telling.

And then another realization, this one much darker: oh, he's started up again.

He should've realized his old mentor would continue where he left off when that group started following him, especially when Stain left him that note that night on his desk. Izuku should've realized that simply ignoring things wouldn't make it all go away forever.

Running wouldn't either. He's learned that lesson.

Fuck. This is all Izuku's fault. So many things could have been prevented if he had only just been better.

He'll have to ask Yamada how Iida is when he comes back. But does he even deserve to inquire about that? Izuku has no right to, does he? Not with how he's involved, that's for sure.

The boy hugs the pillow at the thought and forces himself to get up on the bed. He's been on the ground for far too long.

(And if it takes four minutes for him to even build up the strength to stand up and make it to the bed, nobody will ever know.)

He's long since given up on entertaining himself with the tablet. He doesn't want to go on the web and see it all over again. He doesn't want to see his old mentor's face, he doesn't want to see those blinding white eyes, and damn it all, he doesn't want to even be reminded of that piece of his past.

It wasn't even that long ago, and that's what hurts. He's been trying to run from that part of himself, ashamed and entirely frantic. But it's as if his subconscious longs to simultaneously erase his past and run to it; to reach it before anyone else can. To reach it so he won't be hurt again.

I did this.

A shadow falls under the crack between the door and the fluffy carpet, and Izuku clutches the pillow tighter as two soft knocks sound out. Aizawa's voice comes from the other side, quiet and almost hesitant.

The change from before has Izuku surprised.

“Kid? I made dinner.”

Izuku doesn’t answer. This is obviously an olive branch, but he can’t even respond because he doesn’t know what he could say without making everything worse. He doesn’t think he could speak even if he wanted to. Missy jumps up and sprawls out right next to him, giving Izuku an excuse to focus on something other than the tightness in his chest when he begins to pet her.

There’s another knock. “Midoriya?”

“‘M not hungry,” he says, just loud enough for him to hear. The words come out rough with unuse. Sushi pushes his head into Izuku’s other hand, as if to provide encouragement, and rumbles.

Aizawa’s voice doesn’t change at all when he replies. “You’re gonna have to eat eventually. You didn’t have anything for lunch.”

The boy rolls over onto his back, causing the two cats to get up and sprawl across his stomach and chest. He doesn’t like the way the hero is acting like everything’s fine now.

There’s a beat of silence, and then a soft, quiet sigh. It’s more of an outtake of breath than anything else, but still. “We really need to talk, kid.”

Well, that would’ve been amazing say, Izuku doesn’t know, a week ago? Another jab, and Izuku pushes away those petty thoughts. Geez. When did Izuku start acting so much like his father?

Talk later? He wants to say, a proposal, but his mouth can’t even form the words right now. Not anymore. He missed his chance.

Aizawa waits another ten seconds before speaking again. Izuku can hear the forced calm in his voice. “Dinner will be in the microwave if you change your mind.”

Izuku concentrates on the feeling of Aizawa’s quirk moving away, and the moment he feels the man back in the kitchen he sits up, another wave of dizziness overcoming him.

He’s sorry, but what little pride Izuku has just won’t let his teacher see him like this. Especially not after Izuku so childishly ran off and hid in the safety of the guest room.

Only toddlers do that.

He knows, deep down, what he needs to do. It's pretty obvious.

Aizawa was just being nice to him yesterday and today; he was joking around and listening to the boy's ramblings, acting as if he actually understood him and his feelings—even promising to take him out on patrol despite any potential legal consequences!

He was distracting him. He was keeping him in the dark and being purposefully vague so Izuku would be as ignorant as possible, for he knew what would happen if the boy knew the truth. He knew what Izuku would do. And now, with those gruesome photos ingrained in his mind and appearing on the walls every time he blinks, Izuku thinks that maybe, just maybe he would've been better off not knowing after all.

"That will just make it harder to track them later. I've gotta stop them from trying to hurt anyone else."

A sudden, weird look. "Track them?"

Aizawa knew. He knew the truth then and didn't say a damn thing when Izuku mentioned them being alive. He kept it a secret by not saying anything at all, and that is absolute horseshit.

That stupid fucking bastard. Izuku hates him. He hates him.

Is he not privy to his own business? Is he not worth someone taking a little bit of time out of their day to tell him the truth? Izuku is never one to point fingers, and he's also never one to judge without knowing the full story, but this specific circumstance? This little event?

This might prove to be one of the only exceptions.

For what seems like the fifth time today, Izuku starts to pace, his steps awkward and shaky. His eyes dart around the dark room, nerves dancing all over the place.

A week. It's been almost a week since the incident, give or take a couple of days, and that's far too long. He's been relaxing here in this nice and welcoming not-home, eating food that he doesn't deserve and wearing clothes that don't belong to him—all while his old mentor is out killing innocent people once again. Paralyzing innocent people. And sure, maybe those twenty-four heroes and villains weren't exactly innocent, but it doesn't matter. They were killed because they went after Izuku, and who could blame them for that? It's not like Izuku is anyone important. He's the only outlier; they can go after him and blow up his fucking building for all he cares, but the line is drawn when they hunt down other people.

Stain did it to protect him. He killed for him, which means it's Izuku's own fault that they're dead. He might as well have been the one holding those dreadful blades.

Shaking hands reach up and grasp at uneven hair, pulling at bottle-green strands. Fuck. Why? Why is it always him?

Izuku chokes on something warm and immediately twists to cough it out into the trashcan next to his bed. Red spots dot the bloodied tissues already in there, and he curses to himself. Emotions don't mix well with a sickness fueled by a petty quirk.

He stands there, half bent over the bin, eyes closed as more sweat trickles down his face and drips onto the floor. Everything is once again too much but not enough. It'll never be enough, he thinks.

And in a smaller voice, starved by a white-hot heat, a pouring stream of indifference and petulance, there's another thought: might as well keep going if you can't run. Rule over what you already have. Reinforce. Keep the people safe.

He uses his sleeve to wipe at his mouth as he straightens up. There's something demanding his attention at the corner of his eye, and his brow furrows when he turns to see what it is: a navy blue hoodie. It's hanging on the handle of the door, and Izuku glares at it. There's a pair of matching sweatpants in one of the drawers in the dresser, he knows. Yamada gave it to him after finding it in the lost and found bin at school.

What if I…?

Izuku grinds his teeth in frustration. He doesn't know why he's thinking about this all of a sudden, but now that the pieces are all there, egging him on, he knows that this is what he needs to do.

He forces himself not to think too much as he pulls on both items, making sure to fasten the slightly-baggy clothes so they won't fall off. He doesn't have his costume anymore, so this will have to do. The only other items he could wear are black, which honestly isn't the best option here. Black clothes stand out in all but the darkest of shadows, and that's hard to come by when you live in a city. Even at night, there's always a light to shine on you. Navy blue is more likely to fit your surroundings when you're sneaking around.

And is that what he's going to do? Sneak around like some sort of rebellious teenager who's angry at their parents? Is this what he's come to? He's not going to run for good. Not now, at least. That would be counterproductive and stupid. Izuku just needs out. He needs some freedom, if only a taste of it.

Especially after what just happened.

Besides. He needs some more of his medicine from the club doctor anyway, right? Yeah. He can tell himself that that's why he's doing this.

He doesn't have a mask, but that can easily be fixed by tying up a spare shirt around his face. And isn't that weird? He never used to just have spare things sitting around at his disposal. He never used to have anything extra before this.

Hm. What are the chances that Aizawa has some contacts? He's a master at espionage and underground fieldwork, so the man must have some of that stuff around here. But the question is how Izuku will get it.

He can't just ask. That would be a suspicious thing to do. He might have a few pairs in the medicine cabinet, or perhaps in his room, but Izuku can't risk being seen around the house now. His last interaction with the man didn't end very well, and he knows Aizawa will probably want to talk to him about it once he sees him moving about —something that Izuku is not ready for. He's still too pissed and shaken up from whatever that was earlier.

Is he being petty? Yes. Is he being a stupid, childish teenager? Also yes. But that doesn't mean his treatment of the man is completely uncalled for.

Aizawa is being annoying solely because he's trying to be nice. He hasn't done anything to provoke Izuku or make him feel like he doesn't belong, and yet here the boy is, boiling with hate.

He's shown Izuku a lot of trust recently. He's given him a tablet with no restrictions, he's turned his back to him without thought or hesitation, he's let Izuku annoy him and take apart most of the kitchen appliances four times over, and he also hasn't pressed too much about what Izuku is hiding in his notebook and envelope. So Aizawa is trying, at least.

But at the same time he's also shown Izuku the least amount of trust, which is why he hates him. He's being hypocritical.

"I don't trust your ability to know what's best for yourself."

Yeah, Izuku didn't forget about that stupid comment. If there's one thing Aizawa Shouta has, it's the audacity for sure.

It doesn't make sense, is the thing. Aizawa is disguising his own need for control by acting as if he actually cares about his student's health. As if he's truly worried and wants Izuku to get better, when in reality he just wants the boy where he can see him.

That's gotta be the only reason, Izuku thinks, because why else would Aizawa trust him enough to give him a tablet and turn his back to him, only to keep him locked up anyway? He's trying to create an illusion of trust. He's giving Izuku a false sense of security.

That's how they always get you. They entice you with small rewards and gifts just so you can stay right where they want you to. It's as they always say, Izuku guesses: the best way to keep a prisoner from escaping is to make sure they never know they're in a prison.

Adults do it all the time, sometimes even without realizing it, and Izuku hates that Aizawa has turned out to be just the same. He'd been hoping for the longest time that he wouldn't be, but in the end, when has the universe ever swayed in his favor? He doesn't know why he even bothered thinking he could have this one thing.

Hell, what makes it worse is that Aizawa has done the dumbest thing possible in his attempt to get Izuku to trust him more—he's gone to sleep every night despite knowing that Izuku could use that time to escape. He doesn't even lock Izuku's door. The locks on Izuku's window? They're not for him. He knows Aizawa isn't dumb enough to think those cheap locks would stop him, so it's obvious those locks are just for criminals trying to come in.

It seems as though Aizawa expects him to just not go out at night. As if seeing that he's been given this choice—this small sliver of trust—will suddenly make Izuku compliant.

And that might've been true just a couple of hours ago, but now the tides have shifted. Izuku is going to prove him wrong.

Deciding that he can do without contacts, as his green eyes are bright enough to be mistaken for fakes anyway, Izuku tries to think about what he should do. Without his support weapons he knows he'll have a harder time on patrol, so he'll have to prepare for that. But there is a way to get some more weapons, he remembers. The club has a sort of community chest in the back that not many know about, so he can grab some stuff there since he's planning to get his medicine.

Yes. That… that sounds good. A set-in-stone plan that he can follow without fail. He's used to this. He's used to following his own orders.

The multiple locks on the window prove useless against the power of One for All. Izuku pops them off easily after holding a blanket up to the area to muffle the sound, and he slowly inches up the glass. It's not too loud, so he should be fine. This should go off without a hitch.

So why is he hesitating?

The nightly breeze ruffles his hair and caresses his face when the window slides up all the way. The smell of the city is intoxicating, and Izuku feels his body tense up in mild excitement. He's been waiting to get out of here.

But still, Izuku can't help but pause with his hands on the windowsill. He can fit through; that's not the problem. The problem is that he doesn't know if this is a good idea now that he's actually about to do it.

What will Aizawa think?

Just do it. He won't find out.

But what if he does? What will he do then? Will his teacher be pissed and tighten the slack on his metaphorical leash even further, or will he just hand him off to someone else and wipe his hands clean?

Why do you care so much about what he thinks? Isn't the entire point of this to prove to yourself that you don't have to listen to him?

Well, yeah, but just because Izuku kind of hates the man right now doesn't mean he's lost his respect for him. Aizawa is still very much his idol, and he does care for what he has to say. And he's—he's never been angry at Izuku before, which is a very good thing, so why is he willing to risk changing that? Is he really willing to risk what little freedom he has now just to test the boundaries?

Don't be a wuss. The people need you, don't they? Or are you just lying to yourself and saying you're important when you're really not at all?

His chest tightens at the admission. He doesn't know who's talking right now. It could be himself or it could be an entirely different person—he wouldn't know.

It's just for a few hours. What's the worst that can happen? He's doing it for himself. It's not like he wants Aizawa to find out. And besides, Yamada has no reason to check his room once he comes back from the studio, so Izuku is fine. Better than fine. He's a wanted vigilante, for fuck's sake. He can handle this.

You say that and yet you're trembling like a leaf.

Izuku grits his teeth against the cold and waits, one half of his body in the window and the other half out. This is what normal teenagers do after an argument, right? Sneak out of the house to go fight crime with a variety of powerful quirks under their belt? Yeah. Sounds about right.

He remembers the newspaper Aizawa had thrown away this morning. He remembers seeing his masked face on the front page with bold words accompanying the profile: Vigilante Missing for Days? The End of Rabbit!

It's only fitting that the people have noticed his disappearance. He's never taken a full week off before. The last time he did that was when he got shot with that hollow point bullet, and even then he had made sure to be seen briefly once every day to keep up the act. He didn't patrol on those days, but still. All the people needed was a brief glimpse to think he was out and about.

Crime rate will rise if I'm not out there tonight. It's already been too long.

Something claws at his sweatpants, and Izuku looks down to see Missy hissing at him. Her fur is fluffed up, her ears flat against her head, making the boy frown at her. "Don't look at me like that! I am literally so far from being in the wrong this time, so keep the disapproval to yourself."

Missy just hisses at him again, retracting her claws to leap up onto the bed for a better vantage point. She crouches down, and Izuku only just has time to twist his body to catch her before she can leap straight out the window.

“Nope! It’s too dangerous to come with me. Stay.” He throws her back into the room, leveling her with one last glare before glancing at Sushi, who’s been watching the scene quietly with unimpressed eyes. “You both better not snitch on me or else you’re losing your petting rights for a day.”

And with that, he swings his other leg through the window and drops from the sixth floor, landing quietly on his feet with his heart thumping in his chest. This feeling is exhilarating. After nearly a week of being stuck in that stupid prison, the adrenaline thrumming through his veins feels like a drug that he just can’t get enough of. It’s what he’s been craving so badly for days now, and he can’t help but laugh quietly to himself as he springs up onto a few buildings further down the road, feeling the wind whip at his face as he runs.

His quirks are awake now. They’re not as dull anymore. They feel stronger, more powerful. The difference is huge, and Izuku moves faster through the air, testing out what he’s capable of. It seems that all this medication and resting has done some good—he’s healthier than he’s ever been. His sickness may be worsening, sure, but everything else? It’s all making him feel so alive.

Extract purrs in his mind, all too happy to finally be used this selfishly again. He extends his senses, almost tripping over his own two feet at the sudden sensation of so many quirks and powers bubbling around him, teasing him. His fingers twitch on their own accord, and Izuku’s smile slips from his face.

Oh. Of course this would be the case. He should’ve expected this to happen. His body and mind have gotten stronger, and now that his quirks have as well, he has some catching up to do.

Izuku breathes in the smell of fresh air right before taking a dive off of a larger building, the city lights whizzing past him in a blur of color and familiarity. This feels right. It feels normal. Out of everything that’s happened in the past few days, Izuku knows that this is the one thing he can control for sure. No one else has a say in what he does. Not when he’s out here.

He can start catching up on what he’s missed by doing what he was born to do. What he was made to do.

And so Izuku darts through the shadowed city and prepares for a fight.

Bats hurt. They hurt a lot.

Not the winged bats, of course; Izuku loves those funky little night gremlins. He's actually talking about the bats that are used for baseball—the same kind that are also used to beat up innocent little vigilantes! Sometimes they even have nails in them depending on how festive the criminals are.

The guy Izuku is currently fighting seems to have the right mindset! His bat has sparkly pink screws jutting out from the wood, all rusted and dirty and covered in suspicious fluids. They're bent in such a way that they'll end up tearing your skin on the way out once they puncture you.

Tetanus, Izuku thinks, but make it fashionable.

Has Izuku ever gotten a shot for that? He can't remember, but tonight probably isn't the time to figure it out.

The crook rears back, the baseball bat cutting through the air as he aims for Izuku's head. His jawline is sharp and angular, and his chin makes up at least half the length of his face. He honestly kind of looks like Crimson Chin from that one really old cartoon.

Izuku ducks, backing away a little. "Strike one."

"That's not how this works," Discount Chin huffs, swinging again. Except this time Izuku sidesteps and sticks out a leg, sending the man stumbling forward.

"Strike two. One more and you're out."

The criminal curses under his breath and readies himself. "Stop playin' around, you Rabbit fake! You're not even supposed to be alive, dammit!"

"Fake?" Izuku's voice takes on a dangerous lilt, and he yanks the bat out of the man's hands in irritation, quirks buzzing. "Hey, now, I know I don't look so hot anymore with this shabby outfit on, but I'm still me."

Is he, though? Something's changed, he can feel it. Whether or not that's a good thing is the question.

"Oh, yeah, brat?" Bastard Chin puts his fists up, towering over the boy in a lame attempt to intimidate him. "Fucking prove it to—"

The handle of the bat meets his temple with such speed and force that the guy drops like a sack of potatoes before he can even finish the sentence. If it were any other time, Izuku probably would've humored him, but he's on a time crunch right now.

He hauls the limp body out of the alleyway and uses the dude's belt to tie him to a pole, making sure to use some nearby mud to draw a frowny face on his forehead.

Criminals like King Chin over here don't deserve smiley faces.

He takes the bat with him, a slight swing to his step as he heads for a tall building to climb on. Not many people are out at this time, so there's less chance of people recognizing him while out on the streets, but that doesn't mean the risk is zero. His makeshift mask isn't exactly the most secure; it can be ripped off very easily.

Staying up high is a must—it's not like he wants some potential heroes to catch him wandering the near vacant streets. He's not looking for a midnight chase this time around, and he's also not looking for anyone to follow him to where he's going.

It would be in the best interest of everyone to not make the location of the Underground Club public knowledge. He's been stopping petty crime on the way there for about an hour now, just to get a feel for how the city has been looking since his brief absence.

Besides a slight increase in certain crime, more specifically in the robbery and assault category, nothing much has changed. Word seemed to have traveled fast, however, as apparently the entire criminal underground is under the impression that he's dead.

They actually think he's dead. As in, not alive. They think he's an expired teen. A deceased delinquent.

And fuck, why does he feel kind of affronted at that? Do they really think he's that incapable?

The only good thing about this is that now he gets to see the surprised looks on all the criminals' faces when he pops up out of nowhere claiming to be Rabbit. They don't believe him at first, but shortly after he starts fighting with them it becomes clear nothing's changed. He's Rabbit, after all, and that's not going to change anytime soon.

I'd much rather die.

He's going to the Club for a couple of reasons tonight.

Not only does he need his medicine again, as the pills from the hospital can only do so much, but he also needs some actual weapons. His fighting style is very limited as Rabbit without the help of support weapons. He can't always rely on his quirks, after all. Not unless he wants to be found out.

Izuku passes by a large shoe store on the way there, and he slows to a stop on the roof of a building across from it. Shoes. He needs shoes.

He's lucky he even remembered to change into those clunky shoes Yamada had given him before running. He was about to climb out the window in just his slippers to fight crime, and in hindsight, that wouldn't have been a good idea. He's done that before and will never do it again.

But fighting crime using slippers? Now that's a good idea. He needs his own pair for the apartment anyway, so why not take some? He's been using Aizawa's spares up until now.

Izuku is familiar with this particular company, too. His face is plastered on the wall just inside the automatic doors, and there's a caption under the photo that reads SERIAL THIEF!! DO NOT ALLOW IN!!

It's kind of funny how Midoriya Izuku is a bit of a legend among those poor employees. Total infamy.

But to be fair, Izuku has never stolen any shoes for himself before. Not from here. He would always give the stolen pairs away to the people who actually needed them, like the poor and the homeless. It can get really cold at night in this part of Japan, and while the streets and sidewalks are generally pretty clean, bare feet are still very vulnerable to cuts and infections.

Shoes are very important, and it's easy to overlook this when you've never had to fight for them before. So Izuku never really felt bad about swiping a pair sometimes to give away.

He still doesn't feel bad about it. This specific location isn't family-run, and it's also not like it's a small company to begin with, either. All he's doing is eating the rich here.

And what's a few missing pairs of shoes, really? Close to nothing compared to the grand scale of things.

The store is closed, but Izuku knows that out of all the shoe places in this prefecture, this one has the shittiest security. It's the easiest one to break into by far.

Izuku gets in by using one of the old AC hatches on the roof, and he heads straight for the at-home section. There are no lights or other possible signs of life in here, so it's kind of eerie and ominous. He's gotta get out of here quick before a ghost decides to vibe check him.

He's pretty much searching blindly, so he doesn't know exactly which kind he grabbed, but two minutes later Izuku is cackling like a madman as he runs across rooftops, his new slippers tucked safely inside his hoodie. It's not like he's being totally selfish by stealing them—he can use them as weapons to help the public!

And plus, it'll confuse the hell out of all the criminals when he starts to attack them! Slippers will become a thing to be scared of once he's done.

He looks up at the sky as he nears the club, and the moon shines brightly down upon him. There are no stars this time around, at least not ones that he can see, so all in all it's a pretty standard night.

Izuku briefly wonders what would happen if he wrote his name somewhere in that inky blackness above. He'd be his own kind of star, and perhaps only then he'd be able to last forever.

Humanity glows, he thinks, just as stars do. Humans explode, too.

The club goes silent when he walks in, but it's not the normal kind of silence. They always go quiet upon his arrival, if only for a moment, but this time is completely different. All the members stop, mouths hanging open and eyes widening almost comically once they spot him.

Once they realize who the shabby-looking kid strolling in is.

Izuku feels their burning gazes on him as he walks to the front, and he grips the baseball bat just a little tighter at the extra attention.

They obviously didn't expect him to show up so soon, if at all.

Dragon Lady is working the alcohol tonight, thankfully. Izuku gets along with her a lot more than he does with the others. She's not constantly passive-aggressive with him, at least. The others love to make fun of Izuku, and not in a teasing way, either.

It feels like they truly hate his guts sometimes. But that's to be expected, Izuku guesses.

People fear what they don't understand. And not even Izuku understands what's going on. How could a young, damaged kid like himself ever live up to the reputation that's tied to his name? To both of his names?

Rabbit is loved by the majority of the world, but what about Midoriya Izuku? Who, in fifteen years, has ever looked at Izuku and accepted him for who he is? With and without the mask?

Has Izuku even accepted that?

The woman raises a brow when he walks up, shaking her head slowly as he gives her an overly sweet greeting. She's counting through a large stack of cash, looking far too exhausted to be having to deal with him right now. "I almost didn't recognize you, Rabbit. Could've sworn you were taller last time."

Izuku balks. "Seriously? I've been missing for a whole week and that's the first thing you have to say to me? I'm feeling kind of unloved here."

She narrows her eyes. "You sound like a little girl. Did you break your voice changer again?"

"Oh my god. Why must you be so mean to me?"

His comment is skillfully ignored.

"You know, a few of the guys threw a funeral in here to celebrate your death the other day." She shoves the cash in the register and uses a rag to wipe at the horns on her head. The poison drips into a bottle on the table, and Izuku watches as she sets it next to the others for sale. "They start to get a little excited when you don't show up for a bit."

“Damn, and they didn’t even think to invite me to my own funeral?” Izuku asks with mock disappointment, inwardly wondering how many jobs he’d have to take in order to afford one of those bottles of poison. There aren’t many antidotes in the world capable of reversing the liquid’s effects.

That’s one of the perks of Dragon Lady’s quirk. It’s pretty much always lethal, and it only takes five minutes.

She gives him an unimpressed look. “They really thought you died, Rabbit. Or worse, got caught. It’s unlike you to drop off the face of the earth for a week without warning us first.”

Huh. Did Izuku get caught? Technically he did. A lot more people know about his identity now than before, but does that even count? If he truly got caught, he would be rotting in prison right now, not sitting here and chatting with club members without a care in the world.

Izuku laughs, and the sound of it is like sunshine reflected off broken glass. “You guys really have no faith in me at all, huh? I’m completely fine. Just needed a break, that’s all.” He stretches out like a cat over the counter, only because he knows she hates that more than anything. His bat knocks a few things off the edge, but he pays it no mind. “It was tiring being so underappreciated.”

The woman wipes the inside of a glass, not breaking eye contact. “You got caught, didn’t you?”

Izuku squawks at just how confident she says it, as if she has no doubt that what she’s saying is true, and he straightens up to glare at her. “Hey! Not so loud! That’s embarrassing!”

If the others get wind that Rabbit finally got snagged, he’d never hear the end of it. They might even use it against him for the rest of his life.

“Oh?” She sounds amused now. “How’d you get out?”

Yeah, yeah. Laugh at the expense of my suffering.

“It was an epic escape,” he deadpans, perusing the back wall for some weapons she might let him have for free. Despite her cold appearance, Dragon Lady is a sucker for the puppy eyes. “I had at least thirty heroes on me.”

There's a small wooden staff on the wall. It looks used and incredibly beat up, and it's not as high-tech as his other one was, but it would work.

"Uh-huh. Sure you did."

Izuku whines. "I did! You can even look it up on th$^{e\ int}e^{rne}$t—"

The words die in his throat, and it takes a second for Izuku to realize that his voice just cracked. Embarrassingly loud, too.

Oh. Just kill him now.

Dragon Lady slaps a hand over her mouth to cover her laughter, and Izuku hears a snort coming from behind him.

He turns to glare at the source of the noise, cheeks burning underneath his makeshift mask. Sitting just a table away is a man typing furiously on his phone, the light illuminating his face just barely in the dim room.

There doesn't seem to be anyone else who overheard, so that must mean this man was intentionally listening in. Which automatically makes him a suspicious person in Izuku's book.

When Mystery Creep looks up, his gaze immediately meets Izuku's, as if having already looked at him previously, and the boy tilts his head.

This bastard. He looks familiar. Feels familiar. Izuku knows him, he's sure. But from where? He doesn't have a particularly abnormal face, so it's not like he can identify him that way.

In fact, he just looks like some scroungy homeless man. Almost like Aizawa.

And almost like every other underground hero out there, a voice whispers in Izuku's mind, and the boy blinks in pleasant surprise.

It's not unusual for the more morally gray heroes to come here for supplies, or even just to have a place to hang out or find partners for missions. Lower-ranking heroes, especially underground ones, tend to flock to places like this.

So is this man a part of that crowd? Is he perhaps a hero like Eraserhead? And with that thought comes another unwelcome question: could he be an acquaintance of Aizawa's?

There aren't a lot of underground heroes in this part of the city, so it's likely that the ones that do exist here all know each other and have each other's contact. It's to have extra support, obviously, and also to have a few extra sets of eyes in a couple of different places at the same time.

So if there's an underground hero in here who might know Aizawa, or even just any other hero Izuku is familiar with…

Fuck. That would explain a lot, actually. Izuku isn't naïve. While he thinks of this club as a second home, he knows it's not perfect. It's tight-knit, sure, but there are always going to be a few leaks. A few bugs.

So the question is whether or not this guy is someone Izuku has to be wary of.

I shouldn't be here. Damn it all. Why am I overreacting like this? He could just be a nobody.

This could explain how Aizawa knew what the boy was doing that night after Izuku threatened that idiot here at the club—it was only a day into his personal search-and-destroy mission and the man still figured out he was going after the leftover villains involved with the USJ attack.

His analysis was that quick, too. Something that never sat right with Izuku. It just felt like his teacher knew even before that moment.

If one of Aizawa's acquaintances were present that day and witnessed Izuku's attack on that bastard club member, they would've heard what was said and thus realized what he was doing as well.

Perhaps said acquaintance told Aizawa.

No. Izuku can't go jumping to conclusions when he has little to no evidence. He's just going to work himself up like that.

The best thing he can do is fall back so he can do more research.

When he comes back to himself, the man is still staring, and he merely smiles a little when Izuku's expression darkens. Oh. This dumbass thinks he's funny. He thinks he's a comedian. Maybe someone should tell him that he's the butt of the joke.

Izuku's eyes go back to the phone in the man's grip, and he wonders if he's texting someone. If he's texting the one person that Izuku really does not want him to be.

That would ruin all the fun tonight, wouldn't it?

He turns away, suddenly that much more serious. Dragon Lady's eyes flit back and forth between the two for a moment, obviously ready for possible drama, before stepping back a little to grab something under the counter.

"Doc left this here for you before he left," she says quietly, handing Izuku a white package. "Said he had a feeling you'd be needing some more."

Izuku takes the medicine with a dip of his head, stuffing it inside his hoodie with his slippers.

He can't say anything else, not with the lingering fear of the guy behind him eavesdropping, at least. Letting anyone else know about his, uh, sickness would be less than ideal.

"What if I traded in this bat for that staff over there?" Izuku asks sweetly, gesturing with his newly acquired weapon. "You think that's fair?"

For a few seconds, Dragon Lady just stares, taking in the terrible state of the bat in his hand. She must think he's stupid, and honestly, she's probably right. Izuku would trust her judgment over his own any day.

"You still have blood on it," she says, like that makes all the difference.

Izuku blinks, waiting to see if she's kidding. But then he carefully starts to use his hoodie to dab at the crimson spots in between the nails, making sure to use some of the iced water sitting in a glass next to him to clean off the dirt on the wood.

He looks back up at her appalled face and smiles brightly, even though she won't see it. "There! Looks brand new!"

"Jesus Christ, you really are batshit fucking insane." She takes the bat from his hand and promptly chucks it into the garbage can in the corner of the room, taking the staff off the wall to give to him. "Whatever, just take it."

Izuku is mildly offended at how his stolen weapon was treated, especially since he swears he heard her say this is you right before she threw it, but he doesn't say anything on the subject.

After a few friendly conversations with some other members, spent with him mostly just assuring them that no, I'm not dead, and yes, you're still in my will, Izuku heads out of the Club.

The temperature is dropping dangerously fast tonight. He can see his breath easily now.

He doesn't know how it happens, but eventually, Izuku ends up standing in front of Kacchan's house. His feet seemed to just move on their own, leading him to this place almost as if on instinct.

Izuku is standing by the road with a cut on his forehead and a fresh bruise forming on his jaw, still slightly concerned that there's so much crime happening near his friend's house.

It took him longer than usual to get here, saying as he had to break apart a few fights and start a few of his own on the way, but that doesn't matter now. He's more concerned as to why the light in Kacchan's room is still on.

The explosive teen must be more worried than Izuku previously thought if he's still awake at this time. Kacchan does love his schedules, after all. He usually goes to bed before nine, so for him to be breaking that internal clock? It's a little concerning.

Should… should Izuku go in there? He already missed their weekly dinner the night before, so maybe he can make it up to him with a surprise visit. He could steal a cupcake or something from the store and climb in through the window to give it to him.

It wouldn't be the first time.

But does Kacchan even want to see him? Would he even want to be associated with Izuku after all this? The boy has been ignoring his friend for days now. A flimsy note doesn't count as good communication.

So would Kacchan even allow him to sneak into his family's house and fill him in on what's happening? Would he get truly angry? The kind of angry that has Izuku wanting to curl up in a ball and cry for about a thousand years afterward?

Or worse. Would Kacchan just be… silent. That dismissive type of silence that Izuku swears is the bane of his existence.

The boy usually loves silence. He doesn't panic over most moments of quiet. But when Kacchan is silent, that's when he knows he messed up somehow.

Fuck. It seems Izuku is a master of overthinking tonight, huh? He's too scared to even go and see his best friend. It's kind of pathetic.

He owes Kacchan an explanation, and yet he can't even bring himself to give him that.

Izuku needs to learn to live without attachments. He should have never been this close to his childhood friend anyway—for a variety of reasons. He's constantly putting the boy in danger.

But maybe that's why Kacchan has always been a little different than everyone else. He resists Izuku's efforts of pushing him away and never fails in telling him that he's worth holding on to, even when Izuku is acting like a complete idiot.

Even when they both know that Izuku is better off being cut loose.

He turns and walks away from the house, his steps feeling weighted somehow. It's like his body has gone numb, and it's not just because of the chill in the air.

Kacchan will have to wait a little longer. The city is calling his name.

What people don't know is that Aizawa Shouta is a stress cleaner.

He doesn't like things being dirty or otherwise grimy, which is a surprise given how he looks most of the time. But to be fair, Shouta was homeless for a few months when he first started out as an underground hero.

Sleeping on benches and inside alleyways isn't a foreign concept to him. He still remembers what it was like having to go through that; he still remembers the less than ideal places he had to stay at. It was fine, of course. He was fine. But that doesn't mean it didn't suck any less.

Perhaps that's why he doesn't like dirty things. It's not that he's a germaphobe or that he's squeamish or something, no. He just prefers not to live in an unclean place when he has the chance.

So whenever Shouta gets upset or just can't seem to stop stressing about something, he cleans the apartment.

Thoroughly.

It's kind of funny how he puts more effort into cleaning his home than he does in taking care of his appearance.

And it's also funny how fucking dumb Shouta can be. He's a literal dumbass. If you look up the word moron in the dictionary, you will probably see his face pictured next to its definition. He's that level of stupid.

He's fucked. He's totally and irrevocably fucked.

This is why he isn't good with kids. He doesn't know how to handle them. He doesn't know how to talk to them.

Midoriya probably hates him now. He wouldn't blame him, of course, but still. All he had to do was communicate with his student and all of this would've been prevented.

Stupid, he thinks angrily, shoving the rest of the files into their respective folders. Should've talked to him about this. He had a right to know.

He had a right to know about everything, seeing as it's about him.

The kid is in his room right now, most likely still awake, and Shouta hates that he still doesn't know what to do. He doesn't know how to fix this. If there even is a way to fix this. How do you come back from this level of betrayal?

He calls it a betrayal because he knows that that's probably how it feels to Midoriya. He told him that he'd work on building their trust, that he'd always be there for him, and yet Shouta has been keeping him in the dark about a ton of important things for a week now. Midoriya only found out about one of them by accident.

That doesn't seem like a two-way bridge of trust. It seems more like Shouta is an authoritative ass who doesn't bother explaining things to the other party.

Dammit. He screwed up real good this time.

He tries to distract himself by cleaning off the rest of the dining table, moving to the living room when he's finished.

It's hard, is the thing. Having to help a child so strong yet so vulnerable like Midoriya. So fierce and passionate yet so caring and meticulous in everything he does.

Shouta would take a moment to watch the kid sometimes while working on lesson plans for the class. Sitting at the dining table or on the couch, Shouta had a clear view of what Midoriya was doing most of the time.

He remembers looking at Midoriya and noting how the boy would constantly look at every detail in the room and catalog it. Almost like he was committing it to memory. But why? Why would he take the time to do something so… mundane?

Just in case, Shouta guesses. Just in case he'd ever need to make an escape or need to know the exact layout of the apartment.

Or maybe it could've been for comfort. To know that amidst this chaos, he at least knows something concrete.

Midoriya said he was homeless for how long? Just a few years? The kid had one hundred percent control over his life while homeless, as sick as it sounds. He could go where he pleased, do whatever he wanted, and patrol when and where he felt like it.

Without someone there to reign him back in and care for him, Midoriya suddenly became much less of a child and more of an adult exposed too soon to the cruelest part of the world.

And it sucks. It sucks that he had to be by himself and take care of himself, especially since, in Shouta's opinion, he was barely even surviving.

Hizashi told him that same night what his apartment looked like. He told him about all the gritty details. He told him what was in the kid's fridge—well, what wasn't in the fridge, and he told him how there was a ton of burnt cat supplies and yet a severe lack of burnt human supplies.

The kid had prioritized his cat instead of himself. And honestly, did Shouta expect anything else from him?

Midoriya is a child, but he's also not. Shouta isn't that dumb, at least. He knows that he isn't quite a child with everything he's been through, so why does he keep treating the boy like he is? Why does he keep wanting to protect him from the truth, even subconsciously? Even when he knows it's a bad idea?

Maybe because it's easier to fall back on that. Maybe because it's easier to keep things from Midoriya instead of having to deal with the emotional fallout that will inevitably result from him telling the kid everything.

Shouta isn't good with kids. He's a teacher, sure, and it's not like he hates children, but he just isn't cut out to be one of those figures that people look up to. He's seen a ton of his students cry before, and he's been the cause of a good portion of those.

Some of those times were well-deserved, and some of those weren't.

The point is that he's just going to screw this all up even more. He took away Midoriya's control, knowing how badly that would end, and didn't even tell the kid why. He left him in the dark and just expected him to be okay with it.

And now he has to deal with the consequences of doing that.

Shouta feels guilty for a lot of things. He's guilty for not taking a lot of time to actually talk with Midoriya this past week. He's been home for five days, and how many times has he actually interacted with Midoriya?

Short, snarky conversations and clipped greetings don't count. When has Shouta actually taken some time to talk with him?

The short answer is he hasn't.

Hizashi always gets on him about how he always throws himself into his work. Even now, Shouta rarely takes breaks. The principal made it clear that he wouldn't have to do any work for the school as long as he was watching Midoriya, so why did he choose to do some painstaking analysis and work anyway?

His husband isn't even home during the day and yet he's made more progress with Midoriya than Shouta has. And that's—that's just wrong.

It's becoming clear that he needs to put in some more effort.

The katsudon is still sitting on the counter, cold and untouched. Shouta only ate a few bites of his own portion, knowing he wouldn't be able to stomach much more.

He gets up and puts Midoriya's plate in the microwave, knowing he won't come and get it now. He was hoping the kid would, as he still needs to eat, but it seems like he's just going to stay in his room until morning.

Katsudon is Midoriya's favorite food. Shouta remembers being told that random fact on one of their patrols, and he's glad he didn't just forget. Making it was supposed to be the start of an apology of sorts, and it was also supposed to be a kind of olive branch.

Plus, it's apparently good to make familiar meals for kids coming from unstable environments.

Hizashi sent him an article a few days ago about parenting troubled teens, much to Shouta's embarrassment. Recently orphaned or fostered kids need boundaries and comfort, and since Shouta doesn't know what to do about the first one yet, he decided to attempt the second one.

But Midoriya didn't even end up trying the comfort food, which just goes to show how badly Shouta screwed up.

Even Hizashi agreed. His husband is just as upset, having been informed of the situation when Shouta texted the man in a panic asking what to do.

Of course he went to go see Tensei right after work on the night this would happen. He should be here right now. He'd know how to handle this.

At the reminder of what happened to their friend, Shouta grits his teeth and swipes a hand down his face. He has a headache now. Nothing's going to get done as long as he's stressing this badly.

He needs to feed the cats. That's something he can do. It's way past their normal feeding time anyway. But when Shouta pours the food into their bowls, only Meatball and Pickles come running.

The other two must be in Midoriya's room.

Great. Shouta really doesn't wanna have to knock on the door again. He knows Midoriya won't want anything to do with him right now. He might just make it worse. Missy and Sushi should be fine, right? They most definitely would've heard the rattling of the food and started yowling if they wanted out of the room.

They've never had any qualms about doing that before. But still, Shouta just… he doesn't feel right.

He's relieved when Hizashi finally comes home half an hour later, and he feels some of the dread inside him dissipate once they greet each other and Shouta realizes he's not alone now.

"How was it?" Shouta asks, taking the small box from his husband's hands and setting it on the table. His arms cross on their own accord, and he tells himself it's only an instinctual thing, not something he's doing as a self-soothing method.

"Work was the same as always," the blond groans, shrugging off his leather jacket and kicking off his boots. "My manager's new husband came by today and thought he could boss us all around, so that was annoying. But what can you do?" Hizashi drapes himself over Shouta, putting nearly all his weight on him as he presses small kisses to his neck. "And Tensei is alive and kicking just as well as he can be, all things considering."

Shouta didn't expect any less from Tensei, though he's glad to know his friend is alright after living through such a nightmare. And speaking of living nightmares…

The hero shakes his head and pulls back to point at the box. He doesn't want to think about Stain after what's just happened. "What's that?"

"The hospital was selling sweets, so I bought some dorayaki before leaving," Hizashi says softly, his fruity cologne wafting around Shouta. "Midoriya loves sweet stuff, so I thought the listener would enjoy some right now. He's still in his room, right?"

Shouta nods, already peeking inside the box to look at the delicious desserts. Perhaps this'll be enough to coax the kid out. "Should be. I haven't seen him move around yet."

He can't stop the worry that bleeds into his voice as he speaks, and he ends up gripping the edge of the table tightly with a sour expression. He should calm down. If anyone can fix this, it's his husband.

Hizashi kisses him again, the smallest comforting gesture, and takes the box with him as he heads for the hallway.

For the millionth time, Shouta is glad that at least one of them is good with kids. Who knows where Shouta would be right now without Hizashi.

He listens with his heart thumping inside his chest as Hizashi knocks on Midoriya's door and says something to him, and he has to force himself to turn away so he doesn't have an internal meltdown.

Shouta distracts himself with wiping down the kitchen counters, keeping his mind busy with something other than the obvious elephant hanging around in the apartment.

He trusts Hizashi. If he butts in or something, he might make it worse.

Not even a minute later, the voice hero is emerging back from the hallway, a small frown tugging at his lips.

"What is it?" Shouta asks, raising a brow. Hizashi still has the dessert box in his hand, unopened.

"He's not answering."

It's that one sentence, that simple, innocent-sounding phrase, that has Shouta freezing in place. Because that's—that's weird. He had thought Midoriya would've answered Hizashi of all people, as he's arguably closer to him than he is to Shouta himself. He knows the kid barely sleeps as it is, so there's no way he isn't awake right now, especially after what happened.

But there's also no way that Midoriya is ignoring Hizashi. He might do that to Shouta, but not to his other teacher.

So which is it? Midoriya would never be so dismissive of Hizashi, and he also probably wouldn't fall asleep so soon after an argument like that. None of this is making much sense.

Well. Unless he isn't ignoring him.

Shouta suddenly gets that feeling again. The same one that had him nearly stumbling in panic that day at the hospital. The same one he felt right before finding out about Midoriya's disappearance.

He's moving before he can figure out why. His senses are screaming at him, and it's like his mind has filled up with static as he walks quickly down the hall and past Hizashi, ignoring his husband's confused look.

Fuck. He has that feeling. The feeling that tells him something is off, that something isn't right. His gut is doing backflips now, as if warning him, and he just knows that this feeling isn't unwarranted. His instincts are never usually wrong when it comes to stuff like this.

Ever.

Shouta raps on the door, the fear that's gripping him making him shift anxiously on his feet. Hizashi is right beside him now, looking equally as concerned.

Please just be asleep. Please prove me wrong.

"Kid?" Shouta listens for any sign of life behind the door, but there is none. Even Missy and Sushi, who are supposed to be in the room as well, don't make a noise. He tries again, more frantic this time. "Midoriya, I need to feed the cats. Can I open the door for a second?"

But all that's heard is a faint breeze coming from inside the room. Everything else is almost eerily still. Come on. Is he ignoring them both completely now? While Shouta wouldn't blame him for it, he'd have to admit that it would be unexpected. The teen is usually so—

Shouta stops dead, fist still poised over the wood, having been ready to knock for a third time.

Wait a minute. Breeze? Why is he hearing a breeze? He doesn't remember there being any fans in the kid's room.

Blood roaring in his ears, Shouta wrenches the door open with a new kind of desperation burning inside him, and the first thing he sees is both cats sitting innocently on Midoriya's bed, tails curled around their paws as they stare at him.

Oh. So they were keeping quiet on purpose. Shouta doesn't know how he should feel about that.

And—and the window. It's pulled open almost halfway, allowing the slightest bit of wind through to ruffle the cats' fur. The locks that were automatically installed aren't there anymore, and Shouta suddenly gets hit with a fresh wave of déjà vu.

Shouta moves first with Hizashi right behind him, the blond hero frantically calling Midoriya's name as he starts to search the closet and rest of the room.

But Shouta already knows what to do.

He crouches down next to the kid's bed and feels under the bed frame for the secret compartment he just knows Midoriya would have found and put to good use.

His hand touches leather, and he pulls out the thick notebook he'd seen Midoriya write in once before, and also the same manila envelope he'd questioned him on just a few days ago.

Two of the kid's most prized possessions, Shouta thinks, and they're not even gone.

"His stuff is still here," he says curtly, "so either he's planning on coming back or—"

"Or he was taken," Hizashi cuts in, now rushing to the window and prying it all the way open. He cranes his neck out, making sure Midoriya isn't just on the roof of the building or something.

And that's when the panic really starts to set in. It's already been a few hours since Shouta last checked in on him, so Midoriya could be anywhere by now.

He shoves his student's stuff back, deciding that now would not be the right time to snoop even if he wanted to.

Shouta heads back to the living room while Hizashi checks the rest of the house, calls growing more desperate. But they both know it'll be futile.

Shit, kid.

He pulls on one of his work boots, snagging his capture weapon off the hook on the wall and wrapping it around his neck quickly, almost choking himself in the process. "I'll contact Tsukauchi," he says aloud, nearly stumbling in his haste. Hizashi is emerging from the hallway and getting ready to move, too.

His phone. Where is his phone? He needs it.

"If he left on his own he might be doing his usual route," he continues, hopping on one foot to yank his other boot on. "I'll check his most frequented areas first. Hopefully Tsukauchi can send some people out to help."

Hizashi pulls on a hoodie that was thrown over the back of the couch, grabbing the car keys from off the coffee table at the same time—he's not as quick as Shouta is on his feet, so he'll have to take the car. He doesn't have a capture weapon to help him maneuver around. "I'll check his old place just in case. Nezu has eyes all over the city, so maybe he can help, too!"

And this is familiar. The business part of it. The professional, hero side of it all. Shouta's been with Hizashi for so long now that their teamwork is purely muscle memory.

He never imagined they'd have to do this for Midoriya, though. Not like this.

Where the fuck did I put it? I just had it, dammit!

His eyes scan the apartment wildly, searching for his phone, but then Hizashi is pressing it into his chest and pushing him towards the front door. But right before the pair can run out, Hizashi stops for the briefest of moments, looking extremely distressed.

"Do you think it's my fault?" He frets, glasses sliding down his nose. "Could this be him pulling away? Have we been neglecting him?"

"Neglecting?" Shouta echoes drily, fingers trembling as they clutch one end of his scarf. "You're around him so much I wouldn't be surprised if he's running to get away from us."

The blond looks even more pained at that, and Shouta winces. Okay, that was harsh. He didn't mean to say that. He was just trying to reassure him that this isn't his fault, that Shouta is the only one to blame, but it seems his nerves are getting the best of him. His worry is turning his thoughts to mud.

"I'm sorry, 'Zashi. This is—I don't know what—"

"Hey, hey, it's okay." Hizashi grips his arm tightly, emerald swirls meeting shining obsidian. And Shouta has always appreciated those eyes. They're busy and intelligent and just as honest as the smile his husband wears when they're alone. They say far more about Hizashi's character than any of his shouted words ever could on television. "We'll find him, Sho. We have to."

Yeah. They have to. Because Shouta doesn't know what he's going to do if they don't.

"Get back here you little shit!"

Izuku cackles, stuffing the chicken wing in his mouth and nearly choking on it as he runs out of the store, the KFC employee stumbling after him. "No!"

The family meal bucket in his hand jostles with every stride, but Izuku pays it no mind. He bends down to slurp on the soda tucked in his elbow, dodging the wooden sandal that flies his way. It seems the man who runs this location isn't feeling very generous tonight.

"Damn you, Rabbit!" The manager curses, voice echoing down the streets. "Were the biscuits not enough for you?"

Izuku just chortles happily and powers up One for All to jump onto a neighboring roof. This is the second time he's stolen from KFC tonight. The first time was just thirty minutes before this, when he decided he was in the mood for one of their dry, oxygen-depleting biscuits after a few hours of patrolling.

It was only a matter of time before he inevitably came back for more.

You can't blame him, either. Fighting criminals takes a lot out of you, and KFC is just so fucking good that he can't help himself. Besides, it's their own fault for not sponsoring him. Rabbit is already one of their biggest supporters.

Not to mention the fact that Izuku accidentally sponsored them at the UA sports festival. He's surprised he hasn't been sniped by someone from their legal team already.

He rummages through the bucket, finding a thigh and chomping down on it. He's hungrier than he's been in a long time, and he's not sure if it's because of his body being the healthiest it's ever been or because of the medication he'd taken a bit ago, but he's feeling great.

Izuku hangs his legs off the edge of the building and swings them, currently devouring the godlike pieces of chicken inside the bucket. The shirt on his face now has a hole on it, courtesy of a nice dagger he'd swiped off some random criminal, so now he can eat in peace. He doesn't have to worry about someone spotting him without a covering.

The boy frowns suddenly. What the hell? Is he short a wing?

He's supposed to have ten pieces in the bucket, according to the building's menu, so he should have six left, considering he's only eaten four.

But there's only five left, which means they shorted him a piece.

And seriously? Only nine pieces instead of ten? Those workers should be ashamed of themselves. He should go back in there right now and ask for a refund!

Izuku grits his teeth and slurps on his soda angrily. This isn't what I didn't pay for you bastards.

Whatever. The KFC drama will have to wait, as he hears more crime happening nearby. He'll just have to leave a bad review on Yelp or something.

It turns out that the slippers he stole from the store are actually All Might slippers! They have the number one hero's signature hair spikes on them, and they also follow his color scheme pretty closely!

And honestly, can you truly feel guilty about stealing All Might slippers that happen to double as projectile weapons? No. Not at all.

Izuku chucks one of the slippers at an attempted bank robber, yanking it back with Pull after it clocks the guy at the back of the head. He throws it again, and this time it soars past Mr. Robber and ends up slapping the criminal in the face when Izuku pulls it.

"Okay, what the fuck?" Mr. Thief exclaims, whipping around to glare at him. "There's no way that piece of shit slipper is doing that by itself. Is that your quirk or somethin'?"

He blinks at him and lifts one shoulder in a shrug. "It's a boomerang, actually."

"Hah? No it's fucking not!" Mr. Lowlife takes a step forward, as if squaring Izuku up. “Ya think you can make a fool outta me? I ain’t stupid.”

“It’s basic physics. You see, anything’s a boomerang if you throw it hard enough. You just gotta have the right angle—”

Izuku cuts himself off so he can sidestep the blast of orange air that erupts from the guy’s mouth, and ooh, he thinks, a wannabe fire-breather.

And so it goes.

It’s amazing to be out and about again, even if he doesn’t have his normal costume and supplies. That’s just something he’s gonna have to get used to for now.

See, he’s always gotten a sort of euphoria from being Rabbit. There’s a certain thrill to it that he can’t quite explain. It’s like a drug that he just can’t get enough of, and if he’s deprived of it for too long he might go crazy.

Being stuck in an apartment for a week may not seem like a long time, but it certainly is compared to what the boy is used to.

Speaking of drugs, Izuku should’ve known things were going too smoothly. Something just has to fuck up for it to be considered a regular patrol, huh? That’s how it always is.

He walks down the street with his mouth full of some more chicken, trying to think of ways to quietly sneak back into the apartment without getting caught.

And that’s when he hears some scuffling in a crack between two restaurants, making him pause. Izuku is probably only a few miles away from the apartment now, and the moon is high up in the sky. It must be just after two in the morning, which is when he usually stops patrolling.

But what’s one more fight? He’ll make it quick this time.

He clutches his leftover KFC with one hand and wields his staff in the other, slipping inside the tight alleyway with all the grace and confidence of a pro hero.

That’s rule number four of Late Night Vigilantism: never show a criminal your weakness. The worst thing that could happen is them knowing you're scared, or even the least bit apprehensive.

It's dark, so he can barely see, but Extract has him covered.

There are three of them; he feels two quirks crowding around someone else, backing them further into the alley and away from the entrance.

A potential mugging, it looks like. Something that's not going to slide in Izuku's book.

He moves closer, steps deadly silent as he listens in on the conversation going on a few yards ahead.

"I told you I don't have anything! You already looked through my wallet and found nothing, so what could you possibly get from me?"

The first voice is young. The boy can't be any older than eighteen, Izuku thinks, which makes him either a third year in high school or someone who's just starting out in college.

"Well, you've got a nice-looking watch on your wrist," the figure on the right says, moving closer to the boy. None of them seem to have noticed him yet. "That'll get us a pretty coin on the market, won't it?" She looks to the left at her partner, who's only a tad bit taller than Izuku himself.

"Sure, I guess," is what she gets in reply. It's said enthusiastically, and it's pretty obvious that this one is probably more of a man instead of a boy. He's got a deep, gruff voice that Izuku wouldn't mind listening to in regards to ASMR.

He'd pay this man to read him a book before he goes to bed.

"You want—you want my watch?" The first boy hesitates, hand moving over his wrist as he likely contemplates what to do. "But my grandpa gave this to me!"

Ms. Watch Snatcher closes the distance between them, pushing the teen against the wall. "And I'm sure he'd understand it if you passed it on to us. Come on, I'm not waiting here forever."

Huh. Interesting. This is like a scene straight out of a bad drama show. Izuku wishes he had popcorn on hand right now so he could start throwing it at the muggers and booing. That would be really funny.

But he guesses he'll have to settle for something else this time.

"Couldn't you guys have thought of some better lines to say?" Izuku asks, smiling to himself when all three of them twist to stare at him, wide-eyed in confusion.

Izuku takes his chance while the two muggers are still spooked, and half a second later the dirty All Might slipper is falling to the ground after hitting its mark in between the man's legs. The dude drops like a rock with a hiss of pain, and Izuku cackles.

"Who the hell are you?" The girl asks, standing protectively in front of her fallen partner—and also enclosing the watch-wearer in.

He briefly meets the boy's gaze, hoping to reassure him. It seems like he's doing well in staying calm, so Izuku isn't too worried.

She hasn't rushed me or used her quirk. Is she waiting for something?

One for All recoils in his mind, almost as if it's disgusted by the idea of what the robber's quirk could be. Hm. Izuku wonders if One for All can feel the nature of quirks alongside Extract now, and if so, he's a little concerned as to why he hadn't realized this before.

At the mention of its name, Extract ripples underneath his skin like an overly excited puppy, eager to get in contact with the power before him. Izuku wouldn't really compare it to a puppy, though. Extract is more of an overgrown beast with three heads that demands the souls of the innocent and gets pissed when it doesn't get its way.

Think Cerberus, but add in an angsty teen to the mix. That's how he'd describe Extract.

The thing is it's getting stronger now. The urge. That pull.

He'd been so shaken up and on edge inside the apartment that he never really thought much of it before, but he realizes now that he is definitely getting stronger. At least quirk-wise.

It's harder to push away the feeling now. The entire night, there's been this voice at the back of Izuku's mind, and it's been just begging him to take everything he could get his hands on, to take all the energy he could steal. And now it's back again, this time much more powerful than before.

Izuku wants the quirk that this girl has. It's almost intoxicating the more he thinks about it, and he doesn't even know what it is yet.

"You don't know who I am?" He asks sardonically, feigning hurt. Izuku gestures at her partner, who is only just now scrambling back to his feet. "Should've thrown that slipper harder at him then."

Movement catches his vision, and he makes sure not to break eye contact with the pair in front of him even as he watches the older boy try to edge away. That's right. All eyes on me. Don't look back at the teen you just tried to steal from.

It's surprisingly the man who answers this time, an angry edge to his words. "Rabbit. I heard you were supposed to be long gone by now, but apparently not. You're like a cockroach, you know." A tilt of his head. "Just won't die, no matter how many times someone squashes you."

Hold on a minute. Seriously? He's gonna compare him to a cockroach?

"Now that's just mean," Izuku pouts, making sure he has a good grip on his chicken as he starts to spin his staff around threateningly. "But Ms. Grinch over there was right. It is getting late, and I don't have all the time in the world right now. So why don't you two just get out of here so we can all call it a night?"

Bingo. The teen has just slipped out through a small crack in the back. Now Izuku has more room to work if he needs to.

And apparently he does, as he can't even open his mouth to form his next sentence before the pair rushes at him with surprising speed.

Okay, straight down to business. He's alright with that. He just needs to set down his chicken first.

Izuku leaps onto the wall and uses it as a springboard to crash into the girl, sending her sprawling to the ground. He moves off her just in time as her partner descends upon him.

He has a mutation quirk, Izuku thinks, noting the pointed ears and sharp, almost glowing eyes. His movements are too precise, so he might be able to see in the dark.

The man doesn't hesitate even for a moment, sending a fist Izuku's way. It's knocked away with his staff, and the vigilante then jabs him in the chest with it, dropping into a crouch and twisting to sweep his legs out from under him while he's winded.

Extract buzzes in warning, and Izuku whips around to deflect the girl's punch and maybe send one of his own her way, only to freeze suddenly.

His blood is roaring in his ears now, his mind screaming at him. It's like lightning has settled over his skin and turned his insides to mush, his stomach coiled up tight like a spring.

Take it.

He sees the blow coming in slow motion, and Izuku's eyes widen. His heart stops, if only for a moment, and Izuku is left hanging in between a world of destruction and peace, all in his mind.

Take… it? Take what, her quirk?

She doesn't need it. She hasn't even used it yet, so it's obvious she doesn't even like it. You know she won't mind.

No. That's wrong. She will mind, they always do. And even if she wouldn't now, he knows she'd regret it sometime afterwards. Besides, doing it would be immoral.

What are you waiting for? Just do what you need to do for once. This is why you are always so unhappy.

Is it?

He blinks, and the world speeds back up to its normal rate. The fist is an inch from his nose, promising pain, and what happens next is almost instinctual.

Izuku jerks back, eyes flaring red as his palm latches onto her exposed wrist, his other hand dropping his staff and reaching up to grip at another spot on her arm. There's a fire spreading through his veins now, a strong rush of adrenaline washing over him that has him nearly falling over at its sheer power. Extract is chanting and squirming, all while Izuku is burning in his own body.

And this… this feeling is horrifically familiar.

There's a flash of white and a pain so sharp in his mind that Izuku stumbles back, gasping under his mask once he processes what the fuck just happened. He searches for it instantly, that quirk, and almost cries in relief when he finds that it's still intact and not inside him.

He didn't steal it, though it was a close thing. He was separated before the transfer could complete, though that doesn't make his sudden guilt dissipate.

Izuku looks up, muscles tense, and meets the girl's gaze. She's staring at him, horrified, as she rubs at the red marks on her arm.

He put those there, and he knows they probably still hurt like hell. Izuku hurt her.

The vigilante takes a few steps back, the world swaying around him. Mr. Night Vision is up now, standing beside his partner and watching him with furrowed eyebrows.

Oh. Oh no. Why is Izuku starting to feel… weird? Why are his thoughts slipping away from him?

He's getting lightheaded, and his heavy limbs make it feel as though he's drunk, even though that should be entirely impossible.

What's happening to him?

He recalls the flash of light that went off right before they broke contact, and he gasps when he realizes that that wasn't caused by any of his own quirks.

Huh. The girl must've activated her power out of fear to stop Izuku from doing whatever he was doing to her.

Her power being whatever it is that's making Izuku feel like he's tripping on LSD again.

Wait, again? He only just barely stops himself from laughing. He's never taken LSD and probably never will. It's dangerous, and he never wants to take the chance of Aizawa finding out about it.

She has a drug quirk? He really does laugh this time, the sound bubbly and slightly hysterical.

The guy glares at him and clears his throat. "Listen here, pretty boy —"

"Why is pretty boy even considered an insult?" Izuku interrupts, frowning at them both even though they probably can't see it. He's losing himself now, his fragile mental state not helping to fight off the drugs one bit.

He can barely remember why he's here, or what he just did.

There's a pause. Both thieves glance at each other for a moment before turning back. "It's—"

"Call me a pretty boy again." He points at the guy thief, and honestly he's not asking. He's ordering. "You'd be doing more than my parents ever did."

It's these two's turn to be frozen in place, looking entirely uncomfortable.

Their confused faces make Izuku giggle again, and he puts a hand on his hip, the action making his head swim when he picks up his bōstaff and bucket of chicken. "I wanna be the prettiest boy anyone's ever seen."

"Hey, wait, are you good?" The man scratches at the back of his neck with a knife. Where he got it, Izuku isn't sure. "You're getting a little weird."

Before he can respond, Lady Thief's eyes widen comically. "Oh, shit. So that was me. I used it."

Oh? Izuku would like to know the juicy details of whatever that entails so he can file the information away for later, please. He has a feeling it might be important.

"What? You used it?" Her partner looks worried now, voice becoming a little more high-pitched as he repeats his question.

I'm feeling left out. AINA, play Despacito.

"I don't know! Just look at him! He looks drugged!"

The two friends start to argue with each other over whether or not she accidentally used her quirk on him, but Izuku is too busy staring at the dirty cement wall beside him. There's a caterpillar on there. It's spiky and colorful, and Izuku thinks that maybe he should bring it back to Missy, as he knows she loves caterpillars. She might eat it, but it's the thought that counts.

"Are you kidding me! Rabbit is a minor, isn't he? You just drugged a minor!"

"It was an accident!" The girl defends hotly, gesticulating wildly with her hands. “He was hurting me! What, you think I did it on purpose?”

The guy shakes his head. “Fuck this, I’m out. I’m not getting ten years in prison over this dumb little shit. The cockroach can die on someone else’s terms.”

Izuku frowns as they both suddenly retreat, wondering why they’re not bothering to finish him off when they were so willing to go through all that trouble in the first place. He tries to stumble out of the alley while calling out for them, only to trip and face-plant a few steps into it. His bucket falls out of his grip, sending the leftover thighs and wings skidding across the pavement.

No! His—his chicken!

He tries to crawl forward, but his limbs are now filled with lead. His mind is going numb, too, and he can’t think straight anyway. His metabolism must be trying to fight whatever this is, but it’s not like these are actual drugs, so not even Boost can help him out now. It’s—it is just a quirk, right?

The boy hopes so. Real drugs are bad. All Might would not approve of his current position. If he saw him right now he would give him that look that’s almost as bad as Yamada’s disappointed eyebrows, and that’s saying something.

He sits there for a second, the cold and suspiciously wet concrete soaking through his hoodie and making him shiver. He falls back over the rest of the way and doesn’t bother trying to get up this time.

Nobody should talk to him right now. He’s mourning.

“My family meal,” he whispers sadly, now alone in the alley, and that’s the last thing he says before the drugs take over completely.

Keigo smells fried chicken.

And it's funny, really, how the winged hero seems to have a sort of sixth sense when it comes to stuff like that. It's not like his quirk allows him to have a better sense of smell, of course, it's just that Keigo really likes chicken.

Could this infatuation of his be considered cannibalism? Probably. But Keigo will deny it until his dying breath, as chickens can't fly. He can't be a cannibal if the creature he's being grouped with can't fly. It just doesn't work.

That's flawed logic at its finest, but Keigo will still die on his hill.

The smell of chicken is getting stronger as he flies lower to the ground, a rare burst of sudden excitement overtaking him. Oh, he fucking knew there'd be a chicken place around here. He just had a feeling there would be.

He's been flying around and completing some last-minute tasks for hours now, so he figures he deserves a bit of a break. He never usually allows himself to take a breather, as he really can't, not with his line of work, but he can make an exception for the chicken.

His superiors won't mind if he makes it quick.

Besides, it's not good to fly on an empty stomach. That'd be like driving a car while drunk or something. It wouldn't be very good.

And speaking of potential alcohol consumption, Keigo stares down at the seemingly dead teen at his feet, blinking in mild surprise.

He doesn't know how he got here, actually—standing at the mouth of an alleyway and staring into the darkness, but there's not much he can do about it now.

Honestly, what the fuck is happening? Who the fuck even is this?

It looks like an expired adolescent, in Keigo's own fine opinion. Like a dead, wet rat that just crawled out from the sewers and tried to scurry around for a bit before ultimately keeling over right here on the sidewalk.

More importantly, though, it doesn't look like the KFC building Keigo thought he was flying to. It looks like an incoming headache.

But his nose didn't fail him completely, it seems, as Keigo spots a bucket of fried chicken on the ground next to the teen, half of its contents spilling out over the asphalt. He steps further into the alley and bends down to take one of the wings off the ground, blowing off the grime before taking a bite.

Sue him, he's hungry. And besides, he's eaten worse things before.

It's hard to tell exactly what happened here, but he's sure of one thing: a crime has been committed. That part is obvious. If the slain fried chicken didn't clue him in, the still-very-dead figure on the ground did.

Keigo crouches down, taking another chomp of the free food. He pokes at the teen, wings ruffling a little when a short burst of wind picks up. When he gets no response, the hero grabs the back of their shirt and tilts them up, trying to get a good look at whoever it is—only to immediately drop him and squawk.

Because that looks like someone Keigo is extremely familiar with, and that's not meant to be taken in a good way. What he means by familiar is I've had about fifty compulsory conferences about you, and sometimes I got so bored at them that I felt like plucking out my own feathers and tickling the person next to me to death with them.

He whistles to himself, turning the boy onto his back. "Well, look what the cat dragged in. Didn't think I'd be seeing you this soon, and I definitely didn't think our first meeting would be like this."

His musings don't get a reply, not that he expected one. This kid is out of it.

Yes, this is definitely Rabbit. It may be dark out, but Keigo has better eyesight than most, and he never forgets a face. Especially not one that he's seen almost every day, either from the news or just somewhere at the Hero's Commission.

Rabbit is a bit of a nuisance to them. They hate the vigilante almost as much as they're intrigued by him.

The teen doesn't have his normal costume on, so that's probably what threw Keigo off at first. His face mask is nothing more than a tied up shirt, and the wooden staff that sits a few feet away from the kid is a complete downgrade from what he used to have, but it's still undeniably Rabbit.

Which begs the question: what the fuck is a wanted vigilante doing in a dark alley at ass o'clock in the morning? Passed out, no less, where everyone and their moms can stumble upon him and take advantage of his unconscious state?

Like Keigo, for example.

The mask looks to have fallen down a little on one side, as the blond can spot a few freckles dusting Rabbit's cheek. The shirt is on the edge of his nose, and it doesn't look like it's rigged or anything like his last face mask was rumored to be.

Keigo could do it. He could just grab the fabric and pull, and then he'd be greeted with the sight of Rabbit's true face; it'd be that easy.

He never forgets a face, so all Keigo would need to do is go back to the facility and use some of the resources the Commision has to offer, and bam. He'd have a name come morning time.

And it's funny, he thinks, how the boy before him has been a public menace and all around nuisance to the government for around four years now, and yet no one has been able to figure out his identity. At least, not anyone that's come forward about it.

But of course Keigo manages to have that chance presented to him in a pretty little package one random night, having literally just stumbled upon him while searching for some fried chicken.

It's almost as if it's meant to be.

Keigo starts on another chicken wing, not minding that it's cold. There's a few things he could do right now, but at the moment he's just content in stealing the teen's food. Rabbit is automatically a friend in Keigo's book if he enjoys KFC as well. The least he can do is wait a little bit.

It doesn't take long, as only a couple of minutes later, the vigilante is sitting up almost mechanically, as if rising from the dead. "I'm alive!" He declares, the two words slurring together, and okay, wow, he sounds even younger than Keigo thinks he is. He must be around fifteen or sixteen, or maybe even younger.

"Oh, sweet!" It really is good that he's not dead. A world with one less KFC lover would be a dark one. And plus, the last thing he needs to deal with tonight is a juvenile who smells vaguely like fried chicken and death disturbing people who walk past the alleyway. "Sup, buddy! You doing alright there?"

The teen turns, and bloodshot emerald eyes pierce into golden ones. That's something that's changed, too: the color of his eyes. They were red previously, meaning that Rabbit used to wear contacts, just as Keigo suspected.

He gets a quiet giggle in response. The boy reaches forward with a hand and boops his nose, with Keigo surprisingly letting it happen. "Birb," the vigilante says, and promptly passes out again.

Not wanting him to hit his head on the concrete, Keigo catches him and lays him gently on the ground, briefly thinking about how adorable that was. He immediately shakes his head to clear that thought, however.

Now is not the time to get attached to a wanted vigilante.

His phone buzzes suddenly inside his pocket, and he stifles a groan as he fishes it out and answers the call. "Heyo."

"Did you find him?"

Keigo frowns, looking down at the boy who's softly snoring and now cuddling up next to his leg. He… is not his target. Rabbit is not his target, yet it's funny that his superior phrased the question like that given the circumstance. "The weapons broker was taken in an hour ago. I'm on a separate mission right now."

It's not a lie. Keigo doesn't have a reason to lie about this.

"Whatever it is you're doing, make it quick. We need you back here in an hour."

The man hangs up on him before Keigo can respond, which isn't new but still slightly irritating all the same. He lets out a small, annoyed breath as he stuffs his phone back into his pocket. He gives a mock salute and whispers a sarcastic yes, sir, into the night, sighing once more.

Rabbit looks to be going in and out of consciousness, which would line up with what Keigo is starting to think happened to him. He didn't smell any alcohol on his breath or label Rabbit as acting very skittish, so it must be a quirk doing this to him rather than a willing decision or action.

He thought so. He didn't take the boy as one to just do drugs or drink alcohol recklessly—at least, not while he's in costume. Who knows what he's like under the mask.

Keigo decides to start searching him, finding nothing more than a couple of cheap knives, what looks to be a very important medicine bag, and a… dirty All Might slipper? His gaze flicks up, and he spots a matching one a little further into the alley.

He retrieves it using one of his feathers, not wanting the pair to be broken apart. He knows just how annoying that can be.

After securing the boy's belongings inside his jacket, Keigo hoists Rabbit up onto his feet and takes off into the sky, deciding that he should probably take him somewhere more private if he wants to talk to the kid. The quirk should be wearing off soon, as most drug quirks eventually do.

He's surprisingly light for someone so strong, and Keigo's eyes narrow at the thought that the vigilante is probably a little underweight. Seriously, who's been taking care of this kid?

Keigo tuts, still holding him tightly by the armpits. "You disappear for a week and come back looking like this? I've got a feeling you're not supposed to be out here, kid. Highly unprofessional, if I do so say myself. What would your parents say?"

The boy stirs, and Keigo nearly drops him when the vigilante kicks out with a foot. "I'm flying," he mumbles, causing Keigo to smirk.

He raises his voice to be heard over the wind. "You sure are, buddy! I don't think you should look down, though. Why don't you look up instead? You can see the stars this high up."

Rabbit just scoffs, voice suddenly becoming more serious. "Stars don't exist. Those are just the holes poked in the container so we can, ah, breathe."

Damn, what kind of edgy emo-lord did he pick up tonight? The vigilante kind, it seems.

Keigo can still hear him mumbling to himself the entire time he's searching for somewhere to land, and to be honest it's quite funny.

"I don't trust birds," the freckled boy says. "Fuckin' hollow bones. Suspicious. What're you hiding in there?"

It's said with such tenacity and seriousness that Keigo busts out laughing and nearly drops the kid again. “Love,” he says cheekily.

“Fuck! Shit!” Rabbit curses, his arms jerking around in annoyance as if he’s angry he didn’t think of that before. “You’re right. Fuck!”

He goes back to dangling limply from the number three hero’s grip, kicking his feet out a little as he stares down at the city in awe.

“I think I love you already, kid,” Keigo says, spotting one of his old favorite training spots and diving for it, smiling at the happy noise it elicits from the kid.

When he makes it into the abandoned facility, he realizes he probably could’ve picked a cleaner spot. There’s dust and torn up boards everywhere, and there’s no light. He doesn’t go here often anymore, to be fair.

He sets the boy down on the ground and goes to find the switch. There’s a generator on the roof, and it was working a few months back, at least, so he hopes there’s still some electricity left.

A faint yellow light illuminates a small space in the middle of the clearing after flipping everything on, and Keigo turns back to Rabbit, his smile instantly dropping, because—

“What.”

The boy is lying on his back on the floor, unmoving, and for half a second Hawks thinks he’s actually dead, as he can’t see his chest rising or falling.

He steps closer but is stopped in his tracks when Rabbit suddenly sits up, gasping for air, hand on his heart.

Well, that was quick.

“What the hell just—” Rabbit cuts himself off, eyes turning into saucers when he catches sight of the number three hero just standing there a few yards away, and he jumps to his feet instantly, tripping as he does so.

The quirk wore off, but he’s still frazzled. He needs to take it easy.

Rabbit bumps into a table that just so happens to contain some of Keigo’s old weapons that he’d left here after training one day—which, okay, is definitely Keigo’s fault. He sees that now, as Rabbit is now holding up a pretty nasty looking blade, movements frantic, and he looks like he knows how to use it.

The hero remembers seeing a video compilation of the vigilante's pretty impressive knife work, and he raises his arms placatingly. "Woah, woah, kiddo, I'm not going to hurt you."

You're not my assignment, anyway.

Rabbit blinks owlishly, the makeshift mask barely hanging onto his face now, especially after the flight. And now that the light is hitting him, Keigo can see more of the vigilante. He notices the darkness under the boy's striking green eyes, the cuts and developing bruises on his face and arms, and he frowns.

He's a lot smaller in person. It's hard to believe that this boy is the nationwide sensation known as Rabbit, someone who's rumored to be almost as fast as Mirko and Keigo himself and almost as influential enough among the public to be considered the next All Might.

This teen in front of him doesn't look like any of that. He just looks scared. Unsure.

"You're Hawks," he starts, "the number three hero. You also double as a spy and infiltrator for the government because of your emotional intelligence and physical potential."

He makes sure not to show the pleasant surprise on his face when the boy mentions the spy part. Not even most of his fellow colleagues know that, so he wonders how he got that information.

Rabbit is definitely as all-knowing as everyone says. He has more information than he probably knows what to do with—more information than he should have.

Keigo flashes a grin, all teeth, and lowers his arms. "Yeah, kid. And you're Rabbit, right? Your work is pretty impressive."

"You're going to arrest me."

"Nope." He shakes his head. "I just saw you sitting alone in an alley and wanted to help you out. You got hit by somebody's quirk, so I brought you here for privacy. Do you remember any of that?"

Rabbit's eyebrows furrow, and it's likely that he's opening and closing his mouth multiple times under the mask. Keigo can see something moving there.

He's thinking, maybe? No, he's surprised.

"What did you do with my stuff?" Rabbit stutters out, the knife still raised threateningly.

Keigo ignores the question only because Rabbit ignored his first. He's always wanted things to be even in life, and this is a prime example. "You're not used to heroes doing this, huh?"

He seems to allow the change in topic pretty quickly. Either that or he's just too scared to point out he did it. "Ah, no, actually. They don't like me that much."

Keigo chuckles good-naturedly and moves closer to him, strides open and clear to see.

The teen's eyes follow his every step.

He's jumpy. In all the videos Keigo has ever seen of him, he's not like this. He's confident and badass, not this mess of a vigilante in front of him.

Something must have made him this way. Is it the quirk he got hit with? Maybe he's just shaken up by being near the number three hero. After all, Keigo should be bringing him in right now, not doing whatever this is.

A week is a long time. You had a lot of people believing you were dead, so what happened to you, kid?

He keeps walking until he's about a yard away from the boy, and Rabbit doesn't make a move to stop him. His body is coiled tight, though, like a spring that's about to release. One wrong move and something could go terribly wrong.

Keigo knows this, but he's also teetered the line of chaos and normalcy his entire life, almost as if it's a sport of some kind, so he doesn't find the looming what-if's threatening.

"What's your name, kid?"

"I'm not telling you that."

Ah, so now he's confident. Cool.

“That’s alright,” Keigo reassures with a shrug, voice cheerful. “Just making conversation. You doing good? I need to make sure you’re not too hurt.”

Need to, because he’s a hero, and that’s what heroes do. Whether or not he actually cares is irrelevant.

“I’m fine,” he mumbles, dropping the knife back onto the table, and Keigo agrees easily.

“Thought you’d say that! You are pretty strong.” He reaches past the boy, eyes never losing that artificial spark, and picks up the dusty first aid kit. “But I do need an excuse to brush up on my medical stuff, so you’ll have to bear with me.”

Keigo is slightly surprised to find that he hasn’t been stabbed yet, considering how close he is to the vigilante.

He grabs some ointment from inside the box and dabs it on a bandage, eyeing the cut on Rabbit’s cheekbone.

The hero reaches out to check the wound, smile still plastered on his face, and two things happen at once.

Rabbit jerks back, eyes wide once more, proving Keigo’s thoughts right. He must’ve seen the motion as Keigo potentially going for his mask, which shows he’s not as fooled by the number three’s acting as most are.

And at the same time, there’s a large shift in the air. Keigo can feel it because of how sensitive his wings are, and he can feel the newcomer entering the warehouse from the right side with impressive speed.

He only just has time to bring his wings in to shield his face as a pair of black boots come flying toward him. He flies back, twisting in midair to face his attacker with his wings spread out, but then—then he loses all feeling in his feathered appendages.

It’s like they’re suddenly dead weight, because oh, he can’t even move them anymore. His wings are useless.

When Keigo rights himself and looks up, now halfway across the warehouse and in the shadows, a black figure is standing in front of Rabbit, poised in a defensive stance. Gray tendrils hang in the air like ribbons above the newcomer’s head, blocking the vigilante completely from Keigo’s view.

And then it hits him.

“Don’t take another step,” the figure growls out, voice low and deadly. There’s a flash of light, and Keigo spots a medium-sized blade in the person’s hand. A blade that looks sharp enough to cut a leg clean off.

Or maybe a wing.

A cold chill runs down his spine, and Keigo is faintly aware of the knife that sits heavily inside of his own jacket, ready to be used for cases just like this.

If he can’t deescalate the situation, he’ll be needing it.

Upon closer observation, the man is dressed in baggy black clothes and dark boots, and if it weren’t for the signature capture weapon and yellow goggles, Keigo might have mistaken him for a homeless man.

A scary homeless man.

“Eraserhead?” He asks, dipping his head so his face is shown in the light, not willing to move any more just yet.

He knows the hero in front of him won’t hesitate to cut him up for not heeding his warning.

There’s a few moments of silence, and Keigo notices Rabbit’s head poking out from around the raven-haired man’s body, only to disappear yet again when he gets pushed back behind the other hero.

As if that would be enough to erase the boy from Keigo’s memory. He almost laughs at the thought.

“Hawks?” Eraserhead grumbles, voice still rough and full of warning, though still sounding slightly unsure.

“The one and only,” he jokes, taking that as permission to start moving forward slowly. “What are you doing here?”

Eraserhead—no, Aizawa, he remembers, straightens up, his capture weapon falling back into place around his neck. His quirk stays active, however. “I can ask you the same. You’re far from your normal route.”

“Got assigned another mission. You know how it is.” He waves the comment off, continuing to walk back towards them in a show of open kindness. “Didn't think you’d be up this early, though. I thought your patrol ended over an hour ago? If it even is a patrol night, that is.”

His gaze slides over to the space beside the underground hero, and he doesn't miss the way Aizawa tenses just slightly. Ah, bingo.

Aizawa just raises a brow, and just like that, Keigo is shut out from being able to identify his emotions. The man before him has always been pretty difficult to read, but now he's just closed himself off completely at the prying. "It's a busy night," he says, voice a low rumble. "What do you expect?"

Keigo nods in agreement, but his eyes once again return to the kid being hidden away from view. "It seems you've gathered a fan club, eh, Rabbit? I should've expected that, given your charisma and all. Very impressive, kid!"

The vigilante peeks out again, but this time he steps out so he's standing beside the underground hero yet still a little bit behind. He's obviously evading Aizawa's attempts at pushing him back once more.

Ah, he's got you on a tight leash, doesn't he? I wonder how you two met.

It's obvious this isn't their first meeting.

Aizawa shifts some more, his eyes twitching and hands flexing. "What are you doing, Hawks?"

In other words, what will you do?

Blunt as always. Eraserhead never disappoints. "Don't be such a downer," Keigo complains, rolling his eyes in faux irritation. "You don't have to worry so much. I'm not going to snitch. The kid was just coming down from a drug quirk, that's all. Figured he wouldn't want somebody else finding him, right, kid?"

Somebody who's more of a stickler to the rules than Keigo is. Somebody who wouldn't hesitate to hurt the wanted vigilante the moment they got the chance.

Rabbit nods, albeit hesitantly. Keigo can't blame him; he wouldn't trust himself in his position either.

Aizawa studies him blatantly for a long moment, expression giving nothing away, before seeming to find what he was looking for. His Erasure finally lets up, hair falling back down in waves onto his shoulders, and Keigo just knows his eyes must be hurting right now. "I'll hold you to that," is all he says, and Keigo feels some form of satisfaction build up in his chest from the sentence, from the almost-warning.

And at that, Eraserhead steps forward and slides his knife back into the belt around his waist. He turns to give Rabbit his full attention for the first time since he flew in here, but Keigo isn't naïve. Just because Aizawa isn't staring at him doesn't mean he's not aware of him.

He's probably painfully aware of him. Aizawa is a skilled pro hero, so he's definitely multitasking at the moment, possibly in attempts to make Rabbit feel better, too.

The vigilante's eyes were flicking back and forth between the two, as if expecting and dreading a fight. As if confused as to why they were just talking and not beating the living shit out of each other.

Honestly? Keigo is a tad bit confused, too. He just wanted some KFC. How it came down to all this, he'll never know.

Keigo is left standing there to watch as Aizawa turns his back completely to him before moving his hands quickly in front of Rabbit. The movements are precise and filled with purpose, and is he… signing to him?

Oh. He didn't even know that Eraserhead can do sign language, but it makes sense. He's also being very smart by doing that, as expected, since Keigo would be able to hear them anyway even if they whispered. His feathers are just that sensitive.

This way, with Aizawa's back blocking his view, Keigo doesn't have a clue what they're talking about. And it seems that Rabbit can also sign as well, as the vigilante's head snaps up, like he's ready to argue with whatever is being said, before a sharp shake of the hero's head and more precise hand movements has him deflating.

Their dynamic is interesting. They seem like they're close, but in that Keigo can also see a sort of a barrier there, evident in the way Rabbit was resisting Aizawa's attempts at hiding him. A mentor and mentee, mayhaps? Or something more familial?

And has this always been a thing, or has this relationship started just recently? It can't be that new, though, as Aizawa is harboring a wanted criminal. They've gotta have some kind of background together for the man to take such a risk like that.

His phone vibrates for the second time, probably as a reminder. Dammit. It'll take ten minutes to fly from here to the compound, so he'll have to leave soon if he wants to make it before his hour is up.

And things were just getting good, too.

Keigo takes the slippers out of one of his pockets and walks over to hand it to Rabbit, ignoring Eraserhead's glare at the side of his head.

(The winged hero hopes he's witnessing the aftermath of teenage rebellion, because fuck yeah, stick it to the old people.)

He pats Rabbit on the back with one hand, using the other to easily slip the bottle of pills into his hoodie pocket. He'd taken it out of its paper bag to muffle the sound as much as possible from Aizawa.

He has a feeling Rabbit isn't supposed to have it. And yet he can't help but feel like he needs it.

"Sorry for leaving your staff back there," he apologizes heartily. "Couldn't exactly travel with it while carrying you. But I've gotta get going soon, so how about I walk you two a little ways home? Think of it as a special escort!"

It's said like a tease, but he's really not asking.

He doesn't wait for a reply as he turns and strolls for the entrance with his hands stuffed inside his pockets, wings fluttering in a show of mild excitement.

It's not like the pair have anything else to do but follow. They could've left right after Keigo said he wouldn't tell anyone, but they didn't. Aizawa must've been trying to make sure. He was being cautious.

He's curious as to how his older colleague found them both so quickly, but that question will have to wait. It's not the right time.

What he said to Eraserhead before wasn't a complete lie. He won't snitch on them, and he also won't reveal any information he might've gathered on them to the public.

Even if he could ruin the other hero's life by bringing this all to light, and even if he's a little annoyed that his talk with Rabbit was cut extremely short.

The point is that Keigo would've had no qualms in doing so any other time. The only reason the hero and vigilante duo are allowed to walk away from this is because Keigo wasn't directly told to take the boy in tonight.

Rabbit wasn't his mission, and as of this moment, he still isn't. He has more important things to take care of.

Besides, all good things come to those who wait, right? That doesn't apply to every circumstance, at least not to Keigo, but this is one of the times where it actually works. It'd be better to gather more information first before doing something rash. And that information may come in the form of a crumpled up, empty prescription bag in his pocket.

He's not letting Rabbit go just because he genuinely likes him, no. Waiting for a better opportunity will prove to be more beneficial than doing that.

And if he can get some amusement out of it by watching Rabbit continue to be his vigilante self until then, well, that's just an added bonus.

Aizawa is shaking.

It's almost painfully obvious that he is. The man's hand is gripping Izuku's shoulder, as if afraid to let go for even a second, and Izuku can't really blame him.

He can't help but stick close to Aizawa's side on the way back to the apartment, not minding the weight on his left shoulder at all.

He's not scared, thank you, he's just being cautious. Hawks is a very intimidating figure.

The number three hero may not be as tall or powerful as someone like All Might is, but what he lacks in these categories he makes up for in speed and reputation alone. His skill levels are off the charts, and that's not even taking into account all of the advantages his quirk gives him.

He doesn't flaunt it much at all, but Izuku knows the hero is highly intelligent, both emotionally and logistically. Hawks promotes a carefree and jovial attitude during his public speeches and appearances, and oftentimes he comes off as a little rude because of this, but even when in the middle of this act the winged hero never fails to stay vigilant and alert.

Izuku doesn't miss the way Hawks' eyes will sweep over a crowd during an interview, almost as if scanning for something. Danger, perhaps, or maybe just some brewing trouble. Most pro heroes do that, sure, but with Hawks it's different somehow.

As if the trouble he's searching for is of a far different kind than the kind the others look for.

It's weird and kind of unnerving, because the Hawks everyone sees is lively, expressive, and highly personalized—and thus very far from what the pro hero must really be like underneath all that serenity and equanimity.

He claims to be bad at reeling himself in, but if he's as great an actor as Izuku thinks him to be, Hawks must actually possess complete control over his facial expressions and body language, which would then make him an extremely skilled liar.

Well, either that or Izuku is looking into things that aren't there.

The boy is glad that Aizawa is large enough to serve as a sort of barrier between him and Hawks while they walk. The blond's mere presence is suffocating right now, at least to Izuku.

This may also be because the vigilante is scared out of his mind for what might happen next, but the point still stands.

Hawks feels large, much larger than how Endeavor felt to Izuku that day at the Sports Festival, and also much larger than how the Hero Commission still feels to him.

It's scary.

They're still talking, Izuku realizes once he comes back to himself. Aizawa is making a point to continue the conversation Hawks had started, which is unlike the normally quiet man. It's to distract the younger hero, perhaps, or maybe even just to make sure the direction this talk is going in isn't riddled with traps.

And speaking of directions, Izuku has no fucking clue where they're going. He's only technically been to the Aizawa-Yamada household once, as he hasn't been allowed to leave since he first arrived, so he doesn't exactly remember where it is from here. He could probably find his way there if he were closer to it, but now he's lost.

He is sure, however, that this must be the long way there, as he doesn't remember it ever taking this long.

Aizawa is dragging this out just to spite the number three hero and probably to trip him up, and he's not trying to hide it one bit.

"I have to say," Hawks says, his wings accidentally whacking Izuku in the head when they stretch out. Whether it's in a show of strength or nonchalance, the boy can't tell. "I never expected to see you again so soon, Eraser. Especially not like this! You've changed a ton since our last mission."

And at this, Izuku perks up. An Eraserhead and Hawks team-up mission? Seriously? Izuku would have paid good money to see that—good money he doesn't have.

It's hard to imagine Aizawa working with someone like Hawks. Izuku wonders how their mission went.

"It wasn't even a year ago," Aizawa says simply, voice slightly muffled by his capture weapon. "Nothing's changed."

A year ago? Dammit, Izuku would've just missed it then.

Hawks laughs, and it's only now that Izuku takes note of the almost musical quality to his voice. His words have a kind of cadence to them that reminds him of dancing in the rain. Or maybe running would be a better metaphor. Running in the rain.

"Ah, you're right," the younger man concedes with a grin, wings folding back in on themselves. "That scowl of yours certainly hasn't changed one bit. You just look more dead inside than before, that's all. And besides, you never told me you had a kid!"

Izuku, who is still dying over the dead inside part, chokes on air. The hand on his shoulder squeezes briefly, and the boy notes how Aizawa tenses up even further at the comment.

The situation is tense. Izuku has to fight back the urge to make a joke to lighten the mood, figuring that his input wouldn't be appreciated here.

Again, this is the number three hero they're talking with. They can't be fooled by his laid-back personality.

Hawks has caught a wanted vigilante, and there's no telling what he would've done to him had Eraserhead, another pro hero, stepped in.

Aizawa can get in trouble for this. A lot of trouble. Hawks must know this, so why isn't he saying anything? Is what he said before true? Is he actually going to let Izuku go?

The number three hero talks through the silence, and Aizawa doesn't say a word back to him for most of it this time. He'd completely ignored the whole kid comment, and Izuku doesn't know how to feel about that.

That large hand is still resting on his shoulder, the weight becoming something nice to focus on. Is this a comforting gesture, Izuku wonders, or just to make sure he won't try to run off again?

Either way, it's getting harder and harder to gauge what Aizawa is thinking right now. Is he angry, or is he too preoccupied with Hawks to even care about him and what he's done?

He remembers feeling the rush of air above him. Remembers how his arm nearly popped out of socket when he was yanked back by Aizawa's capture weapon. His teacher came flying in from out of nowhere, and the fact that he caught Hawks by surprise? A hero who's dubbed the fastest man alive?

That just goes to show how skilled Eraserhead is. Sometimes it's easy to forget this fact.

Izuku remembers that feeling he got when seeing Aizawa in front of him. The man had one hand gripping his knife, the coils of his scarf drifting toward the ceiling of the warehouse, and the other hand outstretched behind him to make sure Izuku stayed out of sight.

And he was trembling, even then. Aizawa was shaking as he stood there, protecting him with his own body from the number three hero.

Oh, what Izuku would give to know what was going through his mind at that moment. He figures it would be nothing good, but still.

“Midoriya!”

Izuku is shoved to the side, just barely missing the pole he was heading straight for. He stumbles, turning back to Aizawa with wide eyes, and—oh. Hawks... is gone?

How did he not hear him leave? He must’ve flown away, of course, so was Izuku just that out of it that he didn’t notice? It must be the drugs.

And if Hawks did leave just like that, does that mean he’s letting them off the hook? It’s almost too good to be true.

Aizawa takes him by the shoulder again and steers him back to the center of the sidewalk. The gesture reminds Izuku of the first time they met, when the boy almost walked right into another pole that night.

And that memory was so, so long ago that Izuku’s chest physically aches. So much has changed since then. He’s come so far, and yet it seems he’s also starting to go backwards.

Izuku wipes at his nose, and a bit of blood smears on his sleeve from a cut on his cheekbone. He still feels a little loopy and fuzzy, which are most likely aftereffects of the quirk, so he can’t really think properly.

There’s movement, and then Aizawa is reaching into his tactical belt and pulling out a bandage with some ointment on it. “Here,” he says simply, tucking his face back into his scarf.

And honestly, Izuku had forgotten about the cuts he’d gotten from tonight’s patrol. He never usually checks for injuries that aren’t major. Cuts and bruises will usually heal by themselves as long as they’re not too extreme, so he doesn’t see the point of it.

He didn’t exactly appreciate Hawks about to use that excuse to get closer to him. There’s no way the number three hero was willing to help him like that without something in return.

Izuku is so, so glad that Aizawa arrived just in time, just like he always does. Would he still be with Hawks right now otherwise?

The boy wipes off the dirt on his cheek and presses the bandage against the cut, wincing slightly at the sting.

Aizawa doesn’t speak even though Hawks has already left, and that’s how Izuku knows he fucked up. He expected yelling, he expected something, because this is far worse than his hospital escape precisely because he directly disobeyed Aizawa. He wasn't supposed to leave the apartment at all, and while he technically knew he wasn't allowed to leave the hospital either that day, he wasn't specifically told that, as dumb as it sounds.

But this time? It's obvious that he did this knowing full well he was in the wrong. He wasn't planning on getting caught.

Is he waiting for Izuku to speak? Or does he just not care enough? He can't read his face.

Aizawa's phone rings, and he takes it out and immediately answers the call, muttering it's Hizashi under his breath. And those two words are all it takes for Izuku to crumble even more.

So he does know. Aizawa didn't just do this on his own. Fuck. What does the voice hero think of all this? As much as Izuku needs to know what Yamada is saying on the other end, he forces himself to tune out their conversation. He kind of doesn't want to listen.

He doesn't deserve to.

Izuku suddenly remembers how Aizawa had turned to him back at that warehouse place, his dark gaze boring into his own with such intensity that Izuku almost felt like crying. The sign language had taken him so much by surprise that he almost didn't register the motions at first.

'We're leaving. Don't talk to him and don't interact with him. Stay by me.'

It was the don't interact part that threw Izuku for a loop, and the boy had opened his mouth to somehow get Aizawa to understand that goddammit he needs to interact with him to get his medi—ahem, his stuff back, but then Aizawa was jerking his head sharply, hands shaking as they cut him off before he could even start.

'Not a good time to argue.'

Izuku has a feeling he was referring to more than just what was happening in that moment, and the more he thinks about it, the stronger the guilt becomes.

Maybe he was being childish. He very well could've died out there tonight because he didn't know what he was doing. His body and quirks alike have changed a lot, so how could he have thought patrolling was a good idea?

He doesn't regret running. Despite how bad he feels right now, he would still choose that option every single time over if he had the chance to. It's just his actions leading up to now he would change slightly.

Perhaps he should've crashed Kacchan's place. He would probably be safe and warm next to his friend, sleeping, instead of being here.

But at the same time, how would Aizawa and Yamada have felt?

Aizawa is off the phone call now, so Izuku clears his throat softly, his hands playing with one of the dirty All Might slippers in his hoodie. It's a shame he practically ruined them just a few hours after stealing them. "How did you know I was gone?"

He can feel Aizawa's eyes on him now, as if expecting him to speak sooner or later, but Izuku doesn't look up. "Hizashi brought something for you when he came home. You didn't answer him either when he called you, so I got worried."

Oh. Yamada… brought him something? As in, he thought of Izuku enough to do something for him?

This makes Izuku feel like even more of an ass. He's just so ungrateful, isn't he? He's never been cared for quite like this, and yet he was oh so willing to throw that all away so he could what, patrol for a little bit without an actual costume or anything? To play the hero? Christ.

And Aizawa also said worried. He was… worried. About Izuku. For Izuku.

Why is it that he's only seeing this stuff now, after the fact? After he's done something stupid and already made a fool of himself?

Aizawa huffs softly, the hand squeezing his shoulder yet again. "You really couldn't wait another week, could you, Midoriya?"

It's not meant to be a hurtful jab. More of a tease than anything, but Izuku looks at the dirty ground anyway, eyes stinging. An annoyed Aizawa is something he's all too familiar with, both as Midoriya Izuku and as Rabbit. The boy has screwed up yet again, but this time around Aizawa has this certain look on his face that's never been there before. At least, not that Izuku's ever seen.

He doesn't look pleased, but he's also not quite disappointed. It looks almost like he's resigned—no, exhausted would be a better word.

It's because he has to deal with a dumb teen like you, that nasty voice says at the back of his mind, making Izuku wince. He didn't ask for you to be dropped into his life, but now he's stuck with you all the same.

Is that really true, though? It's easy to believe. It's easy to just look at the situation at hand and go yeah, there's the source of the problem. It's been staring back at you in the mirror your entire life.

But does that make it the truth? If Aizawa truly didn't care, if he truly didn't want him around, he wouldn't have bothered to look for him. He wouldn't have dared to square up to the number three hero just to protect him, putting not only his career but his life on the line in the process.

That has to count for something, right?

They pass by an open shop as they near the apartment complex, and Aizawa halts for a moment, turning to him. The glare of the amber light helps illuminate both of their features, and Aizawa takes out some medical wipes from his belt.

"Stay still," he orders, eyebrows furrowing in concentration as he starts to wipe away the grime and dirt on Izuku's face. Sometime on the way here, the boy had lost his makeshift mask, revealing the rest of his face. His teacher isn't being rough but he's not being particularly gentle either. The touch is so inherently Aizawa that Izuku finds himself glitching for a moment, unsure of what to do.

But then Izuku is reaching up to stop it, because as upset as he is he's not going to stand being treated like a helpless toddler who can't wipe his own face. Aizawa just swats his hand away, though, pressing a few wipes into the boy's palm.

"Your arms are just as bad. Clean them up separately. We don't want you catching something again."

Ah, so that's why he's doing this now. He doesn't want Izuku to get sick or get an infection. He honestly didn't realize how sloppy he was being during patrol. Now that he's looking back on it, though, he can tell that he was definitely being careless.

Getting slammed into some mud at the park while chasing a bag snatcher didn't help his mood either.

Izuku's face burns at the attention, at just how close Aizawa has gotten to study his face. He's right there, and Izuku really doesn't want to look him in the eye, so he focuses on scrubbing his arms.

He wants to apologize. He feels the sorry bubbling up in his throat, but somehow he doesn't know quite how to say it. Would Aizawa even accept it? What is it even for?

For running? For making him and Yamada worry? For overall being a general nuisance and drain of resources this past week?

He's just so tired, and he can't think. So maybe it's all in one. He wishes he actually had the courage to apologize to Aizawa.

"There, now you look less homeless," his teacher says, steering him forwards again after throwing the used medical wipes into a nearby trash can. Which probably isn't the safest thing to do, Izuku is sure, but he's too stuck on what Aizawa said to really care about the biological hazard the hero just created.

His first instinct is to say but I thought I was homeless? but the words die on his tongue before they can escape.

Is he homeless now? Can he even claim to be? He's been at the Aizawa-Yamada household for a week now, and the first time he gets away he's still allowing himself to be dragged back.

Because maybe he truly doesn't mind it so much.

The car is still out front in its designated parking spot, which has Izuku wincing and hesitating at the entrance to the apartment. He doesn't want to go in now that he knows Yamada will be waiting for him.

What if Yamada is upset? What if he hates—

Aizawa shoves him inside after opening the door, as if ripping it off quick, just like a bandaid.

And Izuku takes it back, he really does hate the underground bastard.

Yamada is sitting on the couch in the living room, and his eyes widen when he sees the boy stumbling in. The relieved grin that splits across his face is almost blinding, and in a split second there's suddenly a hand on Izuku's shoulder and another on his head. Green eyes roam over Izuku to check over his injuries briefly before settling back on his face. It's like a blazing inferno is going on around those swirls, and yet it's not scary at all.

Izuku is aware that Yamada is probably saying something to him, but there's a ringing in his ears now that's hard to ignore. "Sorry," is the first thing he says to him. And he knows it's ironic that he'll apologize to Yamada and not Aizawa, but he'll have a crisis over that later. He didn't mean to upset Yamada.

"Oh, kiddo, don't be sorry for this." The voice hero's eyes linger on the bandage on his cheek. "Are you okay? Are you hurt?"

Aizawa is putting his capture weapon up on its hook and pointedly not looking Izuku's way, so he can't rely on him to help explain. He just nods in response, not really knowing what to say. What could he even say?

Oh, yeah, I'm doing great. I almost took this girl's quirk because I just couldn't fucking help myself, and then I got drugged and almost potentially let the number three hero know my identity! Now Aizawa will probably have to owe him something for keeping quiet—if he even decides to keep quiet! So, yeah, I'm okay!

Everything is sort of a blur after that. Like he's detached from reality. It feels like he's floating through his life at the moment, unattached to the world. As if everything he sees is through someone else's eyes. Someone he doesn't know.

He faintly remembers being nudged to the guest room to put on clothes that aren't disgusting, christ, kid, what did you roll in, and then he's suddenly in the kitchen after storing his medicine and All Might slippers somewhere safe.

Aizawa is directing him to the food he heated up for him, and Izuku blinks. He hears them talking in the living room, probably about whatever show is on at this time of day, and he stops eavesdropping immediately. They deserve that much, at least.

Katsudon. Did Aizawa make this purposefully? Did he actually remember that stupid conversation they had all those months ago? The one where Izuku revealed that it was his favorite food?

Even Izuku forgot about that until now.

He eats with a different kind of shakiness, not caring that it's already a few hours old. It tastes delicious. It tastes like comfort.

And he doesn't think there's anything he can do to stop it when his eyes start stinging, his chest tightening in that way it does when he's either feeling nothing at all or everything at once. He feels like he's crying, but his eyes are dry and no tears drop, so what is this?

Is this normal? Is this even allowed for someone like him? He scrubs at his face with a fist, holding the last bite of fried pork in between his chopsticks as his hands decide not to work anymore.

"Kid?"

Aizawa is looking at him, and now so is Yamada. It looks like they're about to head to bed soon, and honestly they should've already been asleep. Izuku shouldn't have kept them up for something so trivial.

Yamada has this pained expression on his face, looking as if he's thinking of something difficult. Don't be sorry for this, he'd said. Why shouldn't Izuku be? He just needs one answer to that, that's all.

He knew it was wrong. He really did. He went out knowing that they wouldn't like it if they found out, and yet he did it anyway. Out of spite or anger or sadness or grief for what Izuku could've been, he doesn't know.

But Izuku is hit with sudden, blinding clarity. Yamada looks sad, so that could mean Aizawa is, too.

Izuku prides himself as someone with great self-control and an ability to hold his tongue when the situation calls for it, born out of necessity when he had to deal with his father's short temper. Now, though, he's not sure if it's the delirium from the drug quirk or the sudden pressing desperation to make the teachers in front of him understand that makes him talk, but either way he can't stop the words from tumbling out.

"It wasn't you!"

The two heroes blink at him from the living room, and Izuku looks away, embarrassed by the spotlight. The last bite on his plate suddenly looks a bit less appetizing.

He shuffles around, feeling small under their burning gazes, and okay, maybe this whole thing tonight was stupid.

"I didn't run because of—of you guys. I mean, I did, but it—it wasn't your fault. I just…" Izuku trails off, glaring at the ground as if it wronged him somehow. His teachers wait patiently for him to continue. “I don’t know. I just needed to get out?”

Fuck. Now it’s starting to sound like he’s making a shitty excuse. Will they think he’s trying to shift the blame away from himself?

God, he’s just so tired right now. He wants AINA and Kacchan.

When Izuku looks back up, Yamada is suddenly in front of him. He doesn’t remember hearing him get up from the couch, but then again it’s not like he was listening for him.

That could be his real quirk: teleportation. Now wouldn’t that be a trip? Izuku would finally know why Yamada always feels so effortlessly comforting and familiar to him.

Gentle hands land on Izuku’s shoulders for the nth time today, and the boy stares up into sincere green eyes, heart thumping inside his chest.

“We’re not mad at you, kiddo. You know that, right? We were just worried.” Yamada crouches down so that he’s the one who’s looking up, and the change has Izuku’s mind crashing. “When I came home and saw you were gone, I thought somebody had taken you.”

Oh. Oh. Now he feels like shit. Izuku looks away, ears burning with newfound shame. He didn’t even think of it that way. He didn’t think they would care that much.

Is that why Aizawa was trembling so badly? He was scared of what could happen?

The voice hero shakes him gently to gain back his attention. “You shouldn’t have been put in a position where you felt like you had no choice but to run, so that part is on us, Midoriya, and I’m so, so sorry for making you feel that way.”

Izuku frowns and tries to cut in, because if anything it’s just Aizawa’s fault, if not his own, but the man shakes his head before he can throw the underground hero under the bus.

“You know what, kiddo? It’s getting late. You should finish up and head to bed, ‘kay? You must be exhausted.”

He is, but what difference does it make? Izuku hasn’t been punished yet. He’s barely even been yelled at, so what’s going on? Why isn’t there more fighting?

There are no blows or angry lectures, or even the threat of confinement. There's just… leftover katsudon and more care being given to him than he probably deserves right now.

Yamada brushes away a stray curl from Izuku's face, a concerned crease between his brows now. "Are you okay?"

He nods on instinct, now used to the blond hero asking him that after many other different situations. But instead of feeling repetitive or forced, the question feels just as sincere as it did the first time Yamada ever asked it.

As if he wants to know his answer every time.

"I'm okay," he says, because the hero still doesn't look convinced. Why it even matters what Izuku is feeling and thinking, he'll never know.

But he'll do anything at the moment to wipe that concerned frown off his teacher's face.

Aizawa walks over from the couch at the same time that Yamada straightens up, so now both men are back to towering over him. Izuku doesn't feel overwhelmed or anything, though. Not this time around.

He feels, weirdly enough, safer than he did before.

"Go to bed, Midoriya." Aizawa leans forward to pick some lint off Izuku's shirt. "I have to leave for the hospital in the morning, but before that we're going to have a chat, alright?"

A what? A chat? Okay, maybe Izuku spoke too soon. What the hell does that mean?

His first thought is it's an interrogation, but he pushes the idea aside just as quickly as it came. They would bring Tsukauchi over for that, and it doesn't seem like he's going to see the detective for a long while yet. It's safe to say that it's probably not an interrogation—an official one, at least.

And there's this small, tiny part of himself that refuses to believe they'd even do something like that now.

Yamada glares at his husband. "Don't make it sound so ominous, Shouta!" His gaze is soft when he turns back. "He means we're going to have a house meeting. You're not in trouble or anything, of course!

It's just to make sure we're all on the same page, and also to lay down some ground rules, yeah? Is that okay?"

Is that okay?

Izuku nods again even though he's still reeling. Why is he asking if Izuku's okay with it? This isn't his house. He shouldn't have any say in the matter, right?

And Yamada mentioned ground rules. Rules are good, he thinks, but they're also constricting. They're good to have in mind so he at least knows where the breaking point is, but that's about it. He guesses he can't have a definite opinion on them until he knows what they are—

His thoughts come to a screeching halt when Yamada gently pulls him closer. Because this… this is a hug. Yeah. Definitely a hug.

A pair of arms wrap around his shoulders and tug him in, but they're loose enough so that Izuku could break away easily if he wanted to.

But why would he even want to?

Yamada smells faintly like strawberries and vanilla, probably due to one of his Present Mic perfumes, and it has to be the most welcoming scent that could ever exist.

That, coupled with just how comforted he feels right now, makes this easily the best hug he's ever experienced. Not like he has a lot to compare it with, but still.

Izuku doesn't know what to do, so he just stands there, his arms limp at his sides. After a few moments, he hesitantly reaches up to hug Yamada back, but the hero is already pulling away. "I'm glad you're alright, kiddo," he says, ruffling his hair one last time before taking the empty plate and heading for the dishwasher.

It's only when Aizawa pokes him in the forehead a whole thirty seconds later that Izuku realizes he's still standing there, trying to process what just happened.

"Bed," the hero reminds, shooing him with a hand. "Get some rest. You need to sleep off the rest of those drugs."

Izuku is already almost to the guest room, feeling a little floaty, when he hears a crash, followed by Yamada screeching WHAT DRUGS?

He walks faster, not wanting to be the one to explain that specific part of his midnight adventure to the man.

Aizawa will have to take one for the team, and honestly? That's what he gets.

But as he goes back to the room and lays down, with Missy staking claim to his desk as per usual, Izuku finds that he feels better, actually. He wasn't planning on getting caught, of course, and he wasn't trying to worry them—but life just has a weird way of kicking you in the ass. It's funny how things turn out sometimes.

Stain's face pops up in his mind momentarily, but it feels easy to push the image away this time. Just for a little while.

He was expecting many different ways that this night could end, but this surely wasn't one of them. It's not exactly the worst outcome, he thinks. Far from it.

In fact, it's probably one of the best ones.

There's blood on the walls.

It seeps through the cracks in the floor and stains the area around Izuku red.

He doesn't remember getting here. He doesn't remember where here even is. This place feels familiar, and yet Izuku can't recall it in his memories. He doubts it's even real.

The air is heavy with something he can't quite identify. It feels a little bit like fear. Like regret. But at the same time, neither of those fit quite right.

Izuku can feel his heart start to squeeze painfully inside his chest. Horror settles over his skin and sends tingles of dread down his spine, and when he tries to move from his spot he finds that he can't. His legs are rooted in place.

He's suffocating, he's sure of it. And yet even as he realizes this, his body remains perfectly still for another few moments, as if on autopilot. As if he's programmed.

This room is important. The copper building on his tongue is proof of that.

All of this feels like change. Like something Izuku ought to remember.

And what a strange feeling that is.

When he finally builds up the strength to twist his head around, he sees a guy strapped to a chair a couple yards to his left. He doesn't know how he didn't notice him before, or how he at least didn't sense him there, but then his mind chooses to focus on the hand-shaped burns on the man's arms and the dullness to his eyes, and he thinks oh.

So this is what this is. Things are starting to feel familiar now, almost hauntingly so.

"Why are we hurting them?"

The voice comes from out of nowhere, making Izuku whip around to try and see where the owner of it could possibly be. The feeling in his limbs is slowly starting to come back to him, but no amount of spinning in place allows him to see whoever is there. If there even is someone there. There's nothing but four bloody walls enclosing him in —four bloody walls cutting off any potential plans for escape.

And then there's the guy in the chair.

The more Izuku looks at him, the more he doesn't want to be here. At all. He wants out.

"Did they do something wrong?"

Izuku's blood turns to ice. He knows who those words belong to now. Kacchan used to tease him about his squeaky voice all the time back when they were both little. Well, it was more like insulting then, not so much teasing, but still.

No. It can't be. Is that…?

"Of course not, Izuku."

He both expected and prepared for it the moment he recognized the setup of the room, and yet Izuku can't help the full-body flinch when he hears the new voice all the same.

His hands start to shake on their own accord, and he nearly trips over himself in his franticness to just make sure he's not here. He can't see him, but that's how it was back then. It doesn't matter if you can't see him, he's there. He's always there.

Izuku's back hits the wall, blood staining his shirt. He can't use his quirks. None of them are coming to him, so does that mean it's over? Did it really happen this easily? Where even was Izuku before this? How did he get here?

Where's Yamada and Aizawa? Or Missy? Or, fuck, All Might—?

The guy strapped to the chair twitches, and Izuku's breathing picks up. He thought he was dead or something, but alas, the corpse is now sitting up straight in the center of the room, the restraints cutting against his skin. A cracked mouth opens to form a soundless wail, and Izuku shivers.

"If they're not villains, why do we make them cry?"

The man jerks, trying to escape, only to tense up at the electricity that pulses through him a moment later. The process looks almost cyclic. As if he's used to this by now but just can't let himself admit defeat. Not now and not ever.

It looks like a hero who will die fighting, Izuku realizes. It makes him want to throw up.

"A little pain is necessary for the world to advance, my dear boy." It comes out as a low rumble, and Izuku thinks it would almost sound comforting coming from anyone else. "Strangers hurt each other meaninglessly in war every day. This is no different."

War.

The blood starts to flow faster down the walls and up through the ground. It's all going towards Izuku. It's all around him, soaking his legs and feet and flooding the room.

When Izuku looks back up, the man and the chair are gone, replaced by a pile of limp figures. Bodies, his mind corrects. These are actual corpses this time.

He can tell they're dead even with how far away he is. His mind now allows him to see them as if they're under a microscope, and he can see how abnormally still they are under the faint light from above.

Oh, god.

No, no. This isn't right. This didn't happen. What is this? A nightmare? Some sick joke or something? Where are the cameras?

The panic is settling in deep, coursing through his veins and echoing in his bones.

More corpses flicker into view, appearing from the depths of the growing blood pool. He sees familiar faces. Familiar costumes and symbols and colors. These are his friends. His friends are dead.

The bodies continue to pile up, towering over him, and Izuku slides down the wall, hands over his mouth. What little light left is snuffed out, and glowing eyes peek at him through inky darkness from all corners of the room.

“This is… war?”

The blood is up to his chest now, but Izuku pays it no mind. He can’t. Not with how fast his mind is going. His insides have been hollowed out and replaced with horror and unadulterated fear.

Everything feels scary, wrong, and yet right after all. Nothing's making sense. His vision is blurring near the edges and he can’t even figure out why.

It’s when Izuku sees a flash of blond and black hair that he jolts into action, body moving before he can stop himself. His hand reaches out, a desperate cry tearing its way out of his throat, but the blood swallows him whole before he can make it.

The near suffocating heat that follows is more comforting than it probably should be.

When Izuku wakes, he can still taste the iron in his mouth. His entire body is trembling, and he nearly falls off the bed in his haste to make it to the trash can, throat burning. The amount of blood he coughs up this time is a lot more than he ever has before, and the realization does nothing to curb his rising anxiety.

It was just a dream, he reminds himself, gripping the edges of the waste basket. A dream. Nothing more.

He’s still slumped on the floor, not having the energy to move just yet. He can’t.

His hands are still stained red no matter how many times he wipes them on the bed sheets, and he can see more blood demanding his attention out of the corner of his vision, sliding down the bare walls of this room. He knows it’s not real, obviously, but he can’t help it. He can’t help but feel so fucking helpless and angry at how unfair his brain is, at how it’s making him go through this again.

It’s getting tiring.

Izuku looks up and sees the first rays of sunlight filtering in through the window above him. It must still be early, which means he only managed to sleep for a few hours.

What a great way to start the morning, huh?

It takes a few more minutes for Izuku to calm down, and in that time he throws away more bloodied tissues and falls back onto the bed—not before retrieving his bottle of pills, though. He's definitely going to need some of them now, as he can feel the tingling in his throat start back up again.

His body is itching worse than before, like the blood is still there, settling over his skin and caking underneath his nails. Like it'll never go away.

He can barely even remember the details of the dream, and he hates it. It couldn't have been that bad, right? If he forgot about most of it?

Izuku can't remember it all, but he can remember how vivid it felt. How scary.

Is this because of what happened last night? Perhaps the nightmare was an aftereffect of that girl's quirk. She can make you feel drunk, so it's entirely possible that his mind could have also been tampered with, consequently pushing him over the edge.

He really hopes that's the reason. If this is going to become a nightly thing again, he doesn't know what he'll do.

His thoughts go back to the medicine in his hands. What really bothers Izuku is that last night he was too out of it to fully question why Hawks ended up giving the pills back to him, as from a legal standpoint he should not have done so. Hawks even took extra care to hand over the bottle discreetly so he wouldn't alert Aizawa. It seems almost as if he knew Izuku had to keep that specific thing hidden from him, as if he knew that Izuku needed that medicine.

For why else would the number three hero decide to give potentially dangerous pills back to a wanted vigilante? He could've easily kept it—hell, it could've been a trade-off since he wasn't capturing Rabbit. Like a form of payment.

What Hawks did do, however, was keep the white paper bag that most prescription medicine is kept in.

And Izuku hates the coil of fear that springs up inside him at that. It has to have been a coincidence, he thinks, because what reason would he have to keep the bag? Izuku can't remember if his name was on it or not. He knows the name of the actual medicine must be on it, of course, but Hawks might not get anywhere with that piece of info since Izuku's doctor worked on making it himself.

These pills were made for Izuku. They're one of a kind. It's not like Hawks can just look up the name on the web and find an answer. No, he would have to go looking for one.

Which is fucking bad. Hawks wouldn't have taken something like that for no reason. Izuku knows he wouldn't have just thrown it away after flying off. No, it's more than likely that he kept it, that he still has it.

A dangerous train of thought that is, huh? Izuku briefly wonders if Hawks accepts bribes, being the type of hero he is. Maybe a bucket of chicken would suffice, and also a promise to do whatever dirty work he wants.

Izuku wouldn't mind having to work alongside Hawks in secret for whatever reason, though he doubts it would ever be that easy.

Nothing is ever that easy with adults.

Missy hops onto the bed and face-plants into his stomach, rubbing her hair all over him as she stretches.

"Morning to you, too," he greets, thankful for the distraction. The tuxedo cat just playfully bites into his hand when he tries to pet her and then flops the rest of the way down, tail whacking his face.

She's getting a little heavier, Izuku realizes. While he was feeding her and taking care of her as best he could before the explosion, Missy still could've put on a few pounds if the situation let her. But here, where the food is stable and on time, and also probably much healthier than the food Izuku was feeding her, she's been getting bigger.

It's relieving to know that she's safe and content here. It hasn't gone unnoticed to Izuku how she tends to follow Aizawa around and con him into giving her treats. She seems to like the hero a lot, which only makes Izuku a little jealous.

The last thing he needs is for Aizawa and Yamada to turn her against him. She was Izuku's cat first.

"I take it you didn't snitch after I left?" He teases.

She meows in response, ears flattening, and at the same time there's a couple of knocks at the door.

Izuku yelps, not having felt anyone approaching. He quickly sits back up, accidentally throwing Missy off of him in the process, and shoves the bottle of pills under a pillow. “Uh, yeah! Come in!”

He still doesn’t know why his teachers bother knocking, but he can’t say he doesn’t appreciate it. Privacy is nice, if not unexpected.

Yamada pokes his head through the door, smiling widely. “Mornin’, kiddo! Sho’s making some breakfast before he has to go, so I hope you’re up for some eggs!”

Breakfast? Now that Izuku is thinking about it, he smells something delicious coming from the kitchen, along with—is that bacon?

Oh, fucking hell, Yamada should’ve led with that.

Izuku scrambles off the bed, only for his foot to get caught in the sheets and send him tumbling to the floor. He squawks when the comforter comes with him, tangling him up even further as he tries to wriggle out of the trap.

It’s only now that he realizes how sore his limbs are. He didn’t even stretch or exercise before going out on patrol last night, and all of the stuff he did certainly wouldn’t help with his injuries, he thinks.

Yeah. Definitely not his best idea.

“Dammit!” His face turns beet red when he hears Yamada double over in laughter, and he struggles even more. “I’m coming! Just—just give me a minute, I swear—!”

A weight settles on his back, and Izuku cranes his neck to glare at the smug-looking cat sitting on him, tail curled politely around white and black paws.

You snake, Missy, he thinks. There’s a reason I like Sushi better!

Yamada is still laughing at the sight of Izuku writhing around on the floor like a dying fish. The boy is just about to call upon one of his quirks to somehow help him out when Yamada takes pity on him.

He pads forward, galaxy slippers sliding across fluffy carpet, and Izuku immediately stops struggling in anticipation. The man reaches down and tugs sharply at a corner of the comforter, which sends Izuku rolling off to the side when the blanket unfurls from around him.

Successfully freed from his prison, Izuku shoots back up to his feet, stumbling a little with his ears burning as he tries to regain his balance. Okay, so maybe it could've been that easy to escape that. His panic just made him think and act a little slower than usual, that's all.

"Good m^{orni}n^{g}!" Izuku says, trying and failing to maintain any last semblance of dignity. He decides to ignore how painfully his voice just cracked, as that is the second fucking time, instead choosing to head for the doorway. "Did—did you sleep okay?"

It was already morning by the time everything ended, but still.

Yamada makes a noise that's somewhere between a laugh and an affirmative hum, and he places a light hand on Izuku's head when the boy walks past him. "I did, thank you. I'm hoping you got some hours in, too?"

Oh, Izuku kind of wants to snort at that, but he holds it in and instead gives a sharp nod. He follows Yamada out into the living room, pointedly ignoring the mewling Missy doing figure-eights around his legs.

She knows what she did.

The apartment feels nice somehow, he notices. Well, it always feels nice, but this time it all feels a little more prominent. He walks further into the living room, and it's like a nice blanket being draped over him on a chilly night. He stands around by the dining table, just taking a moment to breathe in the smell of bacon and pancakes. There's orange juice on the table, along with the last of Izuku's medicine—his actual medicine. The kind that the doctors at the hospital are making him take.

Whether or not he should keep taking them now that he's on another, unlicensed drug is the question, but he figures he'll just have to wait and find out what happens when the different drugs mix.

Aizawa is in the kitchen by the stove, already looking fully dressed and ready to go, and when he catches sight of Izuku's still-flushed face he furrows his brows in suspicion. "What did I miss?"

"Nothing!" Izuku says quickly.

The underground hero looks even more suspicious at that. He glances at Yamada, who raises his hands with a shit-eating grin. "You heard the listener. Nothing to concern yourself over, Sho. You just keep flipping those pancakes."

Aizawa glowers at him. "I'm going to burn yours."

Izuku giggles at the indignant shriek that Yamada lets out in reply, and after a moment's hesitation he lets his feet carry himself into the kitchen. There's a plate full of bacon off to the side of the stove, along with some sunny-side up eggs.

They look perfect, almost professionally done. Izuku thinks faintly that Gordon Ramsay would be absolutely delighted if he saw them. Hell, Ms. Hanako would probably give Aizawa a free basket of her pastries and goods because finally, someone who actually knows how to make decent eggs around here. My hope for the younger generations has been restored.

Izuku walks a little closer, careful not to get in Aizawa's way. The hero is pouring batter onto a griddle on the stovetop, and the boy's eyes widen a little.

Pancakes. He's making pancakes. Izuku didn't even know he knew how to make pancakes. He knows Aizawa can cook, obviously, the man just doesn't ever feel like doing so. But pancakes? Has he ever told Izuku he could make that?

It's kind of funny, honestly. Hardass, compulsive expeller Aizawa Shouta makes chocolate chip pancakes in his free time. And damn good ones at that; they smell heavenly, and the ones he's already made are sitting off to the side, the slightest crispiness to the edges.

Just how Kurogiri would make them, his mind says suddenly, and Izuku beats that voice down with a stick, annoyed now at the reminder. Now is not the time to go back down that road.

He looks up, noting the dark circles under Aizawa's eyes. Well, dark*er*. The man looks like he hasn't slept at all in at least a week, which makes a stab of guilt hit Izuku in the chest.

He blinks, and all he sees is Aizawa holding him back behind him, Aizawa shielding him from a piercing golden gaze.

Izuku steps back a little to study his face. Is he mad? He knows Yamada said that neither of them are upset about what he did, but it's been a few hours since then. Things change. They always do.

But Aizawa is usually blunt. Izuku has learned to count on that. The man doesn't hesitate in saying his opinions when the situation calls for it, so the fact that he's being pretty silent is unnerving.

It's almost scary.

Izuku moves away even further, about to head for the living room, but then Aizawa is stepping back and handing him the spatula. "Flip them when they're done," he says simply, turning around to get some utensils from the drawer.

And Izuku hesitates. Pancakes. He hasn't made these in a long, long time, but he knows how easy it is to burn them. It's easy to get it right, too, though, which is why it's pathetic that he's panicking.

His mind is blank. He thinks it's because of the dream he had and yet he can't be so sure.

Shit, he should know when to flip them. They're just pancakes. It should be stupidly easy. Just… flip them when they start to smoke, right? Or whenever they start to not stick to the pan? But these look to have a ton of chocolate chips in them, and Izuku knows that too many chocolate chips can affect the heat distribution and either cook the pancakes too fast or too slow.

If he flips one like he would a plain pancake, it might not be done all the way inside, or worse, he'll burn it.

He should ask for confirmation. He knows Aizawa won't ridicule him for it. The man only gets upset when someone gets hurt or fails at something because they didn't ask for help.

But still. Izuku is getting stuck on something that even a five year old could grasp. That's embarrassing.

"Have you ever made pancakes before?" Yamada asks, suddenly right beside him. The movement makes Izuku flinch despite himself.

Try again.

"I have," he says a little quietly, stepping away and handing Yamada the spatula. "But it's been a while since the last time I did it. I think I just, uh, forgot how?" Izuku rubs the back of his neck at the last two words, suddenly embarrassed.

But Yamada's face just lights up, and when he smiles his eyes crinkle near the edges. "Ooh, so all the more reason to teach you, yeah?" He moves so he's standing right beside him, his arm brushing Izuku's shoulder. "Some pancake recipes differ, but I'll show you how Sho and I make them!"

The voice hero points with the spatula to a cookbook sitting on the countertop across from them, and he starts to recite the ingredients and steps aloud. He then directs Izuku to continue making more batter as he flips the pancakes already on the stove, adding even more chocolate chips.

He spreads them out to look like cat ears on the pancakes, and Izuku smiles at the display. Yamada does it so fluidly that Izuku is sure he's done this before, probably for Aizawa.

It's heartwarming to see. Almost sickeningly sweet.

"Once you've got that done, you just pour the batter onto the griddle until you get the size you want!" Yamada moves to the side to allow Izuku more space to pour. "Just make sure not to make them too big, though, since bigger pancakes are harder to flip."

And they won't cook correctly on the inside, Izuku thinks, the memories suddenly flooding back to him.

He can hear Aizawa unloading the dishwasher somewhere behind him, and Izuku frowns to himself. That's a job that Izuku could be doing. It's mundane and boring, so he should be doing that instead of Aizawa.

Yamada nudges his shoulder to get his attention. "You know one side is close to done when it starts to bubble on the edges. You'll spot little holes pop up through the batter, see?"

He hands Izuku the spatula and encourages him to flip them this time while he takes over the batter bowl. Izuku does so with great care, eyebrows pinched. This is simple, but I'm panicking. Why am I still panicking?

Yamada starts to once again add an ungodly amount of chocolate chips and blueberries to the last of the mix, and the action is so inherently Present Mic that it's enough to bring Izuku out of his stupor immediately.

Holy shit. These pancakes are about to be so damn good.

"The eggs are getting cold, you know," Aizawa complains, finishing up with the dishwasher and setting three plates out. Coffee is now brewing in the machine next to the toaster, and Izuku stops himself from asking for some.

Huh. It's almost like Aizawa is trying to tell them to hurry up without actually telling them to hurry up.

Yamada just sticks his tongue out before turning back to Izuku in a low whisper, suddenly switching to English. "You see, we gotta be careful with this here species, since the underground hero can pose a threat to just about anyone on Saturday mornings." Yamada narrows his eyes at Aizawa and studies him as a scientist would. "Especially when he hasn't had his coffee yet."

Izuku giggles, stacking the last of the pancakes on top of the others and setting them on the dining table. He hears Aizawa complain about how you know I'm not fluent in English, 'Zashi, come on, which only makes Izuku cackle harder.

All four cats are eating breakfast now, and it doesn't take long before the three of them are seated at the table. Yamada sits at one of the head spots this time, and Izuku sits in the seat closest to him with Aizawa straight across on the other side.

The eggs aren't actually cold, it turns out. They're still relatively warm, and Izuku just can't eat fast enough. His little excursion last night has left him tired, sore, and starved.

That last part is probably because Izuku wasn't able to finish his KFC before being drugged—which he's never going to forget about, by the way. He's forever going to hold resentment for the two criminals who got in the way of his chicken.

He swings his legs back and forth out of nerves, scarfing down the pancakes and bacon on his plate. They did end up making a ton of pancakes, which is weird. Izuku is the only one here who has to eat more than the average person, but even still, it's not like Izuku has been doing that lately. Hell, he's never done that.

But since the food is there… since Aizawa and Yamada look like they're almost done anyway… it wouldn't hurt to take more, right? Just so it won't get wasted?

As per usual, Yamada is the one leading the conversation this morning. Izuku excitedly talks with him between mouthfuls, and Aizawa buts in when he's not downing his two mugs of coffee.

Coffee that Izuku still wants and will one day work up the courage to ask him for. He practically lives off coffee, hot or cold, so not having it for like a week now feels like some form of punishment from above.

Or down below.

Neither of them say anything about last night. In fact, it's almost like they're avoiding the subject altogether for the time being. Now, Izuku should probably be more happy about that than he is. He's just scared. Because if they don't say anything about it, he won't know how they feel, and he won't know what will come next.

It's the unknown of it all that terrifies him.

Aizawa is going to the hospital after breakfast to go see Ingenium, which reminds Izuku that both of his teachers are friends with the other hero. Yamada went to see him last night, which is why he was presumably late coming home.

He hopes Iida and the rest of his family are okay. Izuku hasn't been a good friend at all to him—to anyone in 1-A, actually. He needs to be better. Much better.

When breakfast is finished and Izuku is taking his dishes back to the kitchen, he realizes that things feel sharper than they did last night. Like there's some sort of film over everything that's turning up the contrast and brightness of everything.

It's weird, but not quite unwelcome.

He can already tell that the pills are working. They must be the cause of what's happening, he thinks. His ears are sensitive; he can hear the hustle and bustle of the city outside, he can hear Yamada's phone vibrate from halfway across the apartment, and he can hear the low conversation the two heroes are having together through the kitchen wall.

Izuku could probably listen in if he wanted to, he could probably pick out every word, but he restrains himself. They give me privacy, even when I don't deserve it, so it's only fair.

There's a heavy weight in his chest, almost like there's a brick just hanging out inside there, scraping dangerously against his ribcage. He reaches up with a hand and presses at the spot, the uncomfortable feeling easing up a little.

His hands and fingers are trembling. They've been doing that for a while, he thinks. They haven't stopped doing that since… since the explosion, just about. He's just been trying to ignore it this whole time, because if he doesn't think about it or acknowledge it, eventually it should get easier to deal with, right?

Some days are worse than others. He really hopes that's the case today.

Izuku finishes putting everything in the sink and pauses, eyeing the mixing bowl that still has some leftover batter stuck to the sides. He dips a finger in to taste it, not able to resist the urge, and nearly jumps out of his skin when Aizawa walks up behind him.

"You're going to get salmonella," the man says, wrinkling his nose and turning on the tap to wash his hands.

Izuku shakes his head. "I'm immune to salmon vanilla, actually."

The sudden snort he gets in reply has Izuku beaming, his chest getting just a little lighter at the sound. Victory.

"Sure, kid, whatever you say." He nudges him with a hand. "Don't worry about the dishes. Just get to the table so we can talk."

The smile slips off Izuku's face instantly, and the boy stays rooted to the spot, watching Aizawa head back to the dining room. Talk. So they can talk.

Oh. Izuku had forgotten that they wanted to have a little chat with him before Aizawa left. What is this about again? Ground rules? This is because of what happened last night.

The mere thought of it has Izuku's arms stiffening at his sides. It's not an interrogation. Quit it. You knew this was coming.

When he comes back to himself, he sees that Yamada is already back at the table. But now he's in Aizawa's spot, and the underground hero is walking past to sit in the chair right across from him.

Which leaves the head of the table open, the chair having not been pushed in yet. The two men are facing a little ways that way, looking expectant. They want him to take that spot so they can both look at him properly, it seems.

But Izuku doesn't want to. Why would he be at the head of the table?

It's obvious that this was deliberate on their part, and he doesn't like it one bit.

Is this a test? He doesn't think so, as that would be cruel. But at the same time, you never know.

A tail brushes against Izuku's leg, and the boy takes the chance to bend down and pick Meatball up, cradling the cat like a baby to avoid meeting any of the adults' gazes. He ignores the space between the both of them and instead chooses to sit beside Yamada, blood roaring in his ears.

The pause only feels long because he's focusing on it, he tells himself. This is fine. This is okay. They won't get upset at him for going off-script.

It's Yamada who starts first, his voice patient and so, so kind that Izuku finds himself clinging to the words to help himself calm down. He's sure the blond must've been saying something to him before this, probably when he was walking over, but Izuku was too busy trying not to pass out to hear it.

"I just want to preface this by repeating that last night wasn't your fault at all, kiddo," Yamada says, trying and failing to get Izuku to look at him. The boy just keeps petting Meatball, deathly quiet. "That was due to lack of communication on our part. We kept some secrets from you and made you feel left out of the loop, yeah? So it's only fitting you felt the need to leave for a bit."

Izuku doesn't miss the word choice. We kept secrets. We made you feel left out. This means Yamada did know about how the criminals were killed during the explosion, at least in some way or another. But Izuku doesn't feel as upset about it as he thought he would be. It's easier now that he already knows about it—he only freaked out on Aizawa because the news had been shocking then.

The news of Stain had been shocking.

And though he's not alright with it, Izuku can see some of the reasons behind the men's actions. They weren't doing it to hurt him, no. Far from it.

To protect him, maybe. To shield him from having to deal with that clusterfuck. It's annoying that they thought doing that was necessary, though, because that just makes everything harder. Much harder.

Izuku doesn't need someone to protect him. The truth is the truth. You can't run or hide from it forever.

It always gets you in the end.

Yamada continues his speech, giving Izuku a small, half-smile. "And without that communication, I think we made you feel like you couldn't trust us, and that we didn't trust you. I'm hoping we can change that today, as that isn't healthy for any of us, you know?"

There are four cracks in the table. Izuku focuses on them as he strokes Meatball, wondering if they're just products of age or of something else. How many more would it take for the table to break?

Aizawa nods, leaning back in his chair and folding his arms. "Trust works both ways," he says slowly.

And isn't this weird? Izuku never thought he'd be in a situation like this—having a talk about trust with his two teachers, in their apartment, with their cats.

He's been here for a week, and yet he still can't get over it.

The boy swallows back the lump in his throat. He knows Aizawa's comment wasn't meant like that, but he can't help the small bit of guilt that blooms inside him because of it. "Yeah," he whispers. "It does."

"Your health and safety is important, Midoriya, which is why Shouta and I have come up with a few rules that we could maybe implement around the apartment? It's more of a list of general house rules that we can all try our best to follow, since it wouldn't be very fair to just direct them all at you, yeah?"

Izuku blinks as Pickles hops into his lap and jostles Meatball in the process of begging for pets.

It's not supposed to be fair, though?

The blond pulls out a sheet of paper, smoothing down the creases before placing it on the table for Izuku to see.

"I wrote most of them down so it would be easier to talk through with all of us here, and I think it would be a good idea if we put this on the fridge after we're done, just so we can all see it! Is that okay?"

His voice gets higher near the end, signaling a direct question, and Izuku raises his head to look at Aizawa for his input. The hero merely shrugs and says nothing, leaving the boy on his own.

Why am I the only one giving input if it's not supposed to be directed at just me?

"Kiddo?"

Izuku shifts in the chair, biting the inside of his cheek hard enough to make it bleed. "Uh, yeah, that's fine."

It's just a paper, right? While its presence will probably annoy Izuku every time he has to go into the kitchen, there's not much harm it can do. He'll live. It won't be hard to ignore it.

At least in theory.

The first rule is simple, and it's not entirely unexpected. The topic of communication is probably brought up in every household, so Izuku had sort of mentally prepared for this one the moment he sat down. Yamada speaks every word like it's the most important thing in the world, like it matters beyond what one would normally expect, and the fact has something heavy lodging in Izuku's throat.

"Of course it's okay to have secrets," Yamada says, starting off slow. "Everyone has secrets, even adults! But things get a little tricky when we don't know about something that can potentially put you in harm's way or affect your health. Your well-being is still our priority, so I think it's important that we try to maintain that level of communication here, yeah? That goes for all of us."

That's not specific. I can work around that if I really need to, as it really depends on what you count as potentially harmful.

It's not like Izuku will actively be looking for a way to break the rule, it's just that it's easier to set these boundaries inside his head, too. It's easier to remember and follow that way.

The points that follow are... interesting, to say the least. Izuku has to fight back a snort at the second rule: be kind to yourself!

He's not sure why that one was important enough to warrant its own number, but he guesses it's fine. Yamada explains what exactly this entails, and the frown on Izuku's face gradually gets deeper.

What the fuck does treat yourself like you're your only friend even mean? And again, why is this important?

He doesn't voice these opinions out loud, though. He just nods along and hums when an answer is needed.

The third rule is about lying, something that Izuku is very familiar with, both in terms of doing and spotting.

Aizawa is the one who explains this one, but all he says is you can lie about whatever you want as long as it's not important, just don't get caught.

Izuku finds this quite funny, actually, but Yamada evidently does not. The voice hero glares at his husband and kicks him under the table, turning back to Izuku to recapitulate what the point really means.

"This one goes off rule number one, listener. As I've said, it's not strange for people to lie sometimes, and it's especially not abnormal for teenagers to lie. It would be unfair of us to expect you to be completely truthful all the time, especially since we ourselves weren't always truthful when we were your age."

Aizawa mutters something suspiciously like speak for yourself, 'Zashi, I was an angel, which earns him another kick to the shins.

Izuku hides his laugh with a cough into his palm. Did we switch personalities or something?

"So just please try not to lie about anything that has to do with your safety, kiddo!" Yamada continues as if the interruption never happened.

The boy thinks faintly that this one could've been merged with the first one, but it's too late now, for they're already onto the next rule.

Now this one has Izuku truly coughing into his hand: No drug or alcohol use, both inside the house and out.

Oh. Izuku truly couldn't be more sorry if he tried. Whoops.

Apparently there's not usually alcohol kept in the apartment for a variety of reasons, and Yamada said they'd like to keep it that way, especially since Izuku isn't even old enough to drink anyway.

Not that that's ever stopped him before.

Izuku keeps his gaze on the table, his knee starting to bounce up and down again. He doesn't miss the pointed look the voice hero gives to Aizawa, almost like he's reminding the other of something.

It doesn't seem like it's a good thing.

Everything that comes next follows the script Izuku had planned out in his head. The other rules are all clear, blunt, and typical for most households, and most of them have a little wriggle room for Izuku to work with.

Which is always good. Control is one of the things he needs, no matter how small.

When Yamada talks about the no yelling or arguing in the house rule, Aizawa and Izuku make the same face. They both obviously don't think that's going to last long.

The last point on the paper isn't exactly a rule, but Yamada goes over it anyway, a crease forming between his brows as he faces Izuku fully, his voice taking on a more solemn tone.

"And about last night, kiddo. We just ask that you don't disappear like that again, okay? You really worried us there." The blond laughs softly, though it's not because something's funny. "If you feel like you have to do that again, or that you need to get away from something, please come to one of us. We'll do everything we can to help you, I promise."

I promise?

Izuku scratches at the scar on his jaw, cheeks turning dark at the reminder of how he ran away just a few hours prior to this. "Okay," he mutters before he can even process what he's doing. "I won't disappear again, I promise."

Yamada and Aizawa both blink in surprised relief at him, and Izuku is left wondering what the hell compelled him to even say that. He never makes promises! He doesn't make them precisely because he knows there's a high chance he'll break them! Fuck! What is wrong with him today?

It's Aizawa who breaks the silence, his gruff voice dragging Izuku out from his muddled thoughts and mind. The teacher's eyes flash in the light, and he sighs. "I just want to say that things will change here very soon, kid. I apologize for keeping you cooped up in here for a week, and also for not doing my best to keep you updated on what was happening out there. Like Hizashi said, I'm hoping we can try this out and see how it goes. That's all we can do now; try."

The last part isn't phrased like a question, but the boy shrugs as a way of acknowledgement anyway.

Yamada must see the look on his face, because he rests a light hand on his arm. "Hey, don't stress about it. These are things we can work on together, yeah? All of us."

Izuku glances away. "Even the cats?" He asks, and Yamada laughs a little.

"Yeah, listener, even the cats." For the second time, Yamada's eyes flick over pointedly to Aizawa, who looks to be thinking of something unpleasant before seemingly resigning to his fate.

He hunches forward in an attempt to not look so intimidating, but to Izuku that action somehow just has the opposite effect. Aizawa clears his throat before fixing the boy with a stare. "Hizashi and I also wanted to talk to you about a couple other things."

"It's about your health," Yamada adds, and it's the way he says it that tells Izuku that he's not going to like the upcoming discussion.

Shit. Health? Did Recovery Girl tell them about my blood or something? Or did she snitch about something else?

He doesn't want to explain the issue of his blood to the two of them. Sure, he could just spew the same lie he told the healer about the condition being painless and not a cause for concern, but doing so directly after a conversation about lying and trust?

It would make Izuku feel like one big asshole. Like a cheater.

The boy pushes down the bile creeping up his throat and nods, knee starting to bounce up and down again. He needs this discussion to be over soon.

Aizawa folds his arms and rests them on the table. "Monday marks your first day back at school. When we get to UA you're to head straight for the nurse's office so Chiyo can give you a checkup and take a look at how the healing's going. This is just a precaution so we can figure out if things have worsened for you or not."

“Wait, I’m going to school?” he echoes, frowning. He should probably pay more attention to the other details Aizawa gave, but at the moment he can’t think past the first part.

Logically, sending Izuku back to school would be an obvious course of action, especially since there’s nothing wrong with the boy. There never was anything wrong with him—at least, nothing that the explosions caused. But despite the rationality of it, Izuku still finds himself surprised by the notion of being sent back to a classroom, as it almost feels as if they’re acting like nothing ever happened, like they’re just forgetting that his secret identity was revealed.

He still isn't past the illegality of that part.

“Yep!” Yamada says. He tilts his head to the side. “Why wouldn’t you be, listener?”

Because I thought I would’ve been locked up by now, or at the very least shoved into someone else’s hands entirely.

“I—I don’t have a uniform anymore?” He winces even as he says it, his mind scrambling for a better excuse that won’t get him laughed at.

“UA covers the cost of up to two additional replacement uniforms, listener. There’s one ready for you there as we speak.”

Izuku’s mouth forms a little o shape, because fuck, now isn’t that convenient?

“As I was saying,” Aizawa cuts in, “the checkup with Chiyo will happen once every week for at least the rest of the month. That part is non-negotiable, but we can talk more on the school situation when it happens.”

Five. There are five cracks in the table now, this one nearly naked to the human eye. Izuku didn’t even realize he had taken to drumming his fingers along the edge of it until now.

He swallows drily. He doesn’t like the term non-negotiable, but he doesn’t argue. He can try to change that once it happens; picking your battles is important.

“The next thing regards one of the new rules.” Aizawa’s voice sounds more cautious, and Yamada’s gaze slides over to meet Izuku’s again. Fuck. “We wanted to address something that Hizashi found at your building the morning after the incident. This isn't exactly your fault entirely, and this also isn't what you might be expecting—"

Izuku blinks at the sudden, jarring noise in his mind. It's like an alarm bell has gone off, and he tunes the man out almost without meaning to as he focuses on the area around him. He hears footsteps near them, feels something approaching from the left side of the hallway. It's close, and it's moving fast.

"Kid? What—?"

Before he can reply that there's someone coming in their direction, watch the door, there's the jingling of a key near the entrance, and then the door to the apartment is being flung open, sending the cats scattering;

The couple in the room had tensed at the sound of the keys, but upon seeing who's at the doorway now, the two heroes relax.

"I've arrived early for once!" Kayama Nemuri boasts in a sing-song voice, kicking the door shut behind her as she swaggers further into the apartment. "Isn't that fantastic!"

"Nemuri, I told you to text one of us when you were coming over," Aizawa says through gritted teeth, obviously annoyed, and Izuku's eyes widen a little.

"Oh, come off it, Shouta!" The r-rated hero walks right past them to set the three bags she's carrying on the counter. "I texted Hizashi, ya know, but it's like neither of you like to answer me anymore. I just came by to see my baby, and I'd like to see you just try and stop me from—ah! There he is!"

Midnight cuts off with a delighted gasp as Sushi darts toward her from the hallway, tail held high. The cat jumps into her waiting arms when Kayama kneels down, and Izuku watches as they have their reunion, slightly confused.

He doubts it could've been more than a week since the two last saw each other, but who is he to judge? He was the same way with Missy when Yamada picked her up from the vet's.

While the voice hero is content in rifling through the bags Kayama brought with curiosity, Aizawa is busy thunking his head on the table. Which, okay, same.

Izuku flushes when his arts teacher stands up with Sushi held in her arms and looks at him, sky blue eyes meeting emerald ones.

“Ooh, look who’s here,” she teases, seeming to recognize him instantly. “Morning, Midoriya.”

Does she know about everything? What do I say? She doesn’t look too surprised.

He glances at Aizawa briefly, who’s now watching the interaction closely. The man doesn’t offer any help in answering, not that Izuku expected him to, so the boy just slides off the chair and shifts into a quick bow, hands held in fists at his sides. This is awkward.

“Kayama-sensei!” He greets, entirely unsure of himself. This is a whole ‘nother person in the apartment. This is someone different who can witness his tomfoolery. He has to be careful. He has to be Midoriya. “Good morning! It’s nice—”

The breath is nearly punched from his lungs when the pro lurches forward to grab him by the shoulder, pulling him close to her side with surprising ease. “No need to bother with the boring pleasantries, kid! It’s nice to see ya looking healthy for once!”

Izuku is stiff as a board, eyes wide as saucers as the teacher roughly messes up his hair. Sushi is meowing contently by his ear, still clutching Kayama’s arm, and he looks smug at the turn of events.

“You know, I just knew you were different,” Kayama sighs dramatically, almost wistfully. “To think I’ve been talking with my future nephew for weeks now without knowing it! Crazy, right?”

The boy sputters, face turning beet red as he processes what she said. What? Her future what?

“Nemuri,” Aizawa warns, and the other hero cackles loudly.

“I was only joking, come on.” She lets Izuku go and tips her head thoughtfully to the side, eyes glittering in the light. “Well, partially. But anyway, I brought goodies for you boys!”

Izuku is left standing in place when she joins Yamada in the kitchen to take out the rest of her goods. The two teachers greet each other fondly, matching smirks on their faces.

That’s slightly concerning, a voice in Izuku’s head says, and the boy ends up nodding In agreement. Very. They could be plotting world domination and we'd never know it.

Aizawa sighs. "We can finish that conversation later, then," he whispers to himself, and Izuku's heart gives a jolt inside his chest.

He's probably talking about what he was going to say before Kayama arrived. If he's saying this now, just how important is it? Why can't he just quickly tell Izuku? Will it be a long conversation?

Aizawa turns to him and places a heavy hand on his head, making Izuku frown a little. That's the third time today someone has touched his hair, and it's weird for him to think about how he doesn't mind it at all. "Visiting hours are open at the hospital, so I should get going. You're in charge of those two while I'm gone."

Izuku nearly ascends with the trust being extended to him, even though he knows it's mostly a joke, and he watches the man gather up the rest of his things before saying goodbye to the other two.

Fuck. Why is Izuku worrying so much suddenly? Aizawa is coming back. He's just visiting Ingenium in the hospital before the man is released in the near future; it's not like he's going out on patrol. He'll be fine. There's no reason for him to get hurt or something.

Which means Izuku has no reason to be feeling so… dreadful.

The door seems to shut with a kind of finality when Aizawa leaves, and Izuku glares at the wood for a few moments after. He'll be fine. Quit it.

He wraps his arms around himself, glancing back at his teachers. Kayama seems to have brought a ton of stuff over, which is interesting. She said she had just come over to see Sushi, right? So why would she have all of this stuff?

Aizawa mentioned that she was supposed to text when she was on the way, so it's not like this was a spur of the moment decision. Which leads Izuku to thinking this wasn't so accidental after all. Her timing can't be accidental either.

Is she here to babysit him? To babysit Yamada and him? It's not like Izuku wants her to go, but it doesn't look like she's planning on leaving anytime soon.

He doesn't need a babysitter, he's not a child—

“I brought juice boxes!” Kayama grins, and Izuku’s breath hitches.

“Oh my god,” he says, walking over quickly. “What flavor!”

Yamada laughs. “It’s all apple juice, listener. She doesn’t like any other kind of juice at all.”

“Not even grape juice?”

Kayama shudders. “I despise grape juice. It’s disgusting, and any person who drinks it is a barbarian.”

Now that just won’t stand. Izuku loves grape juice, but only when it's really cold. If it’s not cold, he agrees that it’s absolutely revolting. “Grape juice is the backbone of this society,” he mutters, making the other two laugh without meaning to.

Izuku is handed one of the boxes of apple juice, and he wastes no time in slurping it down. If he can focus on drinking, maybe he’ll forget that awful feeling in his chest.

“Are you ready, kiddo?”

He glances up at Yamada in question, about to ask what for, but Kayama answers first with her eyebrows wagging mischievously. “We’re going to trash this place while Shouta’s gone, Midoriya. You up for it?”

Oh, that sounds like a great idea.

Izuku is used to awkwardness.

He’s a little awkward and shy himself, so it’s only fitting that he’d be used to it by now. But he wasn’t quite ready for the awkwardness that would come along with talking to Kayama at first.

His teacher told him not to refer to her by sensei or Midnight here, as she’s off-duty, so Izuku guesses that puts her in the same boat as Yamada and Aizawa.

The awkwardness didn't last long, though, as Kayama is easy to talk to when she's like this. As she said, she's not her hero self right now—she's just Kayama. She's much calmer and sweeter than the R-rated hero is perceived as. Kayama is more attentive to emotion, almost like a mother.

She has that kind of open air to her with an added bit of fire, and her quirk feels the same way. Izuku is definitely going to be committing her quirk's feel to memory from now on; he doesn't know why he didn't do so before.

Hm, maybe not a mother. She's more like a vodka aunt.

The hero is wearing a fluffy purple and gold sweater with her hair tied back, her kind eyes locked on his as he speaks to her about her quirk and about missions he's taken before.

There's just something about her that makes Izuku ramble even more than he does already. He can't stop the words from pouring out now that there's someone else willing to listen to him.

And she doesn't just listen. She interacts! She laughs and cringes and adds onto some of the stories he tells with enthusiasm and even tells him some of her own. Yamada is enjoying this as well, Izuku knows, because he starts to take pictures of whatever they do.

Probably to send to Aizawa.

They start with a pillow fort in the living room, and Izuku is proud to say that this is probably one of the most structurally-sound things he's ever had the pleasure of building! They moved the coffee table out of the way and instead used it to put something heavy over the edges of the sheets.

There's surprisingly a ton of space on the inside, and Izuku nearly squeals with glee when Yamada brings out a small nighttime projector that lights up the space with small stars and galaxies of different colors.

Does Izuku want it? Of course he does, but he refrains himself from asking for one. He's holding out hope that one day Yamada will just offer it to him, even though he knows it's super unlikely.

"Now, what is with your hair, kid? We gotta fix this." Kayama shakes her head and digs around in her purse, muttering something about how she's brought just the supplies for this occasion. She somehow manages to pull out a fuck ton of stuff from her small bag, including a whole hairdryer and a set of what looks like very expensive hair scissors and combs.

Who just carries a hairdryer on them? What the fuck? And how does all of that just stay in that purse? There's no room!

It's almost like this was planned. Like this is an intervention.

Yamada tilts his head at him. "Do you want to cut your hair, Midoriya? Nem's a very good hairdresser, I promise. She even does my hair sometimes if I'm too tired to do it."

The boy hesitates only for a moment. He's been meaning to cut his hair for a long time but has never had the time or patience to do it. It wasn't a priority for him. But that's why he probably looks like a trash gremlin to many, and that may also be why he wants to change it now.

Maybe more change will be good. Izuku feels like he's too stuck on the past.

The two teachers get excited when he says yes, and they start to tear down the fort to make room for the hair cutting. Why they need so much room, Izuku doesn't know. He'd be fine with getting just a quick, maybe even sloppy cut, but it appears they don't think that's acceptable.

Kayama instructs him to sit in the chair she put in the middle of the living room, and once she drapes a sheet over his shoulders and manages to get a good look at the state of his head, she tuts. "You don't know proper hair care, do you?"

He laughs nervously, fiddling with his hands in his lap. "I do, but I usually just give up on styling it. It's too curly to do anything with it, really."

"It's alright, hon. I've wrangled in curlier hair than this before." Kayama's voice turns dark. "And besides, I like being challenged."

Izuku snorts, wanting to make a joke but holding himself back. Not yet. I've gotta hold it in.

Yamada comes out of the bathroom with a bottle of product to put in his hair first, saying that it'll be a good kind to use on his curls. Whether or not that's true, Izuku doesn't care, because he's too busy focusing on the feeling of gentle hands in his hair and the sound of muted conversations happening around him.

It feels nice, is the thing. The product smells like strawberries, and it reminds Izuku faintly of Kacchan. It leaves his hair feeling soft and bouncy and light, and he finds that it's definitely an improvement to how it was before.

When it's time to actually cut it, the process doesn't take too long. Kayama is definitely an expert somehow, and she doesn't waste time. She asks the boy how he wants it trimmed exactly, but Izuku just shrugs and says to do whatever she wants, he doesn't exactly mind.

And so Izuku is slightly surprised when Kayama eventually steps back and hands him a mirror, asking him if he likes it or not or wants it changed.

She actually didn't do much of anything but trim it like how one regularly would. There are no stray pieces falling into his eyes anymore, and there aren't any noticeable rough patches on his head from where the fire had burnt some of it off. The curls on the sides of his head have been cut shorter, thus putting emphasis on his jaw and face.

The product also seemed to add more volume, so Izuku's hair looks like a proper, cleaner bush now. Like one of those finely trimmed bushes you see at amusement parks.

And it's not bad, really. Just different. It's still inherently Izuku, but with a small twist.

The entire time he's looking in the mirror, he doesn't notice or even acknowledge the thin scar on his face even once.

Izuku lets out a small smile after handing the mirror back. "I love it," he says, thanking her, and Kayama and Yamada both give a little cheer.

He doesn't stop Yamada when the voice hero starts to braid the longer strands on the top of Izuku's head. He adds in more of that conditioner-thing (Izuku should really ask him what that is—he has a feeling Kacchan would know) to make it easier, and Kayama brings out a handful of small flowers to put in between the twists.

Again, how she even managed to keep live flowers in her purse along with everything else in there, Izuku doesn't know. That may just become one of the great mysteries of the world.

Makeup is next on the list of things to do, apparently, and Izuku is ecstatic. He secretly loves the idea of makeup. He's used some before, of course, but only some concealer and foundation to hide some of his bruises when he was a little younger. He was still stupid then, though, so he doubts he was any good at it, but it must've worked somewhat.

"You've got nice lashes, kid, I'm jealous!" Kayama puts her hands on her hips as she studies him. "Your face is perfectly symmetrical, too. It's a wonder you don't have all your classmates tripping over you by now!"

Izuku flushes a deep shade of red and glances away, a dumb grin on his face. He's never even thought of that before now. He's never even entertained the thought that anyone would be looking at him, because why would they be? He's nothing really special to look at.

He's been told he's rather plain-looking. And not to mention slightly scary and off-putting.

After Kayama and Yamada both explain to him the best ways to apply blush and cover up dark spots, Izuku tries on Midnight's glasses with a giggle. It's a little too big for his face, and it looks comical on him, but he likes it a lot.

But when Yamada lets him try on his own Present Mic glasses, obviously Izuku likes those ones better. He loves the slight orange tint.

He puts up a peace sign and a shit-eating grin when Yamada snaps another photo of him, and at the same time Sushi bats at the orange glasses and knocks them off his face. It's a perfectly timed, horrendous photo, and Izuku really hopes that that one isn't going to be sent to Aizawa.

That would be embarrassing.

"Aw, you love him, don't you, Sushi?" Kayama coos at the cat, picking him up to cradle again in her arms.

Damm. Another traitor. Or am I technically the traitor, since Sushi was Kayama's cat first?

Wait, what? That doesn't even make sense.

The trio put on a new All Might documentary while eating the lunch that Kayama had brought over along with all the other snacks, and Izuku is practically vibrating as he writes down what he sees in his journal. He knows that half of what the documentary is saying is probably untrue, but he writes it all down anyway so he can ask All Might about it later.

If he'll ever get a chance to.

His hands are still shaking from this morning, but it's not as bad, and it doesn't quite ache. His excitement outweighs the discomfort.

Kayama teases him a bit about his fanboy-ish behavior, but he doesn't get embarrassed. He knows by now that she's only joking. She never once asks him to stop or comments on how weird it is, so Izuku keeps going.

It's nice, he thinks again, a softer feeling settling in his stomach now, to be listened to.

And when he catches sight of his washed face in the mirror when he goes to the bathroom halfway through the documentary, he doesn't avert his eyes away like he normally does.

He likes the new look, and he thinks that this time, maybe, just maybe it's okay to like it unapologetically.

When Kayama eventually has to go, leaving Yamada and him alone until Aizawa's return, Izuku suddenly realizes that he was smiling almost the entire time they were joking around.

He didn't even realize it.

It's interesting, at least to Hizashi, how much someone can figure out about a person in only a few short minutes upon meeting them.

When he first met Midoriya that day in the alley, he got to talk to him for less than a minute before the kid scampered off, seemingly in a hurry to get somewhere.

Or to leave the situation as quickly as possible. There's a difference between the two of them.

Midoriya didn't seem scared then, even when facing down those bullies. He was more nervous, Hizashi thinks. Jittery.

And maybe he was a little intimidated near the end, but that's only because Hizashi is a rather big man who towers over the average person. Hizashi was also trying to scare away the other kids, too, so that's definitely what might've caused the green-haired boy to become nervous and ultimately led to him leaving as fast as he did.

Their second meeting was at the laundromat, and Hizashi was able to learn more about the kid and his personality. He learned that the kid likes to listen to Melanie Martinez (sitting so close to the other allowed him to hear the songs almost clearly through those shitty earbuds), and he also learned that the kid has a talent for drawing and observing people.

Hell, Hizashi is still in awe over how easily the boy seems to just analyze and take stock of a situation that sometimes hasn't even occurred yet. And his art skills! Hizashi would love to see more of that, as he likes to draw in his free time, too. He knows he'll have to wait for that, though.

Midoriya seemed embarrassed the few times he would work up the courage to show Hizashi some of his works, most of those consisting of quick sketches of heroes and villains he'd pass by on the streets, and others consisting of beautiful landscapes and void-filled rooms he'd conjure up in his mind.

The kid also has an affinity for stars, Hizashi had quickly learned sometime at the start of their visits. That was just another thing Hizashi could add to the list of interesting things about the Laundromat Kid.

And it's interesting, really, how just under a year later, this is where they are. Midoriya is no longer just the Laundromat Kid; he's one of Hizashi's students, and he's a fine hero-in-the-making. He's a vigilante who has one of the kindest hearts Hizashi has ever seen, and yet in that he also has one of the quietest ones.

Midoriya is softer in calmer settings and environments. He's more timid, almost, like he's unsure of himself. Of if he's even allowed to be where he is at that very moment.

It's like he has the awkward tenderness of a kid who's never been fully cared for and is forced to improvise.

And at first glance, one would just assume he's quiet in general, but he can definitely be eccentric, as given by his alter ego. Hizashi still stands firm in his previous observations about him, though. Everyone has a side to them that they don't want anyone seeing, and Midoriya's just so happens to be the side that Hizashi is trying to focus on, because if he can see that side, that part of himself that Midoriya is trying to ignore, maybe help will be easier to dole out and receive.

He had watched the way Midoriya talked with Nemuri the whole time here, and he was mildly surprised at what he saw. Hizashi is very glad his friend ended up coming over after all, as it's riveting to see how the boy acts around someone else outside of school.

Now, he can't quite put his finger on it, but Midoriya was definitely acting differently when conversing with Nemuri. He was definitely happier, Hizashi thinks, but there was also a sense of trepidation there, and it was hard to miss the hesitance in every movement he made.

Since he was looking for it then, he could see it on Midoriya's face—the fresh panic. The guilt. And he had wondered, not for the first time, what could have possibly gotten him so scared.

Now that Nemuri is gone due to an impromptu meeting at her agency, Hizashi finds himself wishing that Shouta will just come home soon from his visit to Tensei.

He wants his husband here so he can help. He already feels bad about his other half missing out on the self-care period that Nemuri had thrown at him, and plus! Hizashi is excited for Shouta to see the kiddo's new haircut!

He'd been texting him photos and videos to make up for it, of course, but it's not the same. He knows Shouta won't be upset, as he probably already knew this would happen, but it doesn't hurt to complain a little.

Last night was rough for all members of the household. Hizashi remembers how scared he'd been when he found out Midoriya was gone, and he remembers the relief that had shot through him like a bullet when he got the hurried texts from Shouta, saying that he thinks he found the runaway. Hizashi was already back at home and anxiously waiting for their return when he got the call, and he had to remind himself that fainting would not be a good idea.

Shouta didn't sound so good over the phone either. None of them were faring very well at the turn of events.

After spending years around Shouta, he's gotten pretty good at being able to just tell how his husband is feeling at first glance. He can usually tell what he's thinking, too, but that's only because Hizashi is privy to that. He knows how Shouta works, and he knows how Shouta is.

He's easy to read when he's comfortable and safe in the privacy of their shared home. He's always a little happier. More carefree.

And so Hizashi's heart had promptly cracked last night when the door opened and his husband trailed in after Midoriya. There was this look on his face. His expression was one Hizashi could never miss.

It was one of terror. Of confusion and slight anger. Shouta was angry then, he knows—but not really at the kid, no. At everything else.

And it's not even an unfamiliar look, if he's being honest. Hizashi himself wears that look sometimes when the days get a little too long, when his voice seems to die in his throat before the words can come out.

It's a blessing and a curse to be able to read Shouta so well, because god, he hates seeing him so upset. But that's just how it is, he guesses. He's just glad he's allowed to see his husband like that at all. It's much more preferable than Hizashi being kept in the dark, so to speak. That would hurt both parties instead of help.

They're in this together, given by how both heroes can read each other like an open book.

But Midoriya, Hizashi finds, is not so easy to read.

The boy's eyes are like mirrors. One tends to see more of themself than of him when they look his way. They see their own fears and desires.

That's his gift, the voice hero thinks. To read a person and mirror what they need back to them. It's sort of like what Hizashi does as a radio show host. He has to know how to entertain people—he has to know how to keep them occupied and leaping from one train of thought to the next, as that's what brings in the best ratings and feedback.

The listener has an incredible attention to detail, and he's always so considerate and kind. It's what makes him an incredible hero in the making and also a terrifying vigilante.

Hizashi doesn't know if he truly wants to see the boy in his other persona. He's been told about Rabbit before, but he's never experienced the boy's recklessness himself. He's never had to see that particular mask. That mirror.

Rather, he's only ever seen the one Midoriya himself wears all the time. And isn't that ironic? Behind the mask is another mask. One that's arguably more difficult to see past than the physical one that goes with his costume.

It's rare, but once or twice—between one moment and the next—the mirror breaks, and Hizashi can see past those walls. He can see a little into the listener's mind, and what he finds there is unnerving.

Midoriya has no demons, he quickly comes to realize. There is no room for petty demons where Midoriya's concerned. It's like the devil himself hides behind his eyes—in his past. Something that Hizashi is becoming more and more anxious about. The kid isn't giving them anything in regards to why his father just isn't around or able to be contacted. It's not like it's normal for a teenager as young as Midoriya to be homeless and alone.

And it's definitely not normal for a kid to lie about living with said father and to also somehow get away with it. Seriously, how did no one realize that the documents Midoriya had were fake? How didn't anyone see that they were forged or otherwise edited?

If someone had just checked—if Hizashi had just used one of his agency's in-depth programs to check, maybe Midoriya wouldn't be in the uncomfortable position he's in right now. Maybe they would've been able to help him sooner.

He wouldn't have had to almost die in a stupid bombing the same day that he participated in the Sports Festival.

The thing is that the past needs to come out, if only so they can find a way to help him, a more permanent way to help him. But Hizashi won't push. He can't do that or he'll risk harming him further.

And it's this mystery that makes him wonder what others see when they look at the boy. What someone like Bakugou sees—as he will certainly see the most. He's apparently Midoriya's best friend since childhood, according to All Might and previous observations, so does Midoriya let him in? Or does he push him away, too?

Can Bakugou see through the mirrors?

Hizashi can only overlook those walls when Midoriya lets him. The trust is building, but it's a slow process.

He can only hope he can learn to help Midoriya before he accidentally hurts himself.

The voice hero seems to be doing okay, at least, as he gets the question just a couple hours after Nemuri has to leave. He's currently threading his fingers through Midoriya's hair and carefully taking out all of the flowers twisted in the curls. Keeping Up With The Kardashians can be heard playing where they left off, and the voice hero is pleasantly surprised to see that Midoriya put on subtitles, too.

Hizashi prefers subtitles on most shows and movies, whether in English or Japanese, if only so he can practice lip-reading whenever he wants to give his ears a break.

(Which reminds him that after this he needs to change the batteries to his hearing aids. He does it every five days because of how often he uses them, which admittedly isn't as bad as how often his old ones needed to be changed.)

Midoriya seems to be quite invested in the show now, as he's sitting with his knees drawn up to his chest, mouth slightly agape as he hangs onto every juicy detail. Watching other people navigate their screwed up life is a comfort for many, and Midoriya doesn't seem to be an exception to this.

He likes distractions almost as much as he likes hiding, Hizashi thinks.

The kid looks like he's thinking very hard about what's happening on screen, so it comes as a surprise to Hizashi when he speaks without preamble.

"Is he angry at me?"

It's quiet, almost tentative in the barely-lit living room. Hizashi frowns to himself, fingers pausing in the boy's hair momentarily as he processes the question. "Who? Shouta?"

He gets a short nod in return, and Hizashi's heart sinks even further inside his chest. The fact that Midoriya is even trusting him enough right now to confide in him like this, to reveal that he's worried, is a step in the right direction, but that doesn't make it any less painful.

"Why would you think that, kiddo?"

He watches as his student squirms in his spot, noting the way he rocks back and forth a little and tips his head to the side, refusing to look back at Hizashi even as he speaks to him. They're both on the floor in front of the couch, facing the television since the coffee table is still pushed off to the side.

In this position, Hizashi can't see Midoriya's face to gauge his reaction, but he can see the way the kid presses his nails into his palms in a sort of nervous tic. Midoriya shifts suddenly, almost seemingly at the reminder that he shouldn't be doing that, and starts to drum his fingers along his forearm.

Shouta does the same thing when he can't figure something out.

"Because I ran," Midoriya eventually settles on, and Hizashi blinks.

Is that what he's been worried about? He's still stuck on last night? Oh, Hizashi has to stop this quickly. He didn't think this would still be an issue, but he was obviously wrong.

"You did," he agrees slowly, matter-of-factly. "And that's okay." A slight tilt of the head. "You know that, right? Just because you left, listener, doesn't mean you're not welcome back. You can always come back."

What he means is we'll never kick you out. We're not ever going to punish you by holding that above your head.

Midoriya doesn't speak for a long while, and Hizashi knows he's thinking long and hard about something. The hero briefly hopes that he's mulling over those words and realizing that they're not lies.

Did he think they'd kick him out because of what he did? Did he want to get kicked out?

He really, really hopes not.

Hizashi goes back to checking dark green hair for the rest of the flowers, and he waits patiently for Midoriya to continue—if he even chooses to at all. He doesn't mind either way. You can't always rush progress.

But then: "Are you mad at me?"

It's this question that makes Hizashi pause, two hands still holding onto a lock of hair where he was untangling a leaf from a newly-formed knot. The way the boy's voice changes on the word you nearly shatters Hizashi's heart anew.

He lets his hands rest in his lap for a second, and he shifts a little to look at the side of Midoriya's face, his student's head tilting to finally meet his gaze in response. "Do I look mad?"

It's not meant to be mean or passive aggressive or sarcastic—none of that. It's a simple question, because Hizashi is curious now. He wants to know, because if Midoriya is truly reading Hizashi that way, then something obviously has to change. He doesn't want the other to constantly be worried about something like that.

"No?" Midoriya says. He looks away and scratches at his jaw, and it's the attention, Hizashi realizes. He doesn't like the attention on him. "But you could—you could also be hiding it to be polite."

And bingo. There it is. Now Hizashi knows what he's working with. Now he knows the best approach to this.

"I'm not mad at you, Midoriya. I could never be mad at you."

Midoriya snorts suddenly, and Hizashi swears he hears him say something like I really don't want to test that out, but it's obvious he wasn't meant to hear that part, so he doesn't comment on it.

He just smiles softly, slightly amused. "Let me rephrase that." He pokes Midoriya's cheek teasingly before going back to his job. "There's very little you could do to upset me, and even then, running like you did last night isn't counted on that list. I told you that this morning, didn't I?"

Midoriya fidgets, eyebrows furrowing in concentration as he thinks. Probably weighing whether or not he should believe him. "Well, yeah, but you also said you were worried. And that's not… okay. I didn't mean to—" He cuts himself off when his voice gets higher, and when he continues, the words are more quiet. "I didn't mean to make you worry."

Didn't you?

"Kiddo, I'm always going to worry. That's just who I am!" He scoots up to sit beside the teen and passes some of the flowers into his open palms. He has a feeling the kid might not want to throw them away just yet. "But that doesn't even matter now, you know. I'm just glad you're okay. There's no need to beat yourself up about it, yeah?"

Midoriya frowns down at the different flowers in his hands, and it's obvious to Hizashi that he won't be getting an answer, not that he was expecting one in the first place. The fact that he got even this far with the conversation is astounding. He thought the kid would have closed off immediately after asking the question.

It's a welcome step in the right direction, and it has Hizashi's heart swelling. Progress.

Midoriya is staring down at the cats now, and Hizashi tips his head, going out on a limb. "Say, here's a random one: what makes you happy? I don't think I've asked you that in months." He grins widely, wagging his finger. "And you can't say journaling this time! It's gotta be somethin' else!"

While the silence was expected, it still hurts a little when it drags on. Midoriya looks to be concentrating long and hard on an answer. It's obvious that he doesn't know how to respond.

And oh, what Hizashi would give to figure out what's going on in that head of his. The green-haired boy writes so well whenever he takes notes or tests, so Hizashi knows his mind must be a disastrous place.

"Arson?"

It's said hesitantly, but with a slight uptilt at the end, as if he's trying to make a joke. Hizashi laughs at the abruptness of it and roughly swipes Midoriya's hair. "That's rockin', kiddo! I should've expected that from you, huh? But do you think you have something a little more socially acceptable? Something you do more often?"

"Arson should be more acceptable."

Hizashi sighs dramatically. "I second that. It's too bad not everyone appreciates the flair that fire gives off."

Midoriya nods, giggling in agreement but otherwise not offering a verbal reply.

The kid doesn't keep talking after that, maybe because he doesn't know what else there is to say in answer to the question, or maybe because he's thinking of something else. He looks a little troubled now, which is definitely not what Hizashi wanted. He had only wished to distract Midoriya and keep the conversation flowing, but that has seemed to backfire on him at the moment.

Hizashi just hopes that eventually he'll be allowed to help the boy with whatever's troubling him. It's easier to do things when you have someone right beside you, supporting you every step of the way.

He knows that too well.

Are there any specific do's and don'ts when it comes to hugs? Any social rules Izuku should be aware of so he doesn't screw something up?

While Izuku is skilled in the art of body language, both in replicating and reading it, he's not so skilled in the social norms that revolve around domestic settings—ones like the scene he's currently in.

He's sitting on top of the fridge and watching Yamada cook, just trying his best to stay quiet and not disturb the other. It might not be as high as a rooftop, but the height is something for Izuku. It's a vantage point.

Would it be acceptable to ask for a hug?

He wants one, strangely enough. Izuku has never been one to initiate physical contact with people, and it's likely that he's not going to start now, but last night was strange.

Yamada had hugged him, right? Well, hug would be a strong word considering the fact that he didn't exactly hug back, but it can still be classified as one. And maybe that's why he wants a hug now—to try again. To get it right this time.

Izuku is a perfectionist in most situations, after all.

The hug was warm and nice, and it was safe. So sue him for wanting another one. He just feels that out of the very few people he can compare him to, Yamada gives the best physical contact.

His quirk always feels bubbly and gentle, yet strong in the way that an ocean is often described to be.

Izuku narrows his eyes. What would an Aizawa hug feel like?

The underground hero doesn't dole out that sort of contact, so it's irrational to even consider that as an option, but it's still an apt comparison.

Would it feel different than how Yamada's hug was, or would it be similar? He's seen Yamada and Aizawa hug each other like twice during his entire stay here, so he doesn't really know. There's nothing much to go off of.

Fuck, this is stupid. How pathetic is Izuku for trying to rationalize what a goddamn hug would feel like? That's not what normal people do, right? That's dumb.

He huffs, aggravated with himself now. His fingers run through his hair, and he gets even more irritated at how there are no knots in the curls anymore. It's illogical and senseless, sure, but the change makes him even more upset.

Don't get him wrong, Izuku does like his haircut! And he appreciates how soft and clean it feels now—it's just weird.

It's something he's never really done before. Something he's never really been allowed to do in his previous situation.

Basic hygiene, Kayama had called it, and while Izuku kind of doubts that the average person goes through that weekly, he finds that he wouldn't mind doing it all again. It was fun.

The boy rests his arms on his knees and watches the blond hero cook, mentally cataloguing each movement and ingredient being used. Yamada is following a recipe from a paper titled Dietary Plans, which has Izuku's eye twitching.

He doesn't want to see Recovery Girl on Monday. He really does not. He trusts her way more than any other medical professional out there (except for maybe the doctor at the Club), but that still doesn't change the fact that what she represents is a danger to Izuku and his very existence.

And it's not like the checkup will just happen once and everything will be forgotten, no. Aizawa said it'll be weekly. As in, every Monday morning for the unseeable future, or at least until he starts to show signs of being completely healed.

Which Izuku knows will probably never happen, even though he feels fine as it is.

Recovery Girl isn't his only dilemma right now. What about the parent-teacher conferences? They were supposed to happen sometime last week, but the boy doubts that they occurred with one of the homeroom teachers being unavailable. Aizawa hasn't said anything about them either, so it's all just so confusing.

Izuku doesn't realize he's voicing these thoughts aloud until Yamada spares him a quick glance while cutting potatoes.

"The conferences were moved to Thursday, kiddo. They can't actually hold any of 1-A's hero course meetings without the teach being there, yeah?" He hums to himself, answering his own question. "Principal Nezu said there was just too much stuff going on to not delay it a bit."

Too much stuff going on? It's obvious what he could be referring to.

Izuku blinks slowly at the man's back, slightly irked now. He wants to ask a question, but is he allowed to? He's asked a lot of things recently; he wouldn't want to annoy the hero.

No. Yamada is different. He won't mind.

The boy holds out his arms to catch Sushi when the animal jumps up onto the fridge. This seems to be the cat's favorite spot, too.

"Can I ask you another question?" Izuku ventures, stroking up and down along Sushi's pelt.

"You just did," Yamada replies cheekily, throwing him a grin. "But you can ask more. You know I love questions."

Izuku does know. Yamada is not like the mentors and teachers he's had in the past. The voice hero actually encourages questions, as he believes that that's better in helping students learn and develop.

“Did the principal push back the internships for everyone because of me?”

There’s a silent, almost suffocating moment. Yamada stops stirring the sauce he’s working on and turns around again with a slight frown on his face. “Say, how do you know about the internships? That's supposed to be a secret from the students.”

Izuku flushes, instantly realizing his mistake. Shit. He fucked up. He got a little too comfortable. “Eh, sorry! I didn’t even mean to find out, really! It was just—” He breaks off, wincing. Is he really going to lie to him now? After that conversation this morning? Izuku was searching for info regarding UA’s schedules so he could be prepared and in the know. It’s not like he just happened across those emails from the Principal to surrounding hero agencies. “Sorry. I didn’t...” He lifts a shoulder in a shrug. “Aizawa’s been letting me use his work tablet.”

What he means by that is unrestricted access to the internet and a bored me don’t go well together.

Yamada’s face lights up in understanding, but he doesn’t seem angry. He looks more amused than anything. “Don’t worry about it, Midoriya. We’re actually going to tell the students all about it on Monday.” He points his spoon at him with playfully narrowed eyes. “And pushing the internships back was a decision made by the whole staff for a variety of reasons. It wasn’t your fault at all.”

Maybe it wasn’t wholly Izuku’s fault, but he knows the hero agencies were probably pissed when they found out about the delay. While this does give them more time to send out their invitations and judge the students during the festival, this resulted in quite a few heroes having to change their schedule. See, according to the emails Izuku read, a lot of pro heroes were ordered to patrol around all of the agencies that were potentially taking in students, if only as added protection in light of the recent attack. But now those heroes had to be rescheduled in accordance with the new change.

And Izuku knows he would be a little annoyed by it, too.

“Besides, it was only a week pushed back. I assigned the students some reflective essays on their performances during the festival to keep them busy.” Yamada laughs lightly. “They loved that, I assure you.”

Geez, Izuku is grateful he didn’t have to do that. He is usually all for analysis work, but perhaps reflecting on his actions at the Sports

Festival, an event he only attended so he could spite his father, wouldn't have been the best idea. Especially since his last match with Kacchan didn't end quite as desirably as Izuku would've wanted.

I can barely remember what else happened before the last fight. Christ. I need to watch the replays.

"We'll start to prepare for the internships on Monday. We've also got a special surprise for you students, so look forward to that." The voice hero suddenly pauses, as if enlightened by something. "Hey, have you ever heard of the game twenty questions, listener?"

Excitement flashes across Midoriya's face at the prompt, and if every flower in the neighborhood started to bloom at the student's joy, it wouldn't be that much of a surprise.

This is a good start, Izuku thinks to himself, matching Yamada's smile after his irritation dies down a little. Distractions are always nice.

It would be something of an understatement to say that Izuku is surprised when Aizawa comes home and holds out a plain gray box, mumbling something about you'll need this in the next couple days, so don't break it.

He's so dumbfounded, in fact, that all he can do is stare at the gift for a few moments, face carefully blank as he lets it sit in Aizawa's outstretched hand. He doesn't quite understand what's happening.

"Midoriya," the underground hero says, snapping Izuku out of his momentary daze. "This is yours. Take it."

"It's mine?"

Aizawa just blinks and doesn't bother repeating himself, making Izuku jerk forward to accept the box so he doesn't seem ungrateful.

It's a present, right? That's what it is. Or at least what it could be considered by definition.

Why would Izuku be receiving a present right now? Scratch that. Why would Izuku be receiving a present ever?

And what even is—?

Izuku's eyebrows fly to his hairline. He's sitting on the couch now, having walked away from Aizawa and Yamada to let the couple talk about whatever they wanted to talk together about in the kitchen.

This is a phone, he thinks. A nice phone.

He moves the cover of the box the rest of the way off and carefully takes the device out of its protective casings, barely breathing. There's no way.

The boy is slightly in awe. This is a phone that was released almost exclusively for heroes and other law enforcement. He can tell the make and model just by looking at it, and he remembers suddenly that this one just recently came out.

Which means the device currently in his hands is one of the most sought for and high-tech pieces of equipment out there.

This is something that Izuku would never be able to afford no matter how much time he spent saving up, and it's not like stealing it was on the table either. The security for this kind of stuff is arguably better than the security Endeavor had in his private office!

"Holy shit," he whispers, turning it over in his palms and marvelling at it.

In all honesty, the phone itself isn't that impressive. Izuku has made better machines with slimmer designs and a couple more capabilities, but it's just the fact that an official high-tech device is here, in his hold, that's making him a bit light-headed.

Because he doubts Aizawa stole this, which can only mean…

Izuku stands up abruptly and heads for the kitchen, scaring Meatball in the process.

Aizawa and Yamada are now both cooking dinner this time, moving together in tandem, and Izuku almost feels bad about interrupting them as he moves to stand in the doorway. Almost.

“I can’t accept this,” he blurts out, holding out the phone with the most serious expression he can muster. “I’m sorry, I can’t take this.”

They’re both facing him now, and Yamada is the first to react. “Huh? Why not, kiddo? Is it faulty?”

Izuku jolts, wincing suddenly when he realizes there really is no good way to put this. “No, no, it looks like it works perfectly! It’s just, ah, I can’t… have it. I might shatter the screen or something. It’s too good.”

Too good? What the fuck are you smoking? Now they’re looking at you weird!

Aizawa raises a brow. “Too good?”

It’s a prompt. He’s obviously asking for a better explanation, but Izuku knows just by the look on his face that Aizawa probably knows exactly why Izuku is upset. Yamada doesn’t look too clueless either.

Damn. Is Izuku that easy to read? Or maybe he’s just easy to predict?

He swallows and tries not to sound too pathetic as he corrects himself quietly: “It’s too expensive. I’ll… I could break it.”

Aizawa hums and wipes his hands on a dish towel. He shares the briefest of looks with Yamada before turning to Izuku fully and leaning back against the counter.

He looks tired, but then again he always does. This specific look actually feels much calmer than his other ones do. Perhaps he’s been waiting for such a scenario to occur.

“You don’t need to worry about stuff like that, Midoriya,” he says, gaze piercing. “Hizashi and I can more than afford a phone for you. But if it makes you that upset, I can assure you that it wasn’t as expensive as you’re probably thinking.”

Izuku sincerely doubts that, but he doesn’t voice this aloud. “Even still! It’s just—it’s too much!”

It’s not right that you give me all this stuff and I can’t even repay you for it all! It’s not fair to you guys!

“Hey, now, you know we have five jobs between the two of us, yeah?” Yamada pushes Izuku’s outstretched hand back towards him. “It’s okay, kiddo, really. And besides, we offered to help you and take care of you, and we both knew what we were getting into prior to doing that. You needed the phone, and you deserve it, too, so I'd say it was money well-spent!"

Well-spent? Are they serious?

Izuku opens his mouth but then shuts it immediately, slightly frustrated now that the two teachers aren't getting it. Yamada's tone was soft but firm, brooking no room for argument, and dammit he's never sounded that way before. Not with Izuku. He's rarely been so clear cut in his methods.

The boy stares at the ground with furrowed brows, the phone still clutched tightly in his hands—god forbid he drops it over the hard kitchen floor—as he tries to rationalize what's happening.

Like Yamada said, they're not poor. Izuku knows that the couple is quite comfortable in their money situation, but still. Just how much was this phone? And why did Aizawa just up and buy it out of the blue like this?

Izuku didn't ask for it, obviously. He never would have had the nerve to do such a thing, especially since it's so expensive.

So why did he do it? Izuku's grateful, sure, but it's hard to enjoy something when you don't know what the catch to it is.

"Tsukauchi is being slow in giving your old phone back," Aizawa explains, turning back to dice a few spring onions. "It might be another couple of weeks or so until you can transfer everything over from that one, but it'll have to do." He points the knife at him. "You're going back to school on Monday, kid, so you'll need it."

Oh. So that's the catch. This is a precaution. it's a way for them to be able to contact him if things go wrong, and maybe to even track him if he ends up disappearing again.

It's a good reason, Izuku will admit, it really is. Despite this, he still stands there for a moment, not willing to try and sway them but also not willing to let it go.

Aizawa huffs and drops the knife onto the counter, noticing his hesitance. He swipes the phone from Izuku's grip and walks to the trash can. "Fine. If you're not going to use it, I'll just have to dispose of it since Hizashi and I already—"

Izuku practically shoots across the kitchen at the absurdity of the words, the briefest flicker of red lightning on his skin. “No! You can’t just throw something like that away! Are you crazy?”

He snatches it back and glares at the man, who just turns away with the ghost of a smile on his face, smug that his plan worked. Yamada is laughing now too, which makes the boy’s cheeks darken.

While he knew Aizawa probably wouldn’t actually dump a very expensive smartphone into a trashcan like that right after buying it, he couldn’t help himself. There’s just something about seeing such a costly device so close to trash that just irks Izuku.

“That was mean!” Izuku continues, cradling the phone to his chest in embarrassment. “You’re not even supposed to dispose of electronics with regular garbage, Aizawa! Everyone knows that! At least do it correctly next time if you’re going to scare me like that. That would be such a waste of money and supplies, you know.”

Aizawa switches places with the still-giggling Yamada and shoos Izuku with a hand. “That’s great, kid, now go set it up or something. Dinner’s not ready yet, so call your friends. Do some ‘teenager things.’ Scram.”

The reference feels like a slap to the face, and Izuku feels something warm settle over his skin after the initial burn. The underground hero never forgets.

He traipses to the guest room with his new phone in hand, still mumbling about Aizawa being an idiot and a grade-A hypocrite, because seriously. The man hates litterbugs and yet seemed to be willing to throw away such a good piece of tech! He could’ve at least thought about selling it!

You’re a fool, too, his brain reminds, and alright, he can’t really argue with that. He can definitely still be salty about it, though.

He takes a deep breath, a shiver running down his spine when he finally finishes the set up. He has his phone back—well, a phone. He can call and text people now.

A blessing and a curse, as Izuku is now obligated to do this next course of action. It would be shitty of him if he didn’t.

With slightly shaky fingers, Izuku types in the number he's had memorized for years and waits for Kacchan to answer.

Izuku has nothing against toast. Really.

He loves toast. He loves bread, and he even loves it when it's burnt so bad that it could pass as charcoal.

It's the texture, he thinks, that really makes bread what it is. Hard but soft at the same time, crunchy but just a tad bit soggy when you put butter on it. It's all very terrible. Disgusting, really.

And that's why Izuku loves it. When he could afford to do this back at his apartment, he would slice up a few large pickles and put them in between two slices of toast and some peanut butter, and he would eat it just like that.

Sometimes he would even dip the atrocity in hot sauce, which makes everything in life better.

Yeah. Izuku's completely fine.

He's sitting on the living room floor with his back up against the loveseat, turning a toaster over in his hands so he can get a good look at it. Little screws and mechanical parts are spread out all around him, cluttering the floor.

Izuku's been working on it for a few hours now, having already sketched out a basic design for the improvements he wants to add to it. Most of the framework is already done, he just needs to actually put the body back together correctly.

It's been a day since they all had that talk at breakfast, a day since Izuku was given that smartphone—the phone that's now being used to shed some light over his work, saying as it's well into the night and Izuku can't exactly see in the dark.

Without much of anything particularly stimulating or interesting to do, Izuku had become sort of restless, which led to him taking apart the toaster and adding some new stuff to it to make it more advanced.

Missy seems to be entertained, though, as she's currently cuddling his legs while he works, face squished against the fluffy All Might blanket that's covering him. Yamada dug the blanket out of the closet for him just yesterday, saying that Aizawa would just have to deal with the number one hero's face being inside the apartment now.

And Izuku honestly couldn't agree more.

The voice hero allowed Izuku to repurpose one of his outdated laptops for this little project, and the device was definitely a worthy sacrifice, as it provided him with multiple vital parts, including the screen itself.

He's never integrated an AI into a toaster before, but he guesses he can check that off his bucket list once he's done. This is the most fun thing he's done in about a day, and it makes sense that he's surprised when he realizes four hours have already passed.

The minutes continue to bleed together seamlessly, and Izuku thinks back on the previous two days.

What makes you happy?

It was an innocent question, and it hit Izuku harder than he expected it to, especially because of just how invested Yamada looked to be in his reply. The man truly cares for what he has to say, and sure, Izuku has known that for quite a bit of time now, but he just can't help but marvel over it.

He can't help but wonder why it is that way, though. Izuku doesn't know what he could've done to warrant such attention and care from Yamada. Has it always just been like that and he never noticed?

And what does make Izuku happy? He's been mulling over the question ever since it was asked, and he still can't find a good answer for it.

He can't say doing analysis, and he can't exactly say fighting bad guys, so what's left? What else can he say?

It's frustrating. It's frustrating that he doesn't even know how to respond. He's been acting like everything is okay, because it is, and yet he still can't answer a question that most other people could without hesitation.

He guesses he could say cooking or building, but those don't feel quite right either. It's like there's something missing, and it's pissing him off.

Izuku likes to keep busy, because keeping busy means he's being useful and productive, right? And Izuku likes being useful. But somehow he doesn't think Yamada would've appreciated cleaning as an answer, either, given by how he refuses to give Izuku any set chores around the house anyway.

The boy had asked him this morning if there were any duties he could do to lighten the load for the couple, but Yamada just said he didn't have to do anything or feel obligated to do any more chores than necessary—which, from an outside perspective, is nice, but still isn't the answer Izuku was looking for.

All kids have chores, right? Kacchan always had some at home when Izuku would come over, and the green-haired boy would always help out when he could. Mitsuki's only policy was that as long as he cleaned up after a mess he or Kacchan made, he was fine.

So why doesn't he have any chores here? He may just be a guest, but he's still draining their resources. He's being fed and clothed by them, so Izuku has to do something in return, even if it means he has to clean all the time.

Unsatisfied with Yamada's answer, he ended up going to Aizawa next, who ended up giving him a list of things he could do around the house with a gruff comment of don't tell Hizashi.

While Aizawa was also adamant in saying that he was by no means obligated to do any of them, Izuku still liked his answer better than Yamada's, and within four hours he had done everything on the list twice over and to the highest level of skill he could muster.

One of the chores included was to reorganize the pantry, and Izuku had a ton of fun with that.

So maybe separating the cans and boxes of food by color and not their actual contents isn't the best way to organize a cabinet, but whatever. It was fun watching Aizawa having to search through each color to find what foods he needed to make dinner. It was highly entertaining.

You know he secretly found it funny, too, something whispers to him, and Izuku snorts.

These voices have been coming back to him more often now, and he honestly doesn't even hate them that much. They're not as disruptive or mean as they used to be, though sometimes he'll find himself talking aloud in response to a particular comment he heard and will see Aizawa giving him this what the fuck are you doing look.

Which is also very amusing. Izuku is going to keep doing that, but only when Aizawa is around.

Psychological fuckery is the best kind of warfare.

Although it's already a little late and Izuku has school tomorrow, the boy can't get himself to sleep just yet.

He didn't do much today besides clean and mess with the cats, though Yamada had promised him that they'll take him shopping as soon as possible. He's not sure how to feel about that. On one hand, going out means more freedom, more chances, while on the other hand it also means more exposure and temptation.

It's perfect, and that's what makes it so wrong.

There's footsteps coming from the hallway, and Izuku freezes immediately, head snapping up as his heart gives a little jolt inside his chest. I thought everyone was asleep already?

A tall figure pads into the kitchen, yawning, and Izuku feels himself start to relax when he recognizes the form. Aizawa is still up.

The man flips on the kitchen light, still unaware of Izuku hiding away in the dark living room, and the sound of a coffee maker brewing fills the silence. It seems like Aizawa must've been working prior to this, if the reading glasses he has on has anything to say about it.

Izuku tips his head. He had come out of his room just an hour or so after dinner, and he didn't see any light under Aizawa and Yamada's bedroom door or anything. He did see one in Yamada's studio, though, so the man must've been in there doing some work instead of the voice hero like Izuku had thought.

He watches as Aizawa pours the coffee in a mug and stirs a ton of sugar and creamer into it, breaths suddenly coming out shallow when the man appears under the archway, finally spotting him.

Izuku freezes like a deer caught in headlights, suddenly realizing how interesting he must look to outsiders.

But then again, when has he ever considered Aizawa to be an outsider?

The hero doesn't seem surprised in the slightest at the sight before him. He just blinks once, then twice, as if not quite processing what's happening yet. "So that's where the toaster went," is all he says.

Izuku just scrunches his nose at him and goes back to his work, skin itching a little now at how the man is scrutinizing him so openly.

He's never liked being observed. Especially by someone so smart. He doesn't want to imagine what the man would find if he decided to truly look at Izuku.

"Why are you up so late?" Aizawa flips off the kitchen light, and now that he's walking closer Izuku can spot the Present Mic-themed slippers on his feet. Whether or not those are his own or the property of his husband's is a question Izuku won't dare ask.

I wonder how he'll feel if I start wearing the All Might ones I stole. They need to be washed, though. Don't want to dirty up the apartment.

Speaking of, Izuku is running out of clothes to wear. The stuff he was given needs to be cleaned, and Izuku knows this. The issue is just bringing it up. He knows Yamada and Aizawa have a matching washer and dryer set here next to the office. He just doesn't know if he's allowed to use it.

What if he breaks it? He probably wouldn't know how to use it even if he's allowed. It would be easy to fuck something up and ruin it all, and god knows he wouldn't be able to afford fixing it for them—

A pink sugar packet hits Izuku's face, and it bounces off his cheek and lands on the floor next to his work.

Izuku turns to glare at the man, who blankly stares back at him before flopping onto the couch on his stomach, somehow managing to not spill his drink when he throws his glasses on the coffee table. And this is where Izuku realizes he hasn't answered the question yet, even though it's been a good twenty seconds already.

He flushes and looks back down at the toaster, adjusting the All Might blanket so it's over Missy as well. "I don't think it's that late. It's only midnight."

He gets a soft hum in disapproval. "You should be getting at least seven hours of sleep every night, kid. Set some alarms on your phone if you have to." The man rubs his face. "You're just going to hurt yourself by not giving your body the proper rest it needs. Especially now."

Damn, Izuku thinks suddenly. He's starting to remind me of AINA. What a drag.

"But you're awake right now, too," he points out, quirking a brow. "Don't you think it's a little hypocritical to say that stuff to me?"

Aizawa side-eyes him. "That's different. I'm an adult, so I can stay up whenever I please. You, on the other hand, have been ordered to rest by multiple certified doctors who know what they're talking about. You'd do good to listen to them, brat."

"An adult, huh? That's a fancy way of saying you're ancient. But, hey, I guess now I know why you sleep so much in class! Old people sure do love their naps."

Izuku manages to dodge the next sugar packet that comes at him on instinct, and it instead hits Missy in the stomach, waking her up instantly.

"I'm not old," Aizawa mutters, but Izuku ignores him in favor of gasping dramatically.

"You hit Missy, you heathen! Apologize!"

The hero rolls his eyes. "She's fine, just look at her. She's enjoying the attention now."

Izuku looks back down at where he's now petting the feline fervently to soothe her. Missy looks content with life, and alright, she's obviously enjoying it, but so what? That's not gonna stop Izuku from dubbing Aizawa with his new title: the Missy-harasser.

Meatball waddles over and tries to consume the sugars whole, and Izuku quickly snatches both of the packets off the ground before a tragedy can occur. Payback time.

Even in the dim light, Izuku's aim is impeccable. With a flick of the wrist and the smallest hint of red lightning dancing across his arm, both projectiles go hurling at the hero. One hits Aizawa in the neck and the other hits the man in the eye right as he opens it.

Aizawa curses and sits up a little to rub at the spots, and Izuku snickers.

“That's what you get for denying Missy’s supremacy,” he says triumphantly, only to have to eat his words not even a second later when said feline jumps to her paws and trots over to Aizawa, who mumbles a detention, both of you, under his breath. Missy springs onto his chest and curls up into a ball right there, easily falling back asleep.

And damn. Isn’t that just great?

Izuku ignores the Cheshire grin Aizawa flashes at him and goes back to his work, scowling now.

The two of them are traitors. They’re enemies of the state, now. Izuku won’t forget this betrayal. He’s going to write about it in his very exaggerated and inaccurate autobiography when he publishes it in the far future, mark his words.

They fall into a companionable silence, with the only sound being the occasional swishing of coffee from Aizawa when he moves to sip his beverage and the metal clinking from Izuku as he puts the toaster back together.

Izuku is suddenly reminded of a simpler time, back when none of this was even a thing, back when his home was still standing strong, back when Izuku was alone.

He’s always liked the quiet. At least when he’s the one controlling it—the one controlling the narrative. He likes the quiet because he can think without the fear of being judged or punished. He can mumble without being ridiculed. He can be himself in the silence, where there’s nobody else around.

Masks never have to be worn in those instances.

Aizawa is here this time, but he’s never made Izuku uncomfortable by his presence. At least not while he’s just Izuku; Rabbit is a different story for entirely obvious reasons.

And so this quiet, almost domestic scene is what gets Izuku to almost fully calm down and revert back to his normal self. His nearly undetectable rambling becomes a little more prominent, his jaw and shoulders relaxing as he continues to work diligently for the next few minutes.

A multi-tasker by design, Izuku often needs to think about multiple things and events at once in order to fully occupy his brain. He can't let the silence get too loud, after all. He doesn't like that very much.

He tilts the toaster more into the light, a crease forming between his brows now. This is the point in his night where he would usually start to analyze his most recent patrol or record the details of a mission he had just completed—or even write more about new heroes and villains he finds interesting, but he can't do that now.

The times are changing.

He instead thinks back to Hawks, and about how Aizawa didn't hesitate for even a moment when choosing to place himself between the winged hero and Izuku.

How did he even get there so quickly? Izuku wonders. And where would I be now if he hadn't?

Hawks seems like a laid-back person, but he's still the number three hero. He's still an agent of the government, so if he felt the need to, Izuku knows Hawks would've had him immobilized and taken in faster than one could say Plus Ultra.

He could've done that at any time. Hell, he could still do that! Izuku isn't naive enough to think he'd be able to escape from the eyes of a predator like Hawks.

The young hero is a bird of prey. He will take what he wants when he wants, and not even All Might himself would probably be able to physically stop him from doing so—at least not before Hawks could inflict enough damage to be fatal.

So really, there's no telling what could've happened to Izuku without Aizawa's interruption.

The darker side of him is annoyed that he couldn't find out, while the more child-like part of himself, the smaller part, is forever indebted to his teacher and doesn't even want to entertain the idea of Aizawa not getting there in time.

But either way, Izuku is just so incurably stupid. Making dumb mistakes like getting caught by a pro hero and letting himself get drugged? And not to mention almost stealing a girl's quirk?

He would've never gotten away with such foolish behavior before.

Izuku screws up his face, not liking where those particular thoughts are headed. He doesn't need that added stress right now.

The toaster is more important.

"Sensei?" He asks abruptly, the title slipping out before he can think better of it. He sees Aizawa glance at him out of the corner of his vision, and Izuku continues with haste lest the man decide to complain about the formality. He needs a distraction. "Why are you up so late?"

I asked Yamada the same thing that one night, but I don't think you'll have the same answer.

Aizawa sighs, hand running up and down Missy's spine, his movements gentle and slow. "Because I was working."

"On what?"

"A case."

The response is short and clipped, making Izuku turn away from his masterpiece to give the other an unimpressed look. "What kind of case?"

"The confidential kind," Aizawa says, a tinge of amusement in his voice.

"Aw, come on!" Izuku goes back to fiddling with the inserted panels on the toaster. "That's never stopped you before! Just tell me!"

A huff is all he gets in response, but then: "I'll think about it."

Izuku beams, happy that it's not a direct no. That's as close to a yes as he'll ever get from the man, he thinks.

I wonder if he'd say yes to me upgrading the other kitchen appliances and turning them into lightsabers. It would be a lot of fun.

Izuku's thoughts eventually flit back to that man from the club. The person he's now so eloquently dubbed as the Mysterious Goatee Dude.

Now, did he have a goatee? No. But does Izuku think he would look and sound more dramatic with one? Yes. So the name is going to stay.

The first pressing question is does Mystery Man know who Izuku is? He obviously knows about Rabbit, but there has to be something more there. Something more personal. More direct.

Who does this guy know? Who even is the guy, for one? He could honestly just be another random club member that Izuku is fixating on because of his growing paranoia, or he could be what the boy is leaning more towards: a bug.

A spy, in other words. Someone who doesn't quite belong at the Underground Club yet qualifies for it just with their title alone.

The Missing Goatee Bastard looked homeless, but not in the I just rolled out from the sewers and got run over fourteen times kind of homeless. More of the I can't have a set place to call my own because it's too risky kind of homeless.

Now, Izuku knows that one of the most valuable skills in espionage is the unteachable skill to belong anywhere. And what some don't understand is that in order to perfect this, you must first belong nowhere.

Which means the guy Izuku is 93.7% sure is an informant would fit the bill to a T. He would be perfect.

Izuku doesn't recall ever seeing him there before that moment, and he also doesn't recall his face popping up on any Wanted lists or criminal records. It's a new identity, it seems like.

So this guy must've indeed belonged nowhere before this, or he had just created a new persona for himself.

Even if Izuku just assumed he was correct in his predictions, the question would still remain: who is this Bastard Man working for, and why would he even bother going to a place like the Underground Club for what's probably mundane information?

There are just too many what-if's, too many variables that he can't bother guessing right now. Someone must have sent the dude and given him some background knowledge. How else would he have gotten in? He had to have been invited, that's for sure. So what—?

Ask him.

Izuku winces at the sudden voice, mentally beating it back down with a stick. No. He's not going to ask Aizawa. That's—that's stupid. That's just asking for a lecture.

There's no reason to assume Aizawa knows anything about the man Izuku came into contact with for literally less than ten seconds. He's still not even sure Aizawa knows about the Club, much less one random guy, so why take the risk?

You can't assume he doesn't know anything.

And that… that makes sense, actually. Why does that make sense? And why is Izuku so stuck on that guy?

He has to know. If things go downhill, well, he'll just have a lot of explaining to do. He could just lie through his teeth if need be, as hard as that is when it comes to Aizawa, but even then… What if he chooses not to lie? What if he actually decides to confide in him about the club?

His presence and position in the Underground Club is one of his most closely kept secrets from outsiders, next to his parentage and identity, of course. He could get into a lot of trouble if he made the Club's existence known to the general public.

Aizawa is different, though. He wouldn't tell, right? He's trustworthy. Izuku trusts him with his own life, however much he won't admit it, so he doesn't think the man would expose him like that.

He would want to know about the club—if he doesn't already, that is. He would want to know about a suspicious guy that may or may not be interested in Rabbit, or anyone else there for that matter.

Izuku scratches at a cheek with the miniature screwdriver Yamada had given him, fiddling with it for a moment. This is a bad idea. He's going to regret this. Why is he doing this again?

The boy takes a deep breath and decides to take the leap off the precipice. "Have you ever been to any clubs?"

His words come out rushed, nearly indistinguishable, and Izuku feels his heart drop when the pause stretches on for a bit too long. Aizawa cracks open an eye and peers at him out of the corner of his vision, expression never changing. He looks to have been trying to sleep. "I have."

Is that a forced calm, or is he really just too tired to be suspicious?

"The fun ones or the not-so-fun ones?"

Aizawa moves his head so his cheek is pressed against the cushion and he can properly look at him, eyes narrowing slightly. "The ones that don't allow pipsqueaks like you within twenty feet of the entrance."

Izuku shoots him a glare. "You're not funny."

This gets a half-smile in return, and Aizawa reaches with his arm to set his coffee on the table before shifting onto his back, making sure to situate Missy as he does so. "Never said I was."

No, you're actually hilarious and you know it.

Izuku can't help but wonder why Aizawa's staying here and not going back to the office or his bedroom. He's sure he would've gone back had Izuku not been there to derail him. Or maybe he just regularly flops onto the couch in the middle of the night with a cup of fresh coffee.

"I've been to a lot of different ones, kid," the man continues, yawning. "Hizashi's responsible for most of that."

Seriously? Izuku's expression turns sour. He's a little annoyed now, even though it's dumb. "That's not a good answer," he mutters, as if it's Aizawa's fault he can't read minds and figure out what Izuku is really asking.

"Then make a better question."

Izuku pauses and takes a moment to study the hero. Aizawa isn't looking at him anymore. His eyes are closed and his face is turned towards the ceiling. He suddenly looks more like Aizawa Shouta than Izuku has ever seen him before, if that even makes any sense. He's not Eraserhead here—in his home, at this very moment, talking with Izuku.

He's… just Aizawa.

And this sudden realization makes the boy go through yet another identity crisis.

He can't be Rabbit here. The other night was proof of that. He doesn't quite know how to be himself, so that's off the table as well. What choice does that leave him with? Who should he be right now?

The snarky vigilante or the orphaned teen? Is there even a difference anymore? Has there ever been a difference?

Izuku can't count how many versions of himself there are now. He can't count how many are left.

Of course you can't. The snide voice is back, whispering near his ear, sending cold shivers of dread up his spine. How many you's have you been? After all this time? And how many of them have you killed?

Sometimes he'll flip back and forth between Midoriya Izuku and Rabbit depending on the situation, but now that line is blurring together. He can't tell where one ends and the other begins.

And maybe that's a good thing.

Izuku decides to stay silent. He can't ask a more direct question without the risk of blowing everything. Aizawa appreciates bluntness, as he's a man of very little patience, but Izuku thinks that this time, just this once, it would be better to ease into the topic.

Even if it's only to make himself feel better.

He finishes securing the screen onto the toaster, doing some final touch-ups. It's a little blocky, he'll admit. Usually he would take the extra time and care to at least make his creations look high-tech and smooth, like something that's actually an upgrade rather than a downgrade, but he's working with limited supplies here.

Besides, the toaster looks better than it did before. It has a lot more functions to it. Maybe in the future Izuku can add in a voice to go with the AI. What it can do right now is allow the user to type in or say how long they want their food in there, and at what level they want the heat to be on.

It's simple, but Izuku likes it.

He sits back against the edge of the loveseat, grimacing. With this pretty much done, he doesn't know what to do. And when Izuku is left without something to do or something to work on, his mind tends to wander.

He hasn't used any of his invites for the Underground Club yet. He doesn't do that often. See, every member gets a certain amount of invites at the beginning of every year, which allows them to invite a number of people of their choosing into the club, at any of their locations.

Most members—the casual members—have to run their invitees by the leaders of the club first before anything official is done. This is just to prevent any disastrous outcomes, of course. All it takes is one bad apple to spill the beans and get everyone arrested, after all.

But for the more active and influential members, the ones like Izuku, asking for permission before handing out an invite isn't necessary. There's a certain level of trust that Izuku, er, Rabbit has with the higher-ups, and this grants the boy a little bit of leeway.

So really, no one of importance will question his decisions. He gets hate, obviously, mostly for his age and personality, but Rabbit is still respected to some degree. His methods aren't always second-guessed.

But would this time be different? With what he's about to do?

His thoughts keep circling back to that question. He can't get it out of his head.

Wouldn't it be better to have someone else on his side? In his small corner? Aizawa is an underground hero. It would be allowed. He could help.

He's been helping me all this time, even from the very beginning. I don't think this would be any different.

Izuku gets a sudden burst of courage and grips the toaster with both hands, swallowing audibly. "Aizawa?" He doesn't wait for a reply. He can't wait for one. "What if I took you to a club I know?"

Silence. Not even an intake of breath or a noise of acknowledgement to tell Izuku that he was even heard.

"I know it sounds dumb!" Izuku continues, gesticulating wildly with the toaster to try and calm his nerves. "But it's not like it's a real club, so you can't get mad at me! I just wanted to know if maybe you've, ah, ever heard of it? It's pretty underground, so it's fine if you haven't! But then again you are an underground hero so maybe you have heard of it but you just haven't said anything about it yet, which would be kind of suspicious but also very likely. I honestly wouldn't put it past you to have already—"

The softest of snores cuts off his rambling, and the boy's head snaps up. Aizawa's eyes are closed, and his chest is rising ever so slowly as he breathes.

Oh. He's asleep.

Izuku sighs and turns his gaze back to the floor. Now that he's thinking about it, Erasure does feel lighter. Quirks tend to not feel as present when the users are sleeping or extremely tired.

"Welp," he shrugs. "I tried."

Now he can't get upset with me later for not at least trying to tell him about it. If he ever finds out on his own, that is.

Izuku gets up and pulls the blanket over his shoulders like a cape, picking up the coffee-filled mug and toaster as he heads for the kitchen. The dishwasher isn't done washing the latest load yet, so Izuku instead starts to wash out Aizawa's mug and places it upside-down on a towel to dry.

Now for the big reveal.

The boy sets the toaster in its rightful place and plugs it in, a little excited now. Almost immediately a soft blue light envelopes the kitchen and stretches over Izuku's skin. His face splits into a wide grin at the realization that it works, holy shit, I didn't expect it to actually turn on, and he does a little fist bump in the air.

He starts to play with the glowing touch screen and messes with the settings, just checking that all of the capabilities are there. Someone can now input their own personal timer and create presets for all of their cooking needs! Everyone has different preferences, so it would be helpful and quite simple to just have options someone could choose right from the get-go, especially if they're in a hurry.

It's not much, he knows, but the fact that it's working still makes him incredibly happy, even if it's not that useful.

The toaster isn't quite a full AI since it can't respond verbally just yet, so Izuku isn't going to give it an elaborate name or something that doubles as an acronym.

What about I name you Giichi? That sounds like a good title.

He'll find the materials to add a voice to it later on, but for now Izuku is pretty proud of what he managed to do in such a short amount of time. His hands have been itching to get back to work on his projects. This is a step in the right direction.

But even as he starts to feel a bit hopeful for the future, the smile still slips off his face.

Compared to AINA, his latest project is merely insignificant. He misses the late AI. He misses her affection and voice, even though it was artificial. Even though he had programmed her to care for him and act like some sort of familial figure.

He misses her almost parental love, even if it was fake and simply a result of his extensive coding.

She may not have been real, but the joy Izuku would feel when hearing her voice in his otherwise lonely apartment definitely was.

The boy stares at the toaster from his place in the middle of the kitchen, the blue light of the screen illuminating his face in a soft glow, reflecting in his eyes.

It flickers off just a moment later, the words good night, Izuku, flashing over the black background.

The familiarity of it has Izuku wincing, and it's only then that he notices Pickles sitting on the counter right next to the toaster, awaiting pets with her tail flicking impatiently. The cat looks about as confused as Izuku feels.

He doesn't see the point of all this. Everything, he means.

Izuku is for sure going to be dead before he reaches thirty. He knows that much, at least. The club doctor said that if he doesn't fix this situation soon, his life on earth will be snatched from him. His subscription will essentially be canceled.

Anywhere between 1-30 years, the doc estimated. A very broad range, all things considered, but Izuku guesses that quirk matters are always quite unpredictable.

Even now, weeks after learning his future and coming to terms with it all, it still doesn't seem real.

And maybe that's why Izuku tries not to think of it much. It's not like he can do anything about it. There's no choice for him. Not now, at least.

Between revealing it all and staying quiet, Izuku knows what he has to choose. It's the most logical answer. What he wants to choose doesn't matter.

He could either let everything go and finally give in and tell someone, or he could just die.

One sounds more relieving than the other.

Izuku snorts, sucking in a sharp breath and killing yet another part of himself in the silence that follows.

Now that he's thinking about it, isn't it ironic? How the one thing he needs the most is the one thing his father has the most of? Time is indeed a fickle thing.

He sighs and lets Pickles climb onto his shoulder as he walks back to the living room. He cleans up his mess on the floor and sets all the parts on the coffee table as quietly as he can. He'll have to put everything away in the morning when he can see better.

Izuku pauses just before he's about to head back to the guest room. He turns back to look at the lump that's still lying on the couch.

Aizawa looks dead when he's asleep.

It's almost unsettling, especially with how the man barely makes a sound or shifts even the tiniest bit—he's as still as a rock.

He doesn't grumble or talk to himself or anything; he just sleeps.

And this is normal for an underground hero, Izuku supposes. People who specialize in stealth have to always be quiet and alert, even in sleep. Any noise at all could attract the wrong sort of attention.

So that part makes sense. The only issue is that Aizawa is on his right side and facing away from the couch, leaving his heart incredibly exposed and vulnerable. It's not something Izuku would expect from him, so the change has him frowning. The best position for sleep is on your left side, where you're curled up into a ball and preferably keeping your back facing the enemy so any weapons or projectiles have a harder time piercing major organs.

But this is Aizawa's home, so in all senses he should feel comfortable enough to not have to do that, so why is Izuku so stuck on it? And why does the man barely look like he's breathing?

Izuku can feel the faintest stir of Erasure under Aizawa's skin, and logically he knows he's alive, but it's just hard not to check. Because what if he's wrong? What if this is the first time Extract is ever wrong?

There's a first for everything.

Before he can think better of it, Izuku takes a few tentative steps forward and pokes his cheek. His hand withdraws quickly, but Aizawa just grunts before twisting a little to faceplant into the cushions.

Not dead, at least.

Izuku unwraps the All Might blanket from around his shoulders and carefully throws it over the hero, not wanting him to get cold. He doesn't quite know why, but he ends up making himself comfortable on the loveseat when he's done instead of just going back to the guest room.

His eyes drift back to the kitchen and settle on the paper that's now permanently hanging up near the top of the fridge.

House Rules!! (^ □ω□ ^ ❁)

Rule #4 is to take care of yourself, right? Is sleeping included in that? Yamada was adamant about how self-care is very important, so will he be upset if Izuku doesn't sleep?

It's not like he's planning on staying up tonight, but still. He'll have to test that out soon so he knows for the future.

Documenting all the variables and testing all possible outcomes is an important step in any experiment.

Izuku hasn't really done anything physical today, but that doesn't stop his muscles from being sore and his back from aching. Which reminds him that he really wants to go back to training with All Might. It feels like he hasn't seen the man in forever. Tsukauchi, too.

School starts back up for him tomorrow for the first time since his apartment blew up. He doesn't think he's ready for it, in all honesty. He may be anxious to get out of this house for a little while, but he's still hesitant all the same.

He doesn't think he'll ever be ready for whatever might be in store for him next. Something big is going to happen. He can feel it.

Izuku lets the quiet hum of the air conditioner serve as a white noise as he sinks further into the cushioned chair, Meatball jumping up to join him and Pickles. His senses aren't as sharp anymore for some reason. They haven't been since Aizawa started talking to him, in fact.

Something that Izuku will theorize about come morning time, no doubt. That's definitely a question for the book.

Perhaps it was just a coincidence, or perhaps it wasn't. Either way, It's going to give him something interesting to do, so it's worth checking out.

For now, though, he's just going to try and rest as much as he can. He's going to need it.

And if, a few hours later, Izuku nearly stirs awake to the feeling of that same warm blanket being draped back over him, well, nobody has to know.

> AHHH!! LOOK AT THIS AMAZING ANIMATIC ON YOUTUBE!!! The details are so GOOD AHHhH!! And the transition near the end?? IMMACULATE!! This is by booyahbaby on the server sdjkfghfsg I love it so much! this must've taken forever 😩 it's so good!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

One of the biggest differences between this apartment and the old apartment is that Izuku doesn't have to worry about falling through the floor anymore.

His teachers' place is fairly new and sturdy, with reinforced walls and floors that don't creak or groan dangerously when you walk on them. It's an interesting thing to get used to, as Izuku forgot what it was like to not have to worry about those things after living in his crumbling building for so many years. Now, that's not to say Izuku's home was trash or anything, of course not! It's just that Izuku can do things here that he wouldn't have even dreamed of doing in his own apartment.

Here, Izuku can quite literally bounce off the walls and ceiling without running the risk of flying through like it's wet paper.

He knows this because he's doing it right now.

Izuku's not even using One for All for this, but he might as well be with how fast he's going. He's a blur of color as he soars over the couch with each jump using Boost, the wind he's creating making Meatball and Pickles run for cover.

He wishes he had more room to work off the energy, but Izuku's still grateful that he's being allowed to do this at all. Well, maybe not allowed. Aizawa would've put a stop to the ruckus earlier had Yamada not cut him off and encouraged the boy to continue his exercise, going on to praise Izuku for his speed and strength. Except Izuku didn't miss the sharp glare Yamada turned upon his husband to stop him from complaining, so yeah, he wouldn't exactly say he was allowed. It's just that they're not stopping him.

While Izuku doesn't exactly like pitting the two teachers against each other, he's also not going to prevent a light disagreement from happening if he gets to do stuff like this. This is fun. And besides, he's so nervous right now that he has to have something to do or else he's going to explode.

After a moment's pause, spent with Izuku moving the lamp on the end table a few inches to the left so he won't crash into it, he's back at it again. He goes from one side to the next in a split second, keeping track of where exactly he lands so he won't hit the same spot twice. The walls may be sturdy and thick, but he doesn't want to take too many chances here.

One, two, three, four.

Izuku switches up after four seconds, now bouncing between the floor and ceiling. His head is spinning with all the rapid turns he's doing, but that doesn't deter him. It just spurs him on even further. Man, I really hope their neighbors can't hear me stomping like this. They're gonna hate me.

After five minutes of this, Izuku allows himself to land on the ground for a final time and starts to sprint in a circle around the living room. Most of the cats are sitting on their pedestals near the right wall and watching him, either amused or perplexed by the display. Missy is the only one unaccounted for, but Izuku is willing to bet a thousand yen she's in the kitchen with Yamada, probably trying to guilt trip the man into giving her more food.

Meatball is surprisingly not the one doing that this time, as the feline is busy watching Izuku. It seems the boy is very entertaining to those that aren't already used to his antics.

He's on his fiftieth lap when Boost fizzles out suddenly, causing Izuku to trip over air and fall flat on his face.

"Calm down, Midoriya." Aizawa's eyes are glinting the faintest red when Izuku cranes his neck up to glare at him. "We're leaving in a minute, be patient."

Izuku just grits his teeth and flips onto his back, using the soles of his feet to continue pushing himself around the couch. Missy trots out of the kitchen and hops onto his stomach, using him as a moving throne as Izuku hits his fifty-first lap. He feels Erasure let up and immediately starts to use Boost again for added speed, leaving a smoke trail behind him as his shirt slides against the carpet. Eventually it becomes so hot that Izuku has to pause so it can cool down, and after ten seconds he starts up again.

As much as he wants to start a fire through friction, it probably wouldn't end well for him.

Izuku sees Aizawa rub a hand down his face and sigh heavily before taking another sip of his coffee. He's sitting at the dining table and looking full of regret. "Didn't think I'd see a kid so excited to go to school," he mutters.

The boy sits up straight and narrows his eyes at him, but Yamada cuts in before he can defend himself. "Well, 'sides little Tenya, of course."

Another bout of impatience hits the vigilante, and he scoops Missy into his arms just before he jumps to his feet. "Come on! You're both being slow! If we don't move now we're gonna be late."

Aizawa snorts and points to one of the seats at the table, shaking his head. "We're already getting there two hours before the bell, kid. We can't be late to being early. And sit down; breakfast is almost done."

It takes less than ten seconds for Izuku to inhale the entire plate when Yamada brings the food over, and then he's up and running again, this time to put on his shoes.

"At least he's eating everything we give him now," he hears Yamada whisper. Aizawa downs the rest of his coffee like a shot in reply.

Izuku is going to steal that fu—that coffee maker and turn it into a flamethrower one day, mark his words. The only downside to that is he wouldn't have coffee for himself. Just fire.

A pretty good trade-off, all things considering.

Not even five minutes later the green-haired boy is throwing open the front door with a wide grin, excited at the prospect of freedom—only for Aizawa to shut it quickly before he can even make it one step out of the doorway.

"Not yet." He takes his capture weapon off the hook on the wall and lifts a brow when Izuku lets himself drop to the floor in exasperation. "This is your first day back, so there are some rules we have to discuss."

Are you kidding me? More rules?

"No, I'm not kidding you. And just listen to me for a minute. This is important."

Izuku wrinkles his nose but doesn't interject, instead starting a silent counter in his head for one minute.

"Your classmates are going to be curious about why you've been gone for a week. That's only natural." Aizawa shrugs on his scarf and glances at Yamada, who's busy doing last minute fixes to his hair using the gel on the coffee table. He looks focused on his work, but Izuku knows he's listening. "Hizashi didn't reveal much, so they're bound to get even nosier once they see you back. Some are going to press you for answers and become general annoyances, so that being said."

His gaze is even when he turns back, the seriousness in his eyes garnering Izuku's full attention.

"It's up to you to decide what you want to tell your friends. Revealing the whole truth about your past situation might be dangerous, both for you and for them, but I'm not going to stand here and say you can't do that, alright? While I don't think you'd want to do something like that anyway, it's still worth noting."

Izuku's brows furrow a little. They don't care if I tell them or not? They're okay with it? He has to admit, he didn't really expect that one. See, he's not stupid. He wasn't planning on telling his classmates anything about the bombing or his current place of stay, as that would be a very uncomfortable conversation. Kacchan is the only one who already knows about everything, and that's because of that phone call Izuku made to him a couple days prior.

Like Aizawa said, revealing something like that would be a recipe for disaster, so Izuku never imagined that the hero would give him the go ahead on possibly telling the rest of his classmates. He doesn't even want to, but it's strangely nice to have that choice.

Because that means the two teachers wouldn't be embarrassed about people knowing Izuku is staying with them for the time being. It's like they truly wouldn't mind at all.

I thought they would've tried to keep it as quiet as possible.

Aizawa's face darkens, bringing Izuku back out of his thoughts. "Regardless of what you choose to do, they still have to respect their classmate's privacy. If they start to be intrusive or won't stop asking questions about why you were gone, come get one of us. You're not obligated to tell them anything you don't want to, so don't feel pressured."

Don't feel pressured. You're not obligated. Izuku frowns to himself at the wording and shifts on his feet. Since he's not going to tell the whole truth, what is he going to tell his classmates? His friends? They deserve to know something. That's the bare minimum, right? And also…

"What are you going to tell them? You were gone for a week, too, and you never skip work."

Aizawa lifts a shoulder in a halfhearted shrug, going back to watching Yamada finish his morning routine. "I've been saving up vacation days. If anyone asks, I just needed a break from you hellions." A tilt of the head. "Which isn't untrue."

The boy rolls his eyes and thunks his head against the door when he gets up.

The truth is, he's nervous for today. He's only pushing them to get going so he can rip it off like a bandaid. Izuku's mind is stuck in this sort of waiting mode, where he can't get anything done or function properly until the cause of his stress and anxiety has been dealt with. Or until he's distracted.

God, could they be any more slow?

"And kid, I want you to stay by us until we actually get on campus." Aizawa must see the look on Izuku's face after he says this, as he continues before the boy can cut in. "We have to take extra precautions right now. People hated you enough to blow up your whole building, and some of them even knew your identity. There's no telling if there are others out there who are willing to do something similar to you with the same information, if not something worse."

Now, if Izuku's being honest, that part holds some truth. Which is why he's even more annoyed all of a sudden. Yeah, sure, he's in danger. But he's always in danger! As Rabbit and as plain old Midoriya Izuku! He can't spend the rest of his days in a bubble. That's just not how life works! Especially not his life.

The people who came after me are outliers anyway, he thinks. He's pretty sure Daddy Dearest is the one who sent them, which is the only way they could have known his identity. They didn't leak it or share it with the public because they were probably either paid or threatened to keep quiet about it. Maybe even both.

The chances of something like that happening again, so soon after the explosion? It's slim. Izuku knows a storm is coming, but it won't happen as random or as sporadic as the hero in front of him seems to think.

Attacking in broad daylight isn't really his style anyway.

Yamada picks up his work bag and flashes Izuku a comforting smile, seeming to sense his growing frustration. "I know this all feels like too much, but it really is just to keep you safe. So don't go running off just yet, yeah? Not until we're inside the gates."

Despite his mind screaming at him to object, to say that he's not a child who needs to be watched so closely, Izuku grits his teeth and nods once. He's not going to argue with Yamada just yet.

Pick your battles.

The voice hero starts to search for the car keys after giving Izuku a hair ruffle, and Aizawa turns back to the boy—who's still dazed over the brief contact—with narrowed eyes.

"One last thing."

He holds out his hand, and Izuku stares.

Huh?

Izuku immediately prepares to make a crude joke to fill the silence but quickly thinks better of it. What does the man want from him? A handshake? Is this a weird secret code that Izuku is supposed to know or something?

Shit, did he see me steal that piece of gum from his wallet this morning? Just as Izuku's about to dig in his pockets for the spearmint gum to put in the man's palm, Aizawa continues. "That knife in your left shoe. Give it here." He keeps his hand up and just shakes his head when Izuku sputters. "Don't look so surprised. You're not as slick as you think, kid. Listen. I know it's easy to forget, but having undocumented weapons on campus is against school rules. It's also very illegal. So hand it over, please."

He's not asking. That much is obvious. What isn't obvious, however, is how he knew Izuku had it in the first place. While Yamada and Aizawa were both finishing up breakfast, Izuku went into the kitchen to fill up one of the cats' water bowls—and also to snag a knife. From where both heroes were sitting, they shouldn't have been able to see him stick it in the bottom of his ratty old shoe.

Not unless they secretly have x-ray vision. He wouldn't put it past Aizawa to have something like that.

Izuku curls his hands into fists and opens his mouth to argue. This is his safety knife. The what-if knife. It's not the same as his old one, the one that had his Rabbit initials carved into it, but it's still a knife.

It still takes off the edge of panic that's always settling at the bottom of his stomach nowadays.

That's not fair, he wants to say. You carry your huge knife around all the time. What's the difference? Izuku has to bite his tongue to keep from voicing this. It would be a weak argument anyway. Aizawa is a pro hero whose actions and weapons are legally backed and protected by the law; Izuku is a vigilante (can he still call himself that?) who is wanted in many countries despite not ever having left Japan before. He's also an underage student who, for the safety and reputation of UA, cannot be seen with dangerous items.

Even if that dangerous item is just a simple kitchen knife.

Izuku throws a hesitant glance at Yamada, brows furrowing when he realizes the man is looking at him expectantly, almost like he's prompting him.

Fuck. And here Izuku was thinking he could go to Yamada for backup for this particular argument.

The boy takes the knife out of his shoe with a barely suppressed huff, eyes boring holes into the ground as Aizawa takes it from him and goes to deposit it in the kitchen sink. This is unfair. They keep saying he's in danger and needs to be protected, and yet they won't let him have stuff that'll help Izuku defend himself better.

Izuku tips his head when Aizawa nudges him to the side so he can finally, finally open the door. "If I can't take my knife, can I at least take Missy?"

Yamada laughs behind him, and Aizawa shoves the boy through the doorway in response.

Yeah. Guess that one's a no.

Aizawa is the one to get into the driver's seat, surprisingly enough, and it's this action that has Izuku freaking out even more.

The clock is ticking. Izuku can hear it echoing in his bones. He can feel his fingers twitching with each movement of the imaginary clock in his head. He wants—no, needs to start moving around again.

His hands are aching again. They've been trembling ever so slightly ever since this morning, and no matter what he does, the boy just can't seem to get it to go away. It just comes and goes as surely as the sun and moon every day, and honestly? It kind of scares him.

Izuku twists his neck to look out of the car window. The clouds above are dark with the promise of rain, and he can't even be mad about it. Rain is nice, he tells himself. Rain can be comforting.

He's so busy trying to calm down and not psych himself out that he doesn't even realize they're at UA until the car comes to a halt in the teacher's parking lot.

The keys aren't even out of the ignition yet before Izuku is throwing open the door and bolting. They're at the back of the school; Izuku can see the archways of what must be the staff's entrance up ahead.

There's a chill in the air and a light mist that hovers over the grass surrounding the campus. It smells like it was recently cut.

His palm itches again and he ignores it, instead focusing on the stretch of trees less than fifty yards away. He needs to get rid of that heavy feeling that's weighing inside his chest now, and if he can just break through that line of birch trees ahead of him, maybe the ache will go away and he'll be distracted from—

Izuku nearly chokes when someone snags his collar and yanks him back. He twists to glare accusingly at the man holding him.

"What did I say earlier?" Aizawa asks tiredly, but his face is still stern when he meets Izuku's gaze.

How the hell did you catch up to me so quickly? Are you even out of breath?

Izuku huffs in frustration and tries to wriggle out of the grip. "I wasn't gonna run!"

"I don't care. Stick beside me."

And with that, the hand releases him from the death prison. Izuku bites back a snark reply and grits his teeth, willing himself to keep his mouth shut for the second time that day. Not yet. Be good. You're not actually angry at him.

It feels easier to be upset at other people, though. That's the hard part.

Izuku moves to walk beside Yamada just to spite the other hero, deciding to ignore the black-haired man entirely. He looks off to the side as they walk the distance from the parking lot to the gate, gaze lingering on the trees and thick greenery to his left. It could provide for good cover if he ever needed it.

And even here, at UA High School, Izuku can still feel eyes on him.

Logically, he knows they're not actually there. He can't sense any quirks buzzing around besides the heroes' next to him and a couple inside UA, so they should be fine. But it's just the idea of what could be there.

If you expect it, why shouldn't it already be there?

His gaze shifts to the side and he sees Aizawa doing the exact same thing: watching the surroundings, eyes sharp and alert.

He looks almost as paranoid as Izuku is.

The boy shivers and inches a little closer to Yamada, telling himself it's only because of how cold it's getting. It's spooky when there's not many other people around.

Aizawa has to use his own ID to allow Izuku through the gates, and the moment the light blinks green to signify the action being approved, Izuku is off like a light once again.

He's in the walls now, so technically he's not breaking his word. He might as well be inside UA itself since he's on campus grounds.

Izuku hears Aizawa yell something at him but pays it no mind. He doesn't need to be reminded that he has to go see Recovery Girl. He's not stupid, thank you. Aizawa will know if he skipped out on it, so there would be no point.

That doesn't mean he can't put it off for a few minutes, though.

UA is almost eerily quiet when it's empty. Izuku scrunches up his face when he finally makes it inside and starts to wander the halls. It's still a little dark, as it is pretty early in the morning, so everything is just that much scarier.

The halls feel damp in a way that has Izuku's ears tingling, the silence pressing in on his temples. It's a weird feeling, really. Almost familiar.

It makes Izuku think of leaky faucets and cobwebs in the corners of red rooms.

His feet carry him to the outside of Recovery Girl's office, and he hesitates once he's about to knock on the door, one hand still hovering over the metal. She's in there, of course. But should he really bother her? He feels fine. He knows he's fine.

Izuku shakes himself free of these thoughts and raps on the door a few times, taking a deep breath in when she calls for him to come inside. The sharp scent of antiseptic hits his nostrils the moment he walks through the door, and yeah, the fact that it smells just like that stupid hospital definitely isn't helping to quell his worries.

It smells like regret and fear and—is that coffee? Izuku walks a little further into the office, briefly debating whether or not he should ask where the coffee machine is. He may not like doctors, but they could potentially bribe him with his favorite drink. He'd allow it.

"Good morning, dearie." Recovery Girl hobbles out of her mini office and points with her cane at the bed pushed against the wall. "You take a seat right there and I'll be right over."

Hm. That coffee smell is coming from that room. She must have it stored in there. Would she notice if Izuku just walked right in there while she was distracted? If it's a coffee maker, Izuku could just shove it up into the vents and come back for it later. Hopefully there aren't any cameras. He can just take the machine and somehow lug it back to the apartment so he can hide it in his room. He could then make improvements to it and—

Izuku squawks when Recovery Girl's cane knocks into his leg, and the boy shoots her a dark look from his place on the edge of the bed. The healer is sporting her usual attire, but this time she has her salt and pepper hair down to her shoulders. "Hey, what was that for!"

She just hmphs and jumps up onto her rolling chair. "Looks like you've still got the feeling in your legs, so that's not a problem."

Wha—? Why would that be a problem in the first place?

The healer must see the look on his face, as she rolls closer to him to poke his knee. “Don’t go forgetting how you almost lost both your legs, sonny. If you had been under those rocks any longer, things would’ve been much worse for you.”

Izuku doesn’t think he can ever forget how it felt to be pinned under that huge slab of concrete, but he doesn’t say this. He didn’t think he was that close to losing his legs, though. He was more worried about other things at the time.

“I had to do extensive healing on them, you know, and even with the help of a few others I was afraid it wouldn’t be enough to protect you from permanent nerve damage.” She taps his other leg with the cane, too, this time near his ankle. “It could’ve worsened over time, so I had to see for myself, but I’m happy to see that everything is in working order. No numbness or tingling besides the usual sort, right?”

What’s the usual sort?

Recovery Girl hums in satisfaction when he just shakes his head. “I see. That’s very good. I’ve said it before and I’ll say it again: you’re very lucky to have made it out of there with minimal injuries. This outcome is the best we all could’ve hoped for.”

No. The best outcome would’ve been something much, much different than this. Izuku didn’t think he would make it this far.

He never planned on it.

The hero continues to check over him, asking him to do basic stretches and exercises so she can see if there’s any stiffness, and she merely tuts when she sees the small scratches on his arm from when Missy got a little too bloodthirsty this morning. They’re already healing, so it’s not a big deal, but that doesn’t stop Recovery Girl from giving him the stink eye.

After taking a look at the faint scarring on his abdomen due to the pipe that shish kebabed him, she pulls away from Izuku with an affirmative nod. “You’re fine, just as I suspected, but it’d still do you good to continue taking it slow. That means no bouncing off walls, you hear?”

Izuku, who would never do something like that, gives her a serious nod.

“Despite what you may want everyone to think, your body is still healing itself and its older wounds, so you’re going to start feeling sick here in the upcoming days as a result of your body trying to adapt; I already have some medicine prepared that’s suited to your needs if things get to be too unbearable. But other than that, you should be alright. As I said, just make sure to take it easy. This won’t be for much longer.”

That’s what everyone’s been saying, he thinks in slight frustration, hands fisting the fabric of his pants, and yet nothing’s changed at all.

Izuku dips his head at her and makes to leave after promising to not do anything reckless, but she holds up her cane to block him right as he slides off the bed.

“Sit back down, boy, I’m not finished yet.” She barely waits for him to obey before continuing. “Your hand. Hold it out for me.”

Her gloves feel weird against Izuku’s skin, and he focuses on the latex feeling as she carefully inspects his palm and fingers. He has a feeling he knows what she’s looking at.

“How long has it been trembling like this?” She asks, not looking up yet.

That’s… not even close.

“Just, ah, since the explosion, I think?” He pulls away, suddenly remembering that he’s not really supposed to be truthful to doctors. He can’t have her asking too many questions. “But it’s not always like this! It only started getting worse last night. Usually it’s not that bad.”

“Hm. You should’ve told one of your teachers this when it started happening, boy.” She leans forward to kiss his forearm, a soft green light wreathing around his fingers and wrist in response. The second is done right after. “That’s not going to help much, but it should make it easier to deal with. The doctors did say you might have some issues with your hands for a few weeks, and maybe even some aching in your wrists. Remember that you took the first explosion in your front, so your hands got the brunt of it all. How you didn’t lose them entirely, along with your legs, is just another mystery no one can figure out.”

To be fair, the first explosion was arguably the weakest out of all of them. Izuku is pretty sure it was only supposed to shock him, not hurt him terribly. If they were ordered to kill him immediately or at least make sure some of his limbs didn't make it out, he wouldn't have been able to stop any of that from happening.

"Have you told All Might yet?"

Izuku breaks out of his stupor at the random question, heart rate picking up at the mere mention of his mentor's name. He knows just from the suspicious look on her face that she's not talking about his hands anymore.

This is exactly what he didn't want to happen today.

He chews on his inner cheek and glances out the window. The storm is rolling in now; he can feel his bones rattling with the distant thunder.

"I… I haven't gotten a chance to see him yet, so, uh, he doesn't know about my blood. I couldn't tell him."

What if he just blames himself for it? She thinks it has something to do with One for All even though I told her it doesn't. He might get upset about it if she tells him that.

"You couldn't tell him, or you just didn't want to?"

Izuku can't suppress the full body flinch that overtakes him. Why does Recovery Girl have to be so intelligent? "Both," he mumbles, and it's not really a lie.

Physically, he had many chances to tell All Might this. Even before he was gifted his new phone, he could've asked Aizawa or Yamada to borrow their own devices, as mortifying as that would be. He has All Might's number memorized, so he could've just texted or called him.

He just didn't want to. He was too scared that All Might would react badly. Still is scared, in fact.

"See to it that you do that, child. I gave you two weeks. Remember what I said." She fixes him with a look and points her cane threateningly. "I have no qualms about doing it myself."

Izuku stops himself from whining that patient confidentiality must be respected even outside of legal medical practice, as he's sure Recovery Girl would just come up with some law to counter his argument, so he instead hops off the bed to leave, taking the shiny All Might sticker she holds out to him without complaint.

He can stick that on the underside of Aizawa's desk later just to piss him off. It would be the ultimate prank.

The dark haired hero is waiting outside the office with Izuku's new uniform in hand when the boy walks out, and he hands it to him with a skeptical look. "There's still around two hours before school starts. We're one of the few here at the moment, so you've got time to get yourself situated. Just make sure you put that on before the bell."

God, Izuku can't fucking wait to destroy this uniform too.

Aizawa stoops down to his level with a sigh, as if sensing his desire for destruction, and the sudden intensity on his face has Izuku wanting to take a step back, but he refrains from doing so at the last moment, cold shock filling his veins.

The hero's gaze lingers on the thin white scar on Izuku's jaw before moving up to bore into his eyes, and oh. This is a show of trust, he realizes. Aizawa is showing it so openly.

Why is he doing this right now? What's the reason?

"We have a new backpack for you and some supplies already at your desk, so don't worry about that. Your old notes for all your subjects are gone, but I don't think it'll be much of a problem for you with that brain of yours. Now, I need to go get some stuff taken care of since I've been gone for a week. Nezu wants me in a meeting in five minutes." He reaches forward to flick his forehead with a finger. "You still have to stay in this building. No going outside the gates. There's always a possibility someone could be watching."

Warmth blooms in Izuku's chest at the words, and it quickly spreads to his face and ears. This is almost suspiciously considerate. While it's nice that Aizawa cares (holy fucking shit he's really serious about that, huh?), who does he think is watching him? He said there could still be more mercenaries out there who know his identity, but Izuku doubts that. Now, he has many other enemies who would love to get a chance to grab him, but most of them don't know Rabbit's identity either—so, again, this is all still very pointless.

What they should be setting their sights on instead is something much larger. His father is always watching, just not physically, so keeping Izuku contained in a small area again would be kind of pointless seeing as All for One would probably be able to find him here anyway if he truly wanted to. Another scheme by his father doesn't seem too improbable, so it would be wiser to prepare for a large-scale fight rather than to try and prevent the inevitable from happening.

Izuku would know, as he's been trying to run from that stuff all his life. He should still be running now, but not to stop the fight—to try and save the people he cares about before it gets here.

Aizawa is being paranoid over the wrong thing, and it's annoying Izuku, but he can't get too upset about it. If he would just tell them what they really have to worry about, like Izuku's appetite on Taco Tuesday, for example, they wouldn't be doing this. But that, among other things, would mean having to admit and reveal things that Izuku would really rather not. That would put everyone in even more danger.

So for now he'll have to settle for another almost-prison.

Izuku sours his expression and huffs even as he agrees to not leave the building. While he was definitely planning to roll in the outside garden UA tries to hide and track all the mud back inside Aizawa's classroom, he can settle for staying indoors. There's still plenty of shit he can get into here.

Like, for example, the vents. It's like a necessity for him to get up high and to be hidden away whenever possible. A good way to spot a possible Imposter Izuku is to ask them what the first thing the real Izuku would do upon entering a new facility is, and the answer better be something along the lines of exploring the ceiling. If it's not, well, any witnesses around had better become cool about a few things really quickly, because a murder will have to take place.

Aizawa is barely all the way down the hall before Izuku is using the wall to his left to spring up towards the vent hatch, and he grabs onto it with a manic grin tugging at his lips.

He could get high off the feeling he gets from doing this… which is probably why Kacchan kept telling him he should accept those free counseling sessions that were offered at the homeless shelter a few blocks away from his house.

Now, what's not making Izuku happy is the nest he stumbles upon that's tucked into the corner of two intersecting pathways. It's the same nest he saw the last time he wanted to roll around in the vents, but this time it's even bigger! There are more fluffy pillows and woollen blankets, and it looks like even a miniature couch has been added off to the side.

The most interesting thing about the nest, however, is the chess set that sits off to the side. It looks like it didn't move from the last time Izuku saw it, but as he comes closer, the boy notices that a piece has been moved forward.

Just a singular white pawn. It almost feels like an invitation.

Without thinking too much about it, Izuku crawls over and pushes one of the black pawns forward in response before moving past the area entirely.

He prefers checkers, but he guesses this game will have to do.

How fast can you go in the vents? a voice asks him as he goes around another corner.

"Faster than your mo—" Izuku breaks off in a flurry of coughs as dust goes up his nose. Okay, maybe he deserved that.

Wait, how fast can he go? These vents are pretty big, so he has room to work with, but he'd still have to crawl. If he uses One for All in the balls of his feet to give himself an extra push, maybe he can go even faster than he thinks. But what if he doesn't have enough room to stop or slow down? He might go right through one of the vent walls and get hurt.

Which sounds a little enticing.

Izuku lets the familiar warmth of All Might's quirk spread through his veins and body, from his ears down to the tips of his toes. He keeps the input at a steady five percent, just letting himself get used to crawling on his hands and knees with the extra energy. There are no sparks yet, and he's glad. How interesting would it be for a random teacher at this hour to see flashes of light coming from above them? He really would be a god then.

Pretty soon he's barreling through the vents at a pace that should probably be illegal, given that he must sound like a terrifying critter scuttling about right now. It's dark, so it's a little hard to see where he's going with how fast he's moving, but he manages.

Fuck yeah. I'm amazing. I'm like Keanu Reeves in this place. Can your favorite hero do this? Didn't think so.

Everything is going great until he has to round a sharp corner. He tries to slow down, but there's something wet on the bottom of the vents, causing the space before him to turn into a sort of slip n' slide.

One for All flickers out immediately in a panic as Izuku twists his body to the side. He falls and scrabbles for some kind of purchase, but the momentum keeps him going.

Shit.

He crashes into the vent wall, only just having enough time to move his hands in front of him to take some of the force. Which is, fortunately for him, the worst thing Izuku could have done!

He lies there, cradling his abused hands to his chest. It's almost like he can already hear Recovery Girl's oncoming lecture. He hates how she was absolutely right.

Keanu Grieves, he thinks sadly, rubbing his knees and forehead when the aching in his hands stops bothering him as much.

Well. At least he answered the question. He can go incredibly fast in the vents.

Strips of light hit his face, and Izuku moves his chin a little to study the room down below him. From what he can see through the little airways, it looks like a storage closet. There are boxes and containers full of varying supplies stacked around the room, and Izuku scooches closer to get a better look.

He wonders what kind of goodies he could find if he dropped in and searched through some of the boxes. Would someone find out? Would they be angry with him?

He's pretty sure this is just a storage closet, so no one should get too mad. But it does look important, and also very high-tech. He can spot some of the weapons peeking out of the towering containers.

But what really catches his eye are the boxes labeled permanent spray paint: do not use!! pushed away into the far side of the room.

It's the last three words that get him going; the hidden challenge in it.

He very carefully opens the vent hatch and drops into the center of the room, his eyes going wide with the same excitement a child would have in a candy shop. He steps toward the boxes, trying to suppress those inner desires of his.

Izuku thinks of chipped chess pieces and small nests resting in too-clean vents. He thinks of Aizawa's annoying face, of white paws much more involved in things than Izuku would like them to be.

Oh, god. He shouldn't. He really should not be doing this. This will get him into trouble. Nothing good can possibly come from what he's thinking about doing. Absolutely nothing.

He shouldn't do this. But he will.

It'll always be the thrill that keeps him alive.

Shit, shit, shit!

Toshinori didn't do his paperwork over the weekend, and nor did he finish grading his classes' last few assignments. Dammit.

He had plenty of time to do them, he just didn't. His mind was too occupied with other things.

When was the last time he ever felt this stressed? Toshinori can't remember. Even when it comes to hero work, he's usually not this busy or overwhelmed. At Might Tower, there are almost always assistants and secretaries that Toshinori can rely on for help with scheduling and signing legal stuff. He admittedly never has to do a lot of work there with them around.

But here? At his old school? He's a teacher (somehow), which means he has to do all of this planning on his own—and everything is that much worse seeing as he truly doesn't know how to be a teacher. He's flying by the seat of his pants and just trying to copy what he sees his coworkers doing.

That's not to say Toshinori is dumb or incapable, not at all. It's just that this particular area is not his strong suit. In the few weeks he's been teaching? All of his students almost died under his watch while he had to fight some crazed monster on their field trip on the third day of school.

Which is, yeah, not the best reassurance a new teacher could have, huh?

Toshinori walks quicker through the halls, shivering. He'll barely have enough time to complete all of his paperwork before the bell rings, saying as most of his morning was taken up by the meeting Nezu wanted him to attend with the others.

He doesn't have nearly enough time anymore. Even his time limit is decreasing by the day, and with it goes his strength. He's tired and shaky and for some reason sore all the time now—he knows he's getting old, but come on!

The only good thing to come out of this morning was the realization that Aizawa is back, and fuck, Toshinori could not be more grateful.

He had to help monitor the younger hero's class while he was away with Yamada, and Toshinori now understands why Aizawa dubs them the hell class.

They're all little gremlins. Every single one of them. Even Iida and Yaoyorozu. Toshinori doesn't remember his own classmates ever being so… vicious back in his time. It must be the water these days.

There could very well be crack in it.

Not too long before school starts, Toshinori notes, glancing at his watch. If I start right now, I can finish the rest of my paperwork at lunch and—

Oh, wait. Did he forget to pack his lunch today? Shit. He's not just any regular ol' fool, is he? He's quite a few steps above that. He's worse.

He's a premium fool, as Young Midoriya would say.

Today is just starting out great, huh? It's altogether too clear that even after a month of teaching, he's still not cut out for all this stuff. Not yet.

Geez, how did you do it, sensei? Were we that bad, too?

Toshinori's head is so high up in the clouds that he almost doesn't hear the vent hatch ten yards away pop open. He stiffens immediately, eyebrows flying to his hairline when a figure drops down from it with a muted thud. The individual straightens up, and Toshinori's gaze is drawn to the volatile red tendrils crackling around their form. Glittering dark eyes are framed by curly hair, and for a fraction of a second, Toshinori forgets himself.

Maybe it's the angle, or maybe it's just the surprise of having someone drop from the ceiling like they belonged up there in the first place that does it, but either way it feels like something sharp jabs Toshinori in the throat and drags all the way down to gut him like a fish. His breath is stolen from him, and all he can do is stand there and stare as One for All dances under his skin in preparation.

Isn't that—?

"That was good comedy," the figure chuckles, lifting up a scarred hand to rub at a shaking palm, and Toshinori blinks, a harsh shudder running through him.

But then he registers the voice and thus the body that belongs to it, and the world comes back into focus.

"Young Midoriya?" He chokes out.

The boy jumps at the voice and whips around, eyes wide as saucers. The flash of red snuffs out like a candle. "All—All Might?" He squeaks. "How did I not—?"

Midoriya cuts himself off, jaw snapping shut as he jerks forward a little, almost as if he wants to run to him. But then a shadow crosses over his face and he hesitates.

Toshinori just grins, however, eyes crinkling near the edges. His worries are put on the back burner at the very sight of his mentee. He didn't realize just how much he missed him. "Hey, my boy!" He walks toward him, and that first step is all it takes to prompt Midoriya forward again. He stumbles at first, but then he's flying at Toshinori at the speed of light, eyes still wide—unsure, it looks like. Midoriya looks almost scared and yet desperate at the same time.

And shit. Toshinori forgot just how fast he can be.

He inflates into his bigger form on instinct, knowing what's about to happen due to past experience, and just as he thought, Midoriya ends up barreling into him so hard that Toshinori topples over with an oomph at the impact.

He's gotten stronger. And, hell, definitely a little heavier!

"At least I can see you're healthy again!" Toshinori grits out, trying for a smile as he catches his breath.

Midoriya immediately rolls to his feet, making Toshinori realize suddenly that the boy just hugged him. Well, was it a hug? It felt like one. It was a Midoriya hug— the kind of hug where the boy just faceplants into Toshinori's chest or shoulder and simply waits. He doesn't speak or lift up his arms; he just… what's the word? Vibes?

Yes. Midoriya simply vibes. And usually this 'hug' doesn't last very long at all before the boy is scampering off, red in the face.

He can't recall Midoriya initiating contact with him like that in a long time, though. So for him to do that now? As short lived as it was? Something must be wrong.

"Shit! Are you okay, All Might?" Midoriya is fretting now, hands wringing together while he makes space for Toshinori to get up. "Sorry, I didn't realize I was going that fast!"

"That's quite alright, Young Midoriya!" He laughs heartily, looking down at him with his hands on his hips. It's only now that he spots the variety of colors splattered on the boy's clothing and hands: paint.

Something that Toshinori is not even going to question. Questioning would make him a witness.

"I'm glad you're back!" Thunder rumbles in the distance, agreeing with the sentiment. He chuckles nervously and rubs his neck. "I was meaning to see you before now, but I was told it would be better to wait. So how are you? I heard you're staying with Aizawa for the time being, so you haven't been too bored, I hope!"

Toshinori also hopes that Midoriya knows he wasn't intentionally ignoring him. If the boy wasn't currently under Nezu's jurisdiction, Toshinori would've done more to see him.

Especially now that everything has been unearthed. Toshinori should've been there for him before now, right alongside Aizawa and Yamada. He needed to talk with him and let him know he wasn't upset with him then—because he knows his boy. He knows Midoriya would've felt guilty over the whole homeless vigilante thing.

The kid is fiddling with his fingers now, and Toshinori blinks when he spots the blank space on the boy's index. And where did you put your ring? Do you not wear it anymore?

“Yeah, uh, it’s been okay! I haven’t been that bored. He’s—they’re nice to me. It’s… nice.”

Nice? He’s fidgeting. Nervous. Why is he so tentative?

Toshinori hums and gives him another warm smile, hoping to ease the tension out of Midoriya’s shoulders. “Great! And what about your cat? How has Missy taken to the change in environment?”

Midoriya perks up a bit, just as Toshinori hoped, and answers his question with a little more enthusiasm.

He starts to ramble about how Missy has actually become friends with the other cats in Aizawa’s apartment, and how she’s been gaining a lot more weight because of all the treats the two resident heroes won’t stop feeding her.

Sometime in the middle of it, Toshinori deflates with a tiny cough, but Midoriya takes it in stride. He’s already used to that happening a lot.

The boy maintains eye contact with him for brief intervals but looks away abruptly at some points, as if embarrassed. He’s still apprehensive, it seems.

Hm. Toshinori tips his head a little for him to continue on, not minding the spew of words at all.

The topic starts to change, and all the while Toshinori is busy thinking. Observing. I wish I could tell what’s going on in that brain of yours, my boy. It would make this all a lot less awkward.

“So yeah! That’s how she became ruler of the house in under, like, ten minutes of her being there. Even Sushi likes her, which was surprising. ‘Zawa said Sushi is usually really stoic and silent since he’s ancient as fuck and also tired of everyone’s shit, so I thought he’d be less accepting of her. But he’s not! It’s really kind of sweet, actually. Way too cute.” Midoriya blinks back to himself, straightening up suddenly. “Ah, but how are you, All Might? I didn’t see you much on the news! I was worried you got hurt or something.”

The concern on his face has Toshinori pausing a little. Dark clouds rumble and glide across the sky, turning the hallway a little darker when the light that usually comes in through the floor-to-ceiling windows is blocked. But then the clouds part, and Toshinori watches for just a second, not surprised that Midoriya’s eyes are shining in the darkness. That’s something new, and yet it’s still not alarming for him.

The rising sun frames Midoriya, and his shadow becomes long and somehow blacker than night, falling short right at Toshinori's feet. It reminds him of a monster with red eyes and sharp teeth, of a mutilated face and a voice that still haunts him in his dreams.

But Toshinori's been thinking those thoughts a lot lately, so they're even easier to push away this time.

"I can assure you I'm not hurt, my boy. Just incredibly tired." He gives a grim look. "But I'm afraid I might still be growing weaker by the day. My time limit is decreasing rapidly, so I'll have to be in this form for a lot longer than usual. It might be best if you don't call me All Might here, at least when there are students around." Toshinori averts his gaze, wincing. "In this form I'm just a secretary here at school. It would be safer if you called me by my real name."

Midoriya blinks, brows furrowing. "Oh! Uh, okay! Are you sure?"

The boy still looks hesitant even after Toshinori tells him he's certain of it, but he doesn't argue. Does he even know my name? Toshinori wonders suddenly. Shit. Have I ever told him before?

"And you said your time limit is really low, huh?" Midoriya's voice takes on a conspiratorial tone. "How long is it now? What can you do? I know it's probably just the time that's being decreased but are you getting weaker, too? Have your drawbacks gotten worse?"

They continue on like that, and the topic seems to be what Midoriya needed to relax a little. He doesn't look as high strung anymore, and his shoulders aren't as tense.

Toshinori is relieved, to say the least. Midoriya is still the same old boy. He looks tired as well, but still better than Toshinori thinks he's ever seen him. Not as burdened, he daresays. Nezu was right, then. You did need some time away.

They catch up on what's been happening to each other during the past week and a half, and it's when Midoriya mentions something about how his old apartment is set to be demolished soon that has Toshinori working his jaw silently, thinking hard.

He hasn't gotten a chance to see this… apartment. The one his ward called his home before everything was destroyed. How long did Aizawa say he lived there? Four or five years?

It must have been something for the boy to stay there that long. Or maybe it really was nothing, and Midoriya himself had to make it something. It's not like he would've had much of a choice, huh?

Another sharp jab to his chest, and Toshinori's face pulls into a tight frown at the reminder that this boy was homeless. Has been, for a very long time.

He didn't trust Toshinori to help him. He didn't trust anyone for that matter.

Eventually, when Midoriya looks to be vibrating hard enough to start floating in the air mid-ramble, Toshinori lays a hand on his shoulder and hunches over a little to look at him. To truly look at him.

Midoriya stops immediately, emerald eyes blinking widely up at him in confusion. "All Mi—Yagi? Are you okay?"

"My boy," he begins, tilting his head a little as he pauses to try and find the right words. "Why didn't you ever say how bad it was? I would've helped you. I wouldn't have hesitated to make sure you were safer then."

Even if it meant I would've had to take you in myself.

Silence greets his statement. There's an ocean of unsaid words between them that neither seem to be quite ready to traverse, too afraid to try for fear of drowning in them.

"I know," Midoriya finally whispers, and great, isn't that the fucked up part. The kid knew he would've helped in a heartbeat, and yet he still couldn't trust him.

I'm so sorry. You should have never felt like you had to be so alone. That is a failure on my part.

Toshinori gives a soft, reassuring grin upon seeing the look on his face. "Hey, it's alright! None of this changes anything between us! You being Rabbit was a surprise, sure—" (Toshinori inwardly cheers when he sees the hesitant uptilt to Midoriya's lips) "—but that's quite alright! What matters now is how we move forward, right?"

He gets a nod and that same wobbly smile in reply, prompting him to move forward a little more.

"So!" Toshinori swallows down the lump in his throat and hopes he's not making some kind of mistake when he holds out his pinky. “No more potentially life-threatening secrets?”

Is this childish? Toshinori feels like it is. But he knows Midoriya wouldn’t be offended. And if this is the only way to get the boy to stop being so destructive to himself, of course he’s going to do it.

He’d do it over and over again. Without hesitation and without complaint.

Midoriya hesitates, eyeing the outstretched pinky before him. Toshinori watches as something dark flits across his kid’s expression, and another bout of lightning cracks somewhere in the near distance. The hero-in-training ducks his head and puts a hand behind his back, seemingly itching at a spot on his back out of nerves.

“No more secrets,” he agrees quietly as he wraps his own pinky around Toshinori's, and even if it’s not as enthusiastic as the hero would’ve liked, it’s enough to ease his worries.

He feels a lot better now. It seems that at least that dilemma has been resolved.

For now.

“Ah, my boy! Why don’t you tell me about some of the stuff you’ve done as Rabbit! Maybe about some of your worst fights! I might be able to give you some feedback.”

And, just like a switch has been flipped back on, Midoriya shakes out of his subdued state and continues his previous word vomit, an excited glimmer to his eyes now—just like Toshinori was hoping.

The hero used to get lost and almost tired of hearing the kid’s ramblings almost every day during their ten months of training, but now he’s starting to realize just how much he actually enjoys them.

They’re walking down the hall a few minutes later, still chatting happily with each other, when a figure comes storming around the corner.

Toshinori stops in his tracks, Midoriya following soon after. “Oh, Aizawa! I didn’t get a chance to talk to you at the meeting, but it’s nice to see you up and about again after—!”

“You,” the man interrupts, death in his eyes.

The blond squeaks at the same time Midoriya does. “Me?” They exclaim in unison.

“Midoriya.”

Before the boy in question can even think about running, Aizawa’s capture weapon snakes out and wraps around his torso, making Midoriya hiss when he’s yanked away from Toshinori’s side.

“Morning again, Yagi,” is all Aizawa says, face set as he casually starts to drag Midoriya along behind him. “Excuse us.”

“Ah, uh, of—of course! I’ll see you later, Young Midoriya!”

As the pair turn the corner quickly, Toshinori sees Midoriya give one last wide-eyed glance and tiny handwave before disappearing.

What... the hell?

Toshinori has probably just witnessed the prelude to a murder. He physically has to stop himself from going after them, telling himself that Midoriya’s going to be just fine.

Besides, it seems that he and Aizawa are close.

The thought sends a pang in Toshinori’s stomach, and he forces himself to ignore it. He truly is happy the boy is alright. He got to see him for a bit, so that’s good! He’ll see him again once class rolls around.

For now, though, he has to get a start on those papers. God, why did he take on this job again? He could just not do them, really. That’s what he does with his hero paperwork, to be fair. And he hasn’t been fired yet!

But then Toshinori thinks of all of his students and the happy feeling he gets whenever he gets to train them and share his experiences, and he sighs.

Time to search for his long-lost pen.

“That was embarrassing!” Izuku hisses, currently writhing like a dying fish in his teacher’s hold. He kicks out with his legs desperately, trying to break free from the restraints of the capture weapon. “And in front of All Might, too, you dick!”

Seriously, couldn’t Aizawa have waited a little longer before stalking up to them so they could at least finish their conversation? They were having a touching moment!

Well, not really touching. It was more awkward than anything, but he’s still happy he got to see his mentor. It doesn’t seem like All M—Yagi is mad at him like Izuku worried he was, and he still doesn’t know what to make of that yet. He’s been using One for All for crime, so he thought he’d have some repercussions. But the blond just seemed concerned and grateful at Izuku’s appearance, if not a little perturbed. He’s not upset.

Maybe a little disappointed, sure—Izuku didn’t miss the look on his face when he finally noticed he was there—but not truly upset. Not angry.

And it’s funny how Izuku both hates and is grateful for that fact, because maybe Yagi should be upset.

His foot manages to touch the ground for half a second, and the boy is about to use one of his quirks to use the contact to his advantage when he’s plucked from the ground yet again, being picked up like a misbehaving cub to be dragged to who knows where.

“The first day, Midoriya. The first day.” Aizawa shakes his head with a huff and tightens his grip. “Not even forty minutes left until school starts; why did I actually think you’d be quiet for that much time?”

“Let go of me! This is illegal somehow, I just know it!”

“This is all illegal,” the hero snorts, and Izuku struggles harder in frustration. He twists and tries to aim a kick at Aizawa’s crotch, but the man is ready for it and simply holds him out further away from his body, glaring daggers at him. But the action is done, and Izuku uses the extra space between them now to hike his legs up and plant both of his boots on his teacher’s chest, knocking the breath out of him and making the coils loosen.

Izuku drops to the ground in a blur of red, excited now to be free, but fabric snakes around his ankle before he can scurry away.

“Hey.”

“I swear if you don’t let go of me I’m gonna—I’m gonna—!” Izuku drops his entire weight to the floor, trying to grab onto something when Aizawa just continues to pull him along behind him, seemingly done trying to do this the easy way. But then an idea hits him, and he reaches for his left shoe. “I’ll—I’ll fight you!”

“Shiver me timbers,” Aizawa deadpans, and Izuku can just hear the eyeroll. “Now quit it, kid, you’re just going to tire yourself out.”

Despite his best judgement, Izuku does stop trying to sever the capture weapon in two with the oversharpened pencil he stole from the storage closet, instead deciding to just lay limp again and let himself slide across the too-clean tile.

This is stupid. Why does Aizawa care so much about this? Does he not have anything better to do? It was one harmless prank! Okay, maybe not harmless, but it didn’t hurt anyone!

Maybe. Probably.

Izuku crosses his arms. “You said as long as I stayed in the building I could go off on my own, so why are you being unfair? I haven’t gone near the exits once.”

The hero glances back at him with a quirk of the brow. “I did say that, but that was before I realized you were going to empty seven spray paint canisters onto the wall next to Principal Nezu’s storage room, Midoriya. I can guarantee you that the very flattering picture you made of him won’t be appreciated.”

“I didn’t do that, actually, thanks. I would never.” Izuku averts his gaze to the very nice windows to his right. “But if I did, I would be offended by that obviously sarcastic comment.”

There’s an irritated huff, and the sound of it makes Izuku’s heart rate spike. He nervously looks back at the man, watching as Aizawa tilts his head to the ceiling and wills himself some patience.

Sometimes Izuku wonders if Aizawa would like to throw him out the window sometimes. He wouldn’t blame him. Hell, he’d encourage him to do that. Izuku would be able to cross that off his bucket list.

“Midoriya, you’re lucky Nezu’s not that upset about it. And you should also count yourself lucky that Cementoss already took the liberty of cleaning it up for you, or else I would've made you do it after school with a toothbrush and some vinegar."

Izuku scowls to himself, cheeks burning. Okay, yeah, he wouldn't have enjoyed that at all. The mural he painted in about thirty minutes flat was huge, so it would've taken him the entire afternoon and evening to get half of it scrubbed off.

Thank you, Cementoss. You are my savior now.

He resolves to stay quiet the rest of the time he's being dragged. Aizawa seems to be too upset to even continue lecturing him, as he just settles for another small, long-suffering sigh before slowing down a little in his walking, now confident Izuku won't try to slip away.

Izuku wonders how Aizawa even found out about his little project. Did one of the other teachers stumble upon it, or did he? Or maybe the principal himself saw it—he does have eyes in the form of cameras almost everywhere. Izuku wouldn't be surprised if Nezu was watching him the entire time from beginning to end.

His research on the mammal proves that he would definitely do such a thing, for entertainment or for studious purposes, Izuku doesn't know yet.

Izuku upholds his silent promise to keep quiet to spite Aizawa for just over thirty seconds—it all changes the moment they round another corner and start to head towards a wide door.

His eyes widen. "Wait, Aizawa."

The man ignores him. Izuku's mind starts to buzz as he recognizes more of the people inside the room ahead. He felt them enter UA less than an hour ago when he was planning his mural, but he was hoping he wouldn't have to see them so soon.

And certainly not like this. That would be beyond embarrassing.

"Aizawa, come on!"

His teacher hums in slight question, though it's obvious he's not going to budge.

"There are people in there!" Izuku screeches, resuming his life-or-death struggle to get out of the bindings. He can't even use any of his quirks right now since Aizawa activated Erasure. "This is—hey! Let me go! I don't want to be seen like this!"

"You should've thought of that before deciding to paint a whole child's drawing on this school's wall," Aizawa says simply, completely unsympathetic. "Now you get to be stuck with me until class starts."

A fate worse than death.

Despite his protests and wild thrashing, Aizawa stops by the door and picks Izuku up off the ground by his collar, letting his scarf do most of the lifting as he turns the handle.

Oh, fuck.

There's a reason Izuku has never been described as a party-starter or even a party-goer by anyone who knows him—excluding the obvious reasons, of course. He just isn't usually the type to be the social butterfly at any kind of gathering. In fact, he's usually the one to make things awkward upon first arriving, or better yet, he's the one to end the party!

Which is exactly what he's doing right now.

The moment Aizawa walks into the room, all of the chatter ceases. Izuku feels his soul descend fifteen levels when multiple pairs of eyes turn to stare at the two.

This must be the teacher's lounge. Their offices are here, too.

To make matters even worse, Aizawa doesn't head over to his own desk right away; he stands there at the front of the room, with Izuku still held above the ground with one hand, drawing even more attention to their arrival.

Everyone is here. Izuku can see most of his teachers milling about and grouped around each other, along with a couple others. He spots Ectoplasm, Snipe, Ms. Kayama, Cementoss, Power Loader, and even Vlad King.

Where's Yamada?

"Shit." Izuku's voice breaks, and he swallows before trying to continue, now trying to scratch at Aizawa. "You bully!" He hisses quietly. "Let me go!"

Aizawa hums. "No."

For a good five seconds, nobody says anything or moves even a hair. Izuku is about to start squirming again to get down when Ms. Kayama greets him. She turns and plops down in her chair, tilting her head back to wink at him.

“Hey, kid. You’ve been staying dry, yeah? It’s raining cats and dogs out there.” She lets out a soft breath between her teeth. “I hope you slept good last night; today’s gonna be wild. I can feel it. It’s going to be one of those exciting days.”

Izuku grins stupidly out of nerves, and it seems that was the icebreaker the room needed, as the other teachers start to acknowledge him too, in their own unique ways.

Except Vlad King. The Class 1-B teacher ignores him entirely, and Izuku can’t help but get a little offended.

How rude. I’m going to call you Chad King now. You look like you’d be a Chad in high school.

He does notice that some of the teachers do seem a little wary of him, namely Power Loader and Ectoplasm, but they are all still really kind to him, so eventually it becomes easier to stop being so on edge and tense, and he responds to their pleasantries in kind.

Aizawa mutters something about the quick change when others are around, and Izuku just elbows him in the throat in one quick motion, having finally gotten a limb free. Aizawa grunts and drops him, and Izuku waits there nervously, instinctively moving to stand closer and a little behind the choking man for comfort, who whacks him in the back of the head as payback.

But Izuku is too busy trying to calm his rising panic to get the last hit in. There are really no new faces in this room, but there’s still a pretty big change in the air.

“Just a warning, kiddo, that a few of the more important teachers were told about your situation. Sorry for not asking you first, but it was a must at the time.”

That’s what Yamada said to him sometime earlier that morning. What that means is they know who he is and what he’s done. The people in front of him know he’s Rabbit, and they know he was homeless.

How many times can Izuku go red and start to stutter in one day? This might be a new record.

Do they think differently of him now? Do they hate him? They didn't act like they do (well, except for Chad King), but that could always be a fluke. People like to act, especially heroes. They're experts at it.

Izuku follows Aizawa over to the man's desk, hovering awkwardly over him as his teacher sits at his chair. He doesn't want to interact again with any of the others, but then again he kinda does if only to get it over with. The air shouldn't be this weird. If he could just… turn invisible, things would be much easier.

Maybe then he wouldn't have gotten so many sleepless nights in the past.

Everyone goes back to what they were presumably doing before the two walked in, but Izuku can still feel a couple stares on him from time to time.

They're not whispering about him, though, which relieves Izuku. They're not like the others, he reminds himself. They won't make fun of you. Stop worrying so much.

It starts to rain even harder outside, and it's only then that Kayama beckons him over with a hand. She's talking with Snipe—one of Izuku's other favorite teachers who's about as wild as they come.

Izuku doesn't talk much when Kayama brings him into the conversation, but he stays attentive and alert all the same. They're supposed to be doing the paperwork following their earlier meeting, but of course they're putting that off. Something that Aizawa, however, is not.

Is he really confining me here?

"Ms. Kayama?" Izuku asks a while later, voice a whisper. He doesn't want to interrupt anyone potentially working. "You think he'd notice if I jumped out the window behind me?"

The hero snorts and ponders over the question. "Well, saying as he's only ten feet away and also staring right at you as we speak, I'd say the possibility is pretty high."

"Almost 100%," Snipe agrees from beside her.

Huh. Who would've known?

"Midoriya." Aizawa sounds unfazed, but the slight edge to his voice is enough to have Izuku straighten up as he walks back to him.

Dammit. The plan has been foiled.

“Go to the showers and wash that paint off your skin, and go put on your uniform like I asked; there’s only fifteen minutes until the bell.” He looks up from his computer, eyes narrowing suspiciously. “Where even is it?”

“Ah! Well, you see, what happened was…!”

Izuku trails off, because how is he supposed to explain that he used his shirt as a rag to clean up his art and smudge some of the colors around? The brand new, pristine white fabric is not very white anymore, that’s for sure. His green pants aren’t much better.

But then, as if he was waiting for this opportunity to arise, Yamada comes strolling in out of nowhere, smiling proudly and holding something in his hands. “Heya! We’ve got a large crowd this mornin’, huh?” Despite his words, Yamada makes a beeline right for Aizawa and Izuku, plopping down at the desk right next to the hero.

Desk buddies! They’re office neighbors!

“I found your uniform on the ground a couple hallways over,” he exclaims, handing Izuku the bundle of clothing. “I saw it was in pretty bad shape, so I just put it in a quick wash using the laundry stuff here!”

Izuku blinks, unsure whether he should be grateful for Yamada’s kindness or whether he should just curl up into a ball and disappear.

The last option sounds the most tempting.

He slowly makes his way to the boy’s locker room after greeting and then saying goodbye to the blond, happy now to be away from all the other teachers. The storm is starting to lighten up a little, promising warmth. While he usually likes rain, it’s starting to get too gloomy around here.

Izuku’s thoughts drift back to what’s going to be happening in the upcoming hours. He thinks of Kacchan and his friends, of his classmates and how they might react to him being back.

His teachers’ reactions surprised him, but in a mostly good way. He can only hope the same thing will happen again.

Izuku sighs and rubs at his shaking palm, still clutching his dreadful, spotless uniform. He can already tell his first day back is going to be a trip.

And maybe not the fun kind.

For once, Izuku is the first in the classroom.

Not even Iida is there yet, which is slightly concerning—usually his friend arrives as early as thirty minutes before the bell. But Izuku figures that it shouldn't be too surprising given the circumstances.

Yamada said Ingenium is doing okay, but he most likely won't be able to walk again, right? It must be hard to get used to that.

The attack shouldn't have happened in the first place, Izuku thinks darkly before shaking himself free of those thoughts.

The classroom is exactly the way it was when Izuku was last in it. None of the desks have been moved or rearranged, and everything looks to be in the right spots. But there's a different feel to the air now, Izuku notices.

It's colder here. It feels bigger.

Maybe it's because Izuku is looking around through a different pair of eyes this time. He's changed a bit now that a few drastic events have happened.

On his way to the very large and tempting windows, Izuku spots a small box on his desk. Walking closer, he can see that it's a bento box!

A golden ribbon is wrapped around it, and the two loops on the top are molded and trimmed to resemble All Might's hair. How it's even managed to stay upright is a mystery to Izuku.

There's a star-shaped note resting on top of the box, and he instantly recognizes Yamada's slanted handwriting. Izuku's signature Rabbit symbol is drawn on the corner, matching the designs on the box itself, and there are large exclamation points after the words If ya want, come to the teacher's lounge for lunch!!

The realization almost doesn't hit him immediately. Yamada… made him lunch? He brought him lunch from the apartment? But Izuku didn't see him make anything for him this morning—he only saw Yamada make his own lunch and then put some of it into what looked like Aizawa's bag.

It makes Izuku feel strangely warm. And it's nice, really, to have the opportunity to skip going to actual lunch in the cafeteria. He knows he's going to have to face his classmates soon, and lunch will be the perfect time to catch up on everything he's missed, but maybe he is a little apprehensive.

He doesn't want to have to lie to their faces like he did to All Might. Call him cowardice all you want, but he can't do that again.

Izuku gingerly puts the box into his new backpack—this one is dark green with red and black pockets on the sides and front, and while it may not be the pink one that Izuku was given to by Kacchan, he thinks to himself that it's still incredibly cute.

Did they buy this for me? Or did the school provide it?

Oh, wait. Kacchan. He totally forgot about his friend for a minute there. What is he going to say to him when he arrives at school? Sure, Izuku may have already talked to him over the phone (it was definitely not a pleasant conversation), but he hasn't seen him in over a week. Not since Izuku lost to him at the festival.

Kacchan promised to kill him when he next saw him, and while it's obvious he won't go through with that threat, Izuku is still a little worried. What will he do?

This is probably going to be awkward—and also embarrassing.

Izuku starts to pace around the empty classroom with one hand on his chin, muttering to himself. His head is starting to hurt now. Extract won't shut the fuck up for some reason, which is pretty ironic since it didn't seem to be working when Izuku dropped down above Yagi's head earlier. He couldn't feel One for All at all in his mentor, which is worrisome.

Was that Extract being dumb, or is this just proof that Yagi is getting weaker? Or maybe it's because we share the same quirk and now that I've had it for a bit, Extract isn't recognizing it.

But that's a problem for future Izuku to deal with. Present Izuku has other things to worry about.

Kacchan isn't the type to hold grudges for a long time, but he is the type to be extremely petty. Izuku did lie to him for a week and put off contacting him, so he does deserve to be resented at least a little.

It's just how far Kacchan is willing to go that's the question. Murder is, again, off the table. But daily threats and sour looks? Not off the table. It's on the menu, actually.

Since Izuku would like to think he knows his friend well, maybe he can just predict some of the upcoming events. That way he can prepare himself. He lifts up his hands and uses his hands as puppets to simulate the possible meeting, voice taking on a rough edge as he speaks.

"Hello, my dearest and incredibly kind friend, I must first express how irritated I am due to your inconsistent ways of contacting me. You see, Deku, I thought we had moved past this…" Izuku drops the terrible Kacchan voice and uses his other hand now. "I understand your misgivings, O' Lord Explosion God, but please understand that I am tiny, poor, and under a lot of stress—no, this is so dumb. From the top!"

Yeah, he knows his friend well.

To be fair, Kacchan can be a wildcard sometimes, so it is kind of difficult for Izuku to prepare for what their reunion might hold—in fact, even calling it that has Izuku wincing and muttering with even more haste.

It's not a reunion—they were only away from each other for a week! It's more of a hey, glad you're not six feet under type ordeal.

The more Izuku starts to make up wild scenarios and conversations using his terrible puppet hands, the more the voices in his brain are convinced he is actually going insane. He's off his rockers. He is officially qualified to be put in Tartarus now—

"Izuku."

He rolls his eyes at the hand that's portraying Kacchan. "Don't say my name like that, you know it upsets me. Makes me think you wanna kill me or something."

"Keep being fucking weird and I just might."

"Hey, at least that one was in character! I'm getting better at these."

"Deku."

A flash of spiky blond hair pops up in Izuku's peripheral vision, and he shakes his head dismissively at the interruption. "Shut up, Kacchan,

I'm talking to you on my hand, wait for your tur—"

There's a loud crash as Izuku topples off the desk he was sitting on, his body quite literally folding in on itself as he smashes into the neighboring chair. What the shit.

He sees it all of a sudden: the light. He's sure of it now. Despite the fact that the room is pretty dark due to the storm outside, he can see it.

Izuku was right. Their reunion would be embarrassing. He takes back every damn thing he said now that he knows Kacchan was probably there listening to everything he was spewing.

All Might, please smite me right now. You'd be doing your mentee a favor.

He's begged for that to happen countless times, but has his wish ever actually been granted? Only once.

(It was a cold, boring day of training—they were both curious to find out what would happen if Yagi tried to change the weather again using a United States of Smash! It was an accident, really, the way the lightning came down and struck Izuku of all things there on that beach. Yagi would not stop apologizing, and it was only when Izuku started threatening to try and drown himself again that he ceased his attempts to bring Izuku to a hospital.)

A shadow falls over him, and Izuku sees Kacchan's blank face hovering a few feet above him.

Huh. So that's why Extract was being a nuisance. It was trying to tell him someone was coming—it just didn't feel like being particularly pointed about it. Sheesh. The only thing I use you for, Extract, and you're still useless.

"…. You're here early."

"And you're not dead," Kacchan says evenly, the calm before the storm. His hair is wet, probably from running through the actual storm outside. It makes him look funny, especially since the spikes in his hair are just slightly rounded out because of it.

He looks like a flattened porcupine.

Izuku gives a nervous grin. "You don't have to sound so disappointed, y'know. I told you I wasn't!"

Kacchan bends down to grip Izuku's freshly-washed uniform by the shirt, and the boy squeals as he's dragged up and out of the tight space.

"Hey, hey, come on! I'm fragile—oh."

This is… definitely not what Izuku was expecting. In the seventy-four scenarios he made up in his head and even acted out, he did not foresee this one being an option.

Kacchan is hugging him. Tightly. Well, hug might be a strong word depending on your definition of it, but it is a hug for Kacchan's standards, even if the boy is practically just choking him.

Two hugs from two different people… in one day?

It almost doesn't seem real. When was the last time Kacchan initiated a hug? Izuku can't remember, probably because the answer is never.

"You think giving me a stupid note and phone call would be enough to save your ass?"

He shrugs. "Yeah, kinda."

Kacchan's hands grip the back of Izuku's shirt a little tighter, and Izuku just lets it happen. His chin rests on his friend's shoulder, as there's not much else for him to do, and he frowns.

"Your shampoo smells like cherries," he says after a sniff, and Kacchan immediately shoves him away, setting his own bag down at his desk.

"After school you're coming to the house," the blond demands. "The hag wants to see you. She's been on my ass all week about telling you to come over."

Oh no. There's a reason Izuku refused to call her or let Kacchan put her on the phone.

And to think Izuku was worried about what Kacchan would do to him. Mitsuki must be out for blood.

He grins again and rubs the back of his neck, turning to look anywhere but at Kacchan. At least the windows are large enough to provide a decent distraction. "Yeah, I don't think that's a good idea just yet. It might be safer if we just… wait a little?"

For a few more weeks, maybe.

Kacchan snorts. “What, ya scared of her or something?”

Okay, that’s a little unfair. Izuku isn’t scared, thank you very much. Not of Auntie—never in a million years would he be truly scared of her. Rather, he’s terrified of what will happen to them all once certain truths come to light.

Izuku’s brows dip down, and he wrings his hands together to quell his sudden tremors. “Kacchan?” He starts nervously, completely forgetting about his friend’s previous question. “You still haven’t told her about where I lived before, right?”

The few seconds of silence in response has Izuku’s heart rate spiking.

“You mean about where you weren’t living?” Kacchan bites. “Because you sure as hell weren’t living with that old bastard like you told her.”

“Kacchan.”

He says it quietly, like a warning, because the way the blond is talking tells Izuku that his friend is about to go on another rant, and they can’t do that. Not here. Not now. Not when they just got to see each other again after what felt like weeks.

Kacchan scoffs. “No, I didn’t tell her you lived on the damn streets; it would kill her. You’re going to tell her yourself today, you shit nerd.”

The last part is so sudden that Izuku doesn’t bother correcting him about how he technically wasn’t living on the streets—he did have a home, even if it was abandoned. “I don’t even think I’ll be allowed to go to the house after school. I’d have to ask Aizawa, and I’m kind of already on his shit list this morning. I doubt he’ll let me go without him, and I really don’t want him and Auntie to meet.”

Auntie knows things, and she’s prone to sharing most of her thoughts with no filter. That’s not something Izuku would like to be made clear when Aizawa is around with open ears.

The same could also be said the other way around. Aizawa knows a lot, and while he’s much better at controlling himself and keeping things quiet, it’s still not something Izuku is willing to risk.

Aizawa and the others are already curious about his father, and Izuku isn’t willing to find out whether or not the man is petty enough to ask Mitsuki about him.

She'd tell him everything she thinks about Hisashi, too.

But how could Izuku blame her for that? She's just always wanted what's best for her boys.

"His shit list, huh? What did you do?"

Izuku's head snaps back to glare at him incredulously. "Why do you assume I did something? Maybe Aizawa is just an ass and likes to make things difficult! Ever think of that?"

Kacchan stares at him as if to say really? You're really saying that?

"Okay, to be fair I think I'm on everyone's shit list now." Izuku crosses his arms petulantly and turns away. "I can already tell some of the teachers don't like me anymore. And All Might mentioned something about a meeting they all had to attend this morning, too, so I imagine that went just swell."

It doesn't take a genius to figure out what the topic of that meeting was. Izuku doubts the others trust him now—if they even did in the first place. Will Yamada and Aizawa be allowed to cut him some slack? Enough to go to his friend's house? And maybe even stay the night?

Maybe he'd be allowed to if he asked Yamada. Aizawa doesn't have to know… okay, yeah, that's a pretty stupid idea right off the bat. Aizawa always figures things out one way or another.

Kacchan's gaze burns his back. It feels pretty judgmental, honestly. There's a beat of silence, and then: "What have you told them?"

There's a ping somewhere at the back of Izuku's mind, and the boy suddenly feels like the world just completed a quick save—almost like what a game does before the player enters an important and equally as dangerous scene.

Oh boy.

"What?" he asks, already apprehensive. He turns to look at his friend, whose expression is intense. "Told who about what?"

Kacchan rolls his eyes. "That's what I'm asking. What have you told them? Nothing?"

Izuku was right. He's entering a dangerous scene now. He knows exactly who Kacchan is referring to, and he knows what he's asking about.

His friend never gives up.

Rain drums against the large windows in the classroom, and Izuku is thankful for the volume of it. It's loud enough to probably drown out their current conversation so the camera in the corner of the room can't catch it. It's a new camera, he notices.

It must've been recently installed.

"I said to you over the phone I haven't told them much," he starts carefully, thinking of all the things he's still keeping from Yamada and Aizawa. His stomach gives a funny swooping feeling at the reminder, and he tries to ignore it. "I'm not planning on telling them anything more, either. Not yet," he amends at Kacchan's look.

That doesn't stop the blond from rounding on him, though, eyes flashing. "Hah? But you're fucking living with them now! They deserve to know at least some shit!"

Izuku shakes his head and turns away even though his friend has a point. "That doesn't mean anything."

"So you're just going to be walking around on eggshells with them, is that it? I didn't think even you would be so weak. That's a coward's move."

"Why are you being so mean!" Izuku hisses back, glancing at the entrance of the classroom nervously. "I've only been with them for like a week—!"

"You told me they're already asking you about Hisashi and everything else, so what's the big deal in telling them? You're just making everything harder than it has to be. You said things are different now. Why can't this be different, too?"

Christ. Here they go again. Izuku should've known this would happen. The hug lured him in. It was just something to make Izuku let his guard down. While he's certain Kacchan didn't mean it like that at all, that's still how it feels.

It's too early in the morning to have these heavy discussions. Especially in public.

“Oh, yes, Kacchan. You’re absolutely right!” His face lights up in mock elation, his panic lighting a fire so hot inside him that he can’t even begin to quell it. “I should just tell them all about my spectacular life! Maybe I’ll even tell them about all of the wonderful memories I made with dad, huh? Wouldn’t want to leave out all the sweet details, either. Hey, what do you think they’ll say when I tell them all about how we used to play catch with quirks!”

By the end of his outburst, Kacchan is dead silent, glaring.

Izuku blinks, realizing what he just said, and turns away again with a groan. He lifts a hand to rub at his temple, wincing. “Did you have to bring this up today?” he asks, quieter this time.

“Someone has to,” Kacchan says without hesitation, but it’s not as angry as before. “You’ve been going around in circles like this for years. Whenever the opportunity to get real help comes along, you always look the other direction and refuse to even humor the idea of __”

“What’s telling them about Hisashi going to do? It’s not like that’ll magically make things better. Everything’s already happened, Kacchan. They’d all just be in more danger and would be even more worried when they shouldn’t be. I’m fine.”

Are you? Izuku’s mind challenges, but the boy is so used to this by now that it’s nearly second nature to push the thought away entirely.

Kacchan seems to be thinking something along the same lines, though, as he still doesn’t back down.

“Shouldn’t be worried? Ya think they wouldn’t want to know you’re being haunted by that bastard?”

“I’m already haunted,” he points out, thinking of the voices he hears in his mind when the world slows down too much. When the shadows start looking less like monsters and more like people. “Just stop it. There’s no chance of me telling them shit until he’s gone.”

I don’t want them to get hurt. Father used to love using others to make me obey. He’d do it to them, too. Just for fun. And I wouldn’t know what to do if he did.

“Fine!” Kacchan snaps suddenly, palms sparking as he slides off his desk. Izuku feels One for All stir in response, and he kicks it down immediately. While he usually loves sparring with his friend, engaging right now wouldn't result in another one of their friendly fights. He doesn't want to start something like that up again.

Izuku is a ball of anxiety, arms crossed tightly across his chest and teeth worrying his bottom lip as Kacchan stalks over to him. He towers over Izuku, and the boy hates how their height difference is being made even more apparent when he has to lift his chin up to meet his friend's gaze.

"Once he's gone, yeah? You just said it." Kacchan jabs him in the chest with a finger. "The fucking moment he's out of the picture entirely, you're telling someone about everything he did. I don't care who, but you have to do it. I can't do this shit anymore. Not telling people before is what got you into this mess. That's why you almost got killed that night—that's why Missy almost died. Because you're too scared to let go of all that shit. That was on you."

The accusation hurts, mostly because it's true. Izuku can recognize that—he has recognized that. But bringing up Missy was honestly a low blow. Kacchan knows how to hurt him without putting much effort in at all.

There are more people walking into UA; Izuku can feel them. Teachers are starting to go back to their classrooms to prepare for the first lesson. This has to stop soon. Izuku doesn't know why he let the conversation go on for this long.

Kacchan just couldn't have waited until after school, could he? But then again, that isn't quite fair to say either, huh?

Izuku shouldn't blame someone else for something he could've fixed a long time ago.

The day he dies is the day he forgets about everything I've yet to pay for. I'm sorry, Kacchan, but you're gonna be waiting a while until that happens.

"Okay," he says, whispering it like a promise, a decree. "When he's gone."

This one isn't a lie.

Kacchan nods once, and at the same time the door to the classroom slides open. Izuku straightens up and turns to stare at Iida, having felt him coming a while back.

“Iida! It’s nice to see you!” Izuku’s heart jumps in his throat, and he swallows it back down to grin at his friend. “It’s been a while.”

The blue-haired boy looks genuinely surprised to see him. “Ah, good morning, Midoriya! Glad to see you’re back! Are you alright?”

“Oh, yeah, I’m great! And thank you! I’m glad to be back.”

He’s quieter than usual, Izuku notes when Iida doesn’t question him further or ask him to elaborate on the first part. Out of most of his classmates, Izuku knows Iida is the most respectful, but he also knows the boy is also one of the most caring. He looks subdued. Lost in thought.

Izuku listens closely to Iida greet Kacchan as well, with Kacchan barking back a yeah, yeah, whatever, now leave me alone! Iida’s tone of voice is slightly different from how Izuku last remembers it. The change is minuscule, but it’s there.

He sits there at his desk, the clouds outside a perfect representation of how the atmosphere feels inside the classroom, and busies himself with getting his new notebooks and materials out of his backpack. He hears Kacchan give a disgusted snort at the sight of it, but he doesn’t comment on it.

Izuku knows the man who tried to kill Iida’s brother personally. He knows him well, almost too well at times. And the worst part is that Izuku wasn’t exactly Stain’s enemy during that entire time. Far from it.

It feels like a betrayal to be sitting here.

But Iida is of course oblivious to the sort-of accomplice he’s talking to and catching up on, and Izuku can’t tell if that’s better or worse.

When Izuku’s brain starts to run a little too quickly for comfort, when Kacchan’s gaze on his back becomes too hot for him to handle, he clears his throat and decides to just go for it. “Hey, um, Iida, about your brother—”

“It’s fine,” Iida interrupts, leaving Izuku’s mouth still slightly open. “You needn’t worry about my brother. I apologize if he or I caused you any undue stress. He’s healing rather well now, so there’s no need to worry!” Iida’s glasses flash when another bout of lightning strikes. Izuku can feel the rumbling in his bones. “But I do appreciate your concern.”

It sounds genuine, but the dismissal is clear. Izuku dips his head and hopes his voice is comforting as he replies. “Yeah! Of course.”

Izuku watches him continue to get ready for class for just a moment longer before turning to stare down at his desk. That look in his friend's eye; he knows it well. He knows it intimately.

And it’s scary to see it on Iida’s face.

Soon enough, everyone else starts to trail into the classroom, and Izuku has to put his worry on the back burner for a bit, a new kind of burning panic working its way up from his stomach.

“Hey, Deku!”

Yeah, this is going to be fun.

He smiles at Uraraka and the others, and honestly? It’s not as forced as he thought it would be. He’s worried about how he’s going to explain his absence to them, but it’s okay, really.

Izuku finds that maybe he did miss this.

Names. Fucking names. Izuku doesn’t like names.

He doesn’t like titles or surnames, and he barely likes nicknames. He only likes nicknames when they can be weaponized or used as an insult against criminals. He only deals with nicknames from Kacchan because, well… he doesn’t actually know. Kacchan has always been the exception.

But what Izuku hates more than names is coming up with names. He’s shit at that. Just look at his quirks! He named a good portion of them himself, and you can see how simple they are.

Izuku glares at his whiteboard, rolling his marker around between his fingers. This is annoying and also incredibly frustrating. Izuku would rather someone else come up with his hero name, for fuck’s sake. He probably won’t even make it to graduation, so it’s not like a name matters.

Yeah, he's out of ideas.

When Aiawa showed them all how many draft picks they each got for the internships, Izuku was surprised. Todoroki was first with a grand total of 4,123 picks despite only making it to the top eight. Kacchan followed close behind, and the next was Tokoyami.

That's not what surprised Izuku; what surprised him was the fact that he got fourth place, which is a lot higher than Izuku expected he would get.

His classmates were confused as to why Izuku wasn't higher on the list since he did get second place in the festival, but Izuku knows why.

It was the motherfucking chicken. It threw everyone off and made him look even more homeless and scrappy than he already was at the time. Izuku has seen some of the headlines about the festival, and he's not too enthused about his new nicknames: KFC Boy and Explosion Magnet. Some newslines have even just taken to literally calling him that one homeless kid.

Izuku thinks that he does have a right to feel offended by that last one even though they weren't wrong. He does.

The students will get a chance to think about which agency they want to intern at sometime after they choose their hero names—something that Izuku was not so excited about. I would've gone to Endeavor's just to fuck with him, but I know damn well he didn't choose me. We just have to choose something before the week is over, right? How hard can it be?

Wait, doesn't All Might have an agency? It would be fun to get more training with his mentor in such a professional setting, though it may be more difficult with Yagi's decreasing health. Would he even allow Izuku to intern with him, or would that be considered favoring?

He doesn't want Yagi to be made fun of by the other teachers. Kacchan already told him that some of the class were remarking on his and All Might's closeness while he was away, so it's not so far-fetched to think that maybe the teachers might be miffed about it too.

Izuku honestly doesn't think Yagi is favoring him, exactly, it's just that the man doesn't know how to hide his concern very well. It's not really favoring… right?

"So all that's left is Bakugou's revision, Iida, and then Midoriya!" Kayama-sensei's voice reaches Izuku's ears with sudden clarity, and he blinks back to reality. Oh, shit. Yeah. Names.

After Kacchan is sent back to his seat after being denied yet another wonderful alias, in Izuku's own terrible opinion, Iida goes up next. He seems to think long and hard about something before turning his whiteboard around to show his neat handwriting.

Tenya. So he's going by just his first name. Somehow this is surprising.

Izuku stands on shaky legs when Iida goes back to his seat, making his way to the front of the room with nothing on his board yet. He just doesn't know , dammit. Should he go the first name route like Todoroki and Iida or just make up something dumb? He should've asked Uraraka what she thought, as she's a lot more creative with this type of stuff.

A hero name could be considered as just another nickname, so what would Izuku be okay with being called by the world? He barely even likes his own name, so this is tough.

"What about Bunny?" Aizawa snarks just quietly enough for Izuku to hear. He's leaned up against the wall behind his desk, and the sleeping bag he's in muffles his voice just slightly. Though his eyes are closed and he looks like he's sleeping, he's obviously not.

And you know what? Just for that stupid fucking jab and the way Aizawa is most definitely sporting some kind of shit-eating grin on his face, Izuku would've done it. He would've tried to put his hero name down as Bunny just to get back at the hero, but unfortunately that's already the name of a very popular stripper that Izuku knows. She comes into the Club all the time; he wouldn't want to tarnish her reputation.

It would've been a fun name, though. That part is undeniable.

He needs to pick something. It can be anything—it doesn't matter! Why is he getting so stuck up on this? It doesn't—it shouldn't matter. Names are just names, they don't always have to represent who you are. They're just placeholders. They don't have to have any attachment or emotion behind it.

Not… not always.

Nineteen other pairs of eyes are staring right at him. They're waiting for an answer. Dammit.

Hisashi loved names, Izuku thinks suddenly. His father always had a plethora of nicknames that he loved to use for his sons and enemies. He used to call Izuku a lot of things.

But for all his fascination with names and titles, All for One did not like Kacchan's nickname for Izuku. On multiple occasions, Izuku can remember the man trying to convince him not to stand being called that, as what kind of friend calls you useless, my boy?

He hated the term Deku and would only ever use it to mock Izuku or to get him to shape up. And it worked, really. Back then, at least.

Izuku didn't like being called Deku then, not by Kacchan or his father or anyone, but eventually he started to like it. Eventually the word started to take on a new meaning for him. For him and Kacchan both.

"Like you can do it! I think it sounds nice!"

Sometimes he even prefers that nickname over his own name. So maybe it isn't really just Kacchan that's the exception for giving nicknames.

It's Deku.

"You've got a name yet, kid?" Kayama prods, and Izuku hastily uncaps his marker before he can think better of it.

Hisashi wouldn't like it, that same nasty voice says in his head, and Izuku grits his teeth as he flips the whiteboard for the class to see.

Maybe that's part of the reason why Izuku is choosing it. As much as he hates it, everything does end up leading back to his father at some point. One way or another.

"Are you fucking kidding me!" Kacchan hisses, nearly snapping his own marker in two at his seat.

Izuku just smiles as the rest of his classmates nod and compliment the choice. Uraraka looks slightly concerned at first, but she seems to understand after seeing the look on Izuku's face.

Sometimes you can learn to love something you grew to hate.

Later in the day, after Kacchan has been forced to give up on picking a name for now (he refused to accept any of Izuku's own fine ideas), Izuku turns to his friend with a shadowed face. The weather still hasn't let up outside; it seems it was supposed to be a miserable day today.

"Hey. About Todoroki. How did he look on the first day back after the sports festival?"

Kacchan doesn't question why he's asking this so randomly, too used to Izuku's interesting ways by now. Izuku has been having thoughts. The kind of thoughts that lead to crime.

Maybe even felonies, he thinks once Kacchan answers him.

Bruised. Beaten. Overall not very good-looking.

Izuku crosses his ankles and hums as his mind runs. He balances his pen on top of his knuckles and covers his mouth with the palm of his other hand, one elbow on the table. He keeps his gaze fixed on how Uraraka talks excitedly with Todoroki and Iida, who looks a little less subdued now.

All three of them are interesting. Iida has the whole issue with his brother and Stain, Uraraka seems to have a lot on her plate and might be suffering from it, and Todoroki… was so obviously trained at home.

Izuku did not inflict the marks that Kacchan described. He would know, as he counted each bruise and cut and scrape he gave his opponents during the festival. Every little mishap.

Todoroki must've gotten even more injured at home, after the festival, and Izuku doubts it was of his own volition. And really, there's only a couple other reasons as to why he would look like that. Today he doesn't look too bad—he always looks amazing—but Izuku can imagine how he must've looked on that first day back.

He doesn't realize he's muttering darkly to himself, his face shadowed with thinly hidden contempt, until Kaminari pokes him in the shoulder. He must have migrated all the way from his seat. "Hey, you good, man?"

Izuku straightens up and nods quickly, tearing his gaze away from his friends. "Yeah! Just tired, that's all!"

It's not really a lie.

By the time lunch rolls around and Izuku has come up with some excuse as to why he can't eat with everyone today, he really is starving. But instead of the plain rice he would usually get in the discount line, today he has something more to look forward to.

He follows Aizawa to the teacher's lounge after most of the hallways have been cleared of the students, as he wasn't exactly allowed to travel via the vents this time. He tries to avoid his other teachers as best he can by pulling up a chair between Aizawa and Yamada's desk, making himself as small as possible.

The air in here is awkward at first, but it's ultimately better than being crowded by his friends in the cafeteria. He can have one more day to prepare for that again.

He did tell them he'd explain himself eventually. He intends to keep that promise.

Yamada assures him that he doesn't have to eat here with them if he doesn't want to, that he can leave at any time, and Izuku appreciates the concern. He must be able to tell Izuku is a bit uncomfortable here.

It's not a problem, though! It's not a big deal. Izuku has been in way more uncomfortable situations. Besides, he actually likes eating with them.

Not that he'd say that. Nope.

Izuku can nearly cry when he opens up the bento box to the sight of beautifully shaped rice balls and other foods. There are little stars and bunny faces and carrots! They've even got miniature noses and whiskers on some of them too!

It's so cute that Izuku might just implode. Preparing the bento itself must have taken ages. It's obvious that a lot of care and thought was put into it.

His cheeks burn when he picks up one of the bunny-shaped rice balls and takes a bite into it. He almost feels bad about eating it.

Izuku waits until Yamada is finished with talking to Kayama before attempting to speak. "Thank you for the food," he says, still embarrassed. "And—and the bento box! Thank you for buying that for me."

"Oh, you're most assuredly welcome, listener, but I only prepared the food. All Might is the one who bought you the bento box, actually. He gave it to me last week to give to you." Yamada turns his full attention to him and smiles softly. "Figured today would be the perfect time to do that, y'know?"

Oh. Yagi bought it… for me? He bought a bento box with green bunnies on it—bunnies that have All Might's hair as their ears? A design that is almost obviously a reference to Rabbit?

Or maybe Izuku is looking too much into it.

But then a funnier thought arises. Was Yagi trying to show some support?

Izuku suddenly has this very weird image of his mentor asking for this to be specially made, as Izuku knows that this isn't just out there on the market. This is probably one of its kind!

He busts out laughing at the mere idea of it and nearly drops his chopsticks. Half the people in the room look at him in surprise, and Izuku covers it up with a cough. "Sorry. It's, uh, allergies."

"That doesn't even—"

Yamada hushes Aizawa, but he's grinning too. Just because it's raining like fuck outside doesn't mean Izuku can't still get allergies.

After Izuku gushes and rambles over his new phone even more to Yamada and giggles with him over some of the hero's latest interviews, he is eventually left with just Aizawa and a few other teachers. Yamada had to go back to his classroom early to help with a lesson.

Aizawa is on his tablet, back to doing some work. But it looks to Izuku like it's outside work. Maybe even case stuff! He's been doing that a lot lately.

Izuku is just sending another stupid meme to Kacchan when Aizawa's phone pings. The man huffs out something between a laugh and a sigh as he reads whatever the notification says.

"The hospital you stayed at is going to update their security measures soon," Aizawa says, a tinge of amusement in his voice. "Hopefully they'll upgrade their locks too."

Izuku pauses with his food held an inch from his mouth and frowns."What, did someone break in and steal something?"

That's the only reason a hospital would make a sudden push for security upgrades. That kind of stuff is expensive to just do out of the blue.

Aizawa snorts. "No, kid. You broke out. No patient has been able to do that so easily before, especially not a patient who was supposed to be bedridden at the time."

The reminder of his hospital escape makes Izuku flush, but he pushes away his slight shame and wrinkles his nose. It's not like it was hard to leave the hospital. They assumed he wouldn't go out of the window, and that was their mistake. It wasn't Izuku's fault at all; the bedsheets in the linen closet were just begging to be used, so Izuku had to do something.

"Well, I guess whatever they're doing now will be better than having no security systems in place at all," he says, struggling to get the last bite of beef from the corner of his bento box. Aizawa just stares at him, and Izuku throws him a look. "What? Is there something on my face? Food in my teeth?"

"They had good security before, Midoriya. The lock on your window was made to withstand even All Might's strength."

Izuku actually has to take a second and wrack his brain to think about whether or not that's true. "Huh? I don't remember there being one like that."

"Kid, just because it was easy for you to break doesn't mean it wasn't good in theory."

What? Izuku puts down his chopsticks to study his teacher's face, the last bite of beef forgotten now. He's not joking, is he? No, he wouldn't be pulling his leg over something this stupid. That's not his style. And something about the fact that Izuku has garnered Aizawa's full attention now tells the boy that nope, this isn't a joke.

"Sensei, I meant there wasn't a lock on the window when I left." He shifts uncomfortably in his seat. Having to explain how he ran is a little embarrassing. "All I had to do was lift up the latch and, uh, go."

Aizawa's eye twitches, and when he speaks, his voice has an edge to it. "Midoriya, you had to take off the lock before being able to scale down the—"

"No, I didn't!" The words come out in a rush, and Izuku winces at his own defensiveness. He's suddenly reminded of before, when Aizawa asked him if he took the last jelly pack that night, except the only difference between then and now is that Izuku isn't lying this time. "I promise, I didn't! There wasn't a lock on the window at all!"

Aizawa stares at him suspiciously for a moment, as if to get him to crack, but Izuku holds his gaze. He may not be the most trustworthy at times (the promise he made Yagi that morning comes to mind), but he's really not lying this time around.

It would be a stupid thing to lie about anyway.

After a few moments, the man just furrows his brows and glances back down at the tablet before him. "When I left your hospital room, there was a steel lock on the window that you would need a special fingerprint to get off. I know because I made sure of it. You're saying you didn't see one at all?"

"I promise I didn't."

There's no hesitation when he answers, because dammit now Izuku is a little indignant. And maybe he's also a little freaked out now. It might not seem like a big deal, but he knows Aizawa doesn't mess up on stuff like that. If he said there was a lock when he left, then there was a lock when he left.

And Izuku may be dumb, but he wouldn't forget something like that either. He remembers simply opening the window and throwing his makeshift rope down to leave. He didn't have to pick or break a lock or anything.

Did the doctor take it off? No, that would be stupid. And why would the doctor have the fingerprint for the lock, anyway? Wouldn't that go to the head of security? Or that specific wing's head person? That would make more sense.

Aizawa leans back in his chair, looking perturbed now. His eyes narrow. "The nurse found the lock under your bed. Said it looked like it fell from the window and rolled, so she assumed it got there from you breaking it."

Izuku pushes away his bento box entirely and itches at the scar on his jaw. "Did someone override it? If it was an electric lock, they wouldn't have to be in the room to do it." He tips his head in thought. "In fact, they could do it anywhere. They would just have to have access to the online control panels, and maybe the schematics of the building.

Though they would need to have some pretty good technology. Not even I could do that on my own from a large distance. AINA would usually take care of that for me, but if someone had their own program…"

The boy breaks off in a mutter and covers his mouth with a palm. If someone did unlock it without using a fingerprint, they would've had to have broken the entire thing using brute force or by unlocking it using another method. Since it is fingerprint sensitive and also apparently heavy duty, it must have been connected to some electric wires. So by sending strong charges through them to fry it, you could potentially override the entire thing and get it to snap off.

Which means someone must have been targeting Izuku personally to go through all that trouble, or else a bigger portion of the building would've been messed with. Did Aizawa get any reports that any of the other locks in other rooms fell off? Doesn't sound like it, so it must've been just in Izuku's room, then, huh? Who could have done something like that? And why? Did they know he would run the moment he saw the opportunity? In his state, he definitely wouldn't have been strong enough to break off an 'All Might-grade' lock, so it's not like he would've escaped had the lock stayed on.

This was deliberate. Whoever did it must've had some meticulous planning done beforehand. Or maybe they were just lucky.

When he tunes back into the real world, Aizawa looks a little pissed, though not at Izuku. His gaze is hard as he starts to pack up some of his stuff. "Don't worry about it right now, kid. I'll take care of it."

Shit. I'd hate to be on the other end of that look.

Despite being a little offended that he just got told not to worry about it when the problem literally involves him, Izuku chooses to focus on how the man seems to be getting more irritated by the second. Does he know who did it? Or does he at least have a good idea of who might be involved?

Wait, maybe he's just constipated. He definitely looks like he is right now. What if he's not even paying attention to their conversation anymore?

"Do you need to go to the bathroom or something?" Izuku asks, mouth moving before he can stop it.

That seems to bring some train of thought to an end, as Aizawa blinks and looks up, expression smoothing over as he easily ignores the question. “There’s still fifteen minutes left for lunch. If I’m not back by then, make sure you get to class. And no fooling around, got it?”

Izuku gives a horrible salute, putting one hand behind his back so he can cross his fingers. “Understood, sensei, sir! I won’t!”

As expected, the hero just pinches the bridge of his nose before pushing in his chair to leave.

He should really stop expecting Izuku to take him seriously when it comes to promising to curb his behavior.

Izuku lives to create disorder, and just because he has people here now to tell him not to do that anymore doesn’t mean he’s going to listen to them.

Breaking laws and expectations is something he knows how to do intimately. Like hell he’s ever going to stop.

Shouta has been in his boss’ office so many times since he started working at UA that it’s honestly kind of concerning. He could have a three-inch layer of blindfolds on and be walking around the school in the dead of night and still be able to find his way there with no trouble at all. It’s like second nature to him, which is pretty screwed up to think about.

So yeah, he’s been in there a lot.

But if he’s being honest, Shouta can’t remember the last time he ever felt this angry before arriving.

He walks swiftly through the mostly empty halls, something hot eating away at his insides. He’s aware, at the back of his mind, that the spark of rage that ignites in his chest is born of the fear that Midoriya could have gotten hurt, or worse, but all Shouta knows is that he’s furious in a way that makes his entire body feel too hot, his muscles tightening as he stalks towards Principal Nezu’s office.

“I promise I didn’t!”

His eye twitches, hands making fists at his sides. Midoriya wasn’t lying there. Shouta has come to know the difference between the kid’s I’m so guilty right now voice and okay, for once I’m actually not lying one, and so he’s fairly certain he was being truthful.

And Midoriya telling the truth in this circumstance can only mean one thing. There’s nothing else that could explain it.

Shouta doesn’t bother knocking. He knows the mammal must have seen him coming a while back.

He doesn’t kick open the door, technically, but it does get shoved open with a lot more force than is probably necessary. His eyes zero in on his boss, who is sitting politely at his desk with a cup of tea in his paws.

The bastard was definitely expecting him.

There’s no time for pleasantries. “You did that on purpose,” Shouta says coldly, making his way further inside the office.

Principal Nezu smiles. “I’m afraid I don’t know what you’re talking about, Aizawa.”

Don’t play dumb.

“You did something to that lock, didn’t you? At that hospital.” It may be phrased like a question, but Shouta knows immediately after the words leave his mouth that he’s correct. “You wouldn’t even need to leave this office to do it, it would be that easy.” Too easy. “You let Midoriya go, and in doing so you put him in danger. You put everything in danger. What if we didn’t find him in time? Or at all? That would be on you, Nezu.”

The mammal hums in consideration and stirs his tea with a claw, unperturbed by the accusatory tone. “I merely leveled the playing field a little. I needed to gauge Midoriya’s emotional state and see what his goals were. Knowing where he wanted to go or wanted to do after such a traumatic event was imperative to my research, and also for his safety.”

“You—” Shouta cuts himself off. It makes sense, really. Finding Midoriya at that apartment after he ran did tell him a lot about what kind of mindset he was in, and Shouta did gain some more information about him, but that doesn't matter. So, so many things could've gone wrong.

The point is that Nezu must be absolutely sick to allow—not just allow, make way for —something like that to happen. He endangered a child's whole life.

Because what if Shouta arrived a few minutes later? Would he have still found Midoriya kneeling down in the ruins of that apartment? Or would he have had to search the streets and come across something far worse?

He wouldn't know what to do with himself if Midoriya didn't turn out okay that day.

"His trauma is not something you can play around with. He's not some zoo animal that you can throw things at and experiment on just to see how he'll react." Shouta grips his capture weapon on instinct to calm the fluttering of nerves inside his stomach. He'd never think about using it, as he still has exemplary control over himself, but the action is undeniable.

The Principal just has a way of pissing people off without doing much of anything at all. It's almost impressive.

Shouta breathes out through his nose, forcing himself to settle down before continuing tightly. "Midoriya isn't here for your sick entertainment. He is a child who barely counts as a highschooler, for god's sake, and he deserves to be treated with the same level of care that you would expect from anyone else in this situation. But I guess this shouldn't come as much of a surprise, right? The only reason you haven't turned him over to the authorities is because you're not finished with him yet."

"I haven't even started," Nezu corrects, as if he didn't just admit to being a complete psycho. "But yes, you could say that. And I'm fairly certain I'm not alone in saying that he has untapped potential that would be just a shame to not explore. In fact! The reason for handing him that application that evening was so you could push him to the limits at this school, was it not?"

No. It was also to protect him. To keep his ass in line so he wouldn't get himself killed. Tsukauchi begged me to do it.

He doesn't answer just yet. He knows a rhetorical question from his boss when he hears one.

“We’ve both had the same thoughts about our dear student, just different ideas on how we should approach this most peculiar situation. And, ah, that reminds me.” Nezu pushes his tea to the side and opens up one of his desk drawers to pull out a few papers. “What is our motto again? I haven’t heard it from you in a while, Aizawa.”

Sometimes Shouta does seriously consider murder.

“Plus ultra,” he grits out, staring straight ahead.

“Indeed! It is our duty to help this child along and nourish his power to the fullest—and even beyond that point! With a mind and emotional intelligence as grand as his, Midoriya will surely be an unstoppable force in the future.” Nezu holds up a claw. “But only if given the right push.”

The right push in the wrong direction, he means.

Shouta stays silent again, stewing. He can’t believe this, but he also can, because fuck, he knew there’d be a catch. He knew that his boss would have some strings attached in allowing the kid to hide here and not be sent away. He just knew it wouldn’t be so easy.

He’s grateful, sure, since there’s no way in hell he would be able to protect Midoriya legally and maybe even physically without Nezu’s help and support, but he’s still pissed. Because the mammal is acting like Midoriya is nothing but a toy that he can play with and ruin and eventually throw out once he gets bored of it.

Shouta has seen it happen before.

“And speaking of his intelligence! I wanted to discuss the details of Midoriya’s test with you, if that’s alright? I’m quite pleased with what I’ve found.”

The IQ test? Is he still stuck on that?

“He wasn’t very happy about taking it, you know,” Shouta grumbles, crossing his arms and leaning back in the sofa directly adjacent to Nezu’s desk. He’s annoyed by the change of topic but also not willing to try and bring up the rat’s selfish tendencies again.

Nezu nods. “I imagine not. He must’ve known why I was pushing for his cooperation with it. But, as I’m sure you told him, to get every question wrong you have to first know every right answer. So if I’m to be honest, he didn’t need to take that second test. I just wanted to see how he would do on a slightly more advanced version." Something dark passes across his furry face, making the hairs at the back of Shouta's neck stand up. "And he didn't disappoint."

"We already knew he was smart. He's one of the top students in my class. What do you want?"

"I think if I were to tutor him personally—"

"No."

"You should understand I wasn't asking your permission," the principal says sweetly.

Shouta's eye twitches, the fire reigniting in his stomach once more. "I told you he's not going to become one of your newest projects. He's not some tool you can train to your liking and use whenever you feel like it. That's cruel."

"He is a hero in training, so he's already a tool. Do not forget that this is exactly what Midoriya signed up for upon turning in his application. But I will assure you, Aizawa, that he will remain in good hands. I merely want to help him expand his knowledge beyond what he believes is possible."

That's the biggest load of shit Shouta's ever heard, but he can't do anything about it. He's witnessed this happen more times than he'd prefer. And each time he was unsuccessful to change the outcome whenever he tried.

He gets up with his head dipped low, making for the door. He trusts Nezu, he really does. But sometimes it scares Shouta how much his boss refuses to understand. But that's not quite right either, is it? Nezu does understand, he just thinks that some things—mainly his projects—are more important than anything else.

"Ah, one more thing before you go!"

Shouta's hand pauses on the handle. It's too cold for his liking.

"Would you mind sending Midoriya to my office sometime over the next few days? I think I should introduce myself formally, as I have yet to do so." He shakes his head in slight shame. "How rude of me. I am the closest thing to his legal guardian as of this moment. You would think I'd have seen him by now."

It's almost a jab towards Shouta himself; another stinging reminder that Midoriya still isn't under his or Hizashi's guardianship despite their living situation. Which means Shouta doesn't have any legal precedence when it comes to Midoriya—Nezu can do whatever he wants to him. He can also decide to revoke the protection the boy's receiving whenever he feels like it. He wouldn't need a reason.

Shouta hasn't exactly told Midoriya that the mammal is his guardian. That's something that he'll have to do very soon, as much as he resents the fact. It's stupid, really, how even though Shouta and Hizashi are the caretakers, the ones who the kid will go back to every day after school and stay with like they're fostering him, Nezu is still his highest authority figure since Midoriya now belongs to UA. They have to wait for the grace period to be up before they can take things a step further and fully adopt the kid. It would be easier to protect him that way.

Even if the mere idea of adoption makes Shouta's heart race and his palms sweat. It's much too early for that. It's too early for any of that stuff.

The kid won't like any of this, he knows. He has to prepare for a nasty reaction.

He turns back and stares at the animal, who's taken to looking out the window now, watching the dark clouds above light up with electricity. His face is shadowed as he thinks of things Shouta isn't privy to.

There's a reason I haven't let you see him yet, Nezu. You know that.

The mammal wants to push Midoriya over the edge of the precipice and into the roaring waters down below. He wants to watch Midoriya struggle to stay afloat until he's about to succumb to the darkness, and only then will Nezu fish him from the waves. He'll wring him out and repeat the process until Midoriya learns how to do it all by himself, until he won't need anyone to save him from the chilling waters. And when that happens, what will be left is something raw and malleable. Something stronger and yet worse than before.

This is exactly what Nezu has been looking for in all of UA's students. And it looks like he's found it, finally. He's found the perfect subject.

Shouta hates that it's Midoriya, and yet he always knew it would be like that. The kid just has a way of drawing people towards him. Even criminals. He manages to worm his way into people's lives and hearts without them even knowing it until one night they just find themselves running into a burning building to snatch him off death's doorstep.

Maybe that's the moment Shouta knew things were going to change.

"You'll break him," he says in warning, taking a shuddering breath in at the same time as thunder rumbles overhead. "But you know that, don't you?"

Just like all the other ones who failed to meet his expectations in the end.

Nezu doesn't reply immediately. He rarely does in instances where he's challenged so openly about his methods. But then one of his ears twitches, and he twists to present Shouta with what is probably meant to be a comforting smile; it's too resigned and sad to ever be that soft.

"Only if he's breakable. And from what I've seen, Aizawa, he is anything but."

His words are final, signaling the end of the conversation, but his tone is almost soft. Protective. More thoughts and memories pass through his eyes like ships in the sea, and Shouta leaves with a heavy feeling in his chest.

Children shouldn't have to be unbreakable, he thinks. They should just be safe.

But the world doesn't work that way. Shouta knows this. They all know this.

The sun is peeking ever so slightly through the black clouds, and Shouta lets the warmth of it shine through the windows and wash over his face as he walks. For a day as shitty as this one, it feels kinda nice. He tucks his face into his capture weapon and bites back a yawn. It's only halfway through the day and he's already tired of this shit. Maybe he should've taken another day off or something.

But speaking of. Where is the little shit? Off terrorizing one of the teachers, probably, as he should still have a couple minutes of lunch left. He hopes at least someone is watching him; he doubts Midoriya actually stayed in the teacher's lounge like he asked.

He doesn't want to deal with another spray painting scenario. That wouldn't be good, especially because he knows that instead of punishing Midoriya, Nezu will punish Shouta for it the next time it happens. Maybe he'll make him play another game of chess with him.

Shouta would much sooner step off a skyscraper than do that. At least then he would have a better chance at surviving.

He's so busy in his thoughts that he doesn't even notice someone is coming around the corner until it's too late. A body smacks into Shouta's chest with so much force that the culprit ends up flat on his ass, a few papers fluttering out of thin arms as a consequence.

And Shouta, who didn't move an inch at the collision, just blinks down at the boy. His eyes immediately go to the circles on the uniform that show he's a student in general studies, and he watches as the kid scrambles to his feet after picking up his papers. He gets the feeling he's seen him before but can't figure out where it might've been from.

"Shit, sorry, I wasn't looking where I was..." Mystery Boy trails off upon meeting Shouta's gaze, eyes widening a little. His mouth hangs open in shock—and he's still standing in Shouta's way, which makes the hero want to sigh again.

He walks right past him, cataloging the fluffy lilac hair to memory so later he can try to remember why the kid is so familiar. "It's fine. Go back to lunch, kid."

Those eyes are familiar, too. And his voice.

No matter. It doesn't concern Shouta.

"Wait! Sir, I—I have a question!"

"I'm busy." Shouta doesn't slow down. "If you have questions, talk to your teacher or one of the counselors, I'm not—"

"You're Eraserhead, right?"

Shouta only just barely manages to stop himself from outwardly huffing at the interruption. He really doesn't have time for this. He quickens his steps and hears the boy scampering along after him. "This isn't the time for whatever you're trying to do."

"You transferred from general studies!"

Shouta's mind short circuits, making him stop abruptly. The student smashes into Shouta's back and hisses, clutching at his nose as he stumbles away, but Shouta can't pay his misfortune any mind.

Transferred? Is he talking about how Shouta was moved from Gen Ed. to the hero course? And if so, just how does he even know that? Not many people do. Shouta only did well on his first sports festival so he would be considered for the hero course. He purposely flunked the last trials of his second and third year festivals so he wouldn't get any unwanted recognition.

But Shouta transferred midway through his first year almost sixteen years ago, so how is it that it's being brought up now? Nobody was supposed to remember the weird-looking kid who wiped the floor with the hero course students that one year. It was supposed to be a fluke.

But now that he's thinking about it, he knows who this boy is. The pieces are coming back to him. This is the one who made it through the obstacle course and the paintball battle without any trouble during the festival . This is the one who fought Midoriya in the first round of the duels. How could Shouta forget?

It's not often a kid with a powerful quirk and an attitude like this comes along.

Fucking hell. Yeah. He definitely needs more coffee for this. Immediately, preferably.

Shouta starts walking again, not bothering to turn around. "And how is that relevant to you, kid?"

He knows the answer. He just needs to hear it. He had a feeling something like this would happen sooner or later; he was expecting it to happen once he watched that fight at the festival.

Shinsou Hitoshi must have done a lot of research to come to Shouta for help and advice. Things must've been made difficult once Shouta had to stay away from work for a week, which means the kid was waiting for him to come back to UA.

"I want to get into the hero course," he hears from behind him, "just like you did!"

He hums, uninterested. Shinsou doesn't seem satisfied with his lack of a real answer, though, as he starts to babble on to fill the silence, his borderline desperate words giving Shouta a headache. He's trying to get him to understand, it seems, but it's like talking to a brick wall, because Shouta already knows, dammit.

It's not going to happen. Not at the rate Shinsou is at. It's not feasible at this very moment. He knows—he's read through his file multiple times. During the sports festival, too.

You can't just wish for something to happen, and you can't just ask for it either. That's not how it works for people like us.

The path he's wanting to take isn't going to be an easy one. Shinsou will have to fight for it every step of the way, and none of it will be desirable. It might not even seem like it'll be worth it while enduring it all. But he knows this, Shouta is sure.

Shinsou wouldn't have sought him out if he didn't already think it over long and hard. But Shouta just needs to make sure.

"Forget about it," he says, cutting him off. "It's nearly impossible to transfer nowadays."

Especially with a mental quirk like yours. As powerful as it is, it won't be enough against any number of people. It's easy to counter, as Midoriya showed at the festival. You'll need something more.

There's the hitch of breath behind him, but Shouta doesn't stop. Can't afford to.

There's no rebuttal, no disbelief or defiance. Not even a but. He stops himself from looking back, instead keeping his gaze straight ahead, hands in his pockets as he walks. The silence feels almost like acceptance, and Shouta hates it.

He really does sigh this time. Another dud.

He's just about to make the turn for the teacher's lounge when it happens.

"Forget about it?" It's a whisper, but it's shaky and low. Angry.

Shouta pauses, waiting.

"No." The kid's voice rises a little in volume. "I'm not gonna stop. I—I can't. I want—need to prove I can do it. I want to help people, just like you do. I want to save! And I need to prove that people like me can do the same things as everyone else, if not do them better." When he continues, it's much quieter than before. Shouta has to strain to hear him. “And if I can rub it in all their faces in the process, that’d be good too.”

Need to?

Shinsou fills in Shouta’s silence, more defensive this time. “Isn’t that why you did it? You wanted to prove yourself back then, right? So why can’t I? You can’t be the only one!”

No. Shouta isn’t the only one to have transferred into the hero course from one of the other departments. But he can count the number of others who have on one hand, and even still, he hasn’t seen it happen yet in his years of teaching here.

So why can’t I?

Shouta snorts despite himself. He shakes his head and turns to truly look at Shinsou. He’s got the same look on his face as Shouta did back then. But maybe it’s just a little more bitter than he remembers. There’s definitely a hunger there—a need, just as he said.

He wants to do good and change things for the better, and being a hero is how he plans to do that.

Shinsou is scrawny, but he’s pretty tall. There’s room for growth on those shoulders of his, Shouta can tell. His potential isn’t zero. Because of his quirk’s limitations, he’ll have to make sure to train his body even harder to keep up with everyone else, just as Shouta had to, but other than that? He would be a force to reckon with on the field.

There’s a light in the kid’s eyes now. It’s almost as if he’s surprised at the prospect of being seen and heard. At the possibility of being extended a hand. He’d probably do fine without that hand, Shouta thinks absentmindedly, but what’s the harm in giving him a little help? Shouta himself would’ve been so much better off with someone guiding him. He wouldn’t have been so clueless and reckless in his beginning years.

For the second time that day, Shouta finds himself cursing Nezu’s name for how unfair he purposefully makes things for others.

He blinks back to himself, ignoring the way the vents above cause Shinsou’s hair to move like purple waves in an ocean. He just has to make sure the kid knows what he’s getting into before he goes any further. Because if Shinsou really does get into this and starts to train like hell, only to fail halfway through without making it anywhere… it would be cruel. It would be crushing.

But it wouldn't be the first time Shouta has witnessed something like that happening.

"Do you really think you have what it takes to be a hero?"

The question takes Shinsou by surprise, and he hesitates. Shouta is about to walk off again when the teen replies with haste: "Yes! I... I have to be a hero. It's what I've been wanting for a while. I know I'm not the strongest out there, and I'll already be behind the hero students, but... I'm not what everyone says I am."

Huh. Interesting.

Shouta can hear the desperation in his voice as clear as day. It's like he has a duty to prove his worth to both himself and to others, like he has no other choice. Like he wouldn't be able to fathom any other way of existing.

And maybe he can't.

It's such an achingly familiar conversation that Shouta finds himself wishing for a jelly pack, the decision having already been made. He looks down at the student before him and beckons him into the teacher's lounge. "Come on, but I'm not writing you a late pass."

The boy's eyes nearly bug out of his head in surprise, and he quickly slips inside at Shouta's second, this time more impatient hand gesture. He still looks shocked, which makes Shouta quirk a brow.

He really is too tired for this shit. He needed to catch up on his late work and then maybe get a nice nap in before his next class, but that plan is gone now. He wouldn't want it any other way, though.

Shinsou's face lights up in faint excitement as their conversation continues, that starry-eyed expression of his not flickering out even once as strict schedules and dates are thrown his way, and Shouta suddenly feels less unsure about everything.

He can already tell this kid is going to be good for the world, too.

It doesn't really occur to Izuku that he actually lives with his teachers until the last bell rings and all of the students start to pack up to go home.

He gets up from his seat at the same time as everyone else, slipping the straps of his new backpack over his shoulders and shoving his notebook inside his jacket pocket—only for the realization to set in and make him freeze awkwardly, brows furrowed as he questions himself.

Normally he would do two things after school: run straight to another part of the city for one of his missions or jobs, or just walk with Kacchan to the house and maybe stay a little bit as an excuse to eat Auntie's food. More often than not it was the first one.

But now he can't do either of those. The first for obvious reasons and the second because Izuku isn't entirely sure Aizawa would let him go home with Kacchan. Not yet, at least.

It's not like Izuku can go back to his own place, either. He is, essentially, stuck here. And it's a weird thing, really. Now he has to rely on people to take him places. He has to allow them to help him. He can't just go out on his own or be reckless anymore.

And maybe, just maybe that part isn't so bad. Living alone, Izuku was constantly exhausted and drained. But now? He hasn't felt this good in a long time, despite everything.

So maybe it's nice. Maybe it's nice to finally be able to break that cycle and be able to let someone else do the worrying and planning for once.

He finds that he doesn't mind it nearly as much as he would've just a few months ago.

"Your smile's changing."

Izuku blinks at the suddenness of it, and he turns to see Kacchan hanging back a little ways away from the departing crowd. "What?"

"Your smile," he says, still just as quiet as before. "It's not the same."

Why does he look embarrassed when he says that?

Izuku tips his head to one side, freckles partially hidden by locks of bushy hair. He didn't even realize he was smiling before his friend pointed it out. "Is that a good or a bad thing?"

Kacchan huffs, looking away, but Izuku can see the glimmer in his eyes. The relief that stretches across his face, akin to a warrior seeing the faintest rays of sunshine after a hard night of fighting and mourning.

He looks hopeful.

"We'll see," is all he says, making Izuku laugh. He wonders if that's changed, too.

And maybe that wouldn't be the worst thing.

Kacchan leaves after making him promise to call him sometime tonight, and then Izuku is stuck waiting in the classroom after everyone else has filed out. Aizawa looks about ready to fall over with exhaustion, making Izuku wonder if he had to deal with a lot today as well.

It's not long before Yamada comes bursting in with the car keys in his hand and a wide grin on his face. He must've had a blast today, unlike his husband.

"Alright, alright! Let's get going, y'all! We're leaving early today!"

Izuku wants to ask why he considers this early, as this is the end of the school day, before he realizes with a sigh that teachers don't always leave when the students do. They still have work to get done before they can leave, which means that in the upcoming days Izuku is probably going to have to stay after school for a while, too.

Which is bad for Izuku since he's going to be leaving Missy alone for longer than she likes, but also bad for them since the extra time can give him more time to explore and test some of UA's precautions. There are a few second and third year training gyms that Izuku isn't allowed in, so obviously he's going to explore those areas first whenever he gets the chance.

"C'mon, kiddo! You wanna help me with dinner tonight? I was thinking of making shrimp tempura rolls , how does that sound?"

The voice hero starts them off toward the back entrance, still talking excitedly, and Izuku notices Aizawa trailing after them at a slower pace. He looks to still be stuck in thought, but Izuku pays it no mind and just turns his head back to assure Yamada that he's not, in fact, allergic to shellfish.

He might not like the food that much, but he's not allergic. And if Yamada's making it, he won't mind trying it.

His teacher just has a way with cooking. He'd get along well with Mitsuki and Ms. Hanako, probably.

The thought makes Izuku a lot sadder than it should for some reason.

"Am I still allowed to go out on Friday?" Izuku asks abruptly on the car ride back to the apartment. The storm from earlier has started up again, coming back with a vengeance. It was quiet during the second half of the day, but of course that wouldn't last.

The boy sees Aizawa glance at him out of the corner of his eye, and it takes all of his willpower not to look away when he meets that piercing gaze. What he really wants to ask is will you still let me patrol like you promised? Did I lose that chance because of what I did that night?

He hasn't been punished yet, is the thing. He did something bad, he fucked up, and he still hasn't been punished for running. They barely even lectured him, so something has to give way eventually, right? He's not going to just get away with it. And Aizawa retracting the promise he made that day sounds like a good form of punishment, at least to Izuku.

His patrols are one of the only things he can see being leveraged over him, and that's only because those hobbies of his are still technically illegal. They don't have to allow him any of that, which is why it physically hurts Izuku every time he thinks of Rabbit now.

Because if the answer here is no, if the answer here is you lost that chance forever, kid, Izuku wouldn't know what to do.

He would have to choose. Most likely between this—Yamada and Aizawa and Missy and UA and safety— and Rabbit.

Some faraway part of him argues that Rabbit means safety, too, and Izuku is inclined to agree.

"The internships start up after this week, which gives us a short time frame." Aizawa's voice is cool. Almost careful. "But we can do a sweep of the city if you want. Just for a couple of hours."

Izuku startles. “You’re going with me?”

“Yes,” the hero says without hesitation, and that’s how Izuku knows that part isn’t up for debate. Shit.

He scrunches up his nose but doesn’t argue. That should’ve been expected, really, and yet it annoys him all the same. Of course he wouldn’t let you go by yourself, dumbass. The one time he left you alone for five minutes you took off and got yourself caught by a top hero. Doesn’t that just scream how independent and responsible you are?

Izuku doesn’t know why he accepts the condition so easily. Maybe because Yamada is in the car as well and most assuredly listening, even as he drums his fingers on the steering wheel and hums a quiet tune, or maybe it’s because he really is just too emotionally tired to debate with Aizawa, but whatever.

Today was the first day back for him since the Sports Festival , and he thinks it went pretty alright. Better than he was expecting.

Kacchan doesn’t hate him. His classmates didn’t press him too much. Yagi isn’t disappointed in him, at least not anymore. Hell, he even had a blast annoying Aizawa and the rest of the teachers! So really, things are okay at the moment. He’s alright.

This feeling of just not being stressed is new to him. He’s rarely had the luxury of being able to just sit and think over things.

The only thing he has to figure out now is what to do about Stain. He can’t just let the vigilante continue his work. He’s done that before, and he regrets every moment of it.

He can’t continue to make that mistake. He won’t let himself do it.

Izuku knows where Stain likes to strike, and he knows his patterns. If anybody can predict where he’s going next, it’ll be Izuku. He might be able to track him down and talk. Or, if it comes to it, fight him.

The boy will probably spectacularly lose against him, just as he’s always done, but this time he could maybe tip off the police right beforehand so he could have some backup.

He could help, you know. With his quirk, the fight would be much easier.

Izuku furrows his brows and looks out the window again, watching the rain from the storm pitter-patter against the glass. This is a different voice than he's used to. This one sounds softer.

No, he thinks back. I'm not letting Aizawa anywhere near Stain. That's a recipe for disaster.

It would be a nightmare coming to life.

You're scared Stain might not like him.

Okay, Izuku's not even going to bother replying to that one. That's a stupid, stupid thing to say. Izuku is trying to figure out the best way to take Stain in—he's not trying to plan a meet-and-greet between his old mentor and his new one!

If that were the case, Izuku would do it with All Might instead. The death rate of that meeting would be significantly less than the potential death rate of the one with Aizawa.

Izuku shudders just thinking of both men meeting each other. He wonders what would happen, if Stain would consider Aizawa to be generally not worth killing, or if he'd hurt him simply because of what he stands for. He knows Aizawa certainly wouldn't give the other a chance to speak once he recognizes him; he'd go straight to trying to detain him.

And everyone knows how that would end.

Yep. Definitely not letting them meet.

He was planning on using Friday night to go search for Stain, but that plan has now been thrown into the gutter now that he knows for sure Aizawa is going to be following him.

Maybe he can persuade the man not to come on Friday night by being extra civilized and well-behaved for the rest of the week, though he doubts that'll work. Aizawa would just get suspicious.

He'll just have to work around it then. Finding Stain can come at another time. There's no other choice at the moment.

More thunder rumbles in the distance, lighting up the sky with dark flashes of blue. Izuku is suddenly reminded of the look on Iida's face when he walked into class this morning. He remembers that determined glint in his eye when he talked to Izuku—the edge to those usually polite words—and he knows he has to get to Stain before anyone else does.

Izuku is always up for a challenge, but he thinks briefly that this might be the hardest one yet.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

For how much time Ms. Kayama and Yamada have spent showing him how to do makeup, Izuku just can't seem to get it right.

To be fair, they've only shown him about two hundred times now how to do the perfect wing to go with his eye shape, so Izuku can't be too harsh on himself, but still.

He has his face pressed up almost completely against the mirror while he drags the liquid eyeliner across his waterline. Which is probably not the best idea, using liquid eyeliner. Ms. Kayama recommended trying pencil eyeliners first so he can learn how to properly do things, but Izuku has never been one to go for the easy route.

Not that Izuku had any luck with the pencil eyeliners either. He keeps ending up looking like The Winter Soldier after a hard day's work of assassinating politicians.

Izuku rarely gives up, though, so here he is in the boy's locker room at school, thirty minutes before homeroom is supposed to start.

He's playing around, in all honesty. He just got out of the shower and has his hair wrapped up in a towel—something that he's never really done before. He usually just lets it air dry and prays that his hair will magically untangle itself.

(Izuku has lost too many expensive brushes to his hair. It's tragic, really.)

Ms. Kayama said that he has beautiful long lashes, so mascara would look just perfect on him. She even gave him a bottle of her own supply for him to try. While he's not sure how to apply it to his bottom lashes without getting it on his cheek, he thinks that he actually might like it!

It brings more attention to his eyes rather than to the other imperfections on his skin and body.

And as for those imperfections…

Izuku stares at the tube of concealer in his hand, brows furrowing. He used to wear foundation a lot when he was younger to hide the bruising on his face before going outside, but he stopped doing that sometime before being accepted into UA. As Rabbit, he got better at fighting and only rarely got hit in the face, so he stopped needing it.

But now he has something more permanent on his face that he might want to cover up.

He glares at the thin white scar on his jaw, contemplating. He got it because of the fire, and his friends have most definitely noticed it sometime during the past two days already, but still. He's grateful none of them have said anything about it, as surprising as that was, but he just doesn't like the way they stare at it. They don't mean to do it, he's sure—it just happens sometimes in the middle of conversations, but what if they do decide to ask eventually? What then?

It might be better to cover it up, both for them and his own conscience. Out of sight, out of mind, right?

But just as he's twisting off the cap to the concealer, the door to the locker room opens quietly, followed by the sound of familiar footsteps —and shit, Izuku has never dropped something so fast in his goddamn life.

He has to swallow back a panicked yelp when he recognizes the quirk of the person approaching, and he shoves the makeup back into the small bag Yamada gifted him, slipping as he tries to get out of sight.

There are stalls he can hide in instead of just standing right by the mirror next to his locker—

He slips in the water puddling by his own feet, because of course he does. That's just his luck. He forgot he got out of the shower just a few minutes prior to this, which is weird since he's half naked with nothing but an All Might towel wrapped around his waist.

The cold draft up his towel should have reminded him.

Hitting the ground hard, Izuku puts a hand on his hair to make sure the towel didn't loosen and grabs the one on his waist for the same reason—but now the problem presents itself.

With no free hands, how is he supposed to get up and run? And how is he supposed to grab the makeup bag he dropped on the floor?

Izuku has less than five seconds to decide on what to do before he gets seen by his classmate, who is walking around the corner as he thinks, so he does the one thing anyone else would do in this situation—he lets go of the towel drying his hair, hoping that it won't actually unravel, and grabs the makeup bag before running.

Well. Tries to. Because the towel does end up sliding off his hair due to his movements, tangling on both his legs to make him stumble.

He curses when he lands on his knees, face planting into the ground. Fuck. That hurts. His nose fucking hurts.

He's going to sue Principal Nezu for this. There should've been a Wet Floor sign!

Why must the tile on the floor be so hard, too? There should be carpet in here. A little wet carpet won't hurt anybody!

Footsteps come to a halt right behind him. "Midoriya?"

Izuku, who is suddenly very aware that he's just showing off his ass, scrambles to his feet. "Ah, Todoroki!" He spins around, beyond embarrassed but trying to hide it. "What are you doing here? School doesn't start for another half hour!"

Todoroki blinks at him, voice giving nothing away, and it's only then that Izuku sees the towel and fresh uniform in his hand. "I woke up early, so I decided to prepare for class at school. Why are you here?"

His eyes trail down lower, and Izuku is confused about what's so interesting before he follows his gaze.

The scar on Izuku's abdomen is on full display.

Usually, he has a tight undershirt on to make sure nobody can see it if something happens to his regular shirt, but he thought he would be alone in the locker room, so he didn't bother putting one on immediately after his shower.

Panic, so thick and hot and cloying, jumps in his throat, and Izuku immediately wraps his arms across his stomach to try and cover it—as if that would erase Todoroki's memory.

He starts to back away a little, shame making his skin burn for a different reason as Todoroki meets his eyes again. "Oh, the same reason as you! I just—the showers here are better than the one at my house, so yeah!" Another step and Izuku's back collides with the corner of the wall. "I'll leave you to your stuff now! Have fun!"

To say he flees would be an understatement; Izuku fucking disappears with how fast he darts around the corner to go into one of the stalls.

Have fun? He hisses to himself when he sits on a toilet and closes the door, smacking his cheeks with his palms. He's just taking a shower, not going to an amusement park! Idiot.

He quickly wipes off his poor attempts at eyeliner in a fit of rage, and he sits there for a moment, processing just how dumb he is.

It doesn't help that just a few moments later he goes to put on his own uniform—only to realize he left it in his locker.

Fuck.

Resigning himself to his fate, Izuku waits until he hears one of the showers being turned on before running to snatch his clothes quickly. It takes him just over four seconds to put everything on, and he doesn't bother with the tie—Vlad King will have to deal. He hates it when Izuku doesn't wear his tie properly.

Before learning of Vlad King's distaste of unkempt uniforms, Izuku just didn't care enough to tie it, as he was forced to learn many kinds of knots as a child in order to always look presentable… but now that he knows he can annoy someone too by not doing it? Good luck ever seeing him with a well-done tie or bow.

He shoves his towels and makeup bag in his locker and quickly jumps up into the vents, not wanting to eavesdrop on Todoroki any longer.

If he tells anyone that the boy actually sings quietly to himself in the shower, the world might just crumble.

Todoroki brings it up at lunch, which should be a crime.

Not the singing, though Izuku wishes that's what the conversation could be about. He wants to ask when the album is dropping but figures that wouldn't be polite.

The day before, on Tuesday, Izuku invited Todoroki over to their lunch table. He wouldn't accept his refusal, either. He practically dragged him over with Kacchan's help.

So now this is the second day they're eating together, and it's strangely nice. Todoroki is quiet as he eats, but he does make light conversation when he feels his input is needed.

His voice makes Izuku warm. It also doesn't help that Izuku could stare at him for hours and never get bored. His eyes are striking.

"Does it hurt?" is what he asks, and Izuku feels pretty dumb until he realizes what Todoroki is referring to.

Uneasiness settles at the pit of his stomach like a snake. Kacchan is sitting at Kirishima's table today, so he won't be able to save him, and Iida and Uraraka are engaged in one of their own conversations.

They're not listening, which is good. But he still can't help but be hesitant. "Does what hurt?" He shoves a piece of fried fish into his mouth. Take the hint. Please play dumb, Todo.

"Your scar," Todoroki says bluntly, now staring right at him in something that looks like concern. It may also be confusion and a bit of anger. Izuku is too busy scarfing down his lunch as quickly as possible to look into it.

"Does yours?" He says, trying to match his bluntness, only to wince immediately after he does it.

Todoroki stares down at his food too. "No. But it itches sometimes."

Izuku looks up to stare at the side of his face. He figured a scar that size would itch, but to not even hurt at all? He didn't expect that. Maybe it's because of how old Todoroki's is. The one on Izuku's abdomen is, what, a year old now? Just about. Maybe that's what's different.

He goes back to staring at his food, chewing thoughtfully. Aizawa must've prepared it today, as Izuku knows Yamada doesn't approve of jelly packs at lunch.

Though the new flavor Izuku is currently slurping down is delectable. He might have to ask Aizawa if they can get more secretly.

"How did you get it?" Todoroki asks abruptly, and Izuku forces his expression not to drop.

He wonders why he's interested in it in the first place, as it's just a scar. It's not important. But this is also the most Izuku has ever talked with Todoroki in one sitting since the Sports Festival, so he doesn't want to take any chances that'll potentially mess this up. He likes talking with him. A lot.

He's just calming, even though his quirk feels like it's boiling most of the time.

Izuku shouldn't lie to him.

"A bullet," he says, maybe a little too cheerfully, and Todoroki blinks.

"Oh." As always, his face gives nothing away. Izuku wishes he could see more of his emotions sometimes so he'd be able to gauge how he should act around him.

Maybe that's part of the reason why Todoroki allures him so much. He's interesting. Though it could also be the expensive cologne, too.

Izuku likes rich stuff.

"I have lotions that help soothe scars," Todoroki says suddenly. "My father has plenty, so I'll bring you a few bottles. It might help."

What? Izuku is so shocked by the gesture that he can't even come up with something to say at first. He sets down his chopsticks, about to say he doesn't have to do that, holy shit, Todoroki, but the other boy tips his head and speaks again.

"Midoriya, I noticed it this morning… you use a towel with your father's face on it?"

Izuku promptly chokes.

Stumped is a fun word to say. It reminds Izuku of large trees in the middle of nowhere, of stars peeking brightly through canopies of leaves. He doesn't know quite why, but it does.

So yeah. Stumped is a pretty cool word, right up until you find yourself in a situation where you're actually stumped.

Izuku glares at the chessboard in front of him, one hand gripping his pants in frustration and the other holding up his chin. This is getting to be stupid now.

He's losing. He can tell.

It's been a couple days of back-and-forth Chess playing. It started on Monday and only evolved from there. Izuku will come in the morning and move his piece, and when he comes back less than an hour later between classes, another piece on the opposing side will be moved.

This is their third game. Izuku's opponent moves quickly, and usually Izuku could say the same thing about himself, but right now he's moving slower than a turtle.

He just can't see a way out of this one.

Izuku takes his trusty pawn and moves it to the only viable place, but he hesitates in letting it go. He doesn't want to see it gone, even though there really is no choice.

For a second, Izuku eyes the cup of hot tea his opponent keeps leaving him, staring at the small chip on the top as he thinks. He never drinks it, but it makes for a good background to focus on while he goes through his internal struggles.

He moves his pawn to another spot and holds it there, cringing even more at the choice. Shit. It's a slightly better decision than the last, but it's still crappy.

"I wouldn't recommend that."

Izuku doesn't flinch. He felt him coming ten seconds ago. He's also too irritated with himself to care that much. "You trapped me," he mutters to himself.

"There are still ways for you to win," Principal Nezu reminds, and Izuku's eye twitches.

"I know, but I'd still be losing my piece."

"It's just a pawn," he soothes, sitting on his cushion politely. He takes a whole tea kettle out of nowhere and pours himself his own cup of tea. Izuku ignores it when he pours a little more into the untouched one.

“Yeah, but it’s the same pawn I’ve stuck to since the beginning. I can’t lose it now.”

“If you are so attached, there are two more pawns for you to use. They’ve been trapped in their places for three turns now. I’d be happy to take one of them instead.”

You fucker.

“You shouldn’t trade lives,” Izuku says suddenly, eyes not leaving the piece.

Nezu is quiet as he sips his tea. Izuku hates him already, and this is only the first time he’s seen the mammal face-to-face. “Sometimes,” he says, voice not wavering, “we have no choice.”

He is patient as Izuku runs through all the mistakes he’s made leading up to now. The boy thinks about how he could’ve prevented this, and then he thinks of any and all possible options he has left. He could maybe use one of his other pieces as bait and hope Nezu leaves his pawn alone, but he knows he won’t.

Dammit. Izuku breathes out and lets the pawn go, watching with disappointed eyes as Nezu leans forward to take it.

Izuku accepts the small defeat quietly and continues playing with the stoat. He’s not too interested in this game anymore. Every move of Izuku’s is usually planned out and expected, as is every time his pieces are taken, but this time wasn’t planned.

He was caught off guard, so to Izuku the entire game has already been lost.

It’s Thursday, the day of the parent-teacher conferences. He’s currently supposed to be in homeroom, but Aizawa was being a bigger ass than usual this morning, so Izuku decided to accidentally get lost in the vents for the entirety of that period and then some.

UA is a big place, can you blame him?

Sure, Izuku was also being a bit of a handful this morning, but he still maintains that he was completely innocent and without fault in the argument he had with Aizawa. Izuku had himself 100% under control and was being 90% respectful right up until Aizawa called him childish.

That's when Izuku decided to be even back with him, which resulted in Aizawa getting pissed and then Izuku getting pissed… Yeah. It wasn't a fun time. Especially since the argument only sort of ended because of Yamada's interference. The man stressed that maybe they should both apologize to each other and be a little more compassionate.

Aizawa eventually apologized, as surprising as that is. Izuku refused to, as he still wasn't over the childish remark, and thus the bickering started right back up.

So overall it was a great start to the day! The car ride was silent on the way to school, and it felt so wrong that Izuku was really close to just opening the door and jumping in front of one of the oncoming trucks.

Izuku was being a little petty—he knows this, but he just couldn't bring himself to apologize to the man. Not then.

He's been feeling on edge since yesterday for some unknown reason. He knows that whenever he gets like this he tends to be a little sharp around the edges and short-tempered, but he didn't think it would be a problem, really.

Except he forgot how hard it is to be living with other people in the house. At his apartment, Izuku was living alone and never really had to keep himself in check like that whenever he got 'moody,' as there was no one for him to get mad at, but now things are different. And he tried to not be so upset this morning, he truly did. But there's just something about being called childish when he is anything but that grinds Izuku's nerves.

Okay, yeah, so maybe Izuku isn't completely faultless. Maybe the fault is actually 100% on him.

It didn't help that Izuku's emotions were already all over the place after working up the courage to call Mitsuki last night. He told his aunt he was staying with one of his teachers—his homeroom teacher, to be exact. After thinking about what Kacchan said that day, he realized that Auntie deserves to know. It wouldn't be fair to keep that hidden from her, especially since she would probably just find out anyways later on.

He told her that his father had another last minute extended stay in America, so he wouldn't be home for another couple months at least. He explained that Hisashi called the school and asked if it was possible for one of the staff members to check in on Izuku every once in a while, and UA instead just offered to house Izuku until his father could arrive back.

Which Izuku would like to think is an amazing excuse.

Auntie was glad he would finally be watched over by someone who's actually present in his life, but she also made sure to tell Izuku that if he ever wants to stay over, the Bakugou household will always be open to him. She would love for him to come if he ever doesn't want to stay with his teacher.

(Izuku was reminded once again that he doesn't deserve Auntie. Not in the slightest.)

He scratches at his jaw and stares as Nezu sets the board back up again. As predicted, Izuku lost the game. There's no surprises there. He lost the other two as well, but at least he got closer those other times.

Izuku made a stupid mistake this game. He won't make it in the future.

Principal Nezu doesn't start a new game once he's finished moving the last piece back into place. Instead, he moves the chess set off to the side and takes another polite sip of tea. "Do you know what time it is, Midoriya?"

Izuku's phone is set to vibrate every five minutes, and since it's been about four minutes and forty-seven seconds since the last time it did that, it's safe to guess that it's probably just after 8:59.

But it's not like Izuku is going to admit that he knows that. He's supposed to be lost right now. "I'm not sure, sir." He tips his head, eyes sliding up to finally look at the mammal. "Does your wristwatch not work?"

"I'm afraid the batteries have given all they can," Nezu explains with a small sigh, "and I have yet to get the chance to buy more."

As if to show proof, he angles the watch on his paw into what little light the vent hatch a couple yards away provides. Izuku can see that it's stuck on exactly six o'clock, something that doesn't really feel like a coincidence.

Before he can respond, the bell marking the beginning of second period rings, and Izuku's heart sinks a little lower. He doesn't want to miss Yamada's class, but he also doesn't want to leave too quickly lest the stoat gets suspicious of something.

Nezu leans back in his cushion and fiddles with his own paws. Izuku wonders if he's wishing for a cigar right now.

"Midoriya, I see life as one large game of chess," the mammal begins, now looking right at him. Izuku reluctantly stares back. "Life and chess both have similar elements, don't you think? You have the difficult decision-making, the frustration, the quiet victories, and the consequence that is losing things that belong to you. Familiar, isn't it?"

Nezu presses a small button on the side of the chess board, something that Izuku spotted the second time he came here to continue playing, and a large hologram of the previous game lights up. It's a recording—or a fun reenactment, maybe, but seeing his own wrongdoings laid out in front of him again in real time makes Izuku want to leave. Immediately, preferably.

The video speeds up and switches to a bird's eye view of the game. Izuku can feel Nezu watching him intently as he scans the hologram to figure out exactly where he fucked up: the little move that set him on the wrong path six turns earlier, to be precise.

Izuku had a feeling it wouldn't end well then and he still did it. It was stupid for sure. He should've listened to himself.

When Izuku looks back down at his lap, Nezu lets out a soft hum. "I suppose the only difference between the two is that mistakes made here are far more trivial than those made in real life."

A flick of one claw, and the video changes to an actual recording. This one is from the Sports Festival, when Izuku used Force on Kacchan by accident and quite nearly sealed both their fates. He watches screen-Izuku peel himself up off the ground to stumble all the way over to his friend, the smoke following him like a cape.

His heart rate starts to pick up the more he watches, the more he sees Kacchan groggily try to push the medic bots away. The video changes, and Izuku sees the crumbled remains of his old apartment, his home. A warning poster with the Hero Killer's details and attributes flutters down to the ground in front of the camera, and Izuku glares off to the side.

Of course life is a game. That's why Izuku keeps on losing.

"There are ways to avoid that flavor of hurt," Nezu says, as if reading his thoughts. "We just have to find that balance. We have to learn from our experiences and let those who truly understand us lend a paw. Only then will things begin to get easier as the burdens are shared."

Izuku leans back against the vent wall, wondering how and why Nezu is so knowledgeable on this. But then he remembers some of the more sensitive files he has on the mammal, the ones currently sealed away and scribbled all over in his notebook, and Izuku understands.

Nezu is extending that paw right now, isn't he? He's asking for his help in building the other half of the swaying bridge. And why wouldn't he, the sadder part of himself asks, the part that's still locked in his father's basement and crying for help where no one but the monsters can hear, when we're one and the same?

Stolen and raised to be exploited. They're just two things that shouldn't exist.

Huh. Next game Izuku will get him for sure. He knows it. He won't fail.

When Principal Nezu offers him the cracked cup for the second time to take with him on his way to class, Izuku accepts it.

He quite likes the way this mystery tea tastes.

There's something about conferences that always has Izuku on edge. Maybe it's the face-to-face conversations and lecturing that makes him uncomfortable, or maybe it's just the idea of having to sit there and listen to his wrongdoings and failures being spoken of aloud that does it.

Either way, Izuku is going to be avoiding this conference for as long as possible. Hopefully Aizawa completely forgot about it, or maybe he won't even bother with it since, well, Izuku is living with him now.

The point of a parent-teacher conference is so the teacher can tell the parent everything that's going on, right? And since Izuku is kind of lacking in the parent department at the moment (forever), there's no need for one at all. Aizawa and Yamada are probably the closest things to caretakers, but as his teachers they should already be in the know.

So the point of this all is lost to Izuku. He should've been allowed to stay back at the apartment. This is a waste of his time.

After Principal Nezu welcomes all the parents and visitors and apologizes for having to push back the original date for the event, everyone is left to mingle and talk and explore the campus. The students were all given specific times for when their conference would start, so all things are orderly.

For now.

Izuku is going to ruin one thing tonight at least, mark his words.

He's planning to hide away in the vents or in Power Loader's off-limits experiment rooms when Uraraka suddenly grabs him by the arm from out of nowhere and tugs him over to meet her parents, where he tries to look as presentable as possible so as not to embarrass her.

And if Izuku makes a weird dying noise at the back of his throat when Uraraka introduces him as one of her best friends, no one has to know. It doesn't help when Mrs. Uraraka smiles softly at him and says that they've already heard a lot about him.

(Izuku must be levitating at this point, and not because of Uraraka's quirk.)

The Uraraka family is strangely chaotic but quiet, on a similar wavelength to the Bakugou family but not quite as fiery. They feel very… homely. Very down to earth.

But they're also determined. When Izuku tries to slip away, not wanting to bother them for too much longer, Mr. Uraraka asks him to accompany them on the tour of the school if he had the time.

And really, how was Izuku supposed to say no?

“Ooh, ooh! Deku, tell them what this one represents!” Uraraka excitedly bounces up and down once they reach the bigger part of UA’s main hallway, the part where all of the past years’ most memorable moments and awards are shown. “This one’s my favorite.”

Izuku dutifully whips out one of his mini notebooks and quickly flips to the page, sharing her enthusiasm. “That one is actually a really old one! In just his second year’s work study, Best Jeanist managed to save over fifty civilians and even his mentor during an impromptu battle with White Sun, a villain with a light manipulation quirk capable of permanently blinding or burning anyone fighting her.” Izuku glances at the two adults to see their reactions, and he continues brightly. “She was placed in Tartarus soon after, and the capture is one of UA’s highest achievements.”

The award itself is a small thing, but it’s shiny and was specially made by the Hero’s Commission to thank Hakamada.

“He’s the number four hero for a reason, huh?” Mr. Uraraka says, looking at all the awards in slight awe as they walk.

Mrs. Uraraka blinks. “I didn’t even know he went to UA.”

The best heroes did.

After another five minutes of exploring UA with Uraraka’s parents, Izuku sees Todoroki walking by himself, no Endeavor in sight. He looks lost in thought, almost troubled, so Izuku excuses himself quickly.

He has a feeling he might’ve come off as weird to the Uraraka family anyway.

“Hey, Todo!” He falls into step right beside him, beaming. The taller boy glances down at him, faint surprise coloring his features. “Are you alone, too?”

“He’s arriving late,” Todoroki explains, though it sounds like he’d rather Endeavor not show up at all. “He’ll be here in time for the conference and that’s all.”

Which makes sense. Endeavor isn’t a big fan of underground heroes, or anyone in general for that matter, so it’s unlikely he’d stay for any longer than needs be. The meeting with Aizawa, a pro hero who is supposed to be teaching his son how to be the greatest, is not going to go well, Izuku predicts. He wishes there were vents big enough to eavesdrop through in the heroics class conference room. Witnessing that shitshow might just make this whole thing worth it.

Izuku hums and skips along happily, not faltering even when Todoroki tips his head and asks him a question.

“You asked if I was alone, too. Your parents aren’t coming?”

“Nope!” Izuku pops the p and glares at Monoma from far away when he sees the blond walking past and boasting loudly to his guardians. “They couldn’t make it tonight.”

Todoroki’s eyebrows pinch together. “But I saw All Might talking to Mic-sensei earlier.”

For a second, Izuku doesn’t know why that would matter, but then the voices in his head start to cackle as they always do when Izuku’s suffering increases, and he sighs in exasperation. “Todoroki, I keep telling you he’s not my dad. I’m serious!”

If you want to know my dad so badly, just look at All Might and think of all his personality traits and morals, and then think of the exact opposite. That should do it.

“Oh. Okay.” Todoroki’s voice doesn’t match with his words. It doesn’t sound like he believes him at all, but he drops the subject nonetheless. He probably thinks Izuku is still trying to keep it on the downlow.

And while All Might being mistaken as his father is not the worst thing that could happen, it embarrasses Izuku greatly. He would promptly die if Yagi himself heard Todoroki call him that.

Now, what’s really embarrassing and incredibly awkward is having to walk past a group of business course and general studies students talking to each other in a large group about Rabbit.

Now, to be fair, they could be talking about the stripper, but the chances of that are low.

Izuku walks by quickly, wanting to listen but also not in case he somehow spills his secret just by being around them. It’s like when you go to an airport and suddenly start worrying if you have a gun or bomb hidden somewhere on your body that you didn’t know about. There’s no reason for Izuku to think his identity might be outed just by existing around people talking about him, but that doesn’t stop him from worrying.

He doesn't know where they're going, and neither does Todoroki, probably, but it's a nice stroll.

"He should have a calling symbol," Todoroki says abruptly when they're nearing the front of the school again.

"Who? Rabbit?" At Todoroki's serious nod, Izuku laughs. "Like Batman?"

His friend just blinks, and that's when Izuku remembers that the standard person won't know who that is.

"I think Rabbit should have a device for when he needs to call for backup," Todoroki explains, staring ahead of him.

"Backup?" Izuku questions. "He doesn't really work with a team, does he? He's still a criminal, so I can't see him with any pro heroes as allies."

A considering tilt of the head. "In the right circumstance, anyone would be willing to help. Bad fights call for team ups. Many heroes would support him, I think."

Izuku matches Todoroki's expression, thinking. The dual-haired boy's interest in Rabbit surprised Izuku at first. He first mentioned the vigilante that day when Izuku invited him over to the lunch table, and Izuku pretty quickly realized that part of Todoroki's interest might come from their shared distaste in Endeavor.

Which only makes Izuku all the more willing to entertain the idea of a calling card. It sounds fun, honestly! He'd finally be chasing that dream of being a little like Batman.

Maybe it could double as a firework in the shape of a dick. That way everyone would know that it's Rabbit. Ooh, or maybe there could be multiple fireworks surrounding a bigger one that explodes into Rabbit's insignia!

"Hey, what do you think about adding fire to that idea? With fireworks?"

Todoroki isn't even fazed. "It would draw attention, so fireworks would work."

"It might even be better than some boring spotlight thing!" Izuku agrees, bouncing up and down on his toes. "It would fit perfectly with Rabbit's persona. I think he would like it."

"But he would still be breaking more laws by using the fireworks," Todoroki points out after a moment's consideration.

"That's even better—!" There's the rush of air behind Izuku, and the boy breaks off and immediately drops to the floor, just barely missing the gray capture scarf that wraps around the space he was in just half a second ago. "Hey! What was that f—!"

Oh. Oh no.

Izuku wishes he didn't turn around, as now he feels like a fool. He quickly glances down at his phone, and—yep! It's eight o'clock. His meeting with Aizawa started ten minutes ago. Meaning Izuku was supposed to be in the meeting room ten minutes ago.

"You're late, Midoriya. Again ." Aizawa is less than pleased, and Izuku straightens up at the tone, not liking the murderous look on his teacher's face.

Fucking fuck. Izuku told him this morning that he wouldn't be late, but only because Yamada was there and listening. He never planned on actually following through with it, mostly because he didn't think Aizawa would be up for another chase, but it seems he was wrong.

Play dumb, some part of his brain says, and Izuku's mouth moves without his permission.

"Who's Midoriya?"

A beat of silence. Todoroki stares at him, intrigued now at how this is going to end, and Aizawa just blinks at how insanely stupid Izuku is. He looks like he's just about seen it all.

It's only when Aizawa raises the capture weapon again that Izuku moves.

"Okay, yeah, that was dumb, but listen!" He says, raising his hands innocently and ignoring Todoroki's quiet acknowledgement of the teacher . "I wasn't even checking the time, I swear! It was an accident! I didn't mean to be late!" He winces. "I mean, I did, but only sort of."

"Sort of?" Aizawa echoes, and it sounds like another nail in Izuku's coffin.

Yeah, he should shut up now.

Five seconds stretch on between the three of them, and Izuku is suddenly aware of a few students and parents walking past them and giving them weird looks. This must look funny to an outsider.

He blinks, and then—

“Oh my god, it’s a villain!” He points behind Aizawa and doesn’t stay long enough to even see if he fell for it. He turns and bolts, shouting an apology to Todoroki for leaving him.

This is survival of the fittest now. He’ll have to understand.

Now, the thing about Aizawa’s quirk is that first you have to see your target and make a kind of mental tally in your head for it to actually work on them. So if Aizawa sees movement out of the very corner of his eye and chooses not to acknowledge it, the chances of the person still maintaining control over their quirk are high.

So the point is that Aizawa’s quirk is extremely overpowered for his job. It’s perfect for chases and group fights since it won’t necessarily affect any of his allies unless he wants it to—the Erasure will only work on the villain in question.

As Izuku runs and darts between parents and students, trying to get out of his teacher’s line of sight, his quirks remain erased the entire time, but everyone else’s around him are perfectly intact as far as he can see.

(And okay, yeah, maybe Izuku shouldn’t be distracting himself by gushing over his teacher’s quirk for the thousandth time, but what else is there to do?)

This is bullshit. He shouldn’t have to be running in the first place, as the conference shouldn’t even be a thing! A parent-teacher conference with no parent is just a teacher’s conference! Which is not something Izuku would like to be part of, thanks.

Aizawa is just being stupid again, that has to be the reason. He’s so fucking controlling.

He feels Aizawa slow down from where he rounds the corner of the hallway, and Izuku doesn’t waste any time before slipping out of the open front doors, feeling a little panicky now.

Technically he's not supposed to be going outside, but he's not going to run, so no one can be mad! He follows UA's outside wall and goes to where he knows the more secretive second entrance is, punching in Aizawa's ID code for admission before jumping inside.

He slams into someone's back immediately upon entering, making him grab his nose and stumble as he stutters out an apology. Shit. He felt their quirk, he was just going a little too fast to prepare for it—

"Oh, hey kiddo!"

Izuku should've accepted his death peacefully while he could.

Bakugou Mitsuki turns around and immediately brightens up, eyes crinkling near the edges when she smiles. "We were just talking about you, sweetie! I haven't seen you in so long." She goes in for a hug and clutches him tight, squeezing the breath out of him.

"It was only a week, Auntie— oomph!" She picks him up off the ground easily and quite nearly cracks his ribcage before setting him back down again, leaving him dizzy.

Izuku feels Kacchan walking towards them with Masaru right behind, and his hands start to tremor again, just slightly.

"How've you been doing?" She asks, pulling back with her hands on her hips. Her eyes are piercing, and it looks like she's searching for something on Izuku's face.

"I'm okay!" He says quickly, seeing Aizawa start to slow down out of the corner of his vision once he spots them. "Nothing but the weather has changed."

Mitsuki doesn't laugh, but she shakes her head in fondness before frowning. "Another new scar, huh?" She reaches forward to thumb the spot on his jaw, and Izuku inwardly preens, his troubles momentarily forgotten. "You need to be more careful, y'know. You're worse than Katsuki."

"Hey!" Kacchan interjects, and Mitsuki immediately turns on him for a petty squabble.

Normalcy at last.

Masaru gives Izuku a side hug when he comes over, and his awkward smile is enough to make Izuku relax again. Okay, maybe it was too long.

He usually sees the Bakugou family at least three times a week, and that's not including when he sleeps over on Thursdays. So to be gone for over a week? It must've been weird.

Aizawa walks up from behind and puts a light hand on Izuku's shoulder, telling him he's there—as if Izuku couldn't already feel him.

Damn. The plan for escape has been foiled.

Mitsuki, as if sensing the newcomer, plasters that bright grin back on her face and stops her mini fight with Kacchan. "Ah, you must be Mr. Aizawa! The boys have told me a lot about you!"

Oh, Jesus fucking shit. No! Izuku is still angry at Aizawa, so now is not a good time to bring up his idolization of him. That's not how things are supposed to go.

"I'm Bakugou Mitsuki, Katsuki's mom!"

Masaru smiles warmly too, leaning in for a handshake. "Bakugou Masaru. Pleasure to finally meet you."

Aizawa dips his head and moves a little now so he's beside Izuku, hand still on his shoulder—likely so he won't escape again. "Same to you both." He nods in a greeting at Kacchan, who just sours his expression and looks away.

Izuku bites back a snicker. As long as Kacchan is suffering too, he won't complain so much.

He sees Aizawa open his mouth, likely to excuse Izuku so they can do the conference, but Auntie speaks first.

"You know, Izuku and Katsuki here have been together since they were babies! I was happy to see them both get into the same school and have the same teacher. They can't be split up for too long or—"

A blush has Izuku's cheeks burning a dark shade of red, and he jolts in embarrassment. "Auntie!" He says quickly at the same time as Kacchan barks at her to shut her trap.

"Oh?" is all Aizawa says, one eyebrow raised, which doesn't help. The bastard is betraying Izuku. He's intrigued.

This is exactly what he never wanted to happen. Aizawa and Mitsuki meeting? It's not a good thing. The world is going to collapse. Izuku can feel it going off kilter right now! Actually, he's tipping over as they speak—

The hand on his shoulder tightens briefly so Izuku won't fall dramatically, but Izuku's mind is already on the floor. It's sliding away.

"Yeah!" Mitsuki continues. "And they haven't changed one bit from when they were younger, I assure ya. They have a problem with roughhousing a lot."

No! Please, stop! He locks eyes with Masaru, who must hear his silent plea. "Mitsuki, let's not waste Mr. Aizawa's time here. I'm sure he's very busy."

"Oh, please, I just want to talk more with who my nephew is staying with!" A light bulb seems to go off in her head, and she looks at Izuku in concern. "Kiddo, I know you called and told us you would be living with your teacher for a bit, so I'm assuming there's no Hisashi tonight?"

If Izuku's father actually showed up, every single person in Japan would know it.

The smile slips off his face, and he shakes his head tightly. "Not this time," he says, trying not to sound too cheerful, and she seems to understand, as for once she doesn't press.

She just sighs in disappointment before pursing her lips. "Of course he didn't."

The only reason she's disappointed is because she probably wanted to be able to punch someone tonight, and Izuku doesn't blame her.

"He never shows up," Kacchan says darkly, his crimson eyes boring into Izuku's even though he's not really talking to him. "Did you really think he would, hag?"

Shut. Up.

Izuku glares at him in warning, well aware of Aizawa listening to all of this and taking it in. Kacchan stares right back, equally as determined.

I'm so going to fuck you up later, Izuku promises his friend silently, and Kacchan tips his head forward, as if saying he's looking forward to it.

Masaru looks from Izuku to Aizawa and back again. "In that case, do you need one of us to step in and—?"

"No!" Izuku practically shouts, and everyone in a twenty feet radius turns to stare at him briefly. He laughs nervously and continues before Aizawa can cut in. "No, sorry, it's alright! That's already taken care of. Er, sensei said I don't need a guardian present, so…"

He can't have them talking too much. He loves Auntie and he loves Masaru, too, but he just does not want them in that conference room. Because once Mitsuki starts talking, she won't stop. And Aizawa, being the information-hungry bastard he is right now, won't bother stopping her either.

"Oh, well, okay!" Masaru messes up Izuku's hair briefly before doing the same to Kacchan. "Good to hear that things were worked out beforehand, son."
